HIDJRA (HEGIRA), the migration of the Prophet from Mecca to Medina, the starting point of the Muhammadan era.

The Prophet, not having succeeded in overcoming the resistance of the Kuraish and on the other hand having already won friends among the people around Medina (then called Yathrib), resolved to remove to the latter town. The Arabic word hidjra should not be translated "flight", for the idea of fleeing is not properly expressed by the verb ḥadjara. This verb means "to break off relations, to abandon one's tribe, to emigrate". At the present day in Muslim countries the name Muhājir is still given to Muslims who have quitted countries in which Christian powers have become established. The word does not imply that there has been precipitate flight but only difficulty in living or repugnance to living in the country abandoned.

Muḥammad, according to Ma'sūdi (Tanbih), had ordered his followers to migrate to Medina; they set out in small parties. Among the first to reach Medina was 'Omar, afterwards Caliph. This migration had certainly been preceded by negotiations with the people of Medina, as Ṭabari's Chronicle (Persian synopsis ii. 437 sqq.) relates. The Prophet himself set out accompanied by Abū Bakr. He left 'Alī behind to return some property entrusted him to their owners. 'Alī remained three days behind in Mecca and then joined the other emigrants.

A very popular legend is associated with the Prophet's migration. The Kuraish wished to slay him and appeared in the morning at his house; but they met only 'Alī who drove them back at the sword's point. They then rushed off to pursue Muḥammad on the road to Medina. When the latter heard of this, he hid with Abū Bakr in a cave and God willed that a spider should spin its web at the entrance to this cave. When the Kuraish saw the web, they thought it impossible that any one could be inside and passed by. This story explains the allusion in Sūra ix. 40: "when the two were in the cave and he said to his companion: Be not afraid, see! God is with us". (Cf. R. Basset, La Borda du Chaikh el-Bousiri, p. 81—86, and the parallels given there).

Along the road the Anṣār came flocking up to the Prophet; they took the reins of his camel and begged him to settle among their tribes. But Muḥammad answered: "Let my camel go; it is obeying God's command". (Cf. Ma'sūdi, Prairies d'Or, iv. 139).

The traditions regarding the erection of the first mosque and institution of the Friday service are also connected with this journey. The Prophet is said to have entered the house of Sa'd b. Khathama in Ḳubā and to have had a mosque built there. He is said to have performed the solemn Friday service (ṣalāt al-Djum'a) for the first time with the Banū Sālim, when he came among them on his way. Arriving in Medina he took up his abode with the Anṣārī Abū Ayyūb.

Authorities are not agreed on the exact date of the Hidjra. According to the most usual account, it took place on the 8th Rabi' I (20th Sept. 622). But this would not be the date of the departure from Mecca but of the arrival in Medina. According to other versions, it was the 2nd or the 12th Rabi' I. Al-Bīrūnī says that the Jews were just celebrating the 'Ashūrā festival (Day of Atonement) when the Muslims arrived in Medina.

The 8th was preferred as it was a Monday. According to a tradition, the Prophet is said to have answered when asked why he observed Monday especially, "on this day was I born, on this day I received my prophetic mission and on this day I migrated".

The fixing of the Hidjra as the beginning of the Muhammadan era dates from the Caliph 'Omar. The traditions which try to trace it to the Prophet himself are devoid of all probability. According to another tradition, Ya'la b. Omaiya, Abū Bakr's governor in the Yemen, was the first to use it, but the view that it dates from 'Omar is by far the most prevalent.

It is related in various forms that 'Omar after having regulated the administration of finance and made up the registers and the levies of taxes found himself embarrassed about the dating, or rather he was reproached for not dating at all. According to a tradition quoted by al-Bīrūnī, Abū Musā al-Ashʿarī wrote to him saying: "Thou art sending us letters undated". The Caliph discussed the matter with his officers and after investigating the customs of the Greeks and Persians it was decided to establish an era. Some proposed to date from the birth of the Prophet, but this date was not certain. 'Alī is then said to have proposed to take the Hidjra as the beginning of the era, as it marked the date when the Prophet began to assume sovereign power. This decision was come to in the year 17 or 18, some however say 16. but the general view is the year 17.

Before fixing this date the Muslims gave their years names such as "year of the permission", "year of the earthquake", "year of the farewell" etc. (Cf. al-Bīrūnī, Chronology, p. 35). When Muḥammad began his preaching, the Arabs were reckoning from the "year of the elephant".

The year of the Hidjra was then chosen as the year 1; but as the calendar was already fixed by the Qurʾān, the months were retained and Muḥarram was retained as the first month because business is resumed then after the pilgrimage. The era thus began, not with the day of the Hidjra but with the 1st day of the moon of Muḥarram of the Hidjra year. This first day fell upon a Friday and corresponded to the 16th Tammūz (July) 933 of the Seleucid era, and 622 of the Julian calendar.

(B. CARRA DE VAUX.)

HIKĀYA has had a varied history, of importance not only lexicologically but also in the development of Arabic literature. In Lane (pp. 618 sqq.) the history is unfortunately confused, but when we turn to the native lexicons (e. g. Lisān, xviii. 207 sqq.) we are met with the paradox that the meanings are not those found in the great mass of later Arabic writings and that the commonest later meaning, "story", "narrative", occurs hardly at all. The root does not come in the Qurʾān (there ḥadīth is commonest as a noun and ḥaṣṣa and nabbaʿa as verbs; on asāfir al-awwalin see Sprenger, Leben, ii. 390 sqq.) and as used in traditions it means to imitate an action, usually in a bad sense (Lisān, loc. cit.). Hikāya is therefore μιμησις and from that all follows. In the first instance it is mimicking for purposes of amusement; the professional ḥakīya is a mimic. Then imitation of speech may be reproduction; thus ḥakaitu ʿanhu ʿl-ḥadīth "I reproduced from him the tradition". It can also involve simple resemblance as though one thing reproduced another by being like it. So the meanings remained for at least the first four centuries. Theologically the distinction lasted much longer. In the Kulliyāt (xvii. cent. A. D.; quoted in Muḥīt al-muḥīt, i. 431^b) ḥakā cannot be said of Allāh since there is nothing like his speech; but see Baiḍawī on Kur. xxxviii, 164 and Ibn ʿArabshāh, Fakīhat al-Khulafāʾ, ed. Freytag, p. 108, l. 25. In the Fihrist (latter part of iv. cent.) narratives are akhbār, sometimes aḥādīth, and stories told for entertainment are asmār or khurāfāt or aḥādīth but never ḥikāyāt; see, for example, the well known passage on the history of The 1001 Nights (pp. 304 sqq. and cf. p. 313). Asmār, of course, may also be historical, e. g. al-asmār al-ṣaḥīḥa (p. 305, l. 9) while ḥadīth has been, from beginning to end, the broadest word of all. But ḥikāya in the Fihrist means only a reproduction of a statement, a transcript, e. g. p. 275, l. 20 ḥikāya min khaṭṭi . . . "a transcript from the handwriting of . . .", l. 21. mā ḥādhihi ḥikāyatuhu, "of which this is a transcript". It may often be translated "statement", and is in oratio recta when there is nothing to the contrary. In Hamza of Ispahān (early part of fourth century) the usage of the root is the same, e. g. p. 17, l. 12, p. 64, l. 1, p. 65, l. 13, p. 201, l. 4 of ed. Gottwaldt. In the Aghānī (Abū ʿl-Faraj d. 356) ḥiṣṣa, ḥadīth and khabar seem to be used indifferently for narrations, but ḥikāya as in the Fihrist and by Hamza, e. g. ed. Bülāḳ, i. p. 4, l. 20: ḥādhi mā samīʿtu min Abī Bakr ʿin ḥikāyatun wal-lafzu yaʿzidu wa-yanḥuṣu "this is a general reproduction of what I heard from Abū Bakr although the expression may not be exactly in his words". Yet the verb ḥakā occurs in the meaning "narrate". See vol. viii. p. 162, ll. 7 and 10, where the verb and ḥikāya come side by side, the latter in the sense "imitation". Apparently the noun retained the original meaning longer. In Masʿūdī's (d. 345-346) well known passage on the Nights (Murūdj, iv. 89 sq.; de Sacy in his Mémoire on the origin of the Nights gives the passage in four forms) khurāfa is the word used for such tales; ḥikāya does not occur. It may be said generally that the older translations of this word (e. g. by Gottwaldt, Kosegarten, Barbier de Meynard) are misleading. Thus in Masʿūdī, viii. 16 sq. it is mimicking that is meant and not story-telling. But when we reach Ḥariri (d. 516) ḥakā is used at the beginning of the Maḥmūt indifferently with ḥaddaṭha, akhbāra and rawā in the sense "to narrate". But he also (ed. de Sacy², vol. ii, p. 420) uses ḥakā in the old sense of "resemble" which later became so archaic that the commentators had to explain it. With Ḥariri the change of meaning is complete, and when we turn to the oldest Mss of the Nights (both the Galland Ms and that of the "Story of Sul and Shumul" at Tübingen are of the early xivth cent. A. D., after A. H. 700) we find ḥikāya in normal use for a story told for entertainment. See Seybold's Geschichte von Sul u. Schumul, p. 164, and my "Story of the Fisherman and the Jinni", in the Nöldeke-Festschrift, passim. Of the words for such tales used in the Fihrist and by Masʿūdī, asmār has fallen back to its original use of conversation and tales told at night in the desert life, and khurāfāt has developed to mean only ridiculously impossible stories, as opposed to those which are fictitious but pleasing; thus in Damiri's Ḥayāt al-Ḥayawān, i. 185, l. 31 of ed. of Cairo 1313, khurāfāt al-riyāda, and ii. 101, l. 25, khurāfāt al-arab. Only in Tripoli, apparently, is it still the normal word for "story"; see Stumme, Märchen aus Tripolis.

change of meaning be in any way bridged and explained? and, What must have been the character of the first hikāyāt in the new sense? There have always been stories in Arabic from those told in the Kur'ān and the competing translations from Persian by Naḍr b. al-Ḥārith (Ibn Hishām, p. 191), to the modern ḥaddūta or Marchen, told in colloquial and, so far, reduced to writing and print only by European scholars and some eccentric Egyptians and Syrians. The very multiplicity of names for the different kinds of the story shows how they have been cultivated and how keenly they have been distinguished. Some of these names have been given above. Others are riwāya which began by being the oral recital of a narrative or a poem by a rāwī and has now become an ordinary word for "story" and the normal word for a play, comedy or tragedy, with or without tam-thīliya added; mathal (amthāl), the story as an example or illustration of some situation or precept, e. g. Kalīla wa-Dimna and all beast-fables ('ulā al-sināti-l-ḥayawān); ṣira (siyar), "manner of life" and then "biography"; nawādir, unconnected anecdotes; ḥiṣṣa (ḥiṣa), a story of any kind but specialized by Kur'ānic usage and that of the professional ḥuṣṣā (Goldziher, Muh. Studien, ii. 161 sq.) to legends of the past and stories about the prophets. To these last the first hikāyāt formed an exact opposite. They were not stories of the past but pictures of the present. This is made plain by the only example so far printed, Hikāyat Abi 'l-Kāsim al-Baghādī, edited by Adam Mez under the title, Abulkāsim ein bagdāder Sittenbild. The author, Muḥammad Abu 'l-Muṭaḥhar al-Azdi, shows in his preface that he knows that he is producing a new literary form. It is not to be a poem or a riṣāla or a maḥāma (he must have known those of Hamadhāni) but a realistic transcript of Baghdād manners and phrases in the person of a, for us, very disreputable representative who, however, seems to be regarded by the author as of literary refinement. Story there is none, but a day is filled with a dinner party and with scraps of verse and of ornate prose in the current forms of rhetoric, but all concrete and direct, written not for the sake of playing with words but of producing a picture of life. The use of a single figure to mirror the ideas and ways of a city he defends with a long quotation from Ḍjāḥiẓ (Bayān, ed. Cairo, p. 31, ll. 12-24) who seems to have been the first to take pleasure in pictures of classes of the people. Yet it is only a new application of the realism of the old poetry of the desert to the artificial town life, marked, however, with all the coarseness of language and idea which distinguished the town from the desert and the new from the old. Of the hikāya badawīya, meant probably as a contrast, which the author says (p. 2, l. 16) he has added we have no trace left.

But ḥukīya in the quotation from Ḍjāḥiẓ is evidently used of a mimic and not of a literary artist who creates a representative figure. The development which produced so striking a literary genre as that of Abu 'l-Muṭaḥhar calls, therefore, for explanation, and I would suggest that it was due to the influence of the Aristotelian doctrine of μimēsis in art (Poetics, i.-iv.). Ḍjāḥiẓ died in A. H. 266 and Abu 'l-Muṭaḥhar wrote after 400 (Mez, p. xv.). But it is evident that the Poetics of Aristotle found translators and attention only slowly. There was a Muḥṭaṣar by al-Kindī (d. about 247; Fihrist, p. 250, l. 5 and 257, l. 6) but no full translation until that of Maṭṭī b. Yūnus (d. 328; Fihrist, pp. 250 l. 4; 263, last l.) and his pupil Yahyā b. 'Adī (d. 364) wrote a tafsir on it (Fihrist, pp. 250 l. 4; 264, l. 12). In that translation (ed. by Margoliouth in his Analecta Orientalia) the word used for μimēsis is hikāya. The conception of literary art as an "imitation" of life may thus, when translated into Arabic forms, easily have resulted in Abu 'l-Muṭaḥhar's new literary type. The next development into "story" must have come very rapidly for we find that Ḥariri (d. 516) has forgotten so completely the earlier uses that he can apply hikāya even to such amthāl as the apologues in Kalīla wa-Dimna (ed. de Sacy², i. 13). When he implies in the same passage that his own maḥāmāt are also hikāyāt he is much nearer the true meaning, for they are certainly renderings of contemporary life though treated with artificial rhetoric and a playing with words for the sake of word-play. On this side they are the nearest that the Arabic of literature ever reached toward that life of the open road and of living by one's wits that is the mark of the picaresque novel. But in popular Arabic the same motif was taken up and extended in such tales as the cycle that surrounds the name of 'Alī al-Zaibak. On the picaresque side these are true reproductions of life; there is an abbreviated recension of them in the Nights and much longer independent forms have been printed at Beyrout and Cairo.

But before hikāya reached the possibility of being used for any story it must have passed through a stage in which it meant a fictitious story, not of wonderful happenings in the past or in distant lands or by the agency of the djinn and of talismans, but of such life as its readers themselves knew. Examples would be the cycles in The 1001 Nights known as "The Hunchback" or, very differently, "Alī b. Bakkār and Shams al-Nahār". In this way a specifically new thing entered Arabic literature. There is no trace of it in the Fihrist even as there is no trace of the beginnings of the maḥāma as developed later by Hamadhāni and Ḥariri. We have record there of professional entertainers (mudḥḥikūn, *nudamū*², pp. 151-155), of wonderful tales, love-stories and stories of the djinn (pp. 304 sq.), but of nothing which can be identified as belonging to this particular genre. To Abu 'l-Faraj, the author of the Aghāni, Ibn Khallikān, in Wüstenfeld's text (nº. 451) ascribes a "Book of hikāyāt", but this elsewhere is read al-ḥānūt, "taverns", (Kosegarten, Prooimium to his ed. of Aghāni, p. 196, and so, decisively, Wright, Chrestomathy, p. 87, l. 11 from the autograph Ms).

We have thus the appearance, practically at the same time between the fourth and the fifth centuries of the Hidjra, of two new forms which in their beginnings were closely akin but which quickly separated into two widely different types. The maḥāma was at first practically a hikāya in the original sense, and the hikāya of Abu 'l-Muṭaḥhar is practically such a monologue, though not one delivered standing as was the maḥāma. But to Abu 'l-Muṭaḥhar his new form was distinct from the maḥāma and was rather a development from the mimetic hikāya. The intention in the two forms was different and the difference is expressed in the names applied to them by their authors. The maḳāma was an oration and therefore ran out in rhetoric; the ḥikāya was a reproduction and therefore turned to action and life. The latter transformation must have been aided by the rapid development in the verb ḥakā of the meaning "narrate". So ḥikawātī now means "public story-teller" and ḥikāya came to be applicable to any tale, while still retaining even in the colloquial (see Dozy, sub voc.) the possibility of the original meaning. And probably even in the ḥikawātī there is still some feeling left of the mimic, as the oriental story-teller always acts out his tale. Yet the terms are sometimes curiously confused. Thus in Nuḥat al-Abṣār wa 'l-Asmā' fī Akh-bār Dhawāt al-Ḳinā' (date?) there is (pp. 82—89 of ed. of Cairo, 1305) a short realistic story fī dhamm al-nisā' which is called a maḳāma.

Only one consideration remains. This development has been conditioned and limited by a constant factor. The professed litterateur, at least in Arabic Islām, has always, with few and individual exceptions, looked down upon the story and refused to recognize it. He has never condescended to a narrative of fictitious facts and events told for its own sake. Such he left to professional entertainers, buffoons and the vulgar in general. The only stories recognized as forming part of polite literature have been those with an ulterior object. They have been apologues (amthāl) as in Kalīla wa-Dimna, Fāḳihāt al-Khulafā', Sulwān al-Mufa' and the like; or simply vehicles for poetry and rhetorical prose, like Law'at al-Shāḳī and the whole range of maḳāmāt; or collections of historical and literary anecdotes like I'lām al-Nās, al-Faradj ba'd al-Shidda and Maṣārī' al-Ush-shāḳ; or stories with ethical or mystical purpose, as Salāmān and Absāl and Ḥayy ibn Yaqẓān of Ibn Sīnā and the Muḥaiyalāt of 'Alī 'Azīz of Crete. Yet Muslim writers were early in contact with stories in good literary standing which came to them from without. They had translations of Greek romances and of Persian and Indian tales (Fihrist, pp. 305 sq.; Ḥamza of Ispahān, p. 41 sq.). In the time of the compiler of the Fihrist also it was evidently possible for a reputable author to write stories; on p. 306, ll. 9 sq. he gives the names of several. See, too, (p. 304, ll. 21 sq.) how Djahshiyārī, a writer of distinction, could occupy himself with the compilation of a collection similar to The 1001 Nights and a brother of Shāfi' could transcribe it. But the popularity of such things under the 'Abbāsids was so great that the warrākūn took to writing them and that naturally affected their standing (p. 308, ll. 9 sq.). The relation also to the professional jester and entertainer was too close; see on these pp. 140 sq. and especially on Abu 'l-'Anbas and his standing, partly as astronomer and partly as nadīm of al-Mutawwakil and purveyor of bāḥ literature, p. 151, ll. 23 sq. So stories tended to be anonymous and to be classified with dubious subjects — stories of the baḥ-fāṭūn, of Djuhā, of bāḥ (pp. 313 sq.). This is well illustrated by The 1001 Nights. We have there stories showing in their structure a technical skill beyond any public reciter; but they are as anonymous as Märchen; their authors did not dare to own them. Such are "Kamar al-Zamān and Budūr", "The Three Ladies of Baghdād", "The Three Apples" and the realistic novels. The romances of chivalry, on the other hand, in so far as they professed to be biographies (siyar) and not ḥikāyāt, required the support of the authority of stated authors, but the names given are usually unknown to us and probably always false; cf. above on 'ANTARA, i. 362 and on BAI-BARS, p. 589^b sq.

The above holds of Arabic-speaking Islām. In Turkish, apparently, and still more in Persian, stories retained a position of higher literary respect and were treated with greater care as to style, although there also they tend to anonymity. Further, the Turkish meddāḥ corresponds closely to the old Arabic ḥākiya, and in the modern development of a new Turkish literature the art of the meddāḥ is influencing the realistic novel. For many specimens of meddāḥ-stories — strikingly resembling in type the ḥikāya of Abu 'l-Muṭahhar — see Georg Jacob's Türkische Bibliothek, passim, and on the whole subject the introduction to vol. i. 6 sqq. and Paul Horn, Gesch. d. türk. Moderne, pp. 12 sqq.

HIKMA, (Hebr. ḥokhmā, Syr. ḥekhmāthā), "wisdom". In the ancient portions of the Qur'ān the term is applied to the Prophet's preaching (xvi. 126; liv. 4), then it is used as synonymous with "sacred, revealed book" (iii. 43, 75, 158; iv. 57; v. 110; xvii. 41; the "Gospel" xliii, 63) and applied to the Qur'ān itself (ii. 231; iv. 113; xxxiii. 34; lxii. 2). Its original acceptance is found in ii. 272; applied to David, ii. 252; xxxviii. 19, and to the sage Luḳmān, xxxi. 11. In this last passage it is explained by Ṭabarī, (Tafsīr, xxi. 39) as "knowledge (ḥikm) of religion, reason and truth" and by Baiḍawī (ed. Fleischer, ii. 113, 3). "Ḥikma in the conventional language of the learned means the perfecting of the human mind by the acquisition of the speculative sciences and complete faculty for doing excellent deeds according to the ability possessed". The same idea of wisdom is already found in the Ḳatabān inscriptions where H-K-M is an epithet of the moon-god. (Ditlef Nielsen, Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., lxvi. (1912), p. 592, l. 25; H. Derenbourg, Revue d'Assyriol., v. (1902), p. 117 sqq.). The lexicographers define ḥikma as "the knowledge of the best thing by means of the best science" (Lisān, xv, 30); "to be just in a judicial decision, to know the truth of things as they are and to act according to the requirements thereof" (Tāj al-'Arūs, viii. 253); "the science in which is sought the true nature of things, as they are in themselves, as far as is humanly possible" (Ḥādījī Khalifa, Lex. Bibl., iii. 84). The word has practically come to be synonymous with falsafa [q. v.], which originally meant Greek philosophy set forth in Arabic (Ibn Khaldūn, Prolegomena, Būlak, i. 399; Ḥādījī Khalifa, iii. 89). Ḥikmat al-Ishrāḳ, a kind of neo-Platonic mysticism, is the philosophy of illumination (mushrikīya) [see FALSAFA, p. 50^b infra]. Practised as early as the time of Avicenna who wrote a work entitled al-Ḥikma al-Mushrikīya, it had at that time a secret character which it has since lost. The Alchemists call their science ḥikma (cf. Maḥāṣin al-'Ulūm, p. 256).

HİLĀDJ (or HĀLĀDJ), a Persian word adopted into Arabic, an astrological term, associated with katkhudā by Ibn al-Rūmī (died 284 = 897) in a celebrated verse. According to the Burhān-i kāfī s. v., where it is derived from the Greek, it means "elixir of life". By its assonance to Hālādji, the word has given 'Aṭṭār a title for his Hilādji-Nāmāh, a long Persian poem, which describes the ideal of mystic union in the form of the story of a martyr.

HILAL, an Arab tribe belonging to the Maʿaddī (Ismāʿīlī) group. Its genealogy is Hilāl b. ʿAmir b. Ṣaṣaʿa b. Muʿāwiya b. Bakr b. Hawāzin.... b. Kais ʿAilān. During the Djahiliya they worshipped at Tabāla the idol Khalaṣa, called the Kaʿba of the Yemen, which was also worshipped by the Baḍjila, Ḥārith b. Kaʿb and Khathʿam.

They lived in Naḍjd (on the Yemen border) and were neighbours of the Sulaim [q. v.]. The following places belonged to them, al-ʿAbḷāʾ, Buraik (with the Harra of the Banū Hilāl), Dūmī, al-Futuḵ, al-Ḳurāihā (the two latter were already ruined by Hamdānī's time), Qharwash, Marrān (a large town on the road to Baṣra with numerous wells, palms, and cornfields), Sārīḥa or Ḍarīḥa and the famous market place of ʿUkāz (in Hamdānī's time); the following wādis: Djildhān, Runīya, and Turaba (near Mecca, very fertile; shared with the Dibāb and ʿAmir b. Rabīʿa), and the following mountains: Baiṣh [with the lake al-Naḳʿā; in Wüstenfeld, Register, p. 224, wrongly Boss and al-Baḳʿa (Baḳʿa)] and al-Kaffā. There were also many Hilāl at Bisha [q. v.]. According to Hamdānī, they spoke good Arabic.

Historical. In the pre-Muḥammadan period, Ḍamra b. Māʿiz, chief of the Hilāl, on a raid slew several of the Azd; the chief of the Azd, the poet Hādji, then made war on them and took many prisoners. On the 'day' of al-Watida (al-Watidāt) between the ʿAmir b. Ṣaṣaʿa and the Tamim, the Hilāl fought on the side of the former and lost nearly 80 men killed. During the 'Fidjār' [q. v.] battles between the Ḳuraish and Kināna on the one side and the Hawāzin on the other we find the Hilāl on the side of their kinsmen, the Hawāzin [q. v.]. Just before the conclusion of peace between the Hawāzin and Ḳuraish and the Kināna, at the instigation of Wahb b. Muʿattib, the chief of the Thakif, a tribe related to the Hawāzin, they made a raid upon the Banū Laith, a clan of the Kināna and stole their cattle, under the leadership of Rabīʿa b. Abī Zabyān in conjunction with other tribes of the ʿAmir b. Ṣaṣaʿa. When, after the conquest of Mecca by the Prophet in 8 = 630, the Hawāzin and the Thakif advanced against Muḥammad in Mecca under Mālik b. ʿAwf, the Hilāl also joined them. In the third year of the reign of the ʿAbbāsīd Caliph al-Wāṭhiḳ (230 = 844-845) his general Bughā al-Kabir sent an army against the Hilāl, who were then with the Sulaim creating unrest in Medina, and had three hundred of the malcontents thrown into prison in Medina; they attempted to escape from here along with the Sulaim prisoners but were prevented by the Medinese and, when they resisted, were massacred to a man. The tribe afterwards migrated to Egypt where they settled at first in the Nile Delta, but were afterwards conquered by the Fāṭimid Sulṭān al-ʿAzīz (365—386 = 975-996) and forced by him to take up their abode in Upper Egypt, as they had taken the side of the Karmatians. Maḳrīzī tells us that in 797 they lived in the Aswān district in the province of al-Ṣaʿīd; among their clans in Egypt he mentions the Banū ʿAmr, Rifāʿa, Ḥādji or Hudjair, Kurra (at Ikḥmīm), ʿUkbā or ʿAkāba (Wüstenfeld, Maḳrīzī (see Bibl.) p. 464 erroneously: Corra) and Djamīla near Aṣfūn (Uṣfūn; Wüstenfeld, l.c.: Asfur, a misprint) and Asnā. In the year 444 = 1052, at the instigation of the Fāṭimid Caliph al-Mustanṣir (427—487 = 1035—1094), they migrated to North Africa (Ḳairawān) where after considerable fighting they conquered the Djiris, the former governors in the Fāṭimids, then the real lords of the country. Many tribes in Africa trace their descent from Hilāl.

The migration of the B. Hilāl to Africa and the wars which they had to wage during the conquest of the country form the historical background of a collection of heroic tales and love stories, the romance or rather epic, Sira Banī Hilāl (History of the B. Hilāl) which exists in two recensions (Sira al-Shāmiya and Sira al-Hidjāziya) containing three cycles.

The first cycle describes the history (the Sira proper) of the B. Hilāl in Bilād al-Sarw wa ʿUbāda. Two sons, Djabir and Djubair, are born to al-Mundhir, son of Hilāl, by his two wives Ḥadhbaʿ and ʿAdhbaʿ on the same night. Djubair goes off with his mother and afterwards becomes Sulṭān in Naḍjd. — The Emīrs Hāzim and Rizḳ of the line of Djabir rule in Bilād al-Sarw. Rizḳ marries al-Khadrā, the daughter of the Sharif of Mecca, whom he had aided against the king of Rūm. She bears him a son, the dark Barakāt, afterwards called Abū Zaid (Zēd). Hāzim's successor is his son Sirḥām (Sarḥān); the latter is succeeded by his son Ḥasan, who marries Kharmā, queen of the Yemen, after conquering the fire-worshippers in the land of Bardhakhā, against whom Kharmā had appealed for help. India is conquered with the help of Abū Zaid and Ḥasan then goes with Kharmā to Bilād al-Sarw wa ʿUbāda.

The second cycle deals with the migration (riḥla) of the Banū Hilāl to the land of Naḍjd. A famine drove the Hilāl from Bilād al-Sarw to Naḍjd, where they were received in the most kindly fashion by king Ḡhānim and his sons Dhiʿāb (Diyāb, of the line of Djubair) and their people, the Banū Zughba. The Hilāl conquer the king al-Haidabī, who was chief of the seven rulers of Nejd; Ḥasan, who marries al-Nāfila, sister of Dhiʿāb, then rules in Nejd with vassal kings. A war breaks out between Dhiʿāb, who kills two of Ḥasan's brothers, and Abū Zaid; Dhiʿāb submits and peace reigns.

The third cycle deals with the migration of the Hilāl to the west (Taghriba) and their wars with the Zanāṭi Caliph in Tunis. In 460 = 1068 Abū Zaid with his retinue goes to Tunis to seek a more productive dwelling-place on account of the famine reigning in Naḍjd. Saʿda, the daughter of the Zanāṭi Caliph, who falls deeply in love with Mir'ī (Mar'ī), one of Abū Zaid's companions, uses her influence on their behalf. Abū Zaid then returns to Najd and the Banū Hilāl begin their migration westwards. After many adventures (the expedition into the land of the Persians with the seven Sultāns and their battles there, the capture of al-Māriya, daughter of the Kaḏī Budair, the battles with al-Ḥaḏbān, king of the Kurds and Turkomans, with al-Bardawīl b. Rashīd (Baldwin I, 1109—1118) al-Serkasī Ibn Nāzil, al-Firmand, the ruler of Egypt, al-Mādi, the king of Bilād al-Ša'id, etc.) they enter the land of the Zanātī Caliph. Al-Zanātī advanced against the Hilāl and kills two of Dhi'āb's brothers. After al-Zanātī had been killed with the help of Dhi'āb, the struggle begins for the possession of the seven thrones and the fourteen citadels of the western land. Hasan and Abū Zaid are treacherously murdered by Dhi'āb. The orphans endeavour to avenge these murders. Under the leadership of Buraiḳī, son of Hasan and nephew of Dhi'āb, and al-Djāziya, Hasan's sister, they go out against Dhi'āb and slay him, after he has killed Djāziya by a kick. Buraiḳī, who then takes the throne, by his tyrannical rule arouses a general rebellion among the B. Zughba in which he loses his life at the hands of Naṣr al-Dīn, son of Dhi'āb.

Of the two chief heroes of the romances, Abū Zaid and Dhi'āb, only the latter is found in history, but there he plays only an unimportant part, like Roland, the hero of the epic of the Charlemagne cycle.

The brief synopsis here given only covers the main outlines of this romance, so highly valuable for philology and the history of Arab culture, which contains a great number of separate stories. Cf. M. Hartmann, Die Benī Hilāl-Geschichten in the Zeitschr. für afrikan. und ocean. Sprachen, iv. 289 sqq.

HILĀL AL-ŠABĪ. [See AL-ŠABĪ.]

HILĀLĪ, the pen-name of BADR AL-DĪN. Of Čaghatāi origin and born at Astarābād he was educated at Herāt, and was patronised by 'Alī Šēr. The fullest account of him is by Sām Mirzā who was a friend of his. (See Silvestre de Sacy in Not. et Extraits, iv. 285). The account there given of his begging to be put to death by a certain young man is not in the B. M. copies of the Tuhfat-Samī and may be an interpolation. Hilālī's best known poem is the Shāh u Darwish (Shāh u Gada). Bābur severely criticises its morality, and Rieu, II, 656, seems to take the same view, but Professor Ethé claims it to be a spiritual poem, and has translated it into German verse, Morgenländ. Studien, p. 197—282. See India Off. Cat., N^o. 1426, p. 783, Hilālī was put to death as a Šhī'a heretic by 'Ubad Allāh (Šhaibānī's sister's son) in 939 (1532-1533).

HILF (A.), a league or confederacy, originally of tribes or clans, which had previously formed more or less closed units. The ceremonial act by which the alliance was usually completed seems to have had for its object the unification of the previously separated groups. Cf. Joh. Pedersen, Den Semitiske Ed etc., Copenhagen 1912, p. 10, 20—32 (German ed., Der Eid bei den Semiten, 1914, p. 7, 21—31), where it is made probable that the idea of "swearing" is not the fundamental notion in the root H-L-F but has developed out of the notion of confederacy.

The parties, by the league, became ḥulafā' (sing. ḥalīf) to one another; a single individual could also enter into a hilf with a tribe. In this case the conception of hilf coincides often with that of djīwār.

Some confederacies are worthy of special mention, e. g. the Hilf al-Muṭaiyabīn, the league which 'Abd Manāf formed with several Kuraish clans against the 'Abd al-Dār, when the latter declined to give up their privileges. The name al-Muṭaiyabūn (the perfumed) is said to be derived from the fact that the confederates dipped their hands in a vessel of ṣīb (perfume) at the Ka'ba and then rubbed the Ka'ba. The Muṭaiyabūn are mentioned in a letter of Muḥammad to the Khuzā'a. — The 'Abd al-Dār on their part formed a league with other clans and were called al-Aḥlāf (Ibn Hishām, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 84, sq.; Ibn Kutaiba, Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 294; al-Ya'qūbī, ed. Houtsma, i. 287 sq.; al-Mas'ūdī, Paris edition, iii. 120 sq.; Caetani, Annali dell' Islam, i. Intro., §§ 85—87, ii. 1, anno 8, §§ 20—21 and other sources and works given there).

Hilf al-Fuḏūl was the name of a league of several Kuraish clans, who banded themselves together to intervene on behalf of those who were treated unjustly. At the formation of this confederacy Zamzam water, with which the edges of the Ka'ba had previously been washed, was drunk. The meaning of al-Fuḏūl is uncertain; the most varied explanations are given by the Arab authorities. Muḥammad is said to have been present at the conclusion of this alliance and to have esteemed it very highly (this is also told of the Hilf al-Muṭaiyabīn, e. g. al-Tabarī, Tafsīr, v. 35 supra). It is related of al-Ḥusain b. 'Alī that he once threatened an Umayyad governor of Medina with the militia of the Hilf al-Fuḏūl. (*Aghānī*¹, xvi. 63—71; Ibn Hishām, p. 85 sq.; Ibn Kutaiba, l. c.; al-Mas'ūdī, iv. 122 sqq.; Caetani, o. c., i. introd. §§ 146, 147). Cf. also the Ribāb (sing. Rubbī, cf. al-Tabarī, i. 1914, 4, 2221, 9, 10; Ibn Duraid, Kit. al-Ishṭikāḳ, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 111; Id., Cairo 1316, ii. 41, cf. 39, 26 sqq.; Aghānī, s. Ind.; Caetani, o. c., i. ii. s. Ind.), the "bloodlickers" (Laḥāḳat al-Dam; Ibn Hishām, p. 125; Aghānī, vii. 26, 28; Caetani, o. c., i. Intro. §§ 169, 170), the Aḥābiḥ (al-Ya'qūbī, i. 278 sq.; Aghānī, xix. 76 sq.; Caetani, o. c., i. Intro. § 305, and passim) etc.

A hereditary right of the ḥalīf confirmed by Qurʾān iv. 37 (according to another view it refers to the brotherhood of the Muhājirūn and Anṣār) was abolished by xxxiii. 6; cf. al-Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, v. 31—35; Th. W. Juynboll, Handbuch des islāmischen Gesetzes, p. 239 note.

In Islām which was to make all its adherents brothers the ḥilf was condemned; the Prophet is made to say: lā ḥilfa fī 'l-Islām, but he is said to have recommended the fulfilment of obligations of alliances contracted in the Djāhiliya (cf. also al-Ṭabarī, o. c., v. 34, 17 sqq.).

HILL. [See ḤALĀL.]

AL-HILLA, a town in the wilāyet of Baghdād, the capital of the sandjak of the same name, with 30,000 inhabitants (Cuinet), was founded in 495 (1101—1102) by Ṣadaqa b. Mansūr al-Mazyadī and given the name Ḥillat Banī Mazyad (settlement of the B. Mazyad). The site was happily chosen by the vigorous Arab emir on the site which had once been occupied by the famous city of Babel, ruins of which still exist some miles up the river. The river, which flows past the town and which has since about the viii (xiith) century been regarded as Euphrates proper, was regarded by the Arab geographers as an arm of the main stream and was called Nahr Sūrā al-Asfal. Even before the foundation of Hilla there was a flourishing town here, called al-Djamī'ain, on the left bank, while Ṣadaqa built his town on the opposite side. The bridge of boats, by which communication between the two banks was carried on, soon became the main passage across the river on the road from Baghdād to Kūfa, which had previously led via Kaṣr ibn Hubaira. Hilla as a result rapidly began to flourish and down to the present day has always been a centre of great importance, from the military point of view also.

AL-HILLI, ṢAFI AL-DĪN 'ABD AL-'AZĪZ B. SARĀVĀ, an Arab poet, born on the 5th Rabi' II 677 (26th Aug. 1278) at Hilla on the Euphrates, settled at the court of the Urtukids of Mārdin and sang their praises. In 726 (1326) he went to Cairo to the court of al-Malik al-Nāṣir but soon returned to Mārdin and died in 750 (1349) or 752 (1351) in Baghdād. As a rule he only follows in the footsteps of his predecessors in his very numerous poems. Only in popular poetry did he introduce an innovation by inventing a kind of muwawṣṣah, called muḍamman.

The collection entitled Durar al-Nuḥūr, in which the fame of the Urtukid al-Malik al-Mansūr of Mārdin is sung, contains 29 poems each of 29 distiches, all of which begin with the same letter and end with the letters of the alphabet in order. A poem entitled al-Kāfiya al-bad'iya is devoted to the praise of the Prophet and was annotated by the author himself. The Kitāb al-'aṭil al-ḥālī is a treatise on the metres of popular poetry called zajal, marwālī, kānkān, and kūmā. His Diwān was printed in Damascus (1297—1300) and Bairūt (1300); a poem in honour of Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Abu 'l-Makārim was translated by G. H. Bernstein into Latin (Leipzig 1816).

AL-HILLI, the native of Hilla [q. v.], the name of three esteemed Imāmiya theologians.

1. Naḍīm al-Dīn Djāfar b. Muḥammad, called al-Muḥakkik, died about 674 (1275), author of the Sharā'if al-Islām, the standard handbook on Shī'ī law (translated into Russian by Kasembeg, into French by Querry).

2. Djāmāl al-Dīn al-Ḥasān b. al-Muṭahhar, called 'Allāma, died in 726 (1326); author of the Khulāṣat al-Aḥwāl, besides other treatises.

3. Aḥmad b. Fahd, died in 806 (1403), "Shāikh al-Muta'akkhkhīrīn".

HILMEND [See HELMAND.]

HIMĀLA [See ḤAMĀ'IL.]

AL-HIMĀR (A.), the ass. Tame (al-ahlī) and wild (al-waḥshī, al-fara') are distinguished. Some of the tame asses are beasts of burden, others are ridden; many of the latter are very swift. The ass can find its way again by a road even though it has only traversed it once before; its hearing is keen and it suffers little from disease. The ass is of special importance in Persia, Syria and Egypt. Many Arabs will not ride an ass out of pride, and it is not considered proper to mention the ass by its real name in good society. Its bray is exceedingly repulsive; the dog howls with pain when it hears it. When an ass brays, it has seen a devil; when a cock crows, it has seen an angel. If a stone be tied to an ass's tail, it will not bray. When an ass sees a lion, it stands still or runs at the lion; it is said to be saved thereby. If a man is bitten by a scorpion, he should sit backwards upon an ass and the pain then passes to the ass. The uses of various parts of the ass in medicine are innumerable.

Wild asses are so like one another that no man can distinguish them. The he ass is very jealous; when he sees a young male, he tears his testicles out with his teeth for fear he should cover a she ass, when he grows up. The she ass knows this and therefore shortly before foaling she goes to some inaccessible place and does not return to the herd until her foal has hard hoofs and can run swiftly. It is further remarkable that individuals never separate from the herd, even though there are thousands of them. Hunting wild asses is therefore very easy. The hunter hides in a narrow pass and waits till a wild ass comes along and then kills it. The others could escape if they fled back, but as they remain together, the hunter is able to slay as many as he cares. This however does not agree with the descriptions of hunting scenes collected by G. Jacob from the poets.

There is a breed called Akhḍariya, called after a stallion of Kisrā Ardasḥir which bred with wild asses or those that had run wild. These are the finest and swiftest among wild asses. According to some authors, the wild ass reaches an age of 200, according to others, 800 years.

(J. RUSKA.)

ḤIMṢ (pronounced Höms) is situated in the great Orontes plain of Central Syria, about a mile from the Orontes (Nahr al-ʿĀṣī) on a canal connected with it. The town, which has 50,000 inhabitants (of whom 15,000 are orthodox Greeks), is the capital of a Liwāʾ under a kāʾimmaḡām and belongs to the wilāyet of Damascus. It is connected by railway with Tripolis, with Ḥamā and Aleppo, and with Damascus via Rayāḡ.

Ḥimṣ (called 'Emesa' by the Greeks and Romans; on the various forms see the article 'Emesa' in Pauly-Wissowa's Realencycl.) is not one of the towns founded by the Seleucids; the town is first mentioned by Pliny; in the time of Pompey the adjacent Arethusa (Restan) was the seat of an Arab dynasty (see Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, i. 245). Emesa was the birthplace of the Emperor Elagabalus, who rebuilt with great splendour the famous temple of the sun-god here from whom he took his name, and furthered the prosperity of the town in every way by granting it privileges. In the Byzantine period also when we already find the name Χέμψ; it was a flourishing city and the see of a bishop.

At the end of the year 13 the inhabitants concluded a treaty with the Arabs by which by paying a sum of money they secured peace to protect their trade. In the beginning of 14, with the help of a Byzantine garrison, they were able to ward off an attack on the town but it fell to the Arabs at the end of the year after a two months' siege. They seem to have left the town again next year, at least, it is several times said that it surrendered to Abū ʿUbaida in 16 and received a grant of protection. On the division of Syria into military districts Ḥimṣ became the capital of a ḡjund [q. v.] It rebelled under Marwān II, was taken by storm and severely punished. As a rule the ḡjund's of Ḥimṣ and Aleppo were administered by the same governor. We possess information on the revenues of Ḥimṣ for various periods [cf. ḤALAB]. While the figures for Ḥimṣ are wanting in the Ḍjirāḡ al-Dawla and in al-Muḡaddasī, we still possess al-Yaʿqūbī's and al-Isfahānī's figures. The yield of the taxes of Ḥimṣ (cf. Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems, p. 44—48) (reckoning the dinār at 10 shillings) was:

a. for the reign of Ḥārūn al-Rashīd (170—193), according to a quotation from al-Djahshiyārī's Kitāb al-Wuzarāʾ, 320,000 dinars and 1000 camel-loads of dried grapes (the vineyards of Ḥimṣ were famous and were only destroyed during the Crusades).

b. for the year 204 (Ḳudāma's Kitāb al-Kharādj) 118,000 dinārs (the same sum is given by al-Isfahānī, quoted by Ibn Khurdādhbih).

c. for the year 250, according to Ibn Khurdādhbih, 340,000 dinārs.

d. for the year 278, 220,000 dinārs (al-Yaʿqūbī, who wrote about this time).

The low figures given by Ḳudāma, al-Isfahānī and al-Yaʿqūbī are due to a different method of calculating the revenue; they have perhaps deducted the salaries of the officials or other administrative expenses in their calculation.

Under the Ḥamdānīd Saif al-Dawla [q. v.] Ḥimṣ passed under the rule of the kings of Ḥalab and was frequently granted by them as a fief. Among those who there held it we may mention Saif's cousin, the famous poet Abū Firās ʿAlī, whom Saʿd al-Dawla deprived of the town. In 367 he granted Ḥimṣ to his general Bakdjūr, whose government of it was highly praised; a minaret of architectural interest (with Kūfic inscription) dates from his time. During this period Ḥimṣ suffered from the repeated ravages of the Byzantines. In 475 it belonged to the notorious Bedouin chief Ḳhalaf b. Mulāʾib (cf. M. Hartmann, Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Pal. Verein., xxiv. 49—66), who recognised the Fāṭimid caliph as his overlord. Enraged at this and moved by the complaints of Ḳhalaf's subjects against his cruelty, the Salḡūḡ Sulṡān ordered the Emīr of Syria to take him prisoner. He was besieged in 483, captured and brought in a cage to Isfahān. Ḥimṣ was granted to Sulṡān Tutuṡh from whom his son Riḡwān inherited it. He granted Ḥimṣ in 491 to his stepfather Ḍjanāḡ al-Dawla, who was murdered by the Ismāʿīlites in 491. Later we find an Emīr Ḳarādja (perhaps identical with the vassal lord of Harrān, one of Malikshāḡ's mamlūks. After his death in 506 his son Khirkhān [see ḤAMĀ] succeeded him and died in 523. His children, who were still minors, suffered a great deal from Zangī's efforts to conquer Ḥimṣ, till their guardian in 530 exchanged the city for Palmyra and Raḡba with Shihāb al-Dīn Maḡmūd, king of Damascus. The latter at first granted it in fief to his vizier Ōnör, but after long negotiations finally transferred it to his stepfather Zangī in 532 (Ōnör received other towns in compensation). Nūr al-Dīn inherited it from Zangī and his son Ismāʿīl from him, till Saladin received it in 570. Four years later he appointed his cousin Muḡammad b. Shirkūḡ ruler of it. With one interruption (it was taken by al-Nāṣir Yūsuf II of Aleppo in 646 and ceded to him, but seems only to have remained a short time in his possession), his descendants remained rulers of Ḥimṣ till 661; they had readily opened their gates to the Mongol Khān Hülāḡū. From 661 it was governed by deputy-governors, sometimes attached to Ḥamā, sometimes to Damascus. In the xviiith century an aḡḡā of a native family ruled there, independent of the Pasha of Damascus. In the xixth century Ḥimṣ passed, like Aleppo, under Egyptian rule (1831—1840) but it suffered so much from the arbitrary conduct [cf. ḤALAB] of the officials that a rebellion broke out, which was with difficulty suppressed.

Only a few insignificant ruins of the city wall (see plan) and gates survive, while of the citadel, which was destroyed by Ibrāhīm Pasha, a tower with an inscription of the year 594 of Saladin's cousin, Muḥammad b. Shirkūh, and a gate still stand (see plan). The mausoleum of the great general Khālīd b. al-Walīd and his wife Faḍḍa (plan 15) has recently been rebuilt. (The valuable inscriptions were previously copied by van Berchem, Freiherr v. Oppenheim and M. Sobernheim). A number of mills on the Orontes belong to Hims, of which one, as the Arabic inscription shows, belongs to the year 824 A.H. and another with Turkish inscription to the year 975 (N.B. this is the only Turkish inscription of this period in Syria). The most interesting building is the great mosque (plan 11), in which half of the cathedral is said to have been incorporated at the beginning of the period of Muslim rule. Herzfeld writes the following note on it: The great mosque lies in the centre of the bazaar and is entered from the south of it. The main entrance, on the west side, leads through a vaulted passage into the court, and a side entrance on the east leads directly into the ḥaram. The ḥaram is an oblong space with two naves each with 13 cross-vaultings. There is a small dome above the bay before the simple mihrāb. In the west is a second, older mihrāb with gold mosaic, which seems to belong to the earliest Muslim period. The court façade of the ḥaram shows that the plan has undergone many alterations. This wall was apparently originally the wall between the main and side nave of a basilika church of quite an unusual type: 4 large arches alternating with 3 double-storied sections, each of 5 small arches. The columns and capitals, of which many lie in the court of the mosque are remains of the ancient building. This court is oblong, surrounded by narrow cloisters, quite unadorned. An estrade with basin and mihrāb almost fill it. Beside it, on the west, is a well with a cupola resting on six antique columns.

HIMYAR, the name of an ancient stock in South Arabia. The form Homeritae, Ὁμηρίται, in the classical authors suggests a diminutive formation; the Arabic form now usual is only found in Theodoros Aognostes (vth century A.D.), Hist. eccles., ii. ch. 58 (cf. Nicephoros Callistos, Hist. eccles., xvi. ch. 37) in the form Ἰμμερῖνοι, or Ἰμμερῖ. Nonnosos, who went to Aksūm and South Arabia as the envoy of Justinian, and following him, Malalas use the form Ἀμερίται, which goes back to the Ethiopian Hemēr. The form found in inscriptions is H-m-y-r-m with mimation and the plural ḥ-m-r-n, which presumably is to be pronounced Ahmūrān (= al-Ahmūr).

According to the Arab authorities, the Himyar, who were divided into a number of smaller tribes, lived around Laḥdī, in the district of Zaḥār and Ridā' and also to the east in Sarw Himyar and Naḡdī Himyar. The Homeritae are first mentioned in Aelius Gallus's account of his expedition to South Arabia in 25 B.C., preserved in Pliny, Hist. Nat., vi. § 161, with the note that they are "the most numerous tribe" (numerosissimos esse); according to Strabo, xvi. ch. 4, § 21, at the time of the Roman invasion Mariaba, i. e. Ma'rib, the capital of Saba', belonged to Ilaṣaros who ruled over the Rhammanites. This statement most probably refers to 'Ilisharāh Yaḥdub, king of Saba' and Dhū Raidān, i. e. of the Sabaeans and Himyarites, who is known from inscriptions. When the anonymous Periplus Maris Erythraei was written (about 70 A.D.), the Himyarites ruled the greater part of South Arabia, namely, the coast of the Red Sea and Indian Ocean up to the frontiers of Ḥaḍramawt, with the correspondiḡ interior, including the laod of the Sabaeans; they also held a portion of the East African coast (Azania). Their king Charibaēl "the legitimate ruler of the Himyarites and Sabaeans" resided in Zaḥār (Z-f-r in inscriptions; in addition to the form with T — Ταφάρ, Τάφαρον, Τάφαρα, Τέφρα and Taphra — the spelling with S, Sapphar, is also found, in Pliny and Ptolemy; Ethiopian Ṣaḥār; not to be confused with the port of the same name on the Indian Ocean), which remained the chief city of South Arabia till the Persian occupation. This ruler was on friendly terms with the Romans. He seems to be identical with the Kariba'il W-t-r Yun'im king of Saba and of Dhū Raidān, of the inscriptions, coins of whom are also known, struck in Raidān. The passing of the hegemony of South Arabia from the Sabaeans to the Himyar took place about the end of the second century B.C. and may have been partly brought about by the discovery of the sea-route to India by the admirals of the Ptolemies, whereby Saba' lost its importance as the centre of the overland trade of South Arabia. Greek and Roman sources are alike silent regarding the further history of the Himyarites down to the ivth century; the inscriptions so far discovered give a series of kings' names but without precise dates. In the reign of the Emperor Constantine II. (337—361) Christianity was introduced by the Indian Theophilos, a native of Diū; he built churches in 'Aden and Zaḥār and other towns; even at this time there were numerous Jewish communities there (Philostorgius, Hist. eccles., iii. ch. 4). According to another account in Theodoros Anagnostes, l. c., the conversion of the Himyarites did not take place till the reign of Anastasius (491—518). About the middle of the ivth century the Abyssinians, the ḥ-b-sh-n of the inscriptions, i. e. the rulers of Aksūm, found a firm footing in South Arabia and Aezanas, the king of Aksūm, a contemporary of Constantius II, in his inscriptions includes among his titles that of "king of the Himyarites and of Raidān". The Abyssinian invasion seems to date back as early as the third century; Marcianus (beginning of the ivth century) calls the Homeritae an Ethiopian people, and this description is often repeated in the older Byzantine writers. The Roman emperors were in regular communication with them (see Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., xxxi. p. 73), partly in the interests of trade and partly to secure their support against the Sassanians who were endeavouring to penetrate into South Arabia through 'Omān. About 521 the native princes under Dhū Nuwās (Dunaas, Dimnos, Damianos of the Greek sources) aroused a serious rebellion against the Abyssinian invaders. Dhū Nuwās, who is said to have professed Judaism and to have organised the persecution of Christians in Nedīrān, which has become famous through the martyrology of St. Arethas, fell in 526 in battle with Kaleb Ela-Aṣbaḥa, king of Aksūm, and the land passed under the sway of an Abyssinian dynasty, whose founder, Ela-Abraha, made himself independent of Aksūm a few years after the withdrawal of Kaleb Ela-Aṣbaḥa. We possess an authentic source for his history and his relations with Byzantium, Persia and Abyssinia, as well as with the Ḡhassānids and other Arab princes, in the great inscription of Ma'rib of the year 540, in which he also gives an account of the restoration of the great dam. In this period arose the "laws of the Ḥimyarites" and other apocryphal works, which are associated with the name of St. Gregentios, bishop of Zafār under Ela-Abraha, and his successor (Migne, Patrol. Graeca, vol. 86, i. coll. 563—784). In the reign of the Emperor Justin II, about 570, the Ḥimyar chiefs invited the Persians into the country. Masrūk, the last ruler of the dynasty of Ela-Abraha (corrupted to Sanaturkes in Theophanus Byzantius), fell in battle with the Persians, who placed the country under military occupation, leaving the various districts (mikhhlāf) under native princes. The Persian governors (marzubān) resided in Ṣan'a'. When Muḥammad sent his first envoys to the Yemen, the kingdom of the Ḥimyar, as such, had long ceased to exist and the new religion was adopted without appreciable opposition by the Ḥimyar chiefs, as well as by the descendants of the Persians, the so-called Abnā'.

The inscriptions hitherto found in South Arabia in the local alphabet, which we usually call Ḥimyaritic inscriptions, belong to widely varying periods, from about 700 B. C. to about 550 A. D. and only a few fragments among them owe their origin to the Ḥimyar in the narrower sense of the word. Linguistically they fall into two main groups, the Sabaeans and Minaean inscriptions; the Ḥimyar texts belong to the former group. The coins hitherto discovered — almost all silver — apart from a few of the earlier issues, are on the other hand mainly to be ascribed to the Ḥimyar. The alphabet (called musnad by the Arabs, which however in the inscriptions only means 'inscription'), a variety of the Phoenician alphabet adapted to the Ethiopian, contains all the consonants of the Arabic language with the addition of a variant of the sibilant ʕ. The Sabaeans-Ḥimyar language is an Arabic dialect which is distinguished from northern Arabic by certain grammatical peculiarities (mimātion instead of nunation, replacement of the article by the affix -ān, haf'al for ʔaf'al in the 1vth form of the verb) and also in vocabulary. On the other hand the supposition of the Arab philologists that the later South Arabian dialects or even the dialects of Mahra and Kāra are offshoots from the ancient language of the Ḥimyar has proved incorrect, although they have preserved in their vocabulary many roots and words, which are not known to Northern Arabic, but which are found in the inscriptions.

Before the discovery of the inscriptions the accounts of the Arabs formed, with the scanty records in ancient and Byzantine authors, our only source for the ancient history of South Arabia. The *tubba'*s of the Yemen are already mentioned in the Qur'ān and the kings of the Ḥimyar were henceforth known in history by this name; we now know from the inscriptions that the kings of the Sabaeans and Ḥimyar always called themselves malik and that tubba' is a corruption of the name of the powerful family of Bata' of the tribe of Hamdān. The same inscriptions teach us that the statements in the literary sources on the Ḥimyar ḡail and adhwa (kings and feudal lords) are for the most part based on misunderstandings. The lists of kings handed down in this way to us and the doings of individual *tubba'*s are still more unreliable. In the Qur'ān we find allusions to the Old Testament story of the queen of Sheba, to persecution of the Christians by Dhū Nuwās in Nedjran (not certain, see Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., xxxv. 610 sqq.) and to the expedition of a tubba' against Mecca. At quite an early period the expositors of the sacred book and the story-tellers at the court of the first caliphs began to devote attention to the ancient history of the country (Ibn 'Abbās, Ka'b al-Aḥbār, Wahb b. Munabbih, 'Abid b. Shārya); although several of them belonged to Yemen, they made less use of genuine popular tradition than of foreign legends, e.g. the Alexander romance and Jewish traditions, and added other matter of their own invention.

The last traces of this kind of historical research are popular works still eagerly read like the story of Bilkīs and Dhū 'l-Karnain, the Sira Saif b. Dhi 'l-Yazan, etc. The works of three natives of South Arabia are much more serious however: al-Tidjān fī Mulūk Ḥimyar of Ibn Hishām, the celebrated biographer of the Prophet, the Iklīl and the Ṣifat Dja'irāt al-'Arab of al-Hamdānī, as well as the so-called 'Ḥimyarite qaṣīda' with commentary, and the lexicon Shams al-'Ulūm of Naṣhwān (died 573); they read the ancient musnad's, although their language was no longer entirely comprehensible to them, and used them in their genealogical and historical researches; how far they worked from old native traditions has still to be investigated, but in any case they were also independent of the scholars already mentioned. Only the information regarding the last century before Islām can be used for the writing of history proper.

HIND, daughter of the Meccan 'Otba b. Rabi'a, of the family of 'Abd Shams, which was related to the Hāshimids. She was the wife of Abū Sufyān, to whom she bore several children including Mu'āwiya, afterwards Caliph. Tradition seems to take a special delight in drawing an unusually repulsive and no doubt caricatured picture of the short, stout woman, who certainly had a very passionate temperament. Her hatred of Muḥammad was increased by the fact that Ḥamza killed her father in the battle of Badr. With other women she accompanied the Meccans on their expedition against Medina in the year 3 and was one of the most ardent in urging on the men to battle; when Ḥamza fell in the conflict on the hill of Uhud, she is said to have mutilated his body and bitten his liver. When the Prophet attacked Mecca in the year 8, she stormed against her cautious and far seeing husband who wished to hand over the city without striking a blow. According to some narrators, the Prophet on this occasion condemned her and a number of other people to death but afterwards pardoned her; this is probably only a malicious invention, as other writers make no mention of it and in some traditions she makes a very stormy appearance at the paying of homage; it is moreover very improbable that Muḥammad would have injured by such an order the feelings of Abū Sufyān, who had met his overtures halfway. Besides she had every reason to be content with the new regime as her son was made governor of Syria; according to one story, she took part in the battle of the Yarmūk with undiminished vigour by urging on the Muslims to circumsise with their swords their uncircumcised opponents. In the end Abū Sufyān divorced her and she is said to have vigorously revenged herself by various intrigues. Some traditions make her die in the reign of 'Umar, others under 'Uthmān.

HIND. The general name for India in Arabic and Persian chronicles and geography. The earlier writers generally make a distinction between Sind and Hind; the first name being confined to the countries bordering on the Indus and Mihrān, and the other to India beyond the limits of the Muḥammadan conquest. This is the use in Ibn Khur-dādhbih, al-Ma'sūdī, Ibn Hawḳal and al-Bīrūnī, and is clearly shown in Ibn Hawḳal's map (reproduced in Elliot and Dowson, Vol. I. p. 32). In later times the name Hind was extended to embrace the whole of India, the term Hindūstān being restricted to the Northern plain of the Ganges and Djamnā, and such is the modern use. After the invasions of the Ghaznawids and Ghōrids it became less usual to speak of Sind as a separate country from Hind. The name Hind is originally identical with Sind, the Skr. sindhu 'a river' becoming hendū in the Avesta, and having first been applied to the R. Indus was extended to the country adjacent to it.

HINDĀL MĪRZĀ, fourth son of Bābur, born early in 1519. His real name was Muḥammad Abu 'l-Nāṣir, but the name Hindāl "Taker of India" was bestowed upon him by his father who was then meditating the conquest of India. Hindāl's mother was Dildār Begam, so that he was the full brother of Gulbadan Begam, the Memoirs-writer. He proved unstable and foolish, rebelled against his elder brother Humāyūn, and had the faḳir Bahlūl brutally murdered in order to show his adherents that he would always be an irreconcilable rebel. He was killed in eastern Afghanistan, in November 1551, in a night-attack made by his brother Kāmran on Humāyūn's camp. By this time, Hindāl had become reconciled to Humāyūn, and died, fighting for him. The good-natured monarch was inclined to lament his death, but Mu'īm Khān coolly told him that he was bemoaning his own gain, for now he had one enemy the less (Bāyazīd Biyat's Manusc. quoted by Erskine). Hindāl was buried at Kābul, near his father. His daughter Ruḳaiya Begam was Akbar's first wife, but had no children. She brought up Shāh Djahān, and died in Agra at the age of 84 in January 1626. (Blochmann 309).

HINDĪ, a modern Indo-Aryan vernacular, descended from an earlier Prakrit, and comprising two distinct languages, 1. Western Hindī, spoken by more than 40 millions of persons inhabiting the Gangetic Dōāb and the country to the north of it, and 2. Eastern Hindī, spoken by 22 millions in Awadh (and throughout India wherever men from Awadh have wandered in search of employment), Baghelkhand and Chhattisgarh. The chief dialects of Western Hindī are Hindūstānī [q. v.], Bāngarū, Bradj Bhāshā, Kanawdjī and Bundēli; only the first of these, under the appellation Urdū [q. v.] has been extensively used as a literary medium by the Indian Muhammadans. The names of a few Muhammadans are recorded who occasionally wrote verses in Bradj Bhāshā. Abu 'l-Faiḍ (commonly known as Shaiḡh Faiḍī), the friend of Akbar, and Faiḍī's younger brother, Fahim, and Akbar's great general, Khān Khānān Mīrẓā 'Abd al-Raḥīm, all wrote Hindī dohās's (or couplets), doubtless under the influence of the strong interest which the emperor took in Hindu thought and literature. Less illustrious poets of the same period were Saiyid Mubārak 'Alī Bilgrāmi (b. 1583), Saiyid Ibrāhīm (b. 1573) who became a Vaishṇava and was known by the name of Ras Khān, and his pupil, Qādir Bakhsh. Such instances however are rare, and when Muhammadan poets, such as Amīr Khusrāw, are said to have written Hindī verses, the dialect they employed was Urdū rather than any form of Bhāshā. (Journ. As. Soc. Beng. XXII, 443). The legend that Sa'di ever wrote verses in Hindī has been shown to be without historical foundation (Journ. As. Soc. Beng. xxi. 513 et seq.).

Eastern Hindī has three chief dialects, Awadhī, Baghelī and Chhattisgarhī. Works in Eastern Hindī by Muhammadan writers are rare; the most notable is the Padumāwatī of Malik Muḥammad Djāisi, written in the Awadhī dialect about 1540; it is a romantic epic founded on the story of the taking of Citor by 'Alā' al-Dīn Khildjī in 1303; the poet himself explains that the story is an allegory of the search of the soul for true wisdom.

Up to the early part of the nineteenth century all Hindī literature was in poetry; Hindī prose first took its rise under the influence of English officials, but the cultivation of it has been almost exclusively confined to Hindu writers and any account of it would therefore be out of place here.

HINDŪ-KUSH, a lofty and extensive range of mountains which forms an extension of the Himālaya to the south-west from the region of the Pamir. It extends from about 75° E and 37° N. to about 66° E. and 35° N. The continuation of the range further west bears various names (Kōh-i-Bāba, Siyāh-Bubuk etc.) this portion being generally known to modern geographers as the Paropamisus, although the Paropamisus of the ancients no doubt included the Hindū-kush. The name Caucasus was also used by the Macedonians, the name according to Arrian having been bestowed upon this range by Alexander's soldiers in flattery. The north-eastern part of the Hindū-Kush rivals the Himālaya in the height of its peaks and the extent of its glaciers, some peaks being over 25 000 feet in height, among these Rakhipōshī south of Hunza and Tiračmir west of Čitrāl are among the best known. The extreme north-east Hindū-kush at its point of junction with the Pamir forms the boundary between three systems of drainage, those of the Indus, the Oxus and the Tarim, while further west it forms the watershed between the Indus and the Oxus, and can be traversed by several passes. From Hunza the Kilik Pass leads to Sarikōl and Yārkand, and also to upper Wakhān. From Yāsin and Mastūdī the Barōghil Pass leads also into Wakhān, and other passes from Čitrāl into the same country. The most important pass from Čitrāl is the Dorāh Pass leading into Badakhshān by the Warūdī and Kōkča valleys, and the Mandal Pass gives communication also between Kāfiristān and the Kōkča valley. North of Kābul the best known passes are the Khawāk, Kaushān, (or Ghōrband) and Bāmiān passes, by one of which Alexander crossed Bactria from Kābul and back again to that region on his Indian expedition. The central block of the mountains between the Kābul and Kunar river to the south and Badakhshān, up to the high range between the Mandal and Khawāk passes, is occupied by the wild and inaccessible country of Kāfiristān. This has now come under Afghān rule since its conquest by 'Abd al-Raḥmān, and the countries of Badakhshān and Wakhān to the north are also under the same rule, but in the north-eastern part of the southern slopes Čitrāl, Yāsin, Hunza-Nagar and Gilgit are politically attached to British India, and the Chinese empire embraces the northern slopes from the Pamir eastwards. The pass of Bāmiān was traversed in the 7th cent. A. D. by the Chinese pilgrim Hiouen Tshang who saw the gigantic Buddhist figures on the face of the cliff which modern travellers have found still in existence. Invaders of India and Afghānistān have usually preferred the easier route over the passes near Herāt, but the passes near Kābul have been used from time to time. Tīmūr travelled by Bāmiān on his return from India. Bābar came from Kunduz to attack Kābul in 910 (1504) probably by the Kaushān Pass, and Humāyūn followed the same route in 953 (1547). Shāh Djahān's army under Rājā Djagat Singh met with disaster in crossing the Hindū-kush to attack the Ūzhags in 1056 (1645), and tradition ascribes the name Hindū-kush "Hindū-slayer" to the losses undergone by his Rājput troops. Awrangzēb two years later experienced great hardships in his retirement from Balkh in the same region and lost 5000 men. Bābar gives a fairly minute description of the Hindū-Kush passes in his memoirs. He came into Ghōrband from the Andarāba valley, evading the army sent to watch for him in the Pandjshir valley, by which he would have come out of the mountains if he had made use of the Khawāk Pass. It may be added that Bābar uses the name Hindū-kush which proves that the legendary explanation of the word mentioned above is without foundation. In more modern times these passes have been frequently traversed by Afghān armies. 'Abd al-Rahmān crossed the Hindū-kush in the middle of winter and his army suffered severely. According to Burnes the name Hindū-Kush was originally used for one peak only, which is visible from both Kābul and Kunduz.

HINDŪSTĀN. [See INDIA.]

HINDŪSTĀNĪ is the name given by European scholars to that dialect of Western Hindī [q. v.] whose original home is the Upper Gangetic Dōāb. As this dialect was in general use in the neighbourhood of the city of Dīhli at the time of the Muhammadan conquest, it came to be adopted by the invaders as a lingua franca and was by them carried into all those parts of India in which Muhammadan rule prevailed. The various forms of this dialect are by native authors called by different names, but as employed by the Muhammadan invaders it was called zabān-i-Urdū (the language of the camp) or urdū-i-mu'allā ki zabān; on to the original dialect as they found it used by their Hindu subjects, they grafted a vocabulary which was to a very large extent Persian, with a certain admixture of Arabic and Turkī words. As thus modified this dialect is known to those who speak it and write it only by the appellation Urdū, (the name Hindūstānī never being used except under European influence); the reader is therefore referred to the article Urdū for an account of the language and literature.

HINGLĀDĪ, a shrine of great antiquity situated in the western part of the state of Las-Bēla in Balōchistān on the river Hingol not far from its mouth. It may possibly be the temple of Mahēshwara mentioned by the Chinese pilgrim Hsuan Tsang in the 7th century as existing in the principal town of Adhyavakila (Las-Bēla). In modern times it is a Muhammadan shrine and Hindu temple of Durgā, the consort of Śiva (Mahēshwara). The Muhammadan dedication is to Bibi Nāni, a female saint who is venerated in other parts of Balōchistān, and whom Masson, with some probability, identified with the Nanaia of the Kushān coins, the Anāhita of Babylonia. There are said to be figures carved on the rocks in an inaccessible site.

HIPPOKRATES. [See BUKRĀT.]

AL-ĤĪRA, the capital of the Lakhmid kings, 3 Arah miles south of Kūfa, an hour's ride southeast of Nadjaf (Meshhed 'Alī), on the lake of Nadjaf, now almost dry close to the edge of the desert. The name is Aramaic (corresponding to the Syr. hertā, and Hebr. hūšēr) and means literally "camp" but was transferred as a proper name to the permanent camp of the Lakhmid chiefs under Persian suzerainty, from which the city gradually developed. The date of its origin, placed by the Arabs in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, cannot be accurately fixed; bishops of al-Ĥira are mentioned at the synods as early as the beginning of the fifth century A.D. For further information see the articles LAKHM and DJĀDHĪMA (now found in inscriptions, see Florilegium de Vogüé, p. 389, 463 sqq.). The situation was a favourable one as the country between Nadjaf and the Euphrates was intersected by canals and rich in cornfields and date-groves. The air is also celebrated for its salubrity. Among the inhabitants, as the mention of bishops shows, there were a number of Christians who professed the Nestorian creed. Among them were the family of the Ĥira poet 'Adī h. Zaid. The Lakhmid princes themselves finally adopted Christianity and Hind, the mother of king 'Amr (reigned after 550), founded a monastery in the city. Near Ĥira were a number of strongholds including the 'white citadel', built by a Persian king, Ibn Bukaila's citadel and the citadel of the 'Adāsīs of Kalb; cf. also the article AL-KHAWARNAK. Among the products of the city the saddles of al-Ĥira are mentioned by the ancient poets (Imru' al-Kais, 4, 59, Nābigha, 5, 22). The town had reached a certain stage of civilization and poets gathered eagerly round the court of the kings. Traditions also relate that the art of writing was well known in Ĥira and spread from there to Arabia. After the death of Nu'mān III (602) the Persian kings incautiously abolished the system of Lakhmid vassals and placed Persian governors in the city, to whom the Arab princes were subordinate. This was still the arrangement in 633, when Khālid attacked Ĥira at the head of the Muslim army. The town surrendered without a battle and pledged itself to pay a considerable tribute. Its importance henceforth ceased, although it existed till much later and is occasionally mentioned. The 'Ahhāsids did not choose it as a residence and the rise of Kūfa threw it more and more into the background. The Caliph Hārūn al-Rashīd however made a short stay in Ĥira and erected buildings there, but this aroused great resentment in Kūfa, so that he left the town. Under Muḥtadir (908—932) it suffered like the rest of the Sawad from the raids of the Bedouins, so that the government had to send an army thither. In the last half of the 11th century, it is described as extensive but thinly populated. The decline of the whole district afterwards affected Ĥira severely so that in the end it utterly disappeared from the face of the earth. Its site is now pastureland where only a few low mounds and heaps of sherds recall its past.

ḤIRĀ' (also written Harā', and without hamza), a mountain some three Arabian miles from Mecca in a N. E. direction, facing Ṭhabīr [q. v.], so that these two are often mentioned together, and sometimes compared to two waves of the sea. Both are without water or vegetation other than a few thorns. Ḥirā' is higher than Ṭhabīr, and is crowned by a steep and slippery peak, which the Apostle with some companions once climbed. Muḥammad was in the habit of staying here with his wife, and it was in a cave of this mountain that he received his first revelation. Hence the present name Djabal Nūr. The cave is still shown. On his return from al-Ṭā'if Muḥammad also hid himself here until he could enter Mecca.

ḤIRZ or ḤURZ (A.) Amulet. [See HAMĀ'IL.]

ḤISĀB or ʿILM AL-ḤISĀB, is the name given by the Arabs to the whole field of arithmetic; al-ḥāsib, also al-hassāb, is the calculator, arithmetician. Arithmetic was one of the four propaedeutic or mathematical sciences (ʿulūm riyaḍiyya or taʿlīmīyya), which, as in antiquity, comprised arithmetic, geometry, astronomy and music. It is divided into two parts, theoretic or speculative (naẓarī), which was sometimes also given the Greek name arithmētikē, and is essentially based on the vii.th—ix.th books of Euclid, and practical (ʿamalī), arithmetic proper.

About the year 770 Hindu scholars brought, along with their siddhāntas (astronomical works), arithmetical lore to the court of Baghdād, notably the Hindu numeral system with the zero (Sanskrit śūnya, Arab. ṣifr = empty). Recent researches (cf. F. Nau, Note d'Astronomie syrienne in the Journal Asiatique, x.th series, Vol. 16, No. 2, p. 258 sqq.) however make it possible that a knowledge of the Hindu numerals with the zero had reached Syria even earlier, and that the Omayyad conquerors of North Africa and Spain perhaps brought the older so-called Ḡhubār figures (al-ḡhubār = dust (on the counting-board)) to the west from Syria, before the newer numerals spread in the east from Baghdād.

But although these Indian numerals were known in certain circles of the learned, the great majority of Arab arithmeticians and astronomers were reluctant to have anything to do with this ingenious Indian invention, just as at a later period in the Christian middle ages the Arabic numerals made very slow progress against the Roman. The majority of the authors of Arabic arithmetics in the xi.th century still wrote all the numbers out. Among the representatives of this conservative school we may mention al-Karkhī (Abū Bakr Muḥammad, c. 970—1036) with his al-Kāfi fī 'l-Ḥisāb (the essentials of arithmetic); there is a manuscript of it in Gotha, of which A. Hochheim has published a German translation (Halle 1878—1880). Others, especially the authors of astronomical tables, made use of the old Semitic and Greek practice of using the letters of the alphabet as numerals (Arab. = Ḥisāb al-Djūmal), cf. the edition of al-Battānī's tables by C. A. Nallino, 3 parts, Milan, 1899—1907. As a champion of the use of Hindū numerals in reckoning we may mention Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Kh̲wārizmī (780—840), the author of the oldest Arabic arithmetic known to us (only in a translation however) as well as of the oldest work on algebra and of the oldest astronomical tables. This arithmetic was translated into Latin, by whom is not known, and this translation edited by B. Boncompagni, Trattati d'arithmeticæ, i., Rome 1857. — Among these users of Hindū numerals was a contemporary of al-Karkhī, 'Alī b. Aḥmad al-Nasawī (c. 980—1040), who wrote al-Muknī fī 'l-Ḥisāb al-Hindī [the satisfying (account) of Hindu arithmetic]; this work has not yet been published in its entirety; on it cf. F. Woepcke in the Journal Asiatique, 1863, i. 492 sqq. and N. Suter in Biblioth. Mathem., 3rd series, Vol. vii. (1906), p. 113—119. In these two contemporary works, the Kāfi and the Muknī, the two schools of arithmetic were striving for supremacy; it seems that in the east the Hindū arithmetic was for long neglected while in the west it was able to hold its own. — Of arithmetical works by Arabs of the west, we may mention the Kitāb al-Saḡhīr fī 'l-Ḥisāb (the "little book on arithmetic") by Abū Zakariyā Muḥammad al-Ḥaṣṣār, who probably lived in the xii.th century, of which the present writer has published a translation of the most important sections in Biblioth. Mathem., 3rd series, Vol. ii. (1901), p. 12—40, the Talkhīṣ, a synopsis of the preceding work by Ibn al-Bannā' (c. 1260—1340) of which A. Marre has published a French translation (Rome 1865, first appeared in the Atti dell' accad. pontif. de Nuovi Lincei, Vol. xvii. 1864); lastly the Kashf al-Asrār 'an 'Ilm al-Ḡhubār (revelation of the secrets of the art of the Ḡhubār i. e. of counting with the numbers used by the Arabs of the west) by Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Kāṣādī (died 1486 in Tunis), of which F. Woepcke has published a French translation in the above mentioned Atti etc., Vol. xii. 1859; it was published in Arabic in Fez in 1315 = 1897-1898.

We cannot here go into details of the methods of counting as space is limited but shall only emphasise a few points that differ from modern procedure. We may first mention that Muḥammad b. Mūsā, unlike the Hindūs, begins addition and subtraction on the left hand side; the erasure of the left hand figures required for this purpose was facilitated for the Arabs by their custom of counting on the dust-board; al-Ḥaṣṣār also still begins subtraction (not however addition) on the left; al-Kāṣādī was the first to begin both operations on the right; it thus required six centuries for the simplest and most natural way entirely to supersede the others, but we do not doubt that in the interval practical arithmeticians had here and there adopted the natural way.

Al-Nasawī still did not use a horizontal line to indicate fractions being content, like the Hindūs, simply to place the numerator over the denominator; al-Ḥaṣṣār was the first to write fractions in our present form with a horizontal line. — Astronomers in their calculations chiefly used sexagesimal fractions as the Babylonians and the Greeks had done before them; e. g. $3\frac{3}{8}$ would be written thus = 3 partes, 37 min. 30 secs. ($3^p\ 37'\ 30''$) i. e. = $3 + \frac{3}{8} + \frac{3}{80}$.

The square root was extracted in the same way as at present; the Arabs expressed surds approximately in the usual fractional form, as they were not yet acquainted with decimals. A sign for the square root is not found till al-Kāḷāṣādī, who uses the initial letter of djīdhr (= root) for it.

The Arabic arithmetics also contain applications of the principal operations to everyday and commercial purposes, and even to geometry also, i. e. calculation of areas and volumes. — To the domain of the theory of arithmetic but usually also included in the practical handbooks belong the tests of the correctness (proofs by casting out sevens and nines) of calculations, summation of arithmetical and geometrical series, of square, cubic and biquadratic numbers, the theorems regarding perfect and related numbers, etc.

We cannot here go into any details of certain branches of arithmetic like ḥisāb al-khaṭā'in (regula duorum falsorum), ḥisāb al-dīrham wa 'l-dīnār (calculation of drachms and dinars) etc., which in any case belong rather to the realm of algebra. Finally, we have still to mention that the Arabs, besides counting on paper or on the dust-board, had also a system of counting on the hands, fingers or "air" (ḥisāb al-yad or al-hawā'). There are a number of MSS. in existence on this form counting, cf. Suter, Die Mathem. u. Astron. d. Araber, and Nachträge (Abhandlungen z. Gesch. d. mathem. Wissensch., x. 203; xiv. 181), and the review al-Mashrik, iii. 1900, p. 171—174.

HİŞÂR (A.), castle, fortress, citadel (from the Arabic ḥaṣara, "to compress, to surround in order to capture"; ḥāṣara "to enclose, to besiege").

Anadolu Hîşâr is the name of the fortress, now in ruins, built by the Ottoman Sultân Bâyezîd I Yıldırım on the Bosphorus between Kandıllı and Gök-Şü ("the sweet waters of Asia") to facilitate the siege of Constantinople; in conjunction with Rumili-Hîşâr, which Muḥammad II Fâtih built in 1452 opposite it, it completely commanded the passage and the latter actually earned its name Boghâz-Kasan (throat-cutter), [see BOGHÂZ, i. p. 737^b].

Hîşâr is further found as a component of many place-names in Asia Minor: Kara Hîşâr-i Şāḥib (the minister's black fortress), official name of Afyūn Kara Hîşâr in the province of Khudāwandgār; Shābīn Kara Hîşâr (black alum fortress) in the province of Trapezunt; Aidīn Güzel Hîşâr (the beautiful palace of prince Aidin), the ancient Tralles; Ak Hîşâr (white castle), Thyatira in Lydia; Arab Hîşâr (Arab fortress), Alabanda; Koç-Hîşâr (Ram castle), near the salt lake of Tüzgöl, near Ak-Serai; Kilise Hîşâr (Church fortress), south of Niğde on the site of Tyana; Kara Hîşâr-i Dewelū, a village in the kaḍā of Dewelū (sandjak Kaṣariya, province Angora) between Niğde and Kaṣariya, where may still be seen the ruins of an ancient castle, called Zendibâr; Eski Hîşâr (old castle) is a village with ruins at Gebize, the ancient Lybissa; also the site of the ancient Laodicea ad Lycum, north of Deñizli; Hîşâr-djik (little castle) is a village in the nāḥiya Āla-ḥam (kaḍā Bāfra, sandjak Samsun, province Trapezunt); lastly Hîşârlik, in the sandjak Bighā, marks the site of Troy.

HİŞÂR, on Russian maps Gissar, a district in Bukhārā. The capital of the same name lies in a fertile and well tilled, but damp and unhealthy area on the bank of the Khānaka which flows into the Kāfirniḥān; not far from Hîşâr the Kāfirniḥān leaves the broad valley and enters a narrow ravine. Cf. the view of Hîşâr in Fr. v. Schwarz, Turkestan, p. 233. The site of the town approximately corresponds to that of the Shūmān of the Arab geographers, cf. ĀMŪ-DARYĀ (i. 340^a). The name "Hîşār-i Shādmān" or simply "Hîşār" is first found in the history of Tīmūr as the residence of one of the most powerful Turkish-Mongol kings who divided the country among themselves during the troubled times that followed the death of the Emīr Kāzāghān (759 = 1358) (Zafar nāmāh, Ind. ed., i. 40), and later as an arsenal (zarrād-khāna) of Tīmūr (ibid., p. 451). Under the Tīmūrids as well as under the Uzbegs Hîşâr owed its importance to its being a strong fortress and the residence of actually independent kings or chiefs. The area ruled from Hîşâr attained its greatest extent in the second half of the ixth = xvth century under Maḥmūd Mirzā (son of Sultān Abū Sa'īd, cf. i. 105 sq.) whose kingdom included all the lands up to the Hindū-Kush (Bābarnāmāh, ed. Beveridge, fol. 26^b), yet even in the time of the Tīmūrids Hîşâr was considered a small and poor country (ibid., fol. 56^b). On the great misfortune, which overtook Hîşâr during the last battles between the Tīmūrids and the Uzbegs (only 60 men are said to have left out of the population of the town) cf. the Tārīkh-i Rashīdī, transl. by E. D. Ross, p. 262. When the kingdom of the Uzbegs in Mā warā' al-Nahr had collapsed after the decline of its first dynasty (cf. ʿABD ALLĀH, i. 25), Hîşâr passed under the sway of the Turkoman tribe of Yüz. From the beginning of the xviith century till 1869 the rulers of Bukhārā were only able to enforce the homage of the Beg of Hîşâr by force of arms and for brief periods at a time only; only under Russian suzerainty did the Emīr Muzaḥḥar succeed in breaking the power of these hereditary rulers and permanently uniting the district with Bukhārā (cf. BUKHARĀ, i. 782^b). About the middle of the xviiith century the inhabited land of Hîşâr, as Muḥammad Wafā Karminagī (Tuḥfat al-Khānī, Ms. of the Asiatic Museum, c. 581^b, f. 196^a) tells us, began at the village of Mir Shādī in the valley of Surkhān; in the xixth century districts further to the west, like Baisūn and Shīrābād were also reckoned to Hîşār; in the south, besides the ancient Čaghāniyān [q. v. i. 811], Kābādiyān and a portion of the ancient Khuttal with Kūrgān-Tūbe also belonged to Hîşār; on account of the great extent of the former Hîşār territory the range, which forms watersheds between the Zarafshān and the upper Amū-Daryā, is called the Hîşār range by the Russians. The Beg of Hîşār now only rules the land between the upper Surkhān and the Wakhsb; this office is usually filled by a son of the Emīr or by another prince of the ruling house. The people still frequently rebel against the government. The cultivation of saffron mentioned by the Arab geographers is no longer pursued; the chief products are cereals and flax and the land is of some economic importance for Bukhārā, although the only method of transport is still by beasts of burden; vehicles are quite unknown. The land was first opened to European exploration by the Russian Hišār expedition of 1875 ("Gissarskaja ekspedicija"). (W. BARTHOLD.)

HIŠĀR FIRŌZA, an ancient town in the Panjāb, the headquarters of the district of Hišār, the centre of a tract of country formerly known as Hariāna, which formed part of the province of Sawālakh. The district lies in the dry belt between the Satlāj and Djamnā on the northern fringe of the Rādjputāna desert. Part of it is sandy waste but part is irrigated by a branch of the Western Djamnā Canal. It lies between lat. 28° 36' and 30° N. and long. 74° 29' and 76° 20' E., has an area of 5271 sq. m. and pop. (in 1901) of 781,717. The western part of the district (Sirsa) is inhabited by the Bhaṭṭi Rādjputs and was formerly known as Bhaṭṭiāna. The town of Sirsa (formerly Sarsuti) derives its name from the river Saraswatī. The Ghaggar river, which receives the now shrunken Saraswatī in seasons of flood, still flows near Sirsa, and its waters have been utilized in modern irrigation works. The Musulmān population (202 009) is mainly of Rādjput origin, and is locally known by the name of Rāngar. Besides Hišār the capital and Sirsa the principal towns are Bhiwānī, a large trading centre, Hānsī [q. v.] and Fathābād (like Hišār founded by Firōz Shāh). Firōz Shāh Tughlāk took especial interest in this district, the home of his mother, who was of Bhaṭṭi Rādjput descent, and he founded here the town of Hišār Firōza, which took its name from him, in the year 757 (1356), and, to irrigate the dry tract in which it stood, constructed a canal from the Djamnā. There was no doubt an older town on the spot, as the fort built by Firōz Shāh is to a great extent constructed of fragments of Hindū buildings. Hišār was long a place of importance. It was taken by Bābur in 932 (1526) and bestowed by him (with the district, which yielded a krór of rupees) on his son Humāyūn. Humāyūn in his turn assigned it for the maintenance of Akbar, and put the 'foster-father' (atgah) Shams al-Dīn in charge. Under Akbar it became the headquarters of a sarkār, and was a mint for the coinage of copper under Shēr Shāh Sūrī, Humāyūn and Akbar. At the end of the 18th century it came into the power of George Thomas (see under Hānsī) who built a fort named Georgegarh, now corrupted into Djahādī. In 1857 the district fell into anarchy for a time during the mutiny.

HISBA, a technical term in administrative law, the meaning of which is, act of counting, office of muhtasib. The word then acquired the special meaning of police, and finally the police in charge of the markets and public morals. It is in this latter, the narrowest, meaning that hisba is used by those authors who deal with Muslim law (Māwardī, Ibn Khaldūn, Maḳrīzī etc.), but there can be no doubt that hisba meant something more than the office of muhtasib in the narrower sense. Occasional references in historians (Dār al-Muhāsaba wa 'l-Mawāriṭh or wa 'l-Mawṭā) show that hisba was the name of the registry office, where deaths and births were registered and estates and the funds for orphans administered. We also find the hisba as office of weights and measures (= Dār al-'Iyār), as well as the supreme audit office, and finally as army commissariat. [Cf. also the article MUHTASIB].

HISHĀM B. 'ABD AL-MALIK, 'Umayyad Caliph, son of the Caliph 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān and 'A'isha, daughter of Hishām b. Ismā'il, governor of Medina. He was proclaimed Caliph in Sha'bān 105 = January 724 and began his reign by dismissing 'Umar b. Hubaira, governor of the 'Irāk. Khālid b. 'Abd Allāh al-Kasrī was appointed his successor and ruled the province for nearly fifteen years and earned the gratitude of the populace by its peaceful development under him. His enemies, however, ultimately succeeded in bringing about his downfall. In Djumādā I 120 = May 738 the Caliph dismissed him and gave the vacant office to Yūsuf b. 'Umar al-Thakafī. Khālid was thrown into prison and only released in Shawwāl 121 = September 739. About the same time, Zaid b. 'Alī, a great-grandson of the Caliph 'Alī, set up as a pretender in Kūfa and readily gained numerous adherents among the volatile people of that city. But his plans were betrayed; when he was about to raise the standard of revolt, he had to give way to superior forces and was mortally wounded.

In 106 = 724-725 Asad, Khālid's brother, had been appointed governor of Khurāsān, where feuds between the Arab tribes and the activities of 'Abbāsīd emissaries caused him great trouble. In 109 = 727-728, Asad, who had only held his office under the control of his brother, was replaced by Ashras b. 'Abd Allāh al-Sulamī, who became involved in war with the Soghdiāns and the Turks and could only hold his position for two years. He was succeeded by al-Djunaid b. 'Abd al-Rahmān [q. v.], who continued the war against the Turks.

During his long reign Hishām continued the war against the Byzantines vigorously but with varying success. Naval enterprises were undertaken every summer on a large scale, in which 'Abd Allāh b. 'Ukba and later 'Abd Allāh b. Abi Maryam commanded the fleet, while the Caliph's two sons Mu'āwiya and Sulaimān, conducted the land operations. In 122 (740) the Arabs under 'Abd Allāh al-Baṭṭāl were severely defeated at Akroinos in Phrygia and al-Baṭṭāl himself fell in the battle. But when the Byzantines in the following year attacked the capital of Melitene the Caliph himself hurried to its assistance and they had to retreat. On the Caspian shores the Turkish tribes gave the Caliph's troops much trouble. In 112 = 730-731 the latter were defeated at Ardabil. Hishām's brother, Maslama, then carried out several successful expeditions, but the final triumph of Muslim arms was particularly due to Marwān b. Muḥammad, afterwards Caliph.

At the same time 'Abd al-Rahmān b. 'Abd Allāh al-Ḡhāfiḳī, governor in Spain, defeated Eude, Duke of Aquitaine, but was in turn defeated by the Franks under Charles Martel, in Ramaḍān 114 = October 732, between Tours and Poitiers. Further the Berbers were discontented, because they were not treated by the Arabs as fellow-citizens on equal terms but as vassals paying tribute, and the Khārījī propaganda poured oil on the flames. In the end a great rebellion broke out and in 123 = 741 Hishām had to send a Syrian army under Kulthūm b. 'Iyād against the Berbers. But the Syrians suffered a fearful defeat: Kulthūm fell and his nephew Baldj b. Bishr escaped to Spain with only a third of his army.

Hishām died in al-Ruṣāfa on the 6th Rabī' II 125 = 6th February 743. He was an upright and conscientious Muslim. He particularly endeavoured to look after the finances of the state but his economy occasionally degenerated to parsimony. Besides foreign foes, 'Abbāsīd emissaries and Khārījī agitators were gradually undermining Umayyad power and in spite of his merits the Caliph could not prevent its increasing decline.

HISHĀM B. AL-ḤAKAM ABU MUḤAMMAD, one of the most distinguished Shī'ī theologians of the earlier period. He was a client of the Banū Shāibān and spent his youth in Kūfa, although his actual birthplace is believed to have been Wāsiṭ; he moved to Baghdād in 199 (814-815) but died soon afterwards (according to one tradition however, he is said to have lived into the reign of al-Ma'mūn). He was held in great esteem by the Barmakid Yahyā b. Khālīd and presided at all the disputations which were held in his presence; he was also acquainted with Harūn al-Rashīd himself. He seems at first to have been a pupil of Djaḥm b. Ṣafwān [q. v.]. His acquaintance with the 'Alid Dja'far who died in 148 (765) made him one of his followers, so that he became one of the most intimate friends of his son Mūsā b. Dja'far. Henceforth the Shī'ī doctrine of the Imāmate was the central point of his belief and doctrine around which his views on other theological and philosophical questions grouped themselves. His teaching was frankly anthropomorphic as in his view God could not otherwise influence material things. The question of the creation or non-creation of the Qur'ān was in his view an idle one, as the Qur'ān is the word (kalām) of God and therefore a quality (ṣifa), which cannot be defined by other qualities. The same of course holds in his opinion with regard to the other ṣifāt. It is not quite clear what his attitude was to the question of the freedom of human action but, according to the express testimony of Ibn Kūtaiba, (Mukhtalaṭ al-Ḥadīth), he belonged to the Djabariya, which attitude is probably to be traced to his early intercourse with Djaḥm b. Ṣafwān.

Hishām wrote a number of works, the titles of which are detailed in Fihrist, p. 175 sq., but they are all lost. The Arab authorities mention his disputations with the Mu'tazilī Abū 'l-Hudḥail [q. v.] and state that his teaching was further developed by his pupils, not however without deviations in many points.

HISHĀM I, ABU 'L-WALĪD AL-RADĪ or AL-'ADIL, son of 'Abd al-Rahmān I [q. v.], was the second Umayyad Emir of Cordova (172—180 = 788—796). Although more humane, just and pious than his energetic, cunning father, he was able to maintain himself against his rebellious brothers and to carry the Muslim arms once more, after an interval of several decades, into the Christian lands to the north and even into southern France, as far as Astorga, Oviedo, Gerona, and Narbonne. It was he who first gave a stimulus to the influence of the stricter school of law and theology of the contemporary Medina teacher Mālik b. Anas in Spain and thus prepared the way for the narrow-minded fanatical views of the Spanish faḳīhs. He completed the great mosque of Cordova which had been begun by his father and restored the bridge (Alcántara), built by the governor al-Samḥ [q. v.] over the Guadalquivir, which had fallen into ruins. This capable ruler died all too soon at the age of 37 and was succeeded by his son al-Ḥakam I (796—822) [q. v.].

HISHĀM II, ABU 'L-WALĪD AL-MU'AYYAD B. AL-ḤAKAM II AL-MUSTAṢṢIR, was the tenth Umayyad of Cordova (766—399 = 976—1009 and again from 400—403 = 1010—1013). While under his nine predecessors on the throne of Cordova the whole administrative power had been actually in the hands of the rulers (Amirs and Caliphs) themselves, Hishām II's personality falls into the background and disappears as a mere shadow behind the all-powerful chancellor, the Ḥāḍib (grand vizir) Almanzor [cf. AL-MANṢŪR] the great statesman and general (died 1002) and his son 'Abd al-Malik al-Muzaḥaffar [q. v.], (died 1001), while Almanzor's second and incapable son 'Abd al-Rahman Sanchol was soon overthrown (1009). Hishām II was placed in tutelage immediately on his accession, when only ten years of age, by his unnatural mother, the Basque Şubḥ (= Aurora), al-Hakam's favourite wife, in conjunction with her favourite and lover Almanzor, educated to bigotry, and finally interned in the new Royal residence al-Zahrā west of Cordova, till he became the veriest puppet in their hands, whereby a way was prepared for the rapid decline of monarchical power and the speedy fall of the once brilliant caliphate of Cordova. A pseudo-Hishām, alleged to have reappeared (he was said to have disappeared during the massacre by the Berbers in Cordova in 1013) also served the unscrupulous 'Abbādid [q. v.] Abu 'l-Kāsim Muḥammad I b. Ismā'il of Seville as a figurehead to deceive the people.

HISHĀM III, AL-MU'TADD, son of the incapable, ephemeral Caliph 'Abd al-Rahmān IV al-Murtadā (408 = 1018) great great-grandson of the great 'Abd al-Rahmān III (912–961), was the sixteenth and last feeble Umayyad of Cordova, who could not prevent the breaking up of the great caliphate into smaller and smaller local kingdoms (Span. Reyes de Taifas, arab. Mulūk al-Ṭawā'if) which had been going on since the beginning of the 11th century: 418–422 = 1027–1031 (died 1036).

HİŞN (A.), fortress, citadel.

HİŞN AL-AKRĀD, originally called HİŞN AL-SAFH, 'castle on the slope', see van Berchem, Journ. Asiat., 1902, p. 446 sq., now often pleonastically called Ka'fat al-Hişn, is situated on the plateau of al-Buḳai'a, which is bounded on the south by Djebel 'Akkār and Lebanon, on the north by the Nusairi hills. It is the official residence of a ḳā'immaḳām. It takes its name 'castle of the Kurds' from a Kurdish garrison established there by Shibl al-Dawla Naşr, king of Aleppo, in the first half of the fifth century A. H., who were granted the surrounding lands and forests in fief on condition that they protected the important road between Hamā and Hims, the great towns of the Orontes plain, and Tripolis, from the enemy. The castle of the Kurds is said to be identical with one built there by Rameses II. It was taken during the Crusades by Tancred of Antioch in 503 (this date is not quite certain) and transferred to the knights of St. John in 537 by Raymond II of Tripolis. The knights had more and more cause to feel insecure as the position of the Crusaders in Syria became weaker. Their situation was all the more dangerous because they had been excluded from the ten years' truce of 626 between the Emperor Frederick II and Sulṭān al-Malik al-Kāmil, as they had not taken the side of the Emperor who had been excommunicated by the Pope. They had therefore every reason to strengthen the defences of the castle more and more; Nūr al-Dīn and Saladin had endeavoured in vain to capture Hīşn al-Akrād. The citadel is protected by two lines of defences, an outer and an inner. It lies on the top of the hill which slopes to the north and east. On the west it is protected by a ditch which is continued round on the south side at no great depth. Thus defined it is approximately a trapezium, of which the south is the most vulnerable. The strongest defences had therefore to be built there. From the description of the capture of the fortress it appears that further earth- and wood works were raised outside the outer surrounding wall, which would have perhaps become quite gigantic, if the Sulṭāns had not kept the Knights from increasing them by agreements and threats (the Emperor Frederick II had actually pledged himself to see that the defences of castle of the Kurds were not strengthened). On the north and west it is surrounded by ramparts which at certain distances are strengthened by round towers.

The hall in the tower vaulted with pointed arches and lit by great embrasures is built to accommodate ballistas and a gallery runs along the ramparts provided with protruding sentry boxes. Over this gallery is a pinnacled parapet with shotholes in the middle. The door of the entrance tower was difficult to take, for in consequence of its low situation it could be defended through the three small rooms projecting over it with openings in the floors. Through the gateway one enters a covered gallery, which turns to the south but turns again on reaching the south of the corner tower and ascends to the upper entrance at the east tower.

A portion of the west side of the open space between the outer and inner lines of defence is so built as to collect water in it. It is connected with the cisterns which are below the castle. The inner defences rise on the south and west side above a masonry escarpment of great strength obviously an escarpment lining the natural rock, while on the north and east side the rock is not escarped. A great open staircase leads from the courtyard to the terrace.

The Knights of St. John were able to maintain a garrison of 2000 men in this strongly fortified castle. With their help they forced the princes of Hims and Hamā to pay tribute in return for freedom of passage for their caravans. They had afterwards to give this up and their situation became more and more precarious. Sulṭān Baibars, who wished to free Syria entirely from the Crusaders, decided to take Hīşn al-Akrād. After taking advantage of a stay in Syria to make a reconnaissance in person accompanied only by 40 horsemen, he led a great expedition against the fortress next year in 669. On the first day of the attack, 19th Raddjāb 669 = 3rd March 1271, he took the weakly defended outer works; next he soon succeeded in making a breach in the wall and capturing the entrance tower, which was now exposed to attack from the inner gallery as well as the outside. On the 15th March the second tower was taken, on the 29th Baibars fought his way into the courtyard and erected ballistas there to attack the donjon. On the 8th April the Knights were reduced to surrender and were granted a safe conduct to Tripolis. Sulṭān Baibars remained there till the end of the month and conducted the restoration operations in person. Hīşn al-Akrād was selected as the residence of the governor of the Syrian 'conquests' and it was not till the capture of Tripolis in 686 by Sulṭān Ḳalā'ūn that the governor's residence was transferred to the latter town. After peace and security had been restored to Syria with the departure of the last Franks Ḥiṣn al-Akrād gradually lost its importance. It suffered nothing from Timūr Lank's invasion (about 803). The fortress, which is the residence of a kā'immaḳām, is still for the most part well preserved.

Bibliography: The architectural history of the castle has been studied in great detail by Baron Rey, to whom the accompanying plan is also due, in his Etude sur les Monuments de l'Architecture militaire des Croisades en Syrie, Paris 1841, p. 46 sqq.; extracts from it are contained in A. v. Essewein's Die Romanische und Gothische Baukunst, iv., 1, Military Architecture.

The Arabic inscriptions in the castle (only briefly discussed by Ch. Schefer in Rey) have been fully edited by van Berchem in Inscriptions arabes de Syrie, Cairo 1897 (p. 64—69) and in Freiherr v. Oppenheim's Inchriften aus Syrien etc., with an account of the capture of the Ḥiṣn by Baibars. All the inscriptions of the fortress and town with their history (with extracts from the sources and bibliography) have been edited by Sobernheim in the Corp. Inscr. Arab., ii. 14—35 (with a plan of the mosque and illustrations). (M. SOBERNHEIM.)

ḤIṢN AL-ḠHURĀB ('Raven Castle'), a hill with a fortress upon it in South Arabia, near the harbour of Bir 'Alī Madjidāh in 30° 59' 20" North. Lat. and 45° 24' 30" East. Long. in the land of the Wāḥidī [q. v.]. The harbour of Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb in ancient times was the well-known Cane Emporium (Κανὴ ἐμπορίον) of the Periplus Maris Erythraei and of Ptolemy, the Ἰνδία of the South Arabian inscriptions, a very important centre for the frankincense trade of the neighbourhood and an intermediate station for the trade between Egypt and India. The name Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb is derived from the black colour of the hill, which is about 1500 feet high, of volcanic origin and composed of different formations such as basalt, sandstone, trap, and slates. Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb was probably in very early days an island; now it is connected with the mainland by a isthmus of sand, on which a town used to stand, of which now only the ruins are to be seen in the form of huge pieces of basalt lying scattered at the foot of the hill. Ruins of houses, walls and defensive works are also found towards the top of the hill. On the topmost slope is a quadrangular tower. The hill can only be ascended from one side; the route is by a zigzag way (manḳal) hewn out of the rock.

Not far from Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb is a group of small, uninhabited islands, of which the most important are Sikhā, also called Ḳanbūs, and Barrāka. The little island of Hillāniya with pearl-fisheries is quite near Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb on the west side. Opposite Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb rises the isolated hill of Shawrān, at the foot of which lies a plain, called Maidān, covered by hundreds of small black, probably volcanic mounds called ḳath'a. On the summit of the Djebel Shawrān is a very deep round crater called Karif (Basin) of Shawrān, surrounded by shrubs.

In the rocky face of the hill four South Arabic inscriptions are engraved of which the most important is the well-known ten-line inscription of Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb which belongs to the time of the Himyar-Ethiopic kings and was inscribed to commemorate the fortification of Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb. It is of particular importance, as it is dated (640 = 525 H. R.). From the inscription it seems that Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb in ancient times was known as 'Urr Māwiyat.

Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb was first visited by Captain Haines and J. Wellstedt in 1834. Wellstedt, Crutenden and Hulton made the first copies of inscriptions the same year. In 1870 Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb was visited by Miles and Munzinger who took new and more reliable copies. Lastly Comte de Landberg took photographs as well as copies of the inscriptions when he visited Ḥiṣn al-Ḡhurāb on the 21st February 1896 along with General Cunningham.

Editions elucidations and translations of the inscriptions are to be found in Gesenius (Hallsche Literaturzeitung, 1841, p. 396), Födigier (in Wellstedt's Reisen in Arabien, Halle, 1842, ii. 355, 359), Fresnel (Journal Asiatique, iv. Series, vol. vi. [1845], p. 191), Praetorius (Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., xxvi. [1872], 436—440; J. H. Mordtmann (ibid., xxxix. [1885], 250—334) and xlv. ḤIṢN KAIFĀ, a town in the Djazira (Mesopotamia), on the right (south or east) bank of the Tigris, in 37° 40' N. Lat. and 41° 30' East. Long. (Greenw.), about halfway between Diyār Bakr and Djazirat Ibn 'Umar, about 3 days' journey (60—70 miles) from either.

Ḥiṣn Kaifā dates from very ancient times. The many ancient caves and grottos still in existence belong to the pre-Armenian (Chaldean) period and show that there was a settlement here as early as about 800 B. C. In the border wars between Romans and Persians during the later Empire the town (Κίφα, Cepha) played an important part on account of its commanding fortress. As the see of a Syrian bishop it is mentioned at the council of Chalcedon (451); Muḳaddasī (c. 345 = 985) particularly notes the numerous churches there. Ḥiṣn Kaifā during the middle ages also enjoyed no mean strategic and commercial importance. The former was due to its strong citadel, the latter to its position as a centre of trade between Diyār Bakr and Djazirat Ibn 'Umar. Since about the xiith century a fine bridge has existed over the Tigris, the traffic over which had probably been busy for centuries.

When the 'Abbāsīd power gradually declined, the real authority in Mesopotamia as in other provinces of the Caliphate passed into the hands of prominent local dynasties. Ḥiṣn Kaifā in this way passed in turn to the Ḥamdānids, Marwānids and Urtukids. Under the latter, who had their 1495-1496, that they were reached the city of Hişn Kaifa, but over 130 years it was not mentioned again, which, although the city was in the hands of the Sütlüks, ruled by the Aq-Koyunlu in Mesopotamia and the Ak-Koyunlu in the districts of Diyar Bakr, Mosul, Mardin, Mervanîna, Nisibis) is not mentioned in the literature (1961).

In 1229-1232 the Ayyubids overthrew the Seljuq domination of Hişn Kaifa; on this date the city was destroyed (book II, section 5, p. 128). The town was taken and destroyed by the Mongols, when it has continued to exist. When Mosul was taken (about 740 = 1340) the city had a considerable population, but was almost completely destroyed. It seems to have been a small town for the Ak-Koyunlu (cf. p. 125), particularly since the sons of Üçün Hasan, who were expelled from the buildings still standing in the city, agrees with the account of the Venetian traveller who visited the town in 1471 and described it as quite imposing (see Ritter, Erdbesch. 81). For the rest, Hişn Kaifa henceforth shared the vicissitudes and political changes of the rest of Mesopotamia. According to the Turkish administrative system of the time, Hişn Kaifa belonged to the kadı of Awincik of the sandjak of Mardin in the wilayet of Diyar Bakr and lies on the border between the kadıs of Awincik and Milyād; cf. Carnet, La Turquie d'Asie, n. (1891), p. 519. The present inhabitants of the town are Armenians (the majority), Kurds, Syrian Christians, and Turks.

Impressive architectural remains still bear eloquent testimony to the great prosperity which Hişn Kaifa repeatedly enjoyed during the Islamic period of the middle ages. They have only recently been studied for the first time by Miss Bell and S. Guyer, but some of the inscriptions and reliefs still await more detailed study. Of these monuments the following deserve particular mention: 1. the citadel (qal'a) with remarkable gates which crowns the town on a rocky eminence; 2. the Dym al-Mulak, the mosque in the centre of the town with a tall minaret, on which is a long and important inscription (a decree); 3. a mosque, much ruined, near the bank of the Tigris, a fine building, also with a tall, slender minaret and an inscription on its erection by Khalil b. Üçün Hasan, the sixth ruler of the Ak-Koyunlu dynasty (died 883 = 1478); 4. the ruins of an ancient madrasa near the east wall of the lower town. The four buildings mentioned are all on the south (or east) of the Tigris: on the north (or west) bank of the river are 5. a türbe in the Persian style with the mausoleum of Zeinal Beg, a son of Üçün Hasan (about 1500); 6. a ziyāra with fine details of ornament. Another important piece of architecture is 7. the old bridge over the Tigris, now allowed to fall into ruins, which probably owes its origin to the Ortokid Karā Arslān (or his father). It consists (or rather once consisted) of a large arch thrown clear over the river and two smaller arches at each side supported by pillars. Yāqūt describes it as the finest erection of its kind that he had ever seen.

Lastly we may mention the slopes on the north shore with their numerous caves and tombs often dating back into remote antiquity. The inhabitants of the village of Korā there almost all live in these caves. Hişn Kaifa may without contradiction be described as the troglodyte capital of Mesopotamia.

The name Hişn Kaifa = the fortress of Kaifa (or rock fortress) seems, if we think of the name of a district or people, Cephemia, Kephenes (Assyr.: probably Kipavi), preserved by ancient writers, to describe the town originally as the centre or the military centre of a district of the same name. In Syrian literature the place is called Ḥeṣnā (de) Kēphā. In place of Hişn Kaifa we frequently also find an abbreviated form Hişn Kaif; cf. also the place-name Tell Kef north of Mosul. At the present day the most usual form of the name of this town seems to be Hasan-Kef; according to some traditions, a Persian named Hasan founded the town. This corruption and explanation of the ancient name Hişn Kaifa is clearly only the result of a popular etymology. Equally worthless are the Turkish etymologies Hasankēf = Hasan's "delight" and Hişn (Hişn)-Kef = "good (beautiful) humour".

HIŞN MANŞÜR, the capital of the kaḍā of the same name in the sandjak of Malaṭia, usually called Adiamān, with about 10,000 inhabitants, mainly of Armenian origin. The name Hişn Manşūr is derived from an Omayyad Emir Manşūr b. Dja'wana who was slain in 141 (758) by command of the 'Abbāsīd al-Manşūr. Hārūn al-Raṣhīd afterwards had the citadel fortified and placed a garrison in it. Hişn Manşūr or Adiamān was thus the successor of the ancient adjacent town of Perre, the site of which is still traceable by aqueducts and rock-tombs. It is nevertheless only rarely mentioned in later times; in the vith (xiith) century it belonged to the Ortokids.

HIT, a town in the most westerly part of the 'Irāk (Babylonia), situated in about 33° 35' N. lat. and 42° 48' E. long (Greenw.), on the right bank of the Euphrates on an eminence which is perhaps of artificial origin. The mediaeval Arab itineraries estimate the distance between Hit and Baghdād at 33 parasangs (about 130 miles) or 5½–6 days' journey; cf. Streck, Babylonien nach den Arab. Geographen, i. (1900), p. 8. Some Arab geographers like al-Iṣṭakhrī and Ibn Ḥawkal already include Hit in Djazira (Mesopotamia); on the whole, however, it has generally been considered a frontier town of Babylonia. In al-Muḥaddasī's time (xth century) it was of some importance; at the beginning of the xiiith century Yāḳūt describes it as a little place; at the beginning of the xixth century Olivier estimated the number of its inhabitants at about 1000 (see Ritter, op. cit., p. 752), Černik about 70 years later at 2000; Chesney counted 1500 houses. The situation of Hit is described as picturesque; the walls and two gates have survived; otherwise there is no prominent building. There Yāḳūt mentions the tomb of the distinguished jurist 'Abd Allāh b. al-Mubārak who died in Hit in 181 = 797 on his way through it; cf. also al-Mas'ūdī, Murūdī al-Dihab (ed. Paris), vi. 294, 503, and the reference in Yāḳūt, op. cit., vi. 508.

Hit is a very ancient settlement; it is mentioned under the name Id as early as the beginning of the ixth century B. C. in an Assyrian inscription (Annals of Tukulti-Ninib II); see Scheil, op. cit. Herodotos and apparently also Isidor Characensis know the town as "Ic, in Zosimus it is called Σῖζα; Hit is the Syriac form of the name, which has been adopted by the Arabs. The name is apparently derived from its most characteristic product, asphalt (Assyr. iddū, ittū). In 16 (629) Hit passed into the power of the Arabs; in 334 it was taken by the Ḥamdānids (see Weil, Gesch. d. Chalifen, ii. 695).

Hit is a town of considerable commercial and industrial importance. The caravans trading between Babylonia and Syria, particularly between Baghdād and Ḥalab cross the Euphrates here. This circumstance has given rise to a flourishing transport business and a busy trade. Even in ancient times the district of Hit was celebrated as being exceedingly productive of asphalt and naphtha; there are a whole series of wells there which yield this product; even the above quoted Assyrian text commemorates this feature of the town. A place, called 'Ain Kaiyāra (= spring of bitumen) near Hit is mentioned, e. g. in Abu 'l-Fidā', Annales, ed. Reiske-Adler, iv. 241. A small river which flows into the Euphrates near Hit carries down with its current many blocks of asphalt. Bitumen is used in different ways in Hit; for example ships are caulked with it or it is burned in kilns for lime. From ancient times asphalt has been used in Babylonia as a cement; cf. also Abu 'l-Fidā' (Geography, op. cit.). There is a considerable export trade in bituminous products from Hit, they are carried down the river in boats and the busy shipbuilding trade of Hit is also directly due to the asphalt. South of Hit are several quarries which were worked even in ancient times; at the present day there is a line of rails from them to the Euphrates; cf. A. Musil in the Anzeig. der Wien. Akad. der Wissensch. 1913, i. (I. N. E. Arabia and Southern Mesopotamia, p. 11). The Arab geographers of the middle ages also note the wealth of datepalms and the extensive cultivation of cereals around Hit. It was further noted for its excellent wine; cf. the poems of Abū Nuwās (ed. Kremer, n^o. 12, p. 46), and R. Geyer's Mā bukū'u of al-A'shā (Sitz. Ber. d. Wien. Akad., Vol. 149, vi.), p. 145, 14. Near Hit a ruined area, called Ulāya al-Maklūba (= "the transformed city"), is pointed out: there is a legend attached to it which, as Mez in the Zeitschr. für Assyriol., xxiii. 220, points out, strikingly recalls the Frau Hitt legend in Innsbruck.

HIZB (A., pl. aḥzāb) means "a party, faction, division". It is probably an Ethiopic loan-word, the original Arabic meaning of the root being "to befall" of a misfortune (aḥḥaba) and "to be rough, coarse" (ghaḥiḥa); so formerly Nöldeke (Neue Beiträge, p. 59, note 3). In the Qur'ān the word is used of confederates and mostly in a bad sense. Thus the Sūrat al-aḥzāb (xxxiii) deals with the siege of Medina by the Jewish tribes confederated with those of Mecca, Naḍj and Tihāma (Ibn Hishām pp. 668 sqq. Ghazwat al-khandaḥ). In a good sense it occurs of the ḥizb Allāh in Qur. v. 61, lviii, 22. But from "portion, division" it soon acquired the same technical meaning as wira i. e. a set portion of the Qur'ān, or of devotional formulae of any kind, imposed by any one upon himself for recitation; for cases of this use in the traditions see Lisān, i. p. 299 ll. 9 sq. As applied to the Qur'ān this developed in some Muslim countries until there was a normal division of the text into sixty aḥzāb, like that into the thirty ad-jāz'. So in Egypt; see Lane, Modern Egyptians, chap. xxvii, Arabian Nights, chap. v. note 38. But apparently this did not and does not hold everywhere. Al-Ghazālī, in the Iḥyā', in dealing with the recital (tilāwa) of the Qur'ān (Book viii of Quarter I. Bāb ii.; ed. with comm. of Saiyid Murtaḍā iv. pp. 470 sq.) speaks of the thirty ad-jāz', but of ḥizb only generally; the number of ahzāb depends upon the usage of each worshipper. So still in India, for Hughes' Dict. of Islam does not recognize the word nor, apparently, does the Dict. of Techn. Terms. With the rise of the derwish fraternities the word became peculiarly associated with them. In Egypt each fraternity is a hizb (Lane, Modern Egyptians, chap. xviii) and hizb is also used of the "office" of each fraternity recited at the regular Friday service (ḥadra) in the zāwiya or takiya, and consisting of extended selections from the Kur'ān and of other prayers (see DIHKR above). From this apparently, came a narrower use as applied to forms of prayer (du'ā) drawn up by conspicuous saints and to be recited, either regularly or in special cases of need. Islām has always treasured such forms. The latter part of Book ix of Quarter i. of the Iḥyā' (Kitāb al-adhikār; ed. above, vol. v. pp. 62 sq.) consists of a collection of such celebrated ad'iya of authorship from Adam to the Ṣūfī saints; see, too, al-Djāhīz, Kitāb al-Bayān, ii. 127 sqq. of ed. of Cairo 1313. But to judge from the hizb's described by Brockelmann (Gesch., index under hizb, vol. ii. pp. 622 sq.) and by Ḥādjdī Khalīfa (III, pp. 56—60) the word hizb was not applied to such prayers until well on in the sixth Muslim century. Al-Ghazālī (d. 505 = 1111) speaks only of du'ā's and the first recorded hizb is by 'Abd al-Kādir al-Djilānī (d. 561). After that there are many: by Ibn 'Arabi (d. 638), Aḥmad al-Badawī (d. 675), al-Nawawī (d. 676), etc. The most famous of all is the hizb al-bahr by al-Shādhilī, called also al-hizb al-ṣaghīr, to distinguish it from one longer but less celebrated by the same author. It is a favorite with travellers, especially those by sea, as it is in great part a "subjecting" (tashkīr) of the sea to them. It was written in 656, the year of his death, by inspiration from the Prophet, and contains the Most Great Name of Allāh. That same year Baghdad was taken by the Mongols, and al-Shādhilī is asserted to have said that it could not have been captured if his hizb had been recited thrice. The text is given in full by Ibn Battūta (vol. i. pp. 40 sqq.; cf. also Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges. vol. vii. p. 25; the transl. by Burton, Pilgrimage, chap. xi. is very incomplete) and is poor devotionally, but has many Kur'ānic references and quotes repeatedly the mysterious letters which occur at the beginnings of certain sūras. This has given it talismanic value and ensured its popularity. A plural, hizāb, occurs in the Fihrist, p. 307, l. 7 (see also note) with the meaning "spells", but the text is uncertain. The authority for Ahlwardt's assertion (Verzeichnis, iii. p. 325) that the ahzāb are so called because the invocations of Allāh in them are arranged "in gewissen Gruppen" he does not give.

HIZKIL (EZEKIEL) B. BŪRĪ, whose mother when advanced in years prayed to God for offspring and had her prayer granted, was the successor of Kālīb. He is not mentioned by name in the Kur'ān but in Sūra ii. 244 ("Didst thou not see those ones who abandoned their dwellings in their thousands from fear of death? and God said "Die!" Then he restored them to life") an allusion to Ezekiel xxxvii, 1—10 is generally recognised.

Of the various traditions in Tha'labī, p. 148 and Tabarī, i. 530, 538, the following, which are of Talmudic origin may here be mentioned. In the days of Hizkīl a plague carried off numerous Israelites. Many corpses could not be buried and became food for birds and beasts. By God's command Hizkīl proclaimed "Ye dead bones, God commands you to assume again the flesh that covered you!" At once the bones clothed themselves with flesh and once more had skin, blood, veins, and arteries. Hizkīl continued "O breath of life, make these bodies live again". They were breathed upon by the spirit of life and rose in their dead clothes. They returned to their people again, founded families and multiplied (Sanh., 92, Gen. R., 14, Cant., 7).

According to Tha'labī, p. 101, one of the members of Fir'awn's council in Egypt was likewise called Hizkīl, while Kisā'ī calls him Hirbil. He was originally a carpenter. Mūsā's mother applied to him to make a small box in which to place her new born son and throw him into the sea; but he hurried to the royal police to tell them of it. His tongue then became paralysed and he lost the power of speech. He only regained it after swearing that he would betray nothing. Henceforward he honoured Mūsā in secret and protected him from all danger. (Cf. Kur'ān, 40, 29).

AL-ḤODAIDA (Hodāde, Hadīda), a seaport in Arabia, on the Red Sea about 110 miles N.N.W. of Mokha [q. v.], the most important port for the coffee trade in Yemen and a landingplace for pilgrims to Mecca from Central Africa. It is under the protection of a patron saint, Shāikh Ṣadiq, whose festival is celebrated on the fifteenth day of the month Shā'bān. In the time of Niebuhr and Seetzen, al-Ḥodaída belonged to the Imām of San'a'. In 1837 Ibrāhīm Pasha was commander in the town. Since 1899, al-Ḥodaída, which was previously a part of the great wilāyet of Yemen, has been a separate wilāyet. The town is fortified and is surrounded by many palmgroves and other fruit trees. It has a considerable garrison and possesses a post and telegraph office, a military hospital and a powder magazine. The streets are small and irregular but densely populated. Most of the houses are straw huts, only the houses of rich merchants being of stone. The bazaar is small and very dirty but well stocked with all necessities. In the suburbs live, besides Arabs, many Banians, Somalis, Persians, Jews and Abyssinians. The climate of al-Ḥodaída is healthy and the town free from fever. The temperature which is always very hot reaches its height in April, May, August, and September. Among the articles brought to this port to be exported are besides the staple, coffee, (the export of which, however, has now considerably diminished particularly on account of the vast supplies exported from Brazil), goat- and ox-hides (to Europe, America and Australia), millet and materials for packing coffee; dried fruits, dates, frankincense, rosin, clothstuffs and rose-red pearls, which are obtained among the reefs at al-

Hodaïda, were also at one time exported. The imports include English, American, and Indian silk and woollen goods, sugar (from India, China, France and Austria), tobacco, (from Egypt, Turkey and Persia), petroleum (at one time mainly from America, now from Batumi), rice (from India) raisins, dates and honey, which are transported hence to other towns, particularly Ṣanʿā. The trade with al-Hodaïda is mainly carried on by British Indian ships; in recent years Greek and particularly Italian ships have had an increasing share in it. Manzoni in 1883 estimated the number of inhabitants of al-Hodaïda at 20,000; according to other statements, the town has nearly 50,000 inhabitants.

AL-HODH (Hōḍ), a semi-desert region in Western Africa. It is a plain, lying to the east of Timbuktu between the Sahel on the south and the Tagant on the north, stretching over a distance of about 200 miles. A zone of steppes called Mrāya (mirror) separates the Hodh from that part of the western Sahara known by the name of al-Djūf. Three well-defined divisions may be distinguished in the Hodh. In the south is a region of sand and thorny brushwood, fairly rich in wells and sustaining quite a numerous population of Pul and Sarakola as well as Moorish herdsmen. To the north of this lie rocky plateaus, often ferruginous, separated by valleys with black soil bottoms, which the winter rains turn into impassable marshes. Lastly, the northern part is covered with white sand dunes, separated by basins of black earth. Arab or Arabised Berber tribes, of whom the chief are the Aghelal, the Ūlād al-Nāṣir, the Ida Budjellān of whom some, like the Namadi, are only Muslim in name, roam freely over the Hodh. Lying outside the main caravan routes, the Hodh is still one of the least known regions of the Sahara.

Sidi al-Habīb and the chronicle known as the Chronicle of Ibn ʿArabi. (G. YVER.)

HODJAILA, a village in South Arabia, at the foot of Ḥarāz [q. v.] about 1900 feet above the sea level, a border village of the Tihāma. It belongs to the qaḍā of Manākha [q. v.] and to the mudirlik of Mitwaḥ on Djebel Ṣaʿfān (Ḥarāz). It has a market and Turkish barracks. The low cottages (arwāḥ) of the village are built of large unhewn stones without mortar. The people of Ḥodjaila are of a chestnut brown colour and resemble gypsies; they belong some to the tribe of Khawli, others to the Ziyādini. Around the village many partridges are found whence its name. Moreover a kind of wild duck called khulāl is found in the waters of the neighbourhood and there are also many other kinds of birds. The women of Ḥodjaila dress their hair in a peculiar fashion: they twine the plait around their ears. Glaser proposes to identify Ḥodjaila with the Ṣhaṭṭ al-Ḥadjal of Hamdāni (Djazira, p. 105, 15).

AL-HOFHÜF (HOFUF, FOOF), a town in Arabia, capital of the province of Ḥasā (Ḥaṣā [see AL-AḤSĀ]. The town, which is surrounded by extensive gardens and datepalm groves, is divided into three parts; 1. the Kōt (fortress) in the north-east; 2. the Raʿīya (Refeyīya, "eminence" so called on account of its rising ground, in the northwest and west); 3. the Naʿāthar (in the south and west). The Kōt, a large fortress with very high, thick walls and towers (about 16 on each side with winding stairways) is about 500 yards long and 400 broad and surrounded by a deep ditch; it contains 2000—3000 people. The governor of Ḥasā (during Palgrave's stay in Hofhūf he was a negro named Belāl) resides in the Kōt and the Nadjdī zealots (the fanatical members of the Wahhābī sect) dwell there also; in it is the Wahhābī mosque. A second isolated fortress dating from the xviiith century, called Kḥuṭaim ("muzzle") is situated near the southern gate of the town. The Raʿīya quarter is inhabited by old and aristocratic families, hostile to the Wahhābīs; its situation is a very healthy one and it contains many fine houses and broad, clean streets. In this quarter is the market place, a long pillared hall with an arched roof, al-kaisāriya, with workshops of shoemakers, smiths and carpenters, and shops containing weapons, clothes, embroideries, gold and silver ornaments and other wares, partly imported from Bahrain, ʿOmān, Persia and India. The Naʿāthar quarter is the most thickly populated; it occupies about half the town and contains a large mosque: its population is a mixed one, consisting chiefly of merchants, small tradesmen, weavers, artisans and including also strangers from Persia, ʿOmān, Bahrain, Ḥarīk [q. v.] and Qaṭar [q. v.]. In the centre of the town opposite the market place is the public square, a long quadrangle about 300 yards by 80, where the stands of the barbers and the workshops of numerous smiths and shoemakers stand and dates (the fine khalaṣ kind, the best in Arabia, which are grown only in Ḥasā), vegetables, firewood, smoked locusts, etc. are sold in numerous booths. The weekly market of Hofhūf is held on Thursdays on an open space before the north gate of the town. Here coarsely woven cloaks, old brass vessels, old swords, sandals, camels, dromedaries and asses are sold by the country people, while bracelets and anklets, looking glasses, European drinking glasses, strings of beads, also cereals and fruits (corn, meal, khalaṣ dates, sugarcane), coal, wood, etc. are sold by the regular traders. According to information supplied to W. Schimpers by a Wahhābī, in 1836 the town had 40,000 inhabitants; W. Palgrave gives the figure at 23,000—24,000 for the year 1862.

In the tenth century Hofhūf like the rest of Ḥasā was the scene of the Qarmāṭian wars; it was from here that the Qarmāṭian leaders undertook their raids into Syria and Mesopotamia. In the beginning of last century Hofhūf fell into the power of the Wahhābīs who as elsewhere introduced their views here by force. The rule of the Wāhhābīs was a heavy burden on the town and the people of Hofhūf as of the rest of Ḥasā enthusiastically welcomed the Egyptians when Nadjd was conquered by Ibrāhīm Pasha: the oppressive taxes which the Egyptians levied on them as well as the servile treatment with which the citizens of the town were treated soon brought about a general rising not only in the town but throughout the country which put an end to Egyptian rule for ever and restored its independence to Hofhūf as to the rest of Ḥasā. After the reconquest of Nadjd by the Wāhhābīs Hofhūf was only taken after stubborn fighting. The walls of the town, like those of other towns, were partly destroyed, the fortress levelled to the ground, new mosques built and old ones restored.

Before the conquest of Ḥasā by the Wāhhābīs, Hofhūf was a flourishing emporium of trade. It had busy relations with Ḥomān, Persia and India on the one side and Baghdād and Damascus on the other. Hardware, cloths of the poorer qualities, silk, gold and silver thread, ironmongery, swords, spears, earthenware, and other articles were imported. Besides khalaṣ dates (which still are a lucrative article of export, particularly to India) and sugar-cane, the robes of Hofhūf highly prized on account of their excellent quality and fine make, were exported and brought the merchants rich profits; the copper and silver vessels (coffee-pots) manufactured in Hofhūf also used to enjoy a great reputation. On account of the fanatical hatred with which the Wāhhābīs in the provinces under their rule put down all that is connected with fine raiment (particularly silk) and adornment, trade has now quite declined. The people of Hofhūf before Wāhhābī rule had been accustomed from ancient times to make excursions, particularly in autumn, often for longish periods to the Djebel Moghūr, situated to the northeast of Ḥasā, where they sought to recuperate themselves, with music, song, and other recreations after their strenuous labours; now Wāhhābī fanaticism forbids them to do this openly, under penalty of fines or even imprisonment.

HOLWĀN. [See HULWĀN.]

HORMUZ (ORMAZD, AHŪRA MAZDA, the name of the supreme being of the Zoroastrians, at a much later period applied to the planet Jupiter), the name borne by five kings of the Sāsānian dynasty.

Hormuz I, son of Shāpūr, reigned for only a year (272–3). He had previously been governor of Khurāsān and had distinguished himself in war with the Romans; he is also said to have given Mānī when persecuted a place of refuge in his palace in Dastagird.

Hormuz II (308–9), son of Narses and grandson of Shāpūr I, was killed by the Arabs after he had defeated them. He was the father of Shāpūr II, who was born after his death and of a prince named Hormuz; the latter was kept in confinement but managed to escape after thirteen years and went to Constantinople from which he accompanied the Emperor Julian on his Persian campaign. The ruins of the palace of Hormisdas (the Greek form of his name) are still pointed out in Stambul, in the wall which separates the city from the sea of Marmora.

Hormuz III was the son of Vezdegird II and succeeded his father. During his brief reign, (457–9) he had to fight his younger brother Firūz, who had procured the assistance of the Hayātīla (Hephthalites, White Huns) by ceding them the cities of Tālekān and Tirmidh in Bactria. Firūz was victorious and killed his brother. During this war Dinak, the mother of the two brothers, took over the government in Ctesiphon.

Hormuz IV (578–590) was the son of Khusrāw Anōshak-Ruwān and the daughter of the khākān of the Turks, whence he was called Turkzād (scion of the Turks), (Tabarī, Annals, i. 965; al-Birūnī, Chronology, p. 123). According to the Byzantine sources, he was a haughty and foolish ruler, who imprisoned the Emperor's envoys and only released them under pressure from the Magi. His troops were several times defeated in battle by the Romans (586). The rebellion of Bahram Čōbin also took place in his reign. Hormuz was deposed, thrown into prison and strangled without his son Khusrāw Parwīz preventing it.

Hormuz V, grandson of Khusrāw Parwīz, fought against his aunt Azarmī-dokht and maintained his position till the first year of Vezdegird III's reign, when he was put to death by his own soldiers in Nišibīn (632).

(CL. HUART.)

HORMUZ (HURMUZ, ORMUS), in the middle ages the most important commercial port of Persia, situated at the entrance to the Persian Gulf; about 1300 the name was transferred to a small island opposite the ancient town and is still attached to it. Hormuz was of importance for the lands on the Indian ocean as trade between Western Asia and India passed through its port; traffic by sea had also been established between China and Hormuz. A district of Ἀρμόζιαι is first mentioned by Nearchus, who explored the Persian coast from the mouth of the Indus. (Arrian, Ἰνδική, 32–35; Onesikritos in Juba's Epitome in Pliny, Hist. Nat., VI, 27–28). The location of this district is established by the fact that the Ananis (Andanis) flowed into the sea here. The town (Harmuza) is mentioned by Cl. Ptolemaeus Marcianus. (Periplus Maris exteri, 27); the Hermopolis of Ammian. Marcellinus (XXIII, 6, 49) is probably identical with it. The situation of the town is wrongly given in Ptolemy; Marcianus agrees with Nearchus and is perhaps indirectly dependent on him.

The district of Hormuz, the land of Caramania, was very rich in agricultural products (wine, wheat, barley, rice and indigo) and in minerals (gold, silver, copper, iron, cinnabar, and salt); but it had no importance in the world's commerce. It was the Arabs who first opened up this district to foreign trade, whereupon Hormuz attained its great importance in the XIV–XVIth century. The mediaeval accounts, European as well as Oriental, show that Hormuz was a port of world wide fame. The foundation of the town is ascribed to Ardashīr Pāpakān (224—241), founder of the Sāsānian dynasty, but it was only after the Arab conquest that it attained prominence. From it horses were exported to India as was the case as late as the xvth century. The fact that China under the T'ang dynasty (627—961) attained great importance, at the same time as the Arab empire, brought about closer relations between Western Asia and China, in which trade played an important part. The Arabs visited India mainly by the sea route while in return Indian and Chinese ships came to the Pērsian Gulf to Hīra and Hormuz. Hormuz is mentioned by Ibn Khordādhbih as a calling-place on the route from Basra to China. A Chinese account (of circa 785—805) describes the sea-route from Canton to the Persian Gulf and mentions as the most westerly point the "important market of the Ta-shi (Arabs)" the harbour of Mo-lo, which Rockhill and Hirth take to be Hormuz, while A. Herrmann identifies it with Basra.

Of the older Hormuz on the mainland, we learn that it was situated one parasang (four miles) from the sea on a river, which ships ascended to the town. Idrisi, Istakhrī and Mukaddasī describe the town as the chief market of Kirmān. Indigo is mentioned as the most important product of the district. Yāqūt particularly notes that Hormuz had attracted all the trade with India.

After about 1100, Hormuz was under Arab rulers, of whom Rukn al-Din Maḥmūd (1246—1277) is known to us from Marco Polo. A full history of the dynasty is given from a lost Persian source in Teixeira, Relações de P. Teixeira d'al origin descendencia y successão de los Reyes de Persia y de Hormuz, etc. After 1262 Hormuz was under the rule of the Ilkhāns of Persia. It cannot be certainly ascertained what brought about the transference of the town from the mainland to the torrid, barren island. Abu 'l-Fidā' says that the old town was destroyed by 'Tatars'. But the Mongols hardly touched the coast of Kirmān. Ibn Baṭṭūṭa expressly distinguishes between the Hormuz of the mainland and 'New Hormuz', an island 3 parasangs from the coast. The references of Marco Polo, who twice visited the place (1272 and 1293) are to the Hormuz on the mainland. He describes the business of the port in a striking fashion and particularly notes the export of horses to India. The island town founded by Kuṭb al-Dīn was, in spite of unfavourable natural conditions, a thriving centre of the world's commerce from the xivth to the xvth centuries. The appearance of the Portuguese in India decided the fate of Hormuz; in 1507 the island was taken by a Portuguese fleet, but the Portuguese allowed the native rulers to remain on condition that they paid tribute. With the help of an English fleet Shāh 'Abbās the Great won Hormuz from the Portuguese, which, apart from an interval under the rule of 'Omān, has ever since belonged to Persia. It was the will of Shāh 'Abbās that his new foundation Bender 'Abbās [q. v. i. 694 sq.] should take the place of Hormuz. The decline of Hormuz dates from this time and now it no longer exists as a town.

We have brief accounts of the island town in Ibn Baṭṭūṭa who stayed there in 1331 and in 'Abd al-Razzāk. The town was very frequently visited by European travellers, first in 1321 by Odoico of Pordenone. He was followed by Odoardo Barbosa, Caes. Frederick (1589) and Jos. Salbancke. The account of the Russian merchant Afannasiy Nikitin (c. 1580) is of particular interest. The information afforded by these sources on the nature of the town, its trade and its highly developed civilisation, have been collected by R. Stube in his monograph mentioned below.

HORMUZĀN, HORMIZDĀN. [See HURMUZĀN.]

HORUK. [See 'ARŪJ.]

HOSHANGSHĀH GHŪRĪ, the second king of the Ghūrī dynasty of Mālwa, ascended the throne in 1405-1406. In 1407 Muẓaffar I of Guḍjarāt invaded Mālwa, defeated and captured Hoshangshāh, and imprisoned him on the ground that he had poisoned his father, who had been Muẓaffar's friend. Hoshangshāh was released and regained his kingdom but throughout his reign was engaged in constant hostilities with Guḍjarāt, from which his kingdom suffered severely. In 1420 Hoshangshāh annexed the Gond state of Kherla to his kingdom, as a feudatory state, and in 1422 led a most daring raid to Dīādīnagar (perhaps Dīādīpūr) in Uṛīsa, captured the rājā by an artifice and compelled him to surrender several elephants as the price of his freedom. On returning to his kingdom he discovered that Ahmad I of Gujjarāt was besieging his capital, Māndū. Hoshangshāh, seizing a favourable opportunity, threw himself into Māndū, whereupon Ahmad Shāh raised the siege and marched towards Sārangpūr. Hoshang followed and attacked him but was defeated and shut himself in Sārangpūr. He was again defeated when following Ahmad, who retired from Sārangpūr. Later in the same year Hoshang made a rash and ineffectual attempt to seize the strong fortress of Gwāliyār. In 1428 Ahmad Shāh Bahmanī of the Dakhan appeared before Kherla, which he claimed as an appanage of Berār, but retreated when he heard that Hoshang was marching to relieve the place. Hoshang followed him and forced an action, in which he sustained a severe defeat. In 1433-1434 Hoshang marched against Kālpi and Ibrāhīm Shāh Sharḳī of Djawnpūr marched to oppose him, but was recalled by the news that Mubārak Shāh of Dihlī was advancing on Djawnpūr, and Kālpi fell, without a blow, into Hoshang's hands. On his way to Māndū, Hoshang punished some Hindū marauders who had invaded his dominions and then hastened on his way to compose the quarrels between his sons, which embittered his later years. Disputes and intrigues regarding the succession were so virulent as to disturb the unfortunate monarch's last moments and hasten his end. He died on July 6, 1435, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Ghaznīn Khān, entitled Muḥammad Shāh.

HŌT, a Balōḥ tribe, one of the five main divisions of the race. The tribe is still found under this name in Makrān, but those who invaded the Panḍjāb in company with the Rinds and Dōdāis are better known by the names of the tribes formed at a later date, such as part of the Khōsa tribe and the Bālāḥānī section of the Mazārīs. The Hōts ruled as Nawwābs at Dēra Ismā'il Khān for two hundred years until they were conquered by Afghans. Hōts are still numerous throughout the South Panḍjāb.

Raverty alludes to them as Hūts, but confounds them with the Dōdāis, from whom they were distinct.

HUBAL, the name of an idol, which was worshipped at Mecca in the Ka'ba but otherwise is only known from a Nabataean inscription (Corp. Inscr. Semit., ii. n°. 189 = Jausen et Savignac, Mission Archéol. en Arabie, i. 169, 170) where it is mentioned along with Dūsharā and Manūtu. It is thus probable that the tradition according to which 'Amr b. Luḥaiy [q. v.] brought the idol with him from Moab or Mesopotamia, is correct in retaining a memory of the foreign, to be more accurate Aramaic, origin of Hubal, although the substance of the tradition is otherwise quite legendary. The name cannot be explained from the Arabic for the etymologies in Yāḳūt etc. condemn themselves, but Pocock's supposition that Hubal is equivalent to הבעל, although defended by Dozy, is hardly better founded. Another tradition indeed relates that Hubal was an idol of the Banū Kināna, worshipped also by the Quraysh, and had been placed in the Ka'ba by Khuzaima b. Mudrika wherefore it used to be called Hubal Khuzaima. It is further related that the idol was of red carnelian in the form of a man; the Quraysh replaced the right hand which was broken, by a golden one; it was the custom to consult the idol by divination with arrows; this was done for example by 'Abd al-Muttalib with reference to his son 'Abd Allāh, etc. We learn nothing further about the cult of this idol and the legends are quite worthless for the comprehension of the real nature of the deity. After the conquest of Mecca Hubal shared the lot of all other idols and the image was removed from the Ka'ba and destroyed.

HŪD, the prophet who, according to the Qur'ān, appeared among the 'Ad [q. v.]. He is represented as one of their kinsmen (akhl) and his genealogy (which is transmitted in various forms), therefore coincides in part with that of their founder 'Ad. He is also identified with 'Ābir (the Biblical 'Eber, the ancestor of the Hebrews); in another reference he is called the son of 'Ābir [q. v.]. His figure is even more shadowy than the picture of his people and like every warner he is represented in the same position as Muḥammad in Mecca, i. e. he found only infidelity and pride among the people and his followers were few. God, therefore punished the 'Ad with a three years' drought, as the later legend tells us. A deputation was sent to Mecca to pray for rain there. God made three clouds appear in the sky, one white, one red and one black. One of the deputation, called Ḳail, was given the choice of one of the three by a voice from heaven. He chose the black one with the result that a terrible storm broke over the 'Ad and destroyed the whole people with the exception of Hūd and his followers (Sūra, 69, 6). Hūd is said to have lived 150 years. There are various traditions regarding his grave; there is a Ḳabr Hūd not far from Bī'r Barahūt [q. v.]. In Ibn Baṭṭūṭa (ed. Paris, i. 205; ii. 203) it is mentioned that the grave of Hūd is in the great mosque at Damascus; according to other traditions he rests near the Ka'ba with 98 other prophets.

In the article 'Ad attention has already been called to the fact that the existence of a tribe of 'Ad is problematic. This is still truer of Hūd. The word Hūd in the Qur'ān is a name for the Jews as a body (Sūra, ii. 105, 129, 134. and the root HWD means to profess Judaism (ii. 59, iv. 48 etc.). The proper name looks as if it had been derived from the verb and the noun: the traditional identification of Hüd with the ancestor of the Hebrews probably points in the same direction. Hirschfeld is perhaps correct when he calls Hüd an allegorical figure (Beiträge z. Erklärung des Korān, Leipzig 1886, p. 17, note 4). Von Kremer's suggestion (Über die süd-arabische Sage, p. 21 sq.), that the crater of Barahūt was the immediate cause of the rise of the Hüd legend is worthy of note.

HÜD. After the assassination of Mundhir II b. Yahyā (cf. TOPPİN) in the year 430 (1039) Abū Aiyūb Sulaimān b. Muḥammad seized the government of the town of Saragossa and became the founder of a dynasty which ruled there and, according to Codera, in Lerida, Calatayud, and Tudela also till 503 (1110). The dynasty is known as the Banū Hüd, because Hüd, one of the Arabs who came to Spain at the conquest, was the ancestor of the family. There are various forms of the genealogy of Hüd preserved. The founder of the dynasty was commander of the Christian troops at Lerida in Mundhir's reign and when he became lord of Saragossa took the name al-Musta'in. According to Codera, Estudios críticos de Historia Árabe española, p. 362 sqq., he divided his power among his sons so that each of them became governor of one of the above mentioned towns, when Sulaiman died in 438 (1046—7). Of the rulers of Saragossa alone do we possess further details. In it there reigned in succession Aḥmad al-Muḥtadir till 474 (1081), his son Yūsuf al-Mu'tamin till 478 (1085), his son Aḥmad al-Musta'in (ii.) till 507 (1107). The last-named's son 'Imād al-Dawla 'Abd al-Malik lost his throne to the Almoravid 'Alī b. Yūsuf in 503 (1110); authorities differ as to how this happened. 'Imād al-Dawla escaped to Rueda and lived there till 524 (1130). Cf. also the article MUḤAMMAD B. YŪSUF B. HÜD.

HUDAIBIYA, a valley a short day's journey (marḥala) from Mecca, i. e. about 9 miles distant. A portion of it was included in the ḥaram of Mecca, which extended farthest in this direction. About the time of the Hidjra this barren valley was the centre of a local cult with a well and a sacred tree. A modest village afterwards arose here as the centre of the surrounding lands, which were rich in subterranean water.

It was towards the last months of the year 6 A. H., after the destruction of the Jewish clans and the humbling of the munāfiḳūn in Medina, that Muḥammad was able to consider himself master of the situation. He therefore thought the moment had arrived for conducting a demonstration against Mecca as an answer to the siege of the Khandaḳ which had been attempted by the Quraysh. His persistent policy had made all preparations. He had assiduously concentrated the attention of his people on the metropolis of Mecca; the alteration of the qibla, the application of the legend of Abraham, who was represented as the builder of the Ka'ba, and the obligation to pilgrimage, which was now laid upon all believers, had no other object. The Prophet seems at first to have meditated a military demonstration: 1400—1600 armed men were to have accompanied him. He then altered his plan and expressed his intention of performing the 'umra (lesser pilgrimage); the sacrificial animals taken with him were to complete the illusion. He would enter Mecca as a sovereign or force the Quraysh to negotiate with him. His military escort was strong enough to gain the respect of the Meccans but too small to suggest thoughts of an attack. The Quraysh took no risks and occupied the approaches. Muḥammad had scarcely entered the sacred territory when he came upon their outposts. Before this resistance he retired to Hudaibiya and entered into negotiations with them. He limited his demands to a request to be allowed to visit the national sanctuary with his followers, which was at first refused. Long and wearisome negotiations followed. As 'Omar did not dare to go to Mecca as plenipotentiary, 'Othman was chosen for the purpose, as the prestige of his family, the influential Omayyads, protected him. When the rumour of his death became current, Muḥammad collected his followers at the sacred tree of Hudaibiya and demanded the oath of fealty from them. This is the ba'i'a of Hudaibiya, also called the "ba'i'a of the three" or ba'at al-riḍwān ("ba'i'a of the agreement"), an ambiguous allusion to a passage in the Qur'an (xlviii. 18) which is traditionally said to allude to these events. All the participators bear the name Shadjari in the history of Islām, from the tree under which the ceremony took place. A few days later ambassadors arrived from Mecca. The treaty to be concluded was discussed clause by clause and word by word. In the protocol Muḥammad had to refrain from using the formulae of Islām and the title of Prophet. He even pledged himself henceforth to send back deserters from the Quraysh, while the Meccans made no such pledge with respect to Muslims. As to the 'umra, they were to be allowed to perform this in the following year provided they came without weapons except the swords by their sides.

This agreement severely disillusioned the companions who had already become impatient of the long period of inactivity and the want of water. In reality, however, in his struggle against Mecca the Prophet had here obtained an important diplomatic success. While on his side he surrendered no rights that he had won but only simple claims, he brought the Qurayshī oligarchy to negotiate with him on equal terms. He was for the first time recognised before all Arabia as a power in the land. The Quraysh entered into negotiations with the former fugitive and leader of a body of fugitives, who had broken all bonds with their homes and the Dār al-Nadwa [q. v.] entirely blotted out the past. Abū 'l-Kāsim would take full advantage of it and be able to make full use of the freedom of movement now guaranteed him by a formal agreement. Medina had nothing more to fear from Mecca. A means would be found to get round the burdensome concessions and to rescind the treaty. In the meanwhile Muḥammad decided to slay in Hudaibiya the sacrificial animals he had brought with him and added certain ceremonies of the pilgrimage to the rite.

HUDHAIL, a large Arab tribe, belonging to the North Arabian group. Their genealogy is Hudhail b. Mudrika b. al-Yās b. Muḍar. They were a brother tribe of the Khuzaina. They inhabited the mountains of Sarāt Hudhail, which bear their name, between Mecca and Medina and were neighbours of the Sulaim [q. v.] and Kināna [q. v.]. In the time of Dīḡhiliya they worshipped the idol Suwāf (destroyed by 'Amr b. al-ʿĀs in 8 = 630) at Ruḡāt and, like the ʿKuraish, Khuzā'a, and other tribes, also Manāt (destroyed in 8 = 630 by Sa'd b. Zaid) at ʿKudaid, mentioned in ʿKuraish liii. 19, 20. The Hudhail produced a great many poets, of whom the most important are the contemporaries of the Prophet, Abū Dhuaib [q. v.] and Abū Khirāsh.

The following places are mentioned, with others, as belonging to the Hudhail: Aṭḥil (in Tihāma), 'Aḏh, al-Aḡath (Wüstenfeld, Register, p. 233; al-Aḡatt), Aḡraḡ, 'Ain, al-Anwās, 'Aly, Alūma, al-'Ardj (a large town near Ṭā'if), Baṣhm, Baṭn Anf, Batu Nu'mān, Dīdad, al-Daḡīf, Huthun, al-Huraida, al-Hikāb, Haiyara, Dūra Farwā, Dabūb, Khaiṣal, al-Ḳurūt, al-Lith, al-Manhā, al-Muntaḡā, Numr (several villages), Rāya, Raḡā Biṭān, Raḡb, Raḡmān, Rutaila, Ruḡāt (3 miles from Mecca, also given as a wādi), al-Tilāf, and 'Urus; mountains: Arāl, 'Asir, al-A'ṣam ('Uṣm, in Wüstenfeld, Register, p. 133, given both as a mountain and a village), al-Faḡl, Faḡl, Ghazwān (a very high peak, on which the town of Ṭā'if stands, rich in game and honey), Haid, Kabkab, al-Ḳarās, Khanthal, Kinthil, Kurāsh, Laban, Mābid (Wüstenfeld, Register, l. c. Mā'id), Makā, Numār, Nubā'i, (also given as a wādi), Salām, Sa'f, Ṣudāṣid, Shamaṣir, Uṣhar, al-Watar, Yaṣūm, Ḳarā'; the wādis include: al-Dāḡi, Duḡāf, Ḥadathā, Halya (Halba), Sa'ya (according to some, a mountain), Udām (all in common with the Kināna), al-Daḡjan (al-Daḡin), Kāfir, Nakhla 'l-Shāmiya (two wādis, which unite at Baṭn Marr), Shadīna, Wādi 'l-Ḳuṣūr, and Tuḡārī.

Historical. The Hudhail endeavoured to tempt the Tubba' Abū Karib to rob the ʿKa'ba, when he came to Mecca, in order that he might thereby incur divine punishment. Abū Karib, warned of this by two learned Jews, had the instigators beheaded. When the Abyssinian king Abraha (in the "year of the elephant") tried to destroy the ʿKa'ba, the Hudhail, along with the Kināna, ʿKuraish and other neighbouring tribes, took up arms against him unsuccessfully; 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib and Khuwailid b. Wāḡila, the chiefs of the Hudhail, and Ya'mar b. Nuḡftha, chief of the Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt, then offered to cede him the third part of Tihāma, if he would spare the ʿKa'ba and leave the country, but Abraha declined.

After the battle of Uḡud in 4 = 626, the Banū Liḡyān, a clan of the Hudhail, assembled at Orna with other tribes around Mecca under Sufyān b. Khālid, to conspire against Muḥammad. The Prophet, being told of this, had Sufyān murdered by 'Abd Allāh b. Uwais. 'Abd Allāh brought his head to the Prophet and was presented by him with a stick which, according to the Prophet, was to serve as a mark of recognition on the day of resurrection. 'Abd Allāh is said to have been buried with this stick, which he carried all his life. In the same year a number of Hudhail fell upon six companions of the Prophet at the watering-place of Radīf; they were on their way from Muḥammad to the 'Adal and ʿKāra to instruct them in the principles of Islām. The Hudhail slew four and brought the others to Mecca, where they sold them to the ʿKuraish. After the conquest of Mecca by the Prophet in 8 = 630, a number of the Khuzā'a fell upon a section of the Hudhail and slew one of them: the Prophet, learning of this, during the midday service next day before the ʿKa'ba made an appeal to the Khuzā'a, urging them to refrain from further bloodshed.

The Hudhail still exist on the Djebel Kora, a number of ranges round Ṭā'if, on one of which is the village of Ra's al-Kora, according to Burckhardt, the most beautiful spot in the Ḥidjāz, and far famed for the quality of its water. Here they encamp with their numerous herds and grow wheat and barley in the very charming valleys of these hills. Their clean little houses, scattered over the plain in groups of four or five, are built of stone or earth. There are also settlements of the Hudhail at Mabede, the southern suburb of Mecca, where they sell dates, corn and cattle. Before their conquest by the Wahhābis, they were only provisionally under Mecca and paid no taxes.

HUDHUD, the hoopoe, belongs to the order Scansores and bears a remarkable tuft of feathers on its head. Much is related concerning its habits and character, of which only a part can be mentioned here. Its piety is particularly emphasised. In Umāiya b. Abi 'l-Salt (ed. Schulthess, in Beiträge zur Assyriologie, viii. 26, 84 sq. cf. also Ibn ʿKutaiba, Kitāb al-Shī'r, ed. de Goeje, p. 279 sq.) there is a story that the hoopoe enshrouded its dead mother and carried the body on its back and head till it found a resting-place for it; this is why its back is brown. It is also related that the tuft of feathers was a reward for this act. — When its mate dies, the hoopoe does not look for a new wife. — When its parents grow old, it feeds them. It bears different kunya's in Arabic, e. g. Abū 'Ibād, Abū 'l-Saḍāda, after the numerous bows of its tuft as it walks. It makes its nest in dung so that it has an unpleasant smell. Its feathers, heart etc. are used in various ways. The Prophet is said to have forbidden it to be killed; according to some, its flesh is forbidden, according to others, it is permitted. The hoopoe plays a prominent part in the legend of Solomon and Bilqis. This was apparently already developed by Muḥammad's time as may be concluded from Sūra xxvii. 20 sqq. In this passage we are told that Solomon assembled the birds and the hoopoe was missing. When he arrived late, he gave an account of the queen of Saba' and was entrusted by Solomon with the hearing of a letter to the Sabaeans.

The later writers as a rule give the whole story as follows. The hoopoe possesses the power of seeing where water is through the earth. He was therefore used by Solomon on his pilgrimage to Mecca to find water. But on one occasion the hoopoe whom Solomon had appointed for this purpose, named Ya'fur or Yaghfur, while on the journey, took a trip to the south and reached the garden of Bilqis where he made the acquaintance of another hoopoe named 'Ufair. The latter told him a great deal about the queen of Saba'. In the meanwhile Solomon was looking in vain for water for his army (or according to another version for ritual ablutions). He sent the vulture (nasr) to assemble the birds and the hoopoe was missing. The eagle ('uḡāb) was sent to fetch him. But he was already on his way back and was brought by the eagle before Solomon, who talked to him severely but finally, after hearing his account of Bilqis sent him with a letter to the Sabaeans.

Another version of the beginning of the story, relates that Solomon on his pilgrimage was being carried with all his retinue on a carpet by the winds to Arabia. The birds were ordered to fly above the carpet in such a compact mass that those sitting on it should be entirely protected from the sun. But Solomon detected a little ray of light in one place; so he concluded that one bird was missing. He then held a roll-call and it was found that the hoopoe was absent; the story continues as before.

It is also related that the hoopoe once invited Solomon and his army to a feast on an island. When the guests had arrived, he threw a dead locust into the sea and said "Now eat, O thou Prophet of God! if the meat be lacking, there is at least plenty of sauce". Solomon and his soldiers laughed for a year at this joke.

On the relationship of the Jewish hoopoe-legend to the Muslim, see Grünbaum, Neue Beiträge zur Semitischen Sagenkunde.

In North Africa, hoopoes are made out of silk, feathers, etc., and used for magical purposes (Doutté, Magie et Religion dans l'Afrique du Nord, p. 270 sq.).

HUDJARIYA. [See HUDJRA.]

HUDJJA (A.), proof, document. The word is also used as a title in the science of Tradition for one who has reached the highest stage in it, knows 300,000 traditions by heart and everything connected with them; hence al-ḡhazālī's title, Ḥudjja al-Islām. Among the Ismāʿīlīs, hudjja is one who is appointed leader of the propaganda by "the Imām of the time". The number of the hudjja's is 12. They occupy the same position as the naḡīb's in the propaganda of the ʿAbbāsids, on the model of the 12 disciples of Christ and the 12 naḡīb's of the Prophet. The simple missionaries (dāʿī) are subordinate to them. Among the "Twelvers" the twelfth Imām bears the title Ḥudjja.

HUDJR B. ʿADĪ of the tribe of Kinda, the "first martyr" of the Shīʿa. The sect would like to give him the title of "companion of the Prophet" but it is denied by the oldest authorities. The Shīʿa likewise, with as little ground, makes him take part in the first Syrian campaigns, when he is said to have conquered the district of Mardj ʿAdhḥrā; but the object of this clearly is simply to connect him from the earliest time with this place, which was to be the scene of his martyrdom. At an early period Hudjr threw himself heart and soul into ʿAlī's cause and fought for him at the 'battle of the Camel' and at Siffin. We later find him in Egypt with Muḥammad, son of the Caliph Abū Bakr, who was governing this province in ʿAlī's name. After ʿAlī's son Ḥasan had given up his claim to the Caliphate, Hudjr became the moving spirit in all the ʿAlid intrigues in Kūfa. The governor Mughīra b. Shuʿba had even to offer him money to obtain peace. Mughīra's successor, Ziyād b. Abihī, endeavoured to bring him to a more reasonable frame of mind; but his efforts failed with this unruly spirit, who always wanted to play an important part. On Ḥasan's death, Hudjr entered into negotiations with his brother Ḥusain; the pretender had been invited to take command over his followers in Kūfa. During Ziyād's absence in Baṣra Hudjr had attempted to stir up a revolutionary movement. Ziyād hurried back with all possible speed and endeavoured to settle the affair peacefully. But when the negotiations fell through, Ziyād had Hudjr arrested along with those leaders of the Shīʿa party who were most deeply compromised. The matter was taken to the courts and an indictment prepared and signed by the most prominent men in Kūfa; finally Hudjr was taken with his companions to Muʿāwiya in Syria. After the Caliph had arranged a new trial and asked the advice of the leading men of Syria, he sentenced Hudjr to death and had him executed in Mardj ʿAdhḥrā near Damascus. In his last moments ʿAlī's follower utterly lost his courage. His death opens the martyrology of the Shī'a; hence the importance assigned to this rather everyday episode, which was really nothing more than an incident in the domestic troubles of the Irāk. Ziyād "throughout maintained a correct attitude and Mu'āwiya even inclined to the side of leniency" (Wellhausen), for he pardoned the majority of Hudjra's accomplices.

HUDJRA (A.), room, chamber, particularly (with the article) 'Ā'isha's room, where the Prophet and his two successors Abū Bakr and 'Omar were buried, now one of the greatest sanctuaries of Islām. [Cf. the article MEDĪNA.]

Hudjariya is derived from the same word; it was the term applied in Egypt to the slaves who were quartered in barracks near the royal residence. During the Fāṭimid period, these were organised by al-Aḳḳal on military lines as a kind of bodyguard under the command of an emir, who bore the title al-Muwaffaq. Their number then amounted to 3000 men: Cf. Maḳrīzī, Khitaṭ, i. 443.

HUDJRIYA, (HOGRIYA, HÖDSYERIE), the name of a tribe in South Arabia. Their land lies to the north of the land of the Sobēḥī (Subaiḥī, [q. v.]) between 43° 40' and 44° 42' East Long. Greenw. and 13° 5' and 13° 15' North. Lat. and is entirely mountainous. The climate is tropical; the principal product is coffee. Among the mountains we may mention Djebel Ṣabr (Ṣabir [q. v.]) which is described by Hamdānī in his Djazīra as a very high mountain, among wādīs, the Wādī Warazān which joins the Wādī Tubban, the river of Laḥedj [q. v.], and belonged in Hamdānī's time to the Sakāsik, and the Wādī Mu'ka (Mo'ka); among towns, Dobhan belonging to the important clan of Sherdjebī (Shergebi), which at one time had an independent Sultān, with about 500 inhabitants (of whom about a fifth are Jews), an old Ḥimyar palace, a bazaar and a Saturday market, Dār Shawwar, the chief place of the powerful clan of Hammād, which has an 'aḳil of its own, with about 300 inhabitants (including only a few Jews), several hiṣn and a Friday market, Heruwa on the wādī of the same name with about 500 inhabitants (including a few Jews), a small bazaar and a Tuesday market, Dimena, near Ta'izz [q. v.] with about 600 inhabitants (of whom a tenth are Jews). In the land of the Hammād there is a hot mineral well with a bath, called Birket Hammām, visited by many Arabs, but access to it is forbidden to Jews.

The Hudjriya claim to be true Ḥimyars, and are said to have at one time formed one tribe with the Sobēḥī. They were earlier under the Imāmate of Ṣan'ā, but became independent on the decline of its power. Since the middle of last century they have become for the most part subject to the Dhū Muḥammad, who are descended from the Bakīl (see HĀSHID and BAKĪL), and were formerly in the pay of the Imāms of Ṣan'ā, and obtained possession of a large part of the Yemen on the latter's overthrow.

The Dhū Muḥammad maintain small garrisons among the Hudjriya, levy taxes on them and administer justice among them. Their chief representative bears the title Kā'id. Many Hudjriya seek to escape the rule of the Dhū Muḥammad, who as followers of the heterodox Zaidi sect are hateful to them as Shāh'īs, by migrating to Aden, where they earn a livelihood as labourers.

HUELVA, the ancient Onuba, Arabic Walba, a town in the province of Spain of the same name, on the left bank of the Odiel, an important port, accessible at high tide to seagoing ships, for the copper and sulphur mines of Río Tinto and Tharsis, which are near it. In the middle ages it was, according to Idrīsī, a small, thickly populated, walled town with flourishing trade and industries. The present population is 29,000. After the fall of the Omayyad dynasty, Huelva had its own rulers, the Bakrī Abū Zaid Muḥammad b. Aiyūb and Abū Muṣ'ab 'Abd al-'Azīz. In 1051 the latter ceded the town to al-Mu'taḍid of Seville on condition that he was left the little island of Shaltish (Saltes), but when he saw that this was of no use to him, he sold his ships and armaments to al-Mu'taḍid and went to Cordova. Huelva henceforth shared the fortunes of Seville.

HUESCA, the ancient Osca, Arabic Washka, a town in the Spanish province of the same name, 50 miles E. of Saragossa. The number of inhabitants is now 12,600. Huesca was conquered as early as 96 (713) by the Arabs, and seems during the period of Arab rule to have formed for a time an independent principality under Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Tawil, died 301 (913—4). Cf. Codera, Estudios críticos de Historia árabe Española, p. 234 sqq. In 1096 the rule of the Moors ended and Huesca became for a brief period capital of Aragon, till the seat of the government was moved to Saragossa in 1118. Idrīsī, op. cit., p. 176, only mentions the name of the town.

HUFĀSH, a high mountain in South Arabia, belonging to the al-Maṣānī range of the Sarāt group, on the Wādī Surud near Ḥarāz [q. v.]. It is often mentioned by Hamdānī in his Djazira, along with the adjacent large mountain of Miḥān (called after the Ḥimyar Miḥān b. 'Awf b. Mālik) the real name of which was Raiṣhān. Not far from the latter, (which in Ḥamdānī's time was said to possess no fewer than ninety-nine springs and had a large mosque [called Masjdīd Shāhir] on its summit, Shāhir), there lies a treasure, according to popular belief, as the same author tells us, which many Arabs sought but could never reach, as a snake barred the way in the shape of a high mountain, as soon as they tried to approach it. In Niebuhr's time, Hufāsh formed a separate district to which Djebel Miḥān also belonged. Among places of some importance in Hufāsh he mentions Sefekin, a small town surrounded by a wall, the residence of the Dawla (Dōla) and the two villages of Bait al-Nuṣḥeli and Bait al-Shumma.

HUKM (A.), plural aḥkām, primarily the infinitive of ḥakama, and so "a restraining" like ḥikma. All ḥikma is, in the classical language ḥukm, but the latter denotes also: 1. a judgment or legal decision (Qur'ān 21, 78), especially of God (13, 41); 2. a logical judgment expressed in a djumla: 3. the exercise of administrative authority, rule or dominion (similarly ḥukūma): 4. an ordinance or decree, synonymous with ḥaḍā (Qur'ān 18, 23); 5. a rule in grammar, and then a rule generally. HŪLA, a town in Arabia, in the province of Sedeyr (Ṣudair) in Naǧd, north of Ḥuraimila [q. v.]. The inhabitants are partly tradesmen and partly agriculturists. Its trade and prosperity has markedly increased under Wahhābī rule. During Palgrave's stay in Naǧd, Hūla was one of the most flourishing places in Sedeyr. The town is surrounded by walls.

AL-HŪLA, one of the districts attached to the province of Damascus, lying 'between Bānyās and Tyros'. Its southern end is the Lake of Hūla, which the geographers also call Lake Qadas, formed by the Jordan and surrounded by swamps full of springs. The present inhabitants use the name Baḥret al-Khēt. According to Muḥaddasī the water was dammed back by the erection of a wall to increase the lake. The banks were covered with ḥalfā plants, out of which the inhabitants wove mats and ropes. The lake is full of fish, among which Muḥaddasī mentions the bunni, which had been introduced from Wāsiṭ. (Cf. Fleischer, on Levy's Neubr. Chald. Wörterbuch, i. 285 (see also Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Pal.-Verins, xiii. 75). The district of Hūla, part of which is low-lying, produced wool and rice and included a large number of villages, according to Zāhiri, more than 200.

HŪLĀGŪ (also written Hulāgū) a Mongol conqueror and founder of a Mongol kingdom in Persia, born about 1217 A. D. Sent by his brother Mongke at the head of an army against the Ismā'ilis and the Caliph, he left Mongolia in 611 = 1253 but did not cross the Āmū-Daryā till the 1st Dhu 'l-Ḥijdja 653 = 1st January 1256. There he received the homage of most of the petty rulers of Persia and the Caucasian lands; in the course of the year 614 = 1256 the greater number of the Ismā'ili strongholds were taken without difficulty; on the fall of the dynasty cf. the article ASSASSINS (i. 491). On Wednesday and Thursday 9th–10th Muḥarram 656 = 16th–17th January 1258 the Caliph's army was routed in a pitched battle and on the following day Hūlāgū stood before the walls of Baghdād, where he met with no resistance to speak of; on the fate of the Caliph, his line and his capital, see the article BAGHDĀD (i. 563). An attempt made in 658 = 1260 to conquer Syria failed; Hūlāgū succeeded in taking Ḥalab and advanced as far as Ḥārim [q. v.] himself, sending his generals to lay siege to Damascus, but was forced to return to Persia on hearing of the death of the Great Khān Mongke; on 25th Ramaḍān 658 = 3rd Sept. 1260 the army which he had left behind was destroyed by the Egyptians. Hūlāgū later tried to renew the struggle and with this object entered into an alliance with the Franks but was unable to execute his purpose. On the unsuccessful war with the kingdom of the Golden Horde in 660 = 1202 cf. BERKE (i. 738).

The petty kingdoms in al-Djazira, Kurdistan and Asia Minor as well as the Christian territories south of the Caucasus were incorporated as vassal states in the kingdom founded by Hūlāgū so that his power stretched from the Āmū-Duryā almost to the Mediterranean and from the Caucasus to the Indian Ocean. The sovereign took the title Ilkhān ("subordinate khān" or "khān of the tribe"); he, like his successors down to Chāzān Khān (cf. ii. 149), reigned in the name of the Great Khān living in Mongolia (later in China). Hūlāgū himself was also called "the great Ilkhān" (Ilkhān-i buzurg). The Christian element in his people was particularly favoured by Hūlāgū and especially by his Christian wife Doḳūz Khātūn, often to the detriment of the Muslims. The towns destroyed during his wars were in part rebuilt even in Hūlāgū's time; he himself in times of peace delighted to live in northwestern Ādharbaidjān, particularly on the banks of Lake Urmiya, where many edifices, such as the famous observatory on a hill north of Marāgha, a palace in Alātagh, temples of idols (butkhānahā) in Khōi, etc. were built. Most of these buildings were still standing 40 years later when Rashid al-Dīn was writing his work; remains have not yet been discovered. Hūlāgū built or restored (cf. Yāḳūt, i. 513, on the earlier fortress on the same island) a strong castle on the mountainous peninsula of Shāhū on the east shore of the lake, which had once been an island (whether this was still the case in Hūlāgū's time is not certain; Rashid al-Dīn only speaks of a mountain on the bank of the lake); the treasures won in battle in Persia and other lands were kept there; Hūlāgū and his successor Abāḳā [q. v., i. 4] were buried there. According to Egyptian sources, the tower in Shāhū collapsed in 681 = 1282—3 and fell into the lake with all its treasures; no such catastrophe is mentioned in the Persian authorities. Iḥāz-i Abrū (cf. above ii. 213) only says that in his time the castle was quite uninhabited (cf. Rashīd al-Dīn, ed. Quatremère, p. 316 sq.; Le Strange, The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 160 sq.). Hūlāgū died on Sunday 19th Rabi' II 663 = 8th February 1265. According to the Mongol custom, beautiful young maidens were buried with him; this is the last occasion on which this custom is mentioned among the Persian Mongols, even in the heathen period.

AL-HULAL AL-MAWṢHĪYA FI DHĪKR AL-AKH-BĀR AL-MARRĀKUSHĪYA, an anonymous work, dealing especially with the history of Marrākush. The author begins his story with the foundation of the city; he deals in detail with the history of the Almoravids and Almohads but on reaching the Marinids, he only gives a summary list of the rulers of this dynasty. We find at the end of the book that he lived in Marrākush. The work has been attributed to Ibn Baṭṭūṭa (!) and by its recent editor to Lisān al-Dīn b. al-Khaṭīb; but the author himself tells us (p. 136) that he compiled (completed?) the work on the 12th Rabi' I 786 (4th May 1384), Dozy's manuscripts are dated 783 and Ibn al-Khaṭīb was assassinated at the beginning of 776 (1374). The preface and the chapter on Yūsuf b. Tāshfin's expeditions to Spain were published by Dozy, Scriptorum Arabum loci de Abbadidis, ii. 182—209; he has also given the chapter on the Almohad Abū Ya'qūb's expedition in his Recherches sur l'histoire et la littérature de l'Espagne (3rd ed., Appendix xxvii. pp. lxx-lxxix). A short extract is given in Amari's Appendice alla Biblioteca Arabo-Sicula (Leipzig 1875), p. 62—63. The text has been published very inaccurately at Tunis (n. d.) with the biography of the supposed author Ibn al-Khaṭīb. In the xviiith century a Spanish translation was made which is now in the Government House at Algiers; it was inserted (without indication of provenance) by Conde in his Historia de la dominación de los Arabes en España, iii. ch. ix—lviii.

HULMĀNĪYA, a mystic sect founded in Damascus by Abū Hulmān al-Fārisī al-Ḥalabī. He appears to have been a disciple of Ibn Sālim of Baṣra (died 297 = 909); he was admitted among the Ṣūfī Shāikhs in the Ta'arruf of Kalābādhi (s. v. simā) but excommunicated by the Aṣḥ'aris for having maintained the theses 1. that God is present in the person of men endowed with physical beauty (ḥulūl) 2. that everything is allowed (ibāḥa) to him who knows to worship the presence of God in them. This is perhaps a corruption of the Sālīmīya thesis on the divine taḍjallī.

Bibliography: Maḳdisī, Bad' wa Tārīkh, ed. Huart, ii. 90—92; Sulamī, Ghalaṭāt (cf. s. v. HULUL); Baghdādī, Furq, ed. Badr, p. 245—6; Hudjwiri, Kashf al-Maḥdūb, transl. Nicholson, p. 131, 260. (LOUIS MASSIGNON.)

HULUL, a philosophical term, derived from halla "to loosen, unfold, alight, settle in a place (maḥall)", whence its classical acceptations in Muslim theology, the relation between a body and its place, an accident and its substance. Hulul has also been applied to the substantial union 1. of the body and the soul, ḥulul al-rūḥ fi 'l-badan, 2. of a divine spirit with man, ḥulul al-'aql al-fa'āl fi 'l-insān (Fārābī, Ar' Ahl al-Madina al-fādila, ed. Cairo, 1906, p. 86), ḥulul al-lāḥūt fi 'l-nāsūt (cf. AL-HALLĀDĪ). The Aristotelian doctrine of hylomorphism, like the Christian doctrine of the incarnation, proposed the union to matter of a spiritual substance, its specific form; it may be compared to a force in its sphere of action. Almost all Muslim theologians (Mutakallimūn) reject it; followers of atomism, with al-Aṣḥ'arī, admitted ḥulul in case 1., for they saw in the rūḥ a subtle body, even in the angels and demons, but they rejected it in case 2. as submitting the divine essence to a partition (taḍjazzī), and to transmigration (tanāsukh), whence the excommunication both by Sunna and Shī'a of the following sects as Hulūliya on the same grounds as the Christians: (a) the extreme Shī'a (Ghulāt): Sabā'iya, Bayānīya, Djanābīya, Khaṭṭābīya, Namīriya (Nuṣairīya), Mukanna'iya, Rizāmiya, Bāṭīniya, 'Azākīra, Druses. b. Sunnī Ṣūfiya: Hulmāniya [q. v.], Fārisīya (cf. AL-HALLĀDĪ), Shabbāsīya. c. Monists: Ittīhādīya (Ibn Taimīya calls "ḥulul muṭlaq") their "waḥdat al-wuḍūd", cf. HULWĀN, Greek Χάλα, a very ancient town at the entrance to the Zagros passes, Zagri Pylae = 'Akaba-i Hulwān, now utterly deserted. The site of the town on the left bank of the Hulwāntai south of Ser-i Pūl is still recognisable by the ruins of a building called Ṭāk-i Girra (illustrated in Flandin and Coste, Voyage en Perse, iv. Pl. 214), which dates from Sāsānian times. According to Arab tradition (cf. Tabarī, in Noldeke, Geschichte der Perser und Araber, p. 138), the town was founded by Kawād I (488—496) but in reality it is much older and existed under the same name (Khalmanu) even in the Assyrian period. The surrounding country is very fertile, fruit-trees being particularly numerous, and the figs of Hulwān are celebrated in the east under the name shāh andjir (king's figs). There are also many sulphur springs around the town.

When the Arabs under Ujarir b. 'Abd Allāh captured Hulwān in 19 (640), it was a flourishing town and continued to enjoy its prosperity in the early centuries of the Hijra. The Arab geographers sometimes place it in 'Irāk 'Arabi but more usually in the province of Ljibāl. The town was surrounded by a wall, which had 8 gates, which are detailed by al-Muḥaddasī. The great mosque was in an ancient castle in the centre of the town, and the Jews had a synagogue, which was held in great reverence, outside the walls. Towards the end of the fourth (beginning of the tenth) century an almost independent dynasty was ruling in Hulwān, which was founded by Muḥammad b. 'Annāz and became very important under his son Abu 'l-Shawḥ (cf. FĀRIS B. MUḤAMMAD, ii. 68). In 437 (1046) Hulwān was burned by the Saljuks under Ibrāhīm Ināl; it also suffered severely from earthquake, for example in 544 (1149), so that by the seventh century it was in ruins. The Arab poets devote much attention to Hulwān on account of two palm-trees which used to be there and of which they have much to tell.

HULWĀN, a village in Egypt on the right bank of the Nile, 3 farsakh south of Fuṣṭāt, celebrated by the Arab poet Ibn Kaïs al-Ruḳaiyāt (ed. Rhodokanakis, iii. 6 sqq.) in a panegyric on 'Abd al-'Aziz b. Marwān [q. v.], who had a pleasure-garden there. The village still exists and has given its name to the health resort of Helwān, which lies farther inland and is of modern origin; it now has over 8000 inhabitants and is much visited.

HUMĀ (v.), the bearded griffon, the largest of the birds of prey of the old world, which lives by preference in the neighbourhood of eternal snows; it is the Lämmergeier of the Alps. It carries off the bones of dead animals, smashes them on the rocks and eats the fragments; so that the poet Sa'di is able to say that the humā is superior to other birds, because instead of feeding on living flesh it only requires bones (Gulistan, i. story 15). According to a popular belief, which is very ancient, the shadow of a humā falling on a person's head is a sign that he will be raised to a throne, whence the epithet humāyūn, "august". One who deliberately kills a humā will perish within forty days. The good omen associated with this bird is again shown in another verse of the Gulistan (Book I, story 3) "No one shall go to seek the shadow of an owl, even if there were no humā in the universe".

AL-HUMĀIDĪ, ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ABĪ NAṢR FUTŪḤ B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. FUTŪḤ B. HUMĀID B. YAṢIL AL-AZDĪ, whose father was born in Cordova in the quarter of al-Ruṣāfa, and afterwards went to live in Majorca, was born in the latter place some years before 420 = 1029. After studying in Spain under the direction of Abū 'Omar Yūsuf b. 'Abd al-Barr and Abū Muḥammad 'Alī b. Aḥmad b. Ḥazm al-Zāhiri, to whom he was particularly attached, he set out for the east in 448 = 1056. During his travels he studied the Risāla and the Mukhtaṣar al-Mudawwana with their author, the jurist Ibn Abi Zaid. He visited Cairo, Mecca and Medina, Syria and the 'Irāk and settled in Baghdād where he died in the night of Monday—Tuesday 17th Dhū 'l-Hijja 488 = 17th–18th December 1095. He was buried in the Bāb Abraz cemetery but his remains were removed in Ṣafar 491 = January 1098 to the Bāb Harb cemetery and interred near the tomb of Bishr al-Hāfi. Among his eastern teachers are mentioned Abū 'Abd Allāh b. Abī 'l-Faṭḥ, the historian Abū Bakr al-Khaṭīb, Abū Naṣr Ibn Mākūlā, and among his pupils, Yūsuf b. Aiyūb al-Nahrānī, Muḥammad b. Ṭarkhān, and his teacher Abū Bakr al-Khaṭīb. Jurist, traditionist, historian and man of letters, al-Humaidi was regarded by his contemporaries as the greatest master of his time not only for his learning but also for the sweetness of his character. A professed Zāhiri, he led a simple life and his only ambitions were for learning.

Of the eleven works mentioned by his biographers we only possess his Djaḍḥwat al-Muḥtabis fī Dhikr Wulāt al-Andalus wa Asmā' Ruwāt al-Ḥadīth wa Ahl al-Fiḥ wal-Adab wa Dhawī 'l-Nabāha wal-Shīr preserved in the Bodleian, Cat., i. 783.

HUMĀYŪN PĀDŠĀH. Full name Naṣir al-Dīn Humāyūn, also styled Djahānbānī, and after his death, Djannat Āshiyānī (nesting in Paradise), eldest son of Bābur and Māham Bēgam, born Kabul citadel 6 March 1508, emperor of India end of December 1530, died at Dihli by a fall down stairs from the roof of his library, 27 Jan. 1556; father of Akbar by Miryam Makānī, Hāmida Bānū. He was a good natured and generous prince, and inherited graceful manners from his father and from his mother who was of a Persian, saintly family and related to Sulṭān Ḥusain. He was also a scholar and a mathematician, but he was indolent and addicted to opium. In his youth he was an active soldier, and conquered Guḍjarāt. But he could not control his brothers or himself. He bore with the former for a long time, but at last caused Kāmran to be blinded. He went to Bengal and lived carelessly at Gaur. Twice defeated by Shīr Khān he had to fly to Persia. There Ṭahmāsp helped him to recover his throne. His success in regaining India was chiefly due to his general Bairām Khān who won for him the victory at Māchiwāra and also that over Sikandar Sur at Sirhind in June 1555. He had a poetical turn and wrote a Dirwān. His widow Hādjdji Bēgam, erected a massive tomb over him near Dihli.

HUMĀYŪN-NĀMA, the title of the Turkish version of the Kalīla wa-Dimna [q. v.].

AL-HUMAZA (A.), the slanderer; title of Sūra civ.

AL-HUMS. This is the name traditionally given to the inhabitants of the ḥaram of Mecca at the time of Muḥammad's appearance, in so far as they were distinguished by special customs during the ihrām [q. v.] from the other tribes who were together known as al-Ḥilla.

The Hums are said to have cooked or eaten no butter when in a consecrated state and to have preserved no milk so that they allowed cows, etc. with young to be suckled freely; they are also said to have refrained from consuming curd (akūt) and flesh and from the use of oil and perfumes as well as from sexual intercourse. They cut neither their hair nor nails and wore a new robe, which had not to be made of wool or hair. It is further said of them that they did not come to 'Arafāt, but made wukūf in al-Muzdalifa (according to another tradition in Namira, cf. Snouck Hurgronje, o. c., p. 130 sqq.) and from there began the ifāda (this is said to be forbidden in Qur'ān ii. 195 cf. al-Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, ii. 163 sqq.), that they only lived in leather tents, rode the circuit of the Ka'ba in sandals and did not enter their dwellings through the usual entrance (but, for example, through an opening in the roof). On the last named custom, against which Qur'ān ii. 185 is directed, there are discrepant traditions, according to which it was rather the Anṣār who practised it (see also al-Ṭabarī, op. cit., ii. 105 sq.); in al-Azraqī, p. 112 infra, however, the Aws and Khazraj are included among the Hums.

It is further stated that the clothes of the Ḥillā, after they had completed the ṭawāf, had to remain at the sacred place. They were thrown about around the Ka'ba as laḳā (in other circumstances also a garment could become laḳā, cf. al-Azraqī, p. 118, 4 sqq.) and mouldered away under the influence of the weather. One who wished to keep his robe, took it off at the entrance to the sanctuary and made the circuit naked or in a garment borrowed or hired from one of the Hums (cf. Robertson Smith, *Lectures on the Religion of the Semites*², p. 451). It is also said that the Ḥilla, who came to perform the Hādjdj or 'Umra, were not allowed to eat the food which they brought with them from the ḥill. They could only eat food given by or purchased from the people of the ḥaram. Qur'ān vii. 27, 29 is said to refer to these two last customs (cf. also al-Ṭabarī, op. cit., viii. 104, 19 sqq., 108—111).

The meaning of the word Hums (sg. Aḥmas; also Aḥmasī) is obscure; the opposite Ḥilla, according to Wellhausen, points to the meaning "consecrated"; according to Noldeke (in a private letter), who is inclined to doubt the reality of this contrast, al-Hums, like al-Aḥūmis (Ḥamūsa, p. 283, v. 1), might mean "the hot" with reference to the corresponding root; the denominative ḥammasa is used in al-Azraqī, p. 123, 10, 11, of a mother, who by a vow dedicates her son to be an aḥmas; cf. I Sam. i. 10 sq.

HUNAIN, a deep and irregular valley, with clusters of palm-trees, situated a day's journey from Mecca on one of the roads to Tā'if; the scene of the famous battle, the second mentioned by name in the Qur'ān (ix. 25—26) fought soon after the surrender (fath) of Mecca. The confederate tribes of the Hawāzin did not wish to await the result of this last trial of strength before mobilising all the forces at their disposal. They posted themselves in the defiles commanding the plain of Hunain. Their commander Mālik b. 'Awf brought their families and flocks with them; their presence, he thought, would make his men invincible.

On the course of the battle we have a number of notices, all inspired by the text of the Qur'ān. The latter testifies that — in spite of the imposing number of Muslim warriors — the action began with a complete rout of the Prophet's forces. His army owed its safety to the intervention of "invisible troops". Setting out from this statement each author has set about a compilation representing these two phases of the battle, not forgetting to magnify the valour of his own fellow tribesmen or of individuals of special interest for the early history of Islām. For the rest the confusion and the contradictions of these accounts show that at quite an early period the Sīra found great difficulty in reconstructing the development of the manoeuvres in the battle.

On leaving the narrow oasis of Hunain the road enters winding gorges, suitable for ambuscades. In them Mālik b. 'Awf awaited the Muslims, coming along in no order and not suspecting the presence of the enemy. Surprised by the sudden attack of the Bedouin cavalry, overwhelmed by a hail of arrows, the Prophet's soldiers retired in disorder. "In spite of its size, the earth appeared too small for the fugitives" (Qur'ān ix. 25); for a moment Muḥammad, left alone, was in great danger. Tradition has great difficulty in glossing over this cowardly desertion; it throws the responsibility for it on the Bedouin allies of the tribe of Sulaim and on the ṭalīk or still infidel Meccans. The accounts — according to their Kuraish or Anṣārī origin — claim for the Muḥadjir or Medinese respectively the honour of not having given way. Those versions which are inspired by the court of Baghdād display no less zeal in favour of the Hāshimids. All authors, except the Shī'īs, endeavour to protect the reputation of the future Caliphs Abū Bakr and 'Umar. In the hagiologies of Islām it is considered a signal merit, indeed a marvel, to have stood firm at Hunain.

Victory finally rested with the Muslims. On this point we have the statement of the Kur'an, confirmed by the advance of the Prophet to lay siege to Tā'if. The access to this town was therefore open. How then was the advantage restored to the Muslim arms? Here again the Kur'an suggests the answer: "God sent invisible troops from on high to chastise the unbelievers". Khālīd b. al-Walīd, who commanded the cavalry, was among the few Muslims wounded that day. He must therefore have been risking his life and it seems legitimate to give him the credit of the victory, equally claimed for the Anṣārīs by the Medinese school. Hunain was not a battle, but two routs; first that of the Muslims, then that of the Bedouins of Hawāzin. This accounts for the large number of prisoners — 6000 women and children are mentioned — and the almost negligible total of the Muslim losses, about twelve killed. The booty captured was enormous, over 24,000 camels. The fleeing Bedouins sought refuge behind the ramparts of Tā'if.

(H. LAMMENS.)

HUNAIN B. ISHĀQ. His full name was ABŪ ZAID HUNAIN B. ISHĀQ AL-IBĀDĪ; he was a member of a family belonging to the Christian Arab tribe of 'Ibād and was born at Hira in 194 = 809-810, where his father was an apothecary; he was celebrated as a physician and as the translator of numerous Greek works into Syriac and Arabic. As a young man he came to Baghdād where he became a pupil of the physician Yaḥyā b. Māsawaihi. He completed his education in Asia Minor and became particularly proficient in the Greek language, which qualified him for his later translations. On returning to Baghdād he began his literary activity with the support of the Banū Musā, for whom he had collected Greek works, and became physician to the Caliph al-Mutawakkil. On account of his attitude to iconoclasm he was suspected of blasphemy and excommunicated by Bishop Theodosius; he thereupon took poison out of melancholy and died in Ṣafar 260 = December 873.

Of his own works there have survived the Kitāb al-Mudkhal fī 'l-Ṭibb, transl. into Latin and printed as Isagoge Johannis ad Tegni Galeni or Johannis Isagoge in artem parvam Galeni; another version of the same work entitled Kitāb al-Mas'ūl fī 'l-Ṭibb li 'l-Muta'allimīn; a Kitāb al-Mawlūdīn; ein Kitāb Iḡtīmā'āt al-Falāsifa fī Buḥūt al-Hikma fī 'l-ʿAḡād wa-Tafāwud al-Hikma bainahum; several works on physics and astronomy; the "Aphorisms of the Philosophers" in a Hebrew translation. Among translations it is principally those of Platonic, Aristotelian or Hippocratic works that are ascribed to him, also that of Dioscorides' περί ὕλης ἱατρικῆς, but especially almost all the works of Galen, so that, according to Ibn Abī Uṣaib'a, "hardly anything by Galen exists which was not translated or improved by him". In addition, translations of the Quadripartitum of Ptolemy etc., are ascribed to him.

There can be no doubt that of the numerous translations ascribed to him a portion are to be placed to the credit of his school, notably to his son Ishāq b. Hunain, his nephew Hūbush and others. It may be particularly mentioned that the translation of Galen edited by M. Simon is ascribed to Hūbush as a result of a critical analysis of its language by G. Bergsträsser. For the details see the Bibliography.

HUNZA-NAGIR. The two districts of Hunza and Nagir, which occupy an isolated valley between 36° and 37° N. and 74° 25' and 75° E., are generally considered as one country under the joint name of Hunza Nagir (often written Hunza-Nagyr). This valley communicates by difficult gorges with Gilgit, and is drained by the Kandjūt River which falls into the Gilgit River a tributary of the Indus. From the north it can be approached by passes leading on to the Tāghadumbāsh Pāmīr, by which there is communication with Sarikōl and Yārkand. On the North-West and South-East the valley is bounded by impassable mountains, spurs of the Hindūkush and Muztāgh ranges, some peaks exceeding 25,000 ft. in height, of which Rakipōshi south of Nagir is the best known. The population is Muhammadan, but while the people of Nagir are Shī'ah those of Hunza, like their neighbours of Wakhān, belong to the Mawlaī sect. The Hunza people are more warlike than those of Nagir. They are apparently of the same race. They speak two languages; the Shīnā dialect of Gilgit being spoken in lower Nagir, and the Burushaski, a non-Aryan and non-Turkish tongue of uncertain affinities, being spoken in Hunza and upper Nagir. In the northern district a branch of the Wakhī race, speaking its own Ghalča tongue, is found. The easy communications with Wakhān by the Kilik Pass have led to the intrusion of a Ghalča race south of the Hindū-Kush. The same cause made it easy for robbers from Hunza to raid the traffic from Yārkand to India by the Karakoram Pass where the so-called Kandjūti robbers inspired great terror until restrained by the extension of British power. The name Kandjūti is derived from Kandjūt, the name by which Hunza is known in the Pāmīrs and Sarikōl, a name which Biddulph compares with Hanzū, one local form of the name Hunza. The people of Nagir took no part in these raids, which were winked at by the Chinese authorities as a reward for assistance given by Hunza in suppressing a rebellion at Yārkand in 1847. The Chinese also paid a subsidy to the ruler of Hunza. The traffic in slaves carried on by the Hunza raiders was a great scourge to the races under Kashmir rule, especially the people of Bālistān.

Hunza and Nagir were and still are governed by separate chiefs, each known by the name of Thum, a word of uncertain origin.

Little is known of the early history of this region. The easy passes leading to the north may have been traversed by Kushān invaders from Badakhshān in the second century B. C. but the routes leading into Citrāl were more probably followed. Buddhism was certainly the prevailing creed from the commencement of the Christian era, and a well preserved tope still exists at Thol in Nagir. The date of the introduction of Islām is not known, but the prevalence of the Shī'a and Mawla'i sects seems to point to its having come in by Badakhshān and Wakhān, and not from the south. But few European travellers visited the country before the war of 1891, the principal were Lockhart, Biddulph, Gromschewsky, Durand and Younghusband. The Sikhs attempted to subdue it after their occupation of Gilgit, in consequence of the perpetual raids from Hunza, but met with a disastrous defeat in 1848. Further unsuccessful attempts were made by the Dogra rulers of Kashmīr, but in 1869 the Thum of Hunza agreed to pay tribute. No Kashmīrī was however allowed to enter the valley. After the appointment of British agents at Gilgit the Thums of Hunza and Nagir entered into agreement to put an end to the raids, but in 1891 they recommenced and the chiefs threatened to attack the fort of Čalt. A small force of Gurkhas and Dogras under British officers was then sent into the country, and after the brilliant storming of the hill forts of Nilth and Thol, the Gorge of the Kandjūt river was forced, the Thum of Nagir submitted and the Thum of Hunza fled over the Panjirs. Since that time the country has been included within the boundary of British India. The internal administration has not been interfered with, but it is traversed by a good road and travellers can pass through it in safety. A body of Kandjūtīs served under British officers in the Citrāl campaign of 1895. The town of Baltit, at an altitude of 8400 feet, is the capital of Hunza and the town of Nagir that of Nagir. The territories of the two countries are separated by the Kandjūt River.

HŪR (A.), plural of hawrā', fem. of aḥwar, literally "the white ones" i. e. the maidens in Paradise, the black iris of whose eyes is in strong contrast to the clear white around it. The nomen unitatis in Persian is hūrī (also hūrī-beheshtī), Arabic hūrīya. The explanation of the word found in Arabic works "those at whom the spectator is astounded (hāra)" is of course false and is therefore rejected even by other Arab philologists.

These maidens of Paradise are described in various passages in the Qur'ān. In Sūra ii. 23, iii. 13, iv. 60, they are called "purified wives"; according to the commentators, this means that they are free alike from bodily impurity and defects of character. In Sūra lv. 56, it is said that their glances are retiring i. e. they look only upon their husbands. "Neither man nor djinn has ever touched them"; this is interpreted to mean that there are two classes of them, one like man and the other like the djinns. They are enclosed in pavilions (lv. 72). They are compared to jacinths and pearls (lv. 58).

Later literature is able to give many more details of their physical beauty; they are created of saffron, musk, amber and camphor, and have four colours, white, green, yellow, and red. They are so transparent that the marrow of their bones is visible through seventy silken garments. If they expectorate into the world, their spittle becomes musk. Two names are written on their breasts, one of the names of Allāh and the name of their husband. They wear many jewels and ornaments etc. on their hands and feet. They dwell in splendid palaces surrounded by female attendants and all possible luxury etc.

When the believer enters Paradise, he is welcomed by one of these beings; a large number of them are at his disposal; he cohabits with each of them as often as he has fasted days in Ramaḍān and as often as he has performed good works besides. Yet they remain always virgins (cf. Sūra lvi. 35). They are equal in age to their husbands (ibid. 36), namely 33 years (al-Baiḍāwī).

These are all very sensual ideas; but there are also others of a different kind. In discussing the Qur'ānī term "wives" (ii. 23), al-Baiḍāwī asks what can be the object of cohabitation in Paradise as there can be no question of its purpose in the world, the preservation of the race. The solution of this difficulty is found by saying that, although heavenly food, women, etc., have the name in common with their earthly equivalents, it is only "by way of metaphorical indication and comparison, without actual identity, so that what holds good for one may hold for the other also". In another passage (on Sūra xlv. 54) al-Baiḍāwī observes that it is not agreed whether the hūrī's are earthly women or not.

Sale (The Koran, London 1821, Preliminary Discourse, p. 134) thinks that Muḥammad owed the idea of the maidens of Paradise to the Persis. Dozy (Het Islamisme 3, Haarlem 1880, p. 101, note) has refuted this view with the observation that Sale's Parsi source is much younger than the Qur'ān and the relationship is therefore reversed. In the article DJANNA it is suggested that Muḥammad misunderstood Christian pictures of Paradise and that the angels in them are the originals of the youths and maidens of the Qur'ān.

HURAIMILA (HOREYMELA), a town in Arabia in the north of Riyād [q. v.], the capital of Nejd, in the province of Sadeyr (Ṣudair) on the borders between the latter and the province of 'Arid, the birthplace of the founder of the Wahhābī sect, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb. It is surrounded by strong fortifications and in 1861 hail, according to Palgrave, 10,000 inhabitants. Inside the town on an elevation is a large fortified citadel of architectural importance, which was erected along with the other citadels in Nejd after the conquest of Darīya [q. v.] by the Egyptians under Ibrāhīm Pasha. During Palgrave's stay there in 1861 the governor of the town was a native of the town, a fanatical Wahhābī, named Bctah.

AL-HURMUZĀN, King of Susiana. As a commander of a Persian division he took part in the battle of al-Kādisiyya in 16 = 637, but escaped by flight and retired to his country of Khūzistān, from which he offered a vigorous resistance to the Muslims. According to the usual statement, he invaded Maisān and Dastmaīsān, but was driven out by the united forces of Baṣra and Kūfa and had to sue for peace and cede the Muslims a considerable portion of his lands. In consequence of a border feud with the Banū 'l-'Am, he is said to have again taken up arms and for a second time was forced to make peace on disadvantageous terms. It is clear at any rate that the cunning and energetic Persian was a very dangerous opponent and the troops of the Arab Caliph were only able to overcome him with difficulty. The population of the two provinces of Fārs and al-Ahwāz was stirred up to renewed resistance by emissaries of the Persian king Yazdādjird III and as al-Hurmuzān's attitude grew more and more threatening, the Caliph 'Omar sent a powerful army against him under al-Nu'mān b. Muḥarrin. The opposing forces met at Arbuk. After a stubborn resistance al-Hurmuzān had to take to flight and went to Tustar, while al-Nu'mān entered Rāmhumuz. He then advanced against Tustar and joined forces with other Arab divisions which had meanwhile come up; al-Hurmuzān was blockaded, but only after eighteen months or, according to another statement two years, did the besiegers succeed in taking the strong fortress and then only by treachery. The Arab general, Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī, declined to decide al-Hurmuzān's fate himself but sent him to the Caliph. The year of the taking of Tustar is variously given as 17 = 638-9, 19 = 640, 20 = 640-1, 21 = 641-642. When al-Hurmuzān was brought before 'Omar, he succeeded in saving his life by his cunning but only on condition that he adopted Islām. He was able to be useful to the Caliph in various ways on account of his knowledge of Persian affairs. But when 'Omar was murdered in 23 = 644 by a Persian Christian, al-Hurmuzān, probably without reason, was suspected of being an accomplice and killed by 'Uбайд Allāh, son of the Caliph.

AL-HURR B. 'ADD AL-RAḤMĀN AL-THAKAFĪ, governor of Spain. His period of office is said to have covered about three years (98-100 = 717-719). During this time he made many districts of Spain tributary and extended his raids beyond the Pyrenees. The Arab chronicles, however, have little to tell of his rule; the Christians (Chron. Pac.), who call him Alahor (Alahort), also give no details. It is clear from their allusions, however, that he was feared by the Christians as well as hated by a section of his countrymen for his extortions and therefore dismissed by 'Omar II.

HURŪF (A.), Plur. of Harf [q. v.].

HURŪFĪ, a Shī'ī sect founded by Faḍl Allāh of Astarābād at the end of the viiith (xivth) century A. H., introduced into the Ottoman empire by one of his disciples, 'Alī al-Aḡā, and adopted by the Bektāshī dervishes. Their creed, which is epitomised in the Mahrem-nāme, composed in 828 = 1425, is based on the idea that the univcrse is eternal and moves with an unceasing rotation, which is the cause of the changes observed in it. These changes are divided into cycles, the beginning and end of which are marked by similar phenomena, the appearance of an Adam at the beginning and a last judgment at the end. God is manifest in the person of man, particularly his face, for man was made in the image of God.

This manifestation is produced under the successive forms of the prophet, saint and God; Muḥammad was the last of the prophets, then came the saints, from 'Alī to Ḥasan 'Askarī, the eleventh Imām; Faḍl Allāh, the last of the saints is also the first of the divine series, he is God incarnate. The distinguishing feature of man is speech or language which is written with the 28 characters of the Arabic alphabet; calculations derived from the numerical value of the letters borrowed from the Ismā'īliyya (St. Guyard, Fragments Ismaélites, p. 108 sqq.) play a great part in their doctrines, but they also make use of groupings of the alphabet by letters composed of one, two, three or four written characters. The lines in the features number seven (four eyelashes, two eyebrows, and the hair, or else two halves of the moustache, two whiskers, the beard divided into two, and tuft on the lower lip), multiplied by the number of the elements, we get 28, the number of letters in Arabic alphabet. Their chief books are the six Djāwidān, the Hakikat-nāme, Istiwā-nāme, Hidayet-nāme and Mahrem-nāme, some in Persian mingled with passages in the Astarābād dialect, others in Ottoman Turkish (Cf. FAḌL ALLĀH and FIRISHTE-ZADE). Unlike other dervishes, they have no wira or sikr; every morning they meet in the house of their spiritual chief, called bābā, and he gives each one by the hands of a servant, a glass of wine, a slice of bread and a piece of cheese; those present make a great noise; the superior takes the glass of wine and gives it to each one present who takes it respectfully, touches his face and eyes with it and drinks it. They have a kind of confession to the bābā.

AL-ḤUSAIN B. ʿABD ALLĀH. [See IBN SINĀ.]

AL-ḤUSAIN B. AḤMAD. [See ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH AL-MUḤTASIB and IBN KHĀLAWAH.]

AL-ḤUSAIN, the second son of ʿAlī and Fāṭima, born in Medina in the fourth or fifth year A. H. As in the case of his brother al-Ḥasan [q. v.] — the two are known together as al-Ḥasanān, the 'two Ḥasans' — tradition pictures the young Ḥusain overwhelmed with marks of tenderness by his maternal grandfather. This is what ʿAlī is said to have thought of them: "Ḥasan is a spendthrift thinking of nothing but the pleasures of the table and entertaining. As to Ḥusain he is mine and I am his". Unfortunately for the future of his line events were to verify the truth of this judgment of Fāṭima's husband; they were to prove the existence in the son of the same indecision and the same lack of intelligence that had been the ruin of the father. During the troubled Caliphate of ʿAlī, Ḥusain remained in obscurity. Less lively than Ḥasan, he did not imitate his life of foolish extravagance and pleasure. After ʿAlī's death he followed his elder brother into retirement in Medina and during Muʿāwīya's reign, particularly after Ḥasan's death made him head of the Shīʿa, he resisted the solicitations of his partisans in the ʿIrāk and maintained a more dignified attitude to the Umayyads than the dissipated Ḥasan. The accession of Yazīd altered his views and Ḥusain decided to listen to the appeal once more made by his ʿIrāk partisans. But before doing anything he resolved to test how matters stood through his cousin Muslim b. ʿAqīl [q. v.]. On the latter's arrival thousands of Shīʿis rushed to swear fidelity to Ḥusain. Muslim wrote to the son of ʿAlī to persuade him to come to take charge of the movement. In the meanwhile ʿUbaid Allāh b. Ziyād [q. v.], being appointed governor of the ʿIrāk, had succeeded in capturing Muslim and executed him. Leaving Mecca, where he had sought refuge after refusing to swear fealty to Yazīd, Ḥusain took the road to Kūfa, according to Muslim's instructions. A few stages from this town he learned of the tragic end of his emissary. ʿUbaid Allāh had established outposts on all the roads leading from the Hīdjāz to the ʿIrāk and parties of cavalry were patrolling the roads. The weak escort of relatives and devoted followers attached to Ḥusain came in contact with one of these detachments. On their refusal to halt ʿUbaid Allāh's horsemen accompanied them at a short distance. In this fashion they reached Karbalā [q. v.], destined to be ten days later the scene of Ḥusain's death. During these ten days the character of the pretender proved more and more feeble. His former irresolution seized him again. The circle of steel formed by the soldiers sent by ʿUbaid Allāh closed in around him. The Omayyad governor wished to persuade or force him to surrender. He cut off all access to the Euphrates, hoping to reduce him by thirst. Ḥusain remained obdurate, being persuaded of the inviolability of his person and hoping for a revulsion of feeling in his favour among the soldiers of Kūfa, who had been secretly won over to the Shīʿa but had been terrorised by the execution of Muslim.

The 10th Muḥarram 61 A. H. (10th October 680) dawned. ʿOmar b. Saʿd b. Abī Waḳḳās [q. v.] had taken command of the 4000 men assembled at Karbalā. Ḥusain was summoned to surrender at discretion. The ultimatum being unanswered, ʿOmar executed a turning movement to envelope the son of ʿAlī. His partisans tried to resist. Ḥusain did not stir; he played none of the heroic parts so fondly described by the Shīʿis. An engagement resulted in which Ḥusain fell wounded in many places. His tents were pillaged. At first merely a police operation, the scheme degenerated into a general mêlée. "It did not last long; just time to slay a camel or to take a nap". Thus a verbal report delivered to Yazīd describes it. The Caliph deplored this ending; he had neither desired nor ordered it. His instructions were to secure the person of Ḥusain, to prevent him prolonging a dangerous agitation. He treated the ʿAlids who survived the catastrophe of Karbalā with honour, provided generously for their needs and gave them an escort to Medina. Ḥusain's descendants vegetated there in obscurity, at variance with their relatives the Ḥasanids. They usually left to their cousins the right of enforcing the political privileges of ʿAlī's family in Arabia.

AL-ḤUSAIN B. ʿALĪ, Bey of Tunis (1705—1735), founder of the Ḥusaini dynasty still reigning there. He was the son of a Greek renegade and at the Algerian invasion of 1705-1706 held the office of an Agha. After the capture of the Dey Ibrāhīm, Ḥusain was elected Bey by the Aghas while Muḥammed Khōdja was elected Dey on the 20th Rabiʿ I 1117 (10th July 1705). After Ḥusain had driven back the Algerians he rid himself of Khōdja Muḥammad, who was put to death along with the ex-Dey Ibrāhīm who had been meanwhile released. When soon afterwards a son was borne to him by a Genoese captive, he had it decided by a council specially summoned for the purpose that his power should be transmitted to his descendants (1710).

Throughout his reign Ḥusain, whose confidant was a Frenchman named Raynaud, endeavoured to live on good terms with European powers. He concluded treaties with France (1710 and 1728), England (1716), Spain (1720), Holland (1728) and Austria (1725). On the other hand he did not succeed in restraining piracy and the attacks of the corsairs forced France twice (1728 and 1731) to send a fleet to Goletta.

At first Ḥusain's reign was a very peaceful one at home, and the people enjoyed peace such as they had not known for long. "The roads" writes Muḥammad al-Saghīr b. Yūsuf "were safe and the land flourishing, the country-houses and gardens became populous again and numerous palaces were built in the country, which had never happened before". The Bey himself undertook important works; he restored the walls of Kairawān, improved the aqueducts of Tunis, erected bridges and reservoirs and finally built mosques and madrasas in Sfax, Gafsa, Sussa, and Tunis (mosque of Bardo and al-Madrasa al-Ḥusainiyya).

From 1729, however, Tunisia suffered from severe disturbances. 'Alī Pasha, the Bey's nephew, discontented because he was excluded from the government, had fled from Tunis with his son Yūnus and stirred up a rising of the tribes in the interior. Defeated by Ḥusain he fled to Algeia where he was imprisoned by the Dey Kurabdi. The latter's successor Ibrāhīm released him and by arrangement with him made an attack on Tunisia. Ḥusain abandoned by a portion of his Arab troops was defeated at Smendja (4th Sept. 1735) and had to retire to Kairawān, while 'Alī entered Tunis and had himself proclaimed Bey after promising to pay a yearly tribute to Algeria. Ḥusain now sought to take the offensive again; after defeating 'Alī's son Yūnus on 3rd November 1735 he advanced up to the walls of Tunis but did not dare storm the town. Returning to Kairawān he was besieged by Yūnus' troops for five years. On the 16th Šafar 1152 (18th May 1746), the town was taken by storm. Ḥusain, who had succeeded in escaping, was brought back by the enemy's cavalry and Yūnus cut off his head.

AL-ḤUSAIN B. 'ALĪ. [See IBN MĀKULĀ, AL-MAGHRIBĪ, AL-TUGHRA'Ī.]

AL-ḤUSAIN B. ḤAMDĀN was the son of the founder of the Ḥamdānī dynasty [q. v.]. At the beginning of 282 (895), when the Caliph al-Mu'taḍid was reducing the Ḥamdānī family to obedience, Ḥusain, who was in the castle of Dair Za'farān, surrendered and was with his father carried to Baghdād. In 283 Ḥusain undertook to capture the fugitive Khārijīte leader Hārūn on condition that his father should be set free. In this he succeeded and the Caliph kept his promise. From this moment the Ḥamdānids occupied a high place at the court of the Caliph. Ten years later Ḥusain was sent in pursuit of Abū Ghānim the Carmatian (Karmatī), who had invested Damascus, but failed to overtake him, but in the following year (294 = 906-7) he defeated the followers of Zikrawāh in Syria.

When the end of the Caliph al-Mu'taḍid drew near, Ḥusain put forward Ibn al-Mu'tazz as successor. When al-Mu'taḍid became Caliph (295 = 908), Ḥusain attacked the palace in order to seize his person. The attempt failed and Ḥusain and the other conspirators scattered. Ḥusain fled to Mosul, but was captured at Takrit. He was, however, pardoned and made prefect of Kumm and Kāshān. From Kumm in 297 (909) he set out against the Šaffārid Laith b. 'Amr, but the armies did not meet. Later he took part in the expedition against Sabkari the opponent of Laith, who was taken prisoner (middle of 298 = 910).

In 301 (913-4) Ḥusain's brother 'Abd Allāh b. Ḥamdān rebelled, but, on the advance of the Caliph's troops, submitted and was restored to his province.

In the following year Ḥusain, who was now governor of Diyār Rabī'a, threw off his allegiance, and 'Abd Allāh was again deposed and imprisoned. The greater part of the Caliph's troops were in Egypt, and as soon as they returned, Ḥusain fled, but he was arrested and his whole family carried to Baghdād. He did not lose heart, as he believed his brothers and himself were indispensable to the Caliph. His brothers were in fact set at liberty and shortly afterwards restored to office. Ḥusain alone was put to death (305 = 917).

AL-ḤUSAIN B. AL-ḤUSAIN, last Dey of Algiers (1818—1830). Born in Smyrna about 1765, Ḥusain was filling the office of Khudya al-Khalī when the Dey 'Alī struck down by the plague appointed him his successor. Ḥusain was proclaimed without opposition. He was a well educated man, moderate in his views, who did not desire power and only accepted it with reluctance. He was considered benevolent and just, and hastened to inaugurate his reign by an amnesty and the abolition of various violent measures taken by his predecessors. Nevertheless, soon after his accession his assassination was twice attempted by the Janissaries. He therefore lived in the kašba under the protection of a guard of Zwāwa.

The situation in the Regency at this time was a very troubled one. The provinces in the east and in the west were in full rebellion. The Nememsha, the tribes of the Awrās and of the Sūf, and the natives of Great Kabylia had taken up arms against the Turks. The Derkāwā marabouts, followed by the Tidjāniya preached rebellion in the Tell and Southern Oran. Ḥusain undertook to restore Turkish authority; in this he succeeded with the help of the Beys of Constantine and Oran and through the military talents of the Agha Yahyā. Peace was restored in the east about 1826 and in the west also in 1828. At the same time the Dey showed his devotion to the Muslim cause by sending a fleet to the Levant, which from 1821 to 1827 took part with the Ottoman fleet in the struggle against the insurgent Greeks.

Ḥusain's relations with the European Powers were also very strained. His refusal to adhere to the decisions of the Congress of Aix la-Chapelle regarding the abolition of privateering provoked a naval demonstration by the English and French, which however was without result (1819). The expulsion of Macdonnell, the English Consul, had more serious consequences. England sent Admiral Sir Harry Neale to demand reparation; after fruitless pourparlers (February—March 1824) the fleet bombarded the town from the 17th to 29th June. The damage done was insignificant however and the Algerians imagined they could brave the Christian powers with impunity.

While the affairs of the bankrupt Bakri Busnach were being arranged, the Dey, who felt himself wronged by the French government, made violent recriminations. His discontent made itself manifest in the insult to Consul Deval on the 30th April 1827. Not content with refusing all satisfaction for this outrage, Ḥusain ordered the destruction of the French establishments at La Calle. These outrages resulted in the blockade of the Algerian coast (1827—1830). During this period the French government made several attempts to negotiate with the Dey, but he, probably relying on the support of the British government, refused to come to any arrangement. He scarcely disavowed the attack on the ship "La Provence" which was fired on by the Algerian batteries on the 30th July 1829, although it was protected by a flag of truce. Unable to obtain any redress by diplomatic means Charles X's ministers changed their methods. An expedition against Algiers was decided upon the 31st January 1830 and the troops disembarked at Sidi Ferruch on the 14th June. Left to his own resources, and deprived of the best general Yahyā Agha, whom he had himself put to death in 1828, Ḥusain was incapable of resisting for long. On the 4th July, after the occupation of Fort l'Empereur by the French, he resigned himself to accepting the terms imposed by General de Bourmont.

Articles 2 and 3 of the capitulation guaranteed the ex-Dey the retention of all his private property and the right to retire whither he pleased. The French government, however, objected to his going to Malta and Ḥusain demanded to be conducted to Naples, where he arrived on the 9th August 1830. After a short sojourn in this city he went to Leghorn from where, through Jewish merchants in regular relations with Algiers, he was able to negotiate with the malcontents of the town and the native chiefs of the interior. Arriving in Paris in 1831 to beg a pension and the restitution of his estates he received an honourable welcome but obtained nothing from the government, now enlightened on his real attitude. On his return to Leghorn he continued his tactics. Then feeling himself too closely watched, he left Leghorn for Alexandria, where he died in obscurity in 1838.

AL-ḤUSAIN B. NUMAIR of the Kindī tribe of Sakrīn, leader of the Sufyānids. He fought in the Omayyad ranks at Siffin. On the accession of Yazid I he governed the important district (djund) of Ḥims. While holding this office he intervened with the Caliph on behalf of Ibn Mufarrigh, the satirist, imprisoned by 'Ubad Allāh b. Ziyād. When the expedition against the sacred towns of the Hijāz was decided upon, Ḥusain was appointed lieutenant to the commander in chief, Muslim b. 'Ukba [q. v.]. In this capacity he distinguished himself at the battle of the Ḥarra. On the death of Muslim during the advance on Mecca he took command of the expedition. For two months he besieged the town and was about to take it, when the death of Yazid suspended operations. After vainly endeavouring to persuade Ibn al-Zubair to accompany him to Syria to be proclaimed Caliph there, Ḥusain led his army back to Syria. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam having become Caliph to the general agreement, he sent Ḥusain to Mesopotamia under 'Ubad Allāh b. Ziyād. There he crushed the Shī'is led by Sulaimān b. Ṣurad (24th Dju-mādā 65 = 6th January 685). Three years later (67 = August 688) he died from wounds inflicted by Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar in the battle on the Khazīr.

ḤUSAIN B. SULAIMĀN, the Ṣafawid, Shāh of Persia, 1694—1722. In the reign of this feeble ruler the kingdom of the Ṣafawids, which since the reign of 'Abbās I had produced no powerful or important prince, collapsed. The approaching fall of the dynasty is said to have been foretold by dreams and prophecies, so that Ḥusain's father changed his true name of Šāfi to Sulaimān on his accession. On Sulaimān's death the 25-year old Ḥusain was recognised as Shāh without difficulty, as an elder brother had been condemned to death by his father himself. The young ruler left the affairs of state in the hands of the nobles of the kingdom, notably the Itīmād al-Dawla (prime minister) Fāth 'Alī Khān, and was under the influence of the mullas, so that at the beginning of his reign he made an endeavour to suppress energetically the drinking habits prevalent at court and among the nobility, without success, however. The early years of his reign passed comparatively peacefully and only in the frontier provinces, Georgia and Kandahār, were affairs in an unsatisfactory condition. But when the unruly Khān of Georgia, Gurgīn Khān came in person to Isfahān to make excuses for his conduct, the Georgian troubles seemed to be at an end; it was even thought that a means had been found through them to put an end to the disturbances in Kandahār also, by sending Gurgīn Khān there as governor backed by Georgian troops.

The possession of Kandahār had long been disputed between the Ṣafawids and the Great Mughal; this was not the main trouble however but the fact that the Afghān tribes of the district, namely the Ghalzai [q. v. ii. p. 138 sq.], were Sunnis and consequently hated Persian rule, particularly as a governor, who had once been an infidel (for Gurgīn Khān had only found favour after his adoption of Islām) was now to hold them in check. Mir Wais, then chief of the Ghalzai, seemed particularly dangerous to the Georgian: to get rid of him he sent him to Isfahān with secret instructions to the Ṣafawid ministers to keep him there; but Mir Wais soon found an opportunity of winning the influential men at the head of affairs to his side by suitable presents and obtained permission to make the pilgrimage to Mecca. He took advantage of his stay in the holy cities to get a fatwā from the religious authorities there making it the duty of the Sunnī Afghāns to wage a holy war against the infidel Georgians and the heretical government. Armed with these documents, he returned to Persia and later to Kandahār. Gurgīn Khān was assassinated and Mir Wais then seized the fortress of Kandahār (1708). The Persian government then sent Khusrāw Khān, a nephew of the murdered Gurgīn Khān with Georgian and Persian troops to enforce obedience upon the rebel Afghāns, but they were put to flight by Mir Wais. Nevertheless, affairs seemed to be taking a better turn for the Persians when Mir Wais died in 1715 and his brother 'Abd Allāh Khān seemed inclined to make peace with the Persian government, but the latter was soon after murdered by Maḥmūd, a son of Mir Wais, who continued the resistance to the Persian troops.

In the meanwhile difficulties had been raised also in other parts of the kingdom by the Kurds and Uzbeks, while the Arabs of Maṣṣāṭ seized Baḥrain. The Persians hoped to regain this island with the help of the Portuguese fleet, but the commander-in-chief, Luṭf 'Alī Khān, a brother-in-law of the prime minister, rightly thought it an urgent necessity to suppress the Ḡhalzai who, under Maḥmūd, had invaded Kirmān. He actually succeeded in defeating the rebels but was prevented from following up his victory by the discontent in Isfahān at his abandoning the Baḥrain expedition, and was refused the necessary supplies with which to advance on Kaṇdahār. His and the 'Itimād al-Dawla's enemies even took the advantage of the occasion to rouse the Shāh's wrath against them with the result that the prime minister was blinded and Luṭf 'Alī Khān, who had retired to Shirāz, was thrown into prison. Husain thus prepared for his own downfall, for Maḥmūd immediately occupied Kirmān and advanced with his troops against Isfahān. The Ṣafawids once more collected a considerable army to check the Afghān advance but in the battle of Gūlnābād, east of Isfahān, the Persians suffered a terrible defeat (1722). Isfahān itself was thereupon besieged and, although it held out for a long time as the Afghāns lacked any of the necessary siege artillery — Tahmasp, the Shāh's son had in the meanwhile escaped to Kaḥẓwīn and Tiflis and was endeavouring to raise a new army with which to relieve the capital — such a terrible famine at length arose in it that Husain was forced to capitulate and resign the Persian throne in favour of Maḥmūd. The unfortunate prince was forced to be a spectator, when some time later, after the Persians had treacherously massacred the Afghan garrison of Kaḥẓwīn, which Maḥmūd had meanwhile captured, Maḥmūd in revenge instituted a terrible massacre in Isfahān and afterwards put to death over a hundred members of the Ṣafawid family. Maḥmūd then went mad, and Ashraf, a son of the 'Abd Allāh Khān who had been murdered by him, made it a condition that, if he was to succeed to the throne, his father's assassin should be put to death, which was done in 1725. The new Khān Ashraf was comparatively lenient in his treatment of Husain, but Russia and Turkey had been exploiting the unsettled state of Persia to their own advantage and left him no rest. Although he made peace with Turkey in 1727, he had again to take up arms when the general, later famous as Nādir-Shāh, took up Tahmasp's cause that was supported by the Russians. He was repeatedly defeated by Nādir and had to take to flight. In revenge he had the aged Husain put to death in 1729 but was himself murdered by robbers a year later. On Tahmasp's fate and the end of the Ṣafawid dynasty see the articles NĀDIRSHĀH and ṢAFĀWIDS.

HUSAIN 'AWNĪ PASHA, four times War Minister and once Grand Vizier under 'Abd al-'Aziz, one of the most remarkable personalities of his age, was a native of Ispārta (wilāyet of Ḳōniya), where he was born in 1820, the son of a tax-farmer. When sixteen he came to Constantinople to study theology but entered the military school in which he ultimately became a teacher of military sciences. On the outbreak of the Crimean War (1853) he entered the army with rank of Lieutenant-Colonel and distinguished himself in the fighting at Kalafat and Çetate. At the end of the war he took part in the Mingrelian campaign as chief of the general staff of the Serdar i-ekrem 'Omar Pasha. On the conclusion of the war he became director of the military school; during the war with Montenegro (1862) he commanded a division under 'Omar Pasha; for the next two and a half years (August 1863 till the beginning of 1866) he acted as interim War Minister and was in 1867-1868 entrusted with the suppression of the Cretan revolution; on performing this task, he was promoted to be mushir (general commanding). From the beginning of 1869 till September 1871 he was War Minister in 'Alī Pasha's cabinet; a few days after the latter's death (6th Sept. 1871) he was dismissed by his successor, the notorious Maḥmūd Nedīm Pasha, and banished to Anatolia, recalled from exile in 1872, and sent to Smyrna in November of the same year as wālī of the province of Aidin. The Grand Vizier Mütterdjim Muḥammad Rūshdī Pasha appointed him to the Ministry of Marine on the 25th January 1873 but he exchanged this for the War Office after a few weeks on the 15th February, when Es'ad Pasha became Grand Vizier. A year later — on the 14th February 1874 — he became Grand Vizier in place of Shirwānizāde Muḥammad Rūshdī, successor of Es'ad Pasha, but continued to hold the portfolio of War Minister. On the 25th April 1875 he was dismissed from both offices and a few days later sent a second time as wālī to Smyrna. By the 22nd August of the same year he was back at the War Office for the third time; a few days later his enemy Maḥmūd Nedīm became Grand Vizier a second time and dismissed him on the 2nd October, to be sent after a few weeks as wālī to Brusa. After Maḥmūd Nedīm's fall (13th April 1876) he was again summoned to Constantinople as War Minister and in this office along with Midḥat Pasha supported by Mütterdjim Muḥammad Rūshdī and the Shaikh al-Islām, Ḥasan Khairullāh, brought about the deposition of the Sultān 'Abd al-'Aziz (30th May 1876). On the 4th June the dethroned Sultān committed suicide; Ḥasan Bey, a Circassian officer devoted to him, resolved to avenge his death and shot Ḥusain 'AWNĪ Pasha in the night of 15th—16th June 1876 in Midḥat Pasha's konak, where he and the other ministers had assembled at a council.

ḤUSAIN DJAHĀNSÖZ, 'ALĀ' AL-DIN the GHÖRID. [See DJAHĀNSÖZ, i. 998a].

ḤUSAIN HAMADHĀNĪ, a Bābī author, who wrote the history of the Bāb, edited by E. G. Browne under the title, The Ta'rikh-i-Jadid or New History of Mirzā 'Alī Muḥammad the Bāb (Cambridge 1893). In his office of secretary to a minister Mirzā Ḥusain accompanied the Shāh on his journey to Europe, spent some time in Stambul and on his return to Persia in 1291 (1874) was thrown into prison but afterwards released. He then entered the service of a Zoroastrian named Mānakdji (or Mānukdji) who asked him to write a history of the Bāb. When he had finished this task, he intended to give a full exposition of the Bāb's teaching but was prevented by his death in 1299 (1881-1882). The above information is given by Browne, op. cit., Introduction, p. xxxvii sqq. from Tumanski in Zapiski Vost. Otd. Imp. Arch. Obšč., Vol. viii. 33—45. In a later publication, entitled Kitāb-i Nuqṭatu 'l-Kāf, compiled by Ḥājji Mirzā Jāni of Kāshān (Gibb Memorial Series, vol. XV), Browne has given a full account of the relationship between the works of Mirzā Ḥusain and Mirzā Djāni Kāshānī, Introduction, xxxiv. sqq. and A New History, etc. p. 339 sqq.).

ḤUSAIN MĪRZĀ B. MANŠÜR B. BĀIKARĀ (Black Prince?), and styled Abū' l-Ghāzī. This famous king of Khūiāsān was born at Herāt in Muḥarram 842 A. H., June 1438, and reigned there, with one interruption, from Ramaḍān 873 (March 1469), to the last month of 911 (May 1506). He was a distinguished soldier and sovereign, and was a munificent patron of letters. He also attempted poetry, and composed a diwān, but it does not seem to have been of much value. According to Sām Mirzā, he is also the author of a book called the Maḍjālīs al-'Ushshāh, which is a mixture of prose and poetry, and contains biographies of a number of mystics and spiritual lovers (Rieu's Catalogue, I, 351^b). But though his name appear on the manuscript as the author, both Bābur in his Memoirs, and Khwāndamir in his Ḥabīb al-Siyar (vol. iii. Part 3, p. 330 of Bombay ed.), say that the real author is Kamāl Ḥusain Gazargāhi. And this seems probable, for if Sulṭān Ḥusain had written the book, he would hardly have put himself at the end of it as one of the mystics, and have described himself. He was of very high birth for he was a direct descendant of Timūr, both by his father and his mother (Firūza Bēgam). His career resembled that of the emperor Bābur, for he suffered much distress in his early years and afterwards attained to great prosperity. He had contests with Abū Sa'īd and his sons, and it was not until the death of the former that he got possession of Herāt. He was a younger son, and his undistinguished elder brother Bāikarā served under him for several years as governor of Balkh. His court was the most brilliant in Asia, and as Bābur says, his Age was a wonderful Age. The poets Djāmi, Hāfīz, 'Alī Shēr, Hilālī, Bannā, the painters Biḥzād and Shāh Muẓaffar, various musicians, and Ḥusain Wā'iz the author of Anwār-i Suhaili, 'Abd Allāh Marwārid who was a sort of Admirable Creighton, the two historians (grand father and grandson) Mir Khwānd and Khwāndamir, and Dawlat Shāh, the biographer of poets, and the famous calligrapher, Sulṭān 'Alī of Mashhad, adorned his court.

One of Sulṭān Ḥusain's greatest feats was his long and rapid march to Herāt in August 1470 which resulted in the capture and execution of his competitor Yādgār Muḥammad, a great grandson of Shāhrukh. Sulṭān Ḥusain was a man of passionate character, and a wine-bibber. He divorced his first wife, although she was the mother of his eldest son, and, according to Bābur he was so infatuated with one of his pages that he put his name on his coins. It is the fact that the words Biḥbūd appear on his coins, but it is not certain if they refer to the page, whose name and title were Biḥbūd Beg. Sulṭān Ḥusain had a large family of sons and daughters, but seven of the sons died in his life time, and the others were, for the most part, no credit to him, and only survived him for a year or two. The eldest, Badī' al-Zamān lived the longest, not dying till 1517, when he succumbed to the plague at Constantinople. One of Sulṭān Ḥusain's worst actions was his allowing his wife Khadidja, to get from him, while under the influence of liquor, a warrant for the execution of his grandchild. His sons rebelled against him, and he was obliged to take the field against them, and defeat them. In his old age, and when suffering much from rheumatism etc., he marched out against Shaibānī and his Uzbeks, and died at the village of Bābā lāhī. He was buried at Herāt, but according to Colonel Yate's report Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, 1887, p. 98) the tomb cannot now be identified. He was the last of the Timūrid kings. His two sons Badī' al-Zamān and Muẓaffar reigned together for a short time but were defeated by Shaibānī, and Muẓaffar shortly afterwards died. Muḥammad al-Zamān, the son of Badī' al-Zamān, eventually went to India, and after vainly trying, with the help of the Portuguese, to succeed Bahādur Shāh, as king of Guḍjarāt, rejoined his brother-in-law Humāyūn, and was drowned at Cawnsa, after the battle with Shēr Khān, in 1539.

ḤUSAIN PASHA, better known under the denomination AGHĀ ḤUSAIN PASHA, or AGHĀ PASHA, the son of a certain Hādījī Mustafā, was born in Adrianople in 1190 (1776) though popular tradition considers Rūsčuk as his birth-place. As his father had moved to Bender he was enlisted there in the 9th band (bülük) of the Janissaries and came to Constantinople in 1203 (1788-1789). Later on he took part in the Russian War (1807-1812) and soon occupied a prominent position among the usta (sergeants) of the Janissaries. After having been promoted to the rank of zaghārđji bashi the Grand Vizier, Silihdār 'Alī Pasha, drew the Sultān's attention to him and his qualities. As the Sultān was just then about to dissolve the Janissary bands and get rid of them in some way, he was on the look-out for a number of energetic men fit and ready to help him in this difficult enterprise. So Husain was made kul-k'āyā on the 10th Rabi' II 1238 (25th December 1822) and further aghā of the Janissaries on the 14th Dju-mād'hā II (26th February 1823). The importance of his position enabled him within a few months to get rid of the most dangerous leaders of the band, partly by discharging them into the Provinces, or by using more violent means. For these services he was raised to the rank of Vizier end of 1238, and was henceforward known as Aghā Pasha. The Janissaries soon knew him to be their deadly enemy, and in order to protect him against their machinations, the Sultān had to dismiss him on the 20th Šafar 1239 (26th October 1823). He became governor of Brussa and Izmid instead, as well as commander of all the forts of the Bosphorus and their garrisons, so that in case of need he could at once be at the Sultān's disposal. During the great Janissary insurrection that broke out three years afterwards it was specially Husain's personal bravery and his cruel severity that finally broke the resistance of the rebels, so completely that this troop was suppressed (14-16th June 1826). He was rewarded by being promoted and named seraskier of the newly organised army (asākīr-i manšūre-i mahmūdiyye). In Shawwāl 1242 (May 1827) he handed over charge to the famous Khosraw Pasha and retook the command of the Bosphorus forts. During the Russian War (1828-1829) he figured as commander in chief of the army; he took up his headquarters in the fortified camp of Shumla, and successfully defended this, but could not prevent the Russians from taking the most important forts on the lower Danube. In spring 1829 he was replaced by the Grand-Vizier Rešhīd Mehmed, and he himself went to Rūsčuk as commander (muhāfiẓ); all the same his military operations remained just as unlucky as they had been hitherto. The war once over, he governed the wilāyet of Adrianople, but received orders to lead the army against Egypt in 1832. In this campaign his second in command, Mehmed Pasha, was beaten in the battle of Hamā (9th June), and Husain was severely defeated by Ibrahim Pasha in the Pass of Beilan (29th July); owing to this renewed bad military experience he was discharged from his office as general (31st August), but thanks to the fact of his being personally on very good terms with Miloš of Serbia he was sent to Widdin as muhāfiẓ and remained there from the 17th Rabi' I 1249 (4th August 1833) till beginning of Febr. 1844. He returned there in the same position beginning of Shawwāl 1262 (October 1846) and kept it till he died on the 2nd Dju-mādā II 1265 (25th April 1849).

HUSAIN PASHA, called 'AMŪJJA-ZĀDE ('Uncle's son'), a name given him by his cousin Faḡlīl Aḡmad Pasha, was the son of Hasan Aḡhā, the younger brother of the great Koprulu Muḡammad Pasha; he grew up in the golden period of the Koprulu and reached the age of thirty without distinguishing himself further than for his attachment to be delights of a life of careless ease. After the defeat of Kara Mustafā before Vienna in 1683 and the fall of this grand vizier, who was devoted to the Koprulu, he was sent in disgrace from the capital, first of all as governor of Shahriār and a year later as muhāfiẓ (military governor) to Čardaḡ in the Dardanelles, where he spent five years. In Rajjab 1100 (April-May 1689) he received the rank of vizier and was sent as muhāfiẓ to Sadd al-Bahr at the entrance to the Dardanelles. In Šaḡbān 1102 (May 1691) he returned to Constantinople to conduct as kā'im-makām the affairs of the grand vizier who was absent in the field. He fulfilled the same duties again from Dju-mādā II till the middle of Shawwāl 1105 (end of January till the 9th June 1694) and then went back to his former post on the Dardanelles. On the 14th Dju-mādā I 1106 (31st December 1674) he was appointed kapudan pasha and entrusted with the recapture of Chios which had been occupied by the Venetians. He succeeded in defeating the Venetian fleet in two battles (9th and 18th February 1695) off the Spal-madore Islands in the Bay of Chios, whereupon the Venetians abandoned the island without striking a blow. At the end of Ramaḡdān 1106 (middle of May 1695) he resigned his command of the fleet and remained in Chios as muhāfiẓ. In Muḡarram 1107 (Aug.-Sept. 1695) he went as wālī to Kōniya and Adana; in the early months of 1108 (Aug.-Sept. 1696) he was transferred to Belgrade as muhāfiẓ. The grand vizier Elmās Muḡammad Pasha fell in the battle of Zenta on the 1st Rabi' 1109 (11th Sept. 1697); Husain was appointed his successor and led the defeated army back to Adrianople. In the following year he concluded the fifteen years' war with Austria and its allies — Venice, Russia and Poland — by the treaty of Carlowicz. After holding the reins of government for five years he resigned on the 11th Rabi' II 1114 (4th Sept. 1702) in consequence of an incurable disease and retired to his estate at Silivri, where he died on the 29th Rabi' of the same year (22th Sept.). Apart from his attachment to strong waters, with which his country men reproached him, and which earned him the nickname of serkkoşh (the drunken), there were no serious defects in his character. A contemporary (Paul Lucas, Voyage au Levant, ii. 154) justly says of him: c'étoit l'homme de tout l'Empire qui l'avoit le mieux servi... fort honnête homme, et dont tout le monde parloit bien; the French ambassador Ferriol (Bonnac, Mémoire historique sur l'Amb. de France, p. 116) says: il a gouverné l'empire pendant cinq ans avec tant de noblesse qu'on a dit que le vizirat étoit mort avec lui. He was in fact distinguished not only for probity and magnanimity but also for a rare statesmanship; nor was it mere love of ease but a wise self-restraint when he entrusted the execution of his plans to tried men like Husain Mezzomorto, Rāmi Muḥammad and Alexander Mavrocordato. His memory is not less honoured for the numerous public buildings and institutions which he left behind him in various towns of the empire, notably in Adrianople. His summer-residence (yūli) at Anadolu Hisār on the Bosphorus forms one of the sights of the capital and still testifies to the love of splendour and artistic sense of its builder.

HUSAIN PASHA, called DELI (the dare-devil), a native of Yenishehir in Anatolia, served in the imperial palace as a common wood-cutter till he attracted the attention of Murād IV by an example of his extraordinary physical strength; his rough pranks and witty sallies were no less pleasing to the sultān, who after a short time made him his muṣāḥib (confidant) and büyük mirakḥḥār (Master of the Horse). On the 4th Muharram 1044 (30th June 1634) he was appointed kapudan paṣha and accompanied the sultān on his campaign against Eriwān; on his way back, on the 9th Djumādā I 1045 (21st October 1635), he received the governorship of Egypt, which he held till the 15th Djumādā II 1047 (4th November 1637). On the accession of Sultān Ibrāhīm (Shawwāl 1049 = February 1640) he was again appointed kapudan paṣha and soon afterwards on the 22th Djumādā I 1050 (9th Sept. 1640) muḥāfiṣ (military governor) of Oczakow. In the following year he besieged for three months Azow, which had been taken by the Cossacks and then went in late autumn to Bosnia as wālī. In 1054 (1644) we find him for a brief period governor of Baghdād; from there he was transferred in Ramaḍān of the same year (November 1644) as wālī to Būdin (Ofen). After the outbreak of the war with Venice he went to Crete as muḥāfiṣ of the fortress of Canea, taken on the 17th August 1645, and landed there on the 15th Dhū 'l-Hijjā 1055 (1st February 1646). In July of the same year he took over the supreme command of the forces in the island, captured the important town of Rhethymnos and conducted the siege of Kandia in the following years but was unable to take this last bulwark of Venetian power. After being thirteen years in the field and having on the one hand assured the success of Turkish arms by his remarkable bravery, and on the other won over the native Greek population to Turkish rule by diplomatic measures, he was recalled towards the end of 1068 (middle of 1658) and on the 14th Shawwāl (15th July 1658) appointed kapudan paṣha. On the 7th Rabī I 1069 (3rd December 1658) he received the governorship of Rūmeli; the grand vizier Köprülü Muḥammad Paṣha, who had long been meditating the ruin of Husain, who was hated by him on account of his popularity and because he was a candidate for the highest office in the empire, succeeded by his intrigues in persuading the Sultān some months later — in the spring of 1659 — to imprison him in the Seven Towers and have him executed for alleged abuse of his powers.

(J. H. MORDTMANN.)

HUSAIN PASHA, surnamed KUČUK owing to his diminutive stature, was originally a Georgian slave, who had been offered to Sultān Muṣṭafā III by his master, the Silihdār Ibrāhīm Paṣha in 1181 (1767-1768). He grew up in the Imperial Serai together with his foster brother, afterwards the Sultān Selim III. When Selim came to power on the 11th Redjeb 1203 (9. 4. 1789) Husain became his first attendant (baṣh ṣokadār) and a few years later on the 16th Redjeb 1206 (10th March 1792) he was appointed kapudan paṣha with the rank of a vizier. In accordance with Selim's plans of reform and with almost unrestricted authority from him, Husain worked hard for the twelve years during which he occupied this post, at the reorganisation of the imperial navy and the arsenal. He succeeded in reorganising the whole Ottoman navy, on the model of the British and the French navies, with the help of foreign technologists, so that he is fully entitled to be called the founder and creator of modern Ottoman naval power. As leader of the fleet he had less occasion to add to his fame. It is difficult to defend the oppressive contributions levied by him on the islands of the Archipelago, during his annual expeditions in the Aegean Sea; these were partly the cause of the Greek insurrection. On the other hand he managed more or less to suppress piracy in these districts; on his first cruise, for instance, he destroyed Lambro Katsoni's (Canziani) filibustering fleet (1792) and even captured this latter's infamous lieutenant, the pirate Karakatani. Although he knew little or nothing of military matters, he was entrusted in 1212 (1798) with the command of the army sent against the famous Pazwanoghlu of Widdin. Husain Paṣha besieged and blockaded him with a fleet of gunboats, but without success, so that he gave up and returned to Constantinople in autumn. In 1800 he spent several months cruising in the waters of Alexandria, and in the following year he united his forces to the British sent to reconquer Egypt. At the beginning of March he landed in the vicinity of Alexandria at the head of 6000 men, mostly Albanians, and joining the British forces, took part in the campaign against the French. As is well known, this expedition ended with the latter's retreat from Egypt. At the beginning of Sha'bān 1216 (Dec. 1801) he returned to Constantinople, where he was received and celebrated by the people as the reconqueror of Egypt, and covered with honours by the Sultān. On the 23rd Sha'bān 1218 (7th Dec. 1803) Husain Paṣha died in Kuruçesme (Bosphorus), not yet 46 years of age, in the summer residence of his wife, the Princess Esmā Sultān. His mausoleum in Eiyūb was long considered a curiosity of the capital, and became famous as did the epitaph on it composed by the historian Wāṣif (cf. v. Hammer, Constantinopolis und der Bosphorus. Vol. ii. p. lxviii.; Wāṣif, Tawāriḫ, p. 11).

HUSAIN PASHA [See MEZZOMORTO.]

HUSAIN RAHMİ, a notable representative of the modern school of Turkish literature, one of the most widely read if not the most popular Turkish writer of the present day. He owes his eminence to his remarkable sketches of life of the populace which he reproduces in masterly fashion in vivid colours in life-like snapshots which reflect the whole freshness and artlessness of the surroundings. In his work there is a certain connection with the popular art of the storytellers (meddāh, q. v.) and their masterly skill in imitating the real, rough everyday life of the people, which Rahmī was the first to introduce into Turkish literature. His scenes from everyday life reproduce the vernacular and form a regular mine for linguistic and ethnographic research with their idioms, the exact wording and meaning of which seems sometimes even to escape the author himself and which will be sought in vain anywhere else. In striking contrast with this natural, realistic style, which assures Rahmī an abiding importance, is his other style supposed to be distinguished and professing to be cultured, which is a hybrid between the language of journalism and the intolerably involved Turkish official language, the notorious bab-i-ālī üslūbī, and lowers him to the most ordinary mediocrity. Apart from the composition of his scenes of popular life, the whole of the rest of his artistic technique is on the same level of commonplace mediocrity. In his novels one cannot help receiving the impression of seeing before one's eyes a collection of splendid pictures with a very poor explanatory text.

In spite of his polemical theorising of recent years, Rahmī does not take his work as an author very seriously. His easily won reputation prevented a strenuous, profitable development of his talent and a thorough and artistic working up of his usually licentious themes. The construction of the plot almost always leaves everything to be desired. The plots are too obvious and awkwardly developed. The endeavour to be didactic in the secondary episodes not unfrequently destroys the artistic effect of the scenes borrowed from the life of the people.

Rahmī who had studied French models, professes to be a realist, although he condemns Zola as too extreme. His humour, his choice of subject and his method have earned him the not unappropriate name of the Turkish Paul de Kock. An ardent patriotism impels him to emphasise the characteristics of his own people which he vindicates in contrast with the sickly imitation of foreign customs and to lay bare the harm caused by slavish imitation of the pseudo-European in Ottoman society. But he firmly avoids any idealising and does not spare with his humour the old types of Turkish society, whom he draws in contrast to the modern excrescences.

He began his activity as an author with translations from the French of which an example may be seen in vol. iii. of the Arakel kitab-khūnisi dīeb romanlary (Constantinople 1309 = 1891-2), which contains the Parisa bir te'ehhül (A Marriage in Paris) and a humorous story by Jules Claretie (iki refik-i tahrir) and also a translation of Alfred de Musset's Frédéric et Bernerette.

His first independent work devoted to ridiculing the aping of European customs: Arayaklı şik (The Looking-glass and the Coxcomb) already shows the true character of his talent. In 1313 (1895) appeared the humorous satirical novel, Murebbiye (The Lady Teacher), 2nd ed. 1315, probably on the whole his best work, which at once made him famous. He boldly attacks the system of education in vogue in Constantinople with its casual governesses, the often very suspicious women teachers. His novel which appeared, like most of his works, in serial form in the İkdam made a great stir and aroused resentment in all quarters, among conservative people on account of its indecency, among progressives for its apparent hostility to progress, and resulted in a vigorous press campaign against Rahmī and the İkdam itself. The humorous collection of letters, Mutallaka (The Divorced Woman), 1314 (1896), translated into German by Imhoff Pasha in his pictures of Turkish life, vol. i., is directed against the senseless severity of the Muslim divorce and thus treats of the problem of female emancipation, a very delicate one in Turkey. Friedrich Giese has translated some interesting fragments of the novel 'İffet (Chastity), which appeared in the same year, as "Die Volksszenen aus Husain Rahmī's Roman" in Orientalische Studien Theodor Noldeke zum 70. Geburtstag gewidmet, 1906. Next followed Bir mü'adele-i-sevda (Equilibrium of Love). In 1315 (1897) appeared his longest novel Metres (The Mistress), which already shows a falling off, in 1316 (1898) Teşaduf (Encounter), and in 1319 (1901) Nimet-shinās. From Ship sevdi on, the artistic qualities of his novels begin to decrease still more. In Ship sevdi itself the description of the dance of the negress with the Agha, in spite of its eroticism, must be described as a pearl of Rahmī's descriptive art. His latest works, Kurukly yildız altında bir izdivādī (A Marriage among the comets), Ghul-i yābānī (the Ghoul of the Desert), and Djady (The Witch), brought him sharp criticism, particularly from the literary circle of the periodical Rubāb (Fikret's school), notably from Shihāb al-Dīn. His last work Djady çarpıyör (the Witch beats), which appeared in 1329 (1910) under the device "Not till the day on which the importance of the purity of our language is recognised, will literature begin" is mere polemic.

(THEODOR MENZEL.)

HUSAIN SHAH B. MAHMŪD, last Sultān of the independent kingdom of Dīawnpūr [q. v.], seized the throne of his brother Muḥammad Shāh in 863 (= 1458), when the latter was embarrassed by the invasion of his territories by Bahlōl Shāh, Sultān of Dihli [q. v.]. Husain Shāh made peace with Bahlōl, and agreed upon a truce for four years. A successful campaign in Orissa and another in Gwalior added considerably to his wealth and importance, and in 878 he took advantage of Bahlōl's absence in the Pandjāb to advance upon Dihli. After an indecisive action, a fresh truce was made, but the conflict between these rival powers was soon renewed, and continued, with brief intervals of peace, until Bahlōl entered Dġawnpūr at the head of a victorious army and established his son Bārbak there as viceroy. Ḥusain Shāh fled to Bihār, but was treated with great generosity by his conqueror, who allowed him to retain a tract of country yielding a revenue of five lakhs a year. Bahlōl died in 894 (= 1488) and was succeeded by his son Sikandar; in 1493 Ḥusain Shāh made a last attempt to recover his kingdom, and collecting a large force marched against Sikandar Lōdī; but he was defeated in the neighbourhood of Banāras and fled to Gawr to the court of 'Alā al-Dīn Ḥusain Shāh, king of Bengal, by whom he was honourably received; he died there in 905 (= 1499), but his body was interred at Dġawnpūr, close to the superb Dġami' Masġid which had been erected during his reign.

HUSAIN WA'IZ KĀSHIFĪ. [See KĀSHIFĪ.]

HUSAINĀBĀD, the name of a town in Bengal, which was a mint of the Kings of Bengal Ḥusain Shāh, Naṣrat Shāh and Maḥmūd Shāh III between the years 899 (1493) and 939 (1532). It is generally supposed to be a name of the capital Gaur [q. v.], bestowed on it by Ḥusain Shāh, but Blochmann held that it was near Gaur but not identical with it. The identity with Gaur does not admit of much doubt, and similar titles (Naṣratābād, Maḥmūdābād) seem to have been bestowed upon the same capital by Naṣrat Shāh and Maḥmūd Shāh. The name Ḥusainābād (or Hasanābād) on the copper coins of the Mughal Emperor Shāh 'Ālam II probably also refers to Gaur.

HUSAINĪ, plur. Ḥusainīyūn, a name borne by those sherifs of Morocco who trace their descent from al-Ḥusain, son of 'Alī and Fāṭima, the daughter of the Prophet. Unlike the Ḥasanī [q. v.] the Ḥusainī came at a relatively late date to Morocco, where they in numbers at any rate never attained the importance of their cousins. They form two main groups, the Ṣaḳaliyūn and the 'Irākiyūn.

The Ṣaḳaliyūn (i. e. these who came from Sicily) were driven from their original home by the Norman conquest. They fled first to Spain and thence to Morocco in the reign of the Marinid Sultān Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad b. Abū Sālim (end of the xivth century). They trace their descent from al-Ḥusain through 'Alī al-Riḳā.

The 'Irākiyūn, the descendants of al-Ḥusain through Ibrāhīm al-Murtaḳā, left Spain after the conquest of Granada by the Christians and sought refuge in Fās (1492).

HUSAINĪ SĀDĀT AMĪR, (RUKN AL-DIN HUSAIN B. 'ĀLIM B. ABI 'L-ḤASAN), born at Guzīv, a village in Ghūr, in 671 (1272), was a famous author and a renowned Ṣūfī poet. He came to Multān and became a disciple of Rukn al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faṭḥ (ob. 735 = 1335) the grandson and successor of Bahā' al-Dīn Zakariyā' of Multān (ob. 666 = 1267). He afterwards settled in Herāt where he died, according to the Nafaḥāt al-Uns, in 718 (1318), according to the most recent researches however not till 729 (720?). Among his works the following may be mentioned: Nuḥḥat al-Arwāḥ a Ṣūfī work in mixed prose and verse, in which the rules of the spiritual life are explained and illustrated by anecdotes and sayings of holy men; Zād al-Musāfirīn "Provisions for travellers", rules of the religious life, illustrated by anecdotes and fables, and many other tracts such as Kanz al-Rumūz, Rūḥ al-Arwāḥ, Shirāt mustaḥim, Sī Nāma, and Ṭarḥ al-Muslīmīn, all of them treating of mystic love.

AL-ḤUSĀM B. DĠRĀR AL-KALBĪ, ABU 'L-KHAṬṬĀR, governor of Spain 125—127 (743—745). After Balġ b. Bishr [q. v.] had fallen in battle in 124 (742) and his successor Tha'labā b. Salāma had sold the Spanish Anṣārīs defeated and taken prisoner by him as slaves for a low price, Ḥanzala b. Ṣafwān, governor of Ifrikiya, sent Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār to Spain as governor. According to Ibn al-Kūṭīya and Ibn al-Aṭhīr, this was done at the express command of the Caliph Hishām, after Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār, who hated the Syrians bitterly, had sent him a poem in which he reminded him of the enmity of the Kaisīs. Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār at once set free the imprisoned Arabs and broke the resistance of the Syrians by sending a number of their chiefs to Africa and dividing the rest among various towns and districts in Spain, where they were allotted for their support one third of the harvest which the natives had to pay to the state treasury. But their discontent continued and became dangerous to the governor, when a certain chief named al-Ṣumail [q. v.], who had been personally insulted by him, undertook the leadership of the Syrians and caused the civil war to flame forth again. When Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār met them on the banks of the Guadalete, a portion of his troops failed him so that he had to take to flight and was captured (745). Soon afterwards, however, he was released by some of his followers but a new attempt to face the Syrians had the same lamentable result except that Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār escaped his enemies this time. But he had now to agree to make common cause with Ibn Ḥuraith, who had at first been on the side of his enemies but whose claims to be recognised as Emir of Spain had met with the resistance of al-Ṣumail; Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār had even to grant him precedence. Nevertheless, both were captured in an encounter at Secunda on the Guadalquivir, opposite Cordova, and put to death (130 = 747).

AL-HŪT = the fish, more accurately al-Hūt al-djanūbī was the name given by the Arabs to the constellation of the Southern Fish the largest star in which is Fomalhaut [q. v.]. Al-Hūt, however, is also used of the zodiacal sign of Pisces, for which we find in al-Battāni, etc. the dual al-Samakātāni = the two fishes; Ptolemy uses the plural ἰχθύες for this sign and ἰχθύος ὀνόμας for the former. Ṣāhib al-Hūt = Jonah.

(H. SUTER.)

AL-HUTĀ'Ī'A, 'the dwarf', a nickname originally given in contempt to the Arab poet DJARWAL B. AWS, who belonged to the Muḥaddramūn [q. v.]. His genealogy was despised; he had cause to attach himself sometimes to the 'Abs clan and sometimes to the Dhuhl. The date of the commencement of his poetical activities is usually antedated in an impossible fashion by literary tradition; he was most probably a younger contemporary of 'Urwa b. al-Ward [q. v.]. He was converted to Islām but his religion was very superficial. In the reign of Abū Bakr he took part in the Ridda [q. v.] rising. His character is very unfavourably described; a low avarice and venality form the main characteristics of his literary career. He wandered among the Arab tribes singing and begging, lavishing extravagant panegyrics on any liberal Maecenas and threatening the less bountiful with lampoons. In 'Omar's reign he was imprisoned for lampoons directed against Zibri-kān b. Badr. Nothing definite is known of the year of his death. Arab tradition makes him survive into the reign of Mu'āwīya I. Abulfeda (Annales, i. 375) even puts the date of his death at 69 = 668 A. D., which is hardly credible. The most probable supposition is that he died about 30 A. H. = 650 (Brockelmann, i. 41). His versatile poetic talent, especially in these two branches of poetry, is highly praised. Later poets mention him as a distinguished predecessor (Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., xli. 41; also Kumait, ed. Horowitz, n^o. 4 v. 11, Bahā al-Dīn Zuhair, ed. Palmer, p. 217, 3); philologists of the second and third centuries actively collected his poems, which however even at a very early period (notably by Hammād al-Rāwīya) had been corrupted by interpolations. Of the two recensions of his Diwān, that in which unauthentic portions were leniently dealt with by Abū 'Amr al-Shaibānī and Ibn al-'Arabī has survived in its entirety, while Abū Ḥakīm al-Sidjīstānī's recension in which the elimination of suspicious passages is more strictly performed, has only survived in isolated fragments. The extant manuscripts of the Diwān and the editions based on them give the first recension. The Diwān of Hutai'a was published with an introduction and explanatory notes by the present writer (in vol. 46 and 47 of the Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., and reprint, Leipzig, 1893), and later with Sukkarī's commentary and glosses by the editor, Aḥmad al-Shingīṭī (Cairo, Takaddum press, n. d.). In addition to the mss. mentioned in the former edition the Diwān (with Sukkarī) also exists in Stambul, Fātih-Library, n^o. 3821 (a copy of it in Cambridge, see E. G. Browne's Handlist n^o. 384); a portion in the Catalogue 'Auf Ef. n^o. 2777 (according to Rescher).

Bearers of the name al-Hutai'a are also found in later times; an Abu 'l-Abbās b. al-Hutai'a is quoted by Subkī, Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'iya, iv. 234, 2, and an Aḥmad b. al-Hutai'a, ibid., 279, 12 (both in the viii century A. H.) (I. GOLDZIEHER.)

HUTAIM (HETEM, HATEM, TEHM, HITEM, plur. Hutaimān, Hetaimān), a large tribe of nomads which is scattered throughout the Ḥijāz, Naǧd and Egypt. Their chief settlements are at Dīdda, Līth and al-Waǧh; smaller bodies of the Hutaim live near al-Ḥiǧr, al-'Ulā ('Ally), Khaibar (here they are makers of cheese), in the Harat al-Eḥṣān (near Khaibar), on the Wādī 'l-Rumma above Medina, where they are neighbours of the Harb, and in the vicinity of Mecca. In Egypt they are found south of Ḥelwān and in considerable numbers in the eastern delta near Zakāzīk. During the spring after the rainy season many of the Hutaim encamp with their herds of sheep and goats on the islands of the Red Sea at the exit from the Gulf of 'Aqaba (Nu'mān [Naamān, Neimān], etc.) and on the west coast of the sea at Abū Sha'r, where they catch fish, which are numerous there, and tortoises which yield excellent shell.

In Dīdda, al-Waǧh, Yanbu', and other ports they sell fish, butter, milk, honey, goats, and sheep to the pilgrims and caravans. The following subdivisions of the Hutaim are mentioned: Ibn Barrak, Ibn Dammūk (min al-Khluie), Ibn Dījelladān, Ḥai-zān, al-Kahid (Gabiḍ), Fehyāt (see Fehyī), al-Khiarāt, al-Moḥābara, Bedōwna (on the Djabel Dokhan below al-'Ally), Banū Rashīd (numbering about 2000 souls), al-Ferāḍissa, Kerabis (al-Waǧh), al-Noāmsī, al-Thiabbā or Ibn Simra (Simrī, the three latter at Khaibar), also the so-called 'Arab al-Ḥisār (south of Ḥelwān, very prosperous) and the Banū 'Aṭa (in the eastern Delta).

The origin of the Hutaim is unknown; they are therefore not regarded as Bedouins and are despised by the Arabs who do not intermarry with them; the Sherārāt [q. v.] so feared for their treachery are held to be related to them; the traveller Rüppel considers them to have come from Yemen. According to legend, the Prophet once visited a camp of the Hutaim where a dog was served up to him as a meal; Muḥammad in anger is said to have forbidden his followers to enter into marriages with them or to eat with them. The travellers Burckhardt, Rüppel, and Wellsted describe them as industrious, kind and hospitable. The Hutaim on the islands of the Red Sea are poor and live under wretched conditions, they dwell partly in caves and caverns; they pay tribute (two dollars a head) to the Huwaitāt [q. v.]. The Hutaim in Ḥijāz and Naǧd are more prosperous than Bedouins usually are. Their camels are of the finest. They are well armed and excellent shots. A portion of the Hutaim pays tribute to the Shammar chief Ibn Rashīd.

HUWA HUWA, literally "he is he", or "it is it", means:

a. in logic what is represented as entirely identical e. g. "Muhammad b. 'Abd Allāh" and "the Prophet". (Peano and the modern logicians express this equation by the sign \equiv).

u. in Mysticism the state of the saint whose completed personal unity testifies to divine unity in the world.

AL-HUWAITĀT (HWEĀT, HAWĒTĀT, HOWĒTĀT, HOWEYAT, HOWADAT, HOWAHTAT; sing. HUWAITĪ), an Arab tribe in the northern Ḥidjāz and on the Sinai peninsula; their settlements in the Ḥidjāz reach southwards from al-'Aḳaba to beyond al-Waḍḥ; they are neighbours of the Balī [q. v.] and Djuhaina [q. v.] with the latter of whom they are on bad terms. Formerly the Djudhām [q. v.] occupied their settlements.

There is a large settlement of the Huwaitāt on the Wādī Maḳnā, where they have many huts and thick palmgroves; they only stay here during the date-harvest. Between 'Ain Unna and al-Muwailīḥ (Moila), a station for pilgrims on the Red Sea, they have good pastures where they encamp during the rainy season with their numerous flocks of sheep and goats. In autumn they live in the oasis Dhāt al-Ḥaḍḍī in the neighbourhood of Djebel Ṭubaik, north of Tabūk. In the hot season they go back to Ghazza; here as well as in the little villages in al-Hismā near al-'Aḳaba they tend their extensive date orchards and cultivate their fields of dhura. In Yanbu' and other ports they sell butter, milk, goats and sheep to the pilgrims and travellers along the coast; in Naḡd they exchange dhura for cattle. Many of the Huwaitāt are camel-drivers and camel dealers; those in Palestine are traders (particularly among the Bedouins). In Burckhardt's time they carried on a busy trade with Cairo; every year a caravan of over 4000 camels went from the Huwaitāt to the Egyptian capital, where they bought wheat, barley and clothing. The Huwaitāt are considered descendants of the ancient Nabataeans; according to a common belief among them, they are descended from two brothers of the Harb [q. v.] The founder of the tribe is said to have been Hwēt (Huwait), a native to Egypt, who came to al-'Aḳaba on a pilgrimage and is buried in al-Hismā. Of the ten or twelve subdivisions of the Huwaitāt, which were given to him, Burckhardt mentions the following as the most powerful; the 'Omran (perhaps identical with the 'Imran, the present northern neighbours of the Huwaitāt al-Tihāma [on the Red Sea]), al-Djāzi (al-Dshāsi, probably the Hwētāt [Kawm] b. Djāzi or Huwaitāt al-Safha in A. Musil, now the most important group in Arabia Petraea, who live in the town of al-Shera' and the eastern desert and number nearly 800 families), al-Mesk and al-

Resai. C. M. Doughty mentions the following divisions: Allowin ('Alawin ['Alāwin]) or Hwētāt b. Djād in Musil, the second main group in Arabia Petraea, 100 families strong, living in al-Hismā, Suāki, Saidin (nomads, probably the Zawā'ida [al-Zaidi] in Musil, who are reckoned to the Huwaitāt b. Djāzi), al-Terābin, Tiāha (al-Tiyāha) and Darāwessha (Darāwsha [b. Darwish], a division of the Huwaitāt b. Djād). The Tarābin, the most powerful tribe in the country between Bi'r al-Seba' and al-Nakhl (about 13,000 men) and the Tiyāha, an influential tribe at Bi'r al-Seba', who, according to Musil and Jaussen, do not belong to the Huwaitāt but are merely their neighbours.

The Huwaitāt are a warlike tribe and are feared by the pilgrims for their ambushes (they beset the roads to al-'Olā' [Ally]). Every year they raid the neighbouring tribes, the Balī, Shammar etc.. During the Egyptian campaigns, Muhammad 'Alī was only able to subdue them by bestowing annual gifts on their shaiḳhs. They still receive at the present time considerable gifts in gold, garments, and food from the Turks, particularly in times of political unrest. In 1873 the inhabitants of al-Kerak (north of Ma'an, were defeated by the Huwaitāt. In 1877 there was a great battle between them and the people of al-Kerak and al-Shōbak (north of Petra) in which they were again victorious. They levy a yearly tribute of two thalers a head on the Hutaim [q. v.] to whom they grant protection. They also receive tribute from the Shararāt [q. v.], the people of Taimā', from some emigrants in Djawf al-Sirhān [q. v.], from the town of Kaf in the Wādī Sirhān, al-Shōbak (Shawbak, north of Petra), etc. Palgrave estimates the number of Huwaitāt, who are under Shammar chiefs, at 20,000.

According to al-Batanūni, their total number is 70,000.

HUWAIZA [See HAWĪZA.]

HUWĀRA (Berber HOWĀRA) is the name of one of the most important Berber tribes. It must be confessed that the genealogists are not agreed as to the place which should be allotted to it in the Berber family, quite apart from the legends, which give it a Yemeni origin. The Arabic etymology of the name (tahawwārā) has given rise to suggestions detailed by al-Idrisi and attacked by Ibn Khaldūn. The most probable view is that their eponymous ancestor, was descended from Aūriḡh, son of Branes. The tribes and clans of the Huwāra were very numerous; among the most important are the B. Kamlān, the Gharyān, the Wargha the Zekkawa, the Maslata and the Maḡās. At the Arab conquest, these tribes, as the Muslim historians inform us, took Tripolitanía and the country of Barkā. Some even settled in the Sahara desert near the Lamta and took the name Hoggar (a contraction of Howār, Hawār); they would thus be the ancestors of the modern Tuāreg. Others founded the town of Aghmāt in Southern Morocco. They became converts to Islām but afterwards apostasized; they later zealously adopted the doctrines of the Khāridjis and shared in all their rebellions, in that of Abū Yazid also, particularly those who had settled in Ifrikiya, Awrās and Sersū. They became so weakened by oppression by the Fātimid caliph Ismā'il al-Manṣūr and later by the Ḥafṣid Emir Abū Zakariyā, that they played no part in political affairs afterwards. In the xivth century we find them spread all over north Africa, between Barkā and Alexandria, from Tebessa to Begā and to the sea, in the valley of the Shelif where they had founded the town of al-Baṭṭa, which has now utterly vanished and between Mascara and Relizane where they had built the Ka'fa of the B. Huwāra, the modern Ka'fa of the B. Rāshid. One of their families the B. Khaṭṭab had founded a kingdom in Zīrila; on its downfall they founded another in Fezzān, which was destroyed by the Kurd Karakosh, who put the last ruler of this family, Muḥammad b. Khaṭṭab b. Islitén, to death by torture, in order to gain possession of his wealth. Of those who occupied the central Maghrib Ibn Khaldūn says: (the tribes) graze herds of sheep, but as they are oppressed with taxes they no longer show the pride and independence, which once distinguished them when their armies won bloody victories. Scattered and weakened they are now despised".

HUWWĀRĪN a place on the road from Damascus to Palmyra and Hims, about midway between them. It is celebrated as a resort of Yazid I. The district was inhabited in 'Abd al-Malik's time by Nabīṭ, i.e. natives who were Christians and spoke Aramaic. This remained the case down to the time of the Mamlūks of Egypt. Yazid died at Huwwārīn and was buried there; this is confirmed by contemporary poetry. The inhabitants still point out a ruin called Kaṣr Yazid, 'Yazid's castle'. This name is probably only an echo of the literary tradition, according to which there were lasting links between Yazid and Huwwārīn.

I.

AL-IBĀDĪYA, usually called ABĀDĪYA in North Africa, are the followers of 'Abd Allāh b. Ibād [q. v.]. A few additions may here be made to what has been written in i. p. 3, chiefly with reference to the North African Abādīs. The first rising of the Ibādīs took place in the last years of the reign of Marwān II, under 'Abd Allāh b. Yahyā Ṭālib al-Ḥaḥḥ and Abū Ḥamza (129 = 747). 'Abd Allāh had homage paid him in Hadrāmūt, then conquered Ṣan'ā' and sent Abū Ḥamza to Mecca; the latter defeated the Omayyad governor at Qudaid and brought Medina also under his sway. In the following year 130 (748) however, Marwān sent 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Aṭiya against him; Abū Ḥamza was put to flight in the Wādī 'l-Kurā, took refuge in Mecca, whither 'Abd al-Malik followed him, and was taken and executed there after a vigorous resistance. A short time afterwards the Ibādī caliph 'Abd Allāh b. Yahyā met the same fate. According to Shahrastānī, ed. Cureton, p. 100, Abd Allāh b. Ibād also took part in this rising but this statement seems to be inaccurate, as Ibn Ibād, according to more reliable statements, died in the reign of 'Abd al-Malik nearly half a century previously. A second rising under al-Djulandā in 'Omān in 134 (751-2) was put down by the 'Abbāsīd general Khāzim b. Khuzaima.

In the meanwhile the Ibādī movement spread to North Africa; on its vicissitudes there cf. the article ABĀDĪTES. In Arabia itself it found a hospitable soil in distant 'Omān and in time became the predominant sect there cf. the article 'OMĀN. From there it was later brought to Zanzibar.

The Ibādīya form a separate community in Islām alongside of the Sunnis and Shī'is and have their own rules of faith and religious laws, which, however, on the whole agree with those of the Sunnis and only deviate on certain questions. They also recognise the Qur'ān and Hadīth as the source of religious knowledge, but instead of Idjmā' and Kiyās they have Ra'y [q. v.]. They show their Khāridjī origin not only on these points but also on the question of the Imāmate, although in a different fashion from the Azrakīs. We cannot here enter into details of their conception of walāya, barā'a and rukūf, especially as they are not agreed among themselves on them. Al-Shahrastānī, al-Baghdādī, etc. mention a schism of the older Ibādīya into 3 or 4 sects; the Ḥafṣīya, the Hārithīya, the Yazīdiya and those who admit of an obedience which has not God as its object. In the later history of the community, notably in North Africa, further differences of opinion revealed themselves. Several theological works of their leaders are mentioned in Fihrist, p. 182 sqq., more about which is given in Bibliography to the art. ABĀDĪTES. The chief source is the work made known by Sachau, Mitteil. des Semin. für orient. Sprachen, 2th Abteilung i, 1 sqq., and ii. 47 sqq., entitled Kaṣḥf al-Ghumma al-Djāmi' li-Akḥbār al-Umma.

IBLIS, the personal name of the Devil. The word is probably a corruption of διάβολος; the native philologists derive it from the root h-l-s "because Iblis has nothing to expect (ubliṣa) from the mercy of God". He is also called al-Shaiṭān (Satan), Adūwā Allāh (enemy of God) or al-Adūwā. Al-Shaiṭān however is not a proper name. In the Qur'ān he appears mainly in the early history of the world (ii. 32; vii. 10; xv. 31 sq.; xvii. 63; xviii. 48; xx. 115; xxxviii. 74 sq.) as rebellious at the creation of Adam and as the tempter of Eve in Paradise. After Allāh had formed Adam [q. v.] out of earth and breathed the breath of life into him, he issued an order to the angels to bow down before him. The only one who refused to do so was Iblis, because he, being created of fire, thought it beneath his dignity to pay homage to a being made of earth. He was therefore banished and cursed; but he begged postponement of his punishment till the Day of Judgment; he was granted this as well as power to lead astray all those who are not true servants of God. When Adam and Eve were in Paradise, he tempted them to eat of the fruit of the tree. Muḥammad has here combined two independent myths, the creation of Adam and the temptation of Eve in Paradise. It is to be noted that in the story of the creation, the devil is always called Iblis; in the story of Paradise, however, al-Shaiṭān, at least when not denoted by a pronoun. The story of Iblis is based on Christian tradition. In the Life of Adam and Eve, § 15 (Kautzsch, Apokryphen) it is related that Michael had commanded the angels to worship Adam. The Devil objected that Adam was less important and younger than they; he and his hosts refused and were cast down upon the earth. According to the Schatzhöhle (ed. Bezold, p. 15 sq. of the Syriac-Arabic text), God gave Adam power over all creatures. The angels thereupon revered him, except the Devil, who had become jealous and said: He ought to worship me, who am light and air, while he is only earth. He was therefore cast out of heaven with his hosts; then he was called Satan, Daemon, etc.

Muslim tradition has adorned the Qur'ānic account with various features, some well known. The difficulty had first to be overcome that in the Qur'ān Iblis is numbered among the Djinn [q. v.] as well as among the angels, and these are usually considered two different classes of beings. Zamakhsharī says that Iblis is only a Djinnī and that the name angel in the Qur'ān applies to both classes (Kashshaf on Sūra xx. 115). But it is also said that Iblis was an archangel. Others say that the Djinn were a division of the angels, who had to guard Paradise (al-Djanna); hence their name (Ṭabarī, Annales, i. 80). These Djinn were created of the fire of Samūm (Sūra, xv. 27) while the angels are created of light (Ṭabarī, ib., p. 81.) In the beginning the Djinn inhabited the earth. But they quarrelled with one another and finally blood was shed. Allāh then sent Iblis who, at that time, bore the name of 'Azāzil or al-Hārith, with a troop of angels against the brawlers who were driven back into the mountains. According to other accounts however, Iblis was one of the earthly Djinn and was brought back a prisoner to heaven by the angels sent by Allāh to punish the unruly Djinn; he was still quite young at this time (ib., p. 84). The name al-Hakam is also given to Iblis before his fall, as Allāh had appointed him judge over the Djinn, he filled this office for 1000 years. He then became vain of the name and created unrest among the Djinn, which lasted another 1000 years. Allāh then sent fire which consumed them; but Iblis took refuge in heaven and remained a faithful servant of Allāh till the creation of Adam (ib., p. 85; Mas'ūdi, Murūdj, i. 50 sqq.)

But there are other traditions about the pride of Iblis. Ṭabarī (ib., p. 83) relates that he felt himself superior to the other angels, whereupon Allāh said: "I will create a khalīfa on earth" (Sūra ii. 28); Ṭabarī (ib., p. 79 sq.) further says that Iblis was one of the archangels and ruled over the Djinn on earth and in the lowest heaven. He then became rebellious and was called Shaiṭān raḍīm by Allāh.

In the discussion of the story of Paradise in Tradition it is related how Iblis obtained access to Paradise. The view, also found in Christian authors, is generally prevalent that he made use of a serpent for this purpose. According to some authorities, he tricked all the animals in vain; according to others, he began with the peacock, which he once saw at the gate of Paradise. He promised to tell him three words which would protect him from death on condition that he let him enter. But the peacock would not and told his experience to the serpent. The latter allowed Satan to sit between its teeth (according to others in its belly) and carried him in. The serpent was on intimate terms with Eve; and Satan now talked out of its mouth. He told the woman of the fruit of the tree which gave immortality, as an angel had told him. When Eve had gone to the tree, Iblis appeared in the form of an angel. According to others, he brought her the fruit of the tree himself, with the well-known result. Iblis, Adam, and Eve were banished from Paradise and cursed. (The Qur'ān places the banishment of Iblis after the story of the creation). The serpent, previously a beautiful quadruped was condemned to crawl upon its belly. Iblis was granted postponement of his punishment. Henceforth he had to live in ruins, tombs and filthy places. His food is flesh offered to idols, his drink wine, his pastimes music, dancing, and poetry. His descendants are seven times more numerous than those of men.

In the end Iblis shall be thrown into hell-fire with his hosts and the damned among men. "Then shall they (the idols) be thrown into it (i. e. into hell) as well as those who have been seduced and the hosts of Iblis". (Sūra, xxvi. 94 sq.). The phraseology of this verse recalls Matthew, xxv. 41: "Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand: Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels".

But in the meanwhile he plays many a trick on men, and leads them astray except the believers (Sūra, xxxiv. 19). The hātif [q. v.] so frequently mentioned in Arabic literature is often simply the voice of Iblis. For example, he is said to have warned 'Alī in this way not to wash the Prophet's corpse; another hātif then brought the Prophet's son-in-law into the right course again (Tha'labī, Kiṣṣa, p. 44).

Allāh once granted John the Baptist an interview with Iblis. He asked the Evil One, when he had the greatest influence on men and the answer was: "when they have eaten and drunk their fill". John thereupon resolved never to reach this stage.

On his propagation it is said that he lays two eggs as often as he rejoices over the rebelliousness of the children of Adam and young are born from these eggs. It is also said that he has both male and female organs and impregnates himself.

IDRĪS AL-ṬĀLAKĀNĪ, vizier of the two Būyids Mu'ayyid al-Dawla and Fakhr al-Dawla, born in Dhu 'l-Ka'da 326 (September 938). His father had been Rukn al-Dawla's vizier; he himself received the name 'al-Ṣāhib' (the companion) on account of his relations with Abu 'l-Faḍl b. al-'Amīd [v. IBN AL-'AMĪD] or Mu'ayyid al-Dawla, who appointed him his secretary. After the fall of Abu 'l-Faḍl b. al-'Amīd [v. IBN AL-'AMĪD] he was raised to the rank of vizier and when Mu'ayyid al-Dawla died in 373 (954) and the power passed to Fakhr al-Dawla, the latter confirmed him in his office. He held the grand viziership till his death and during his long tenure of office exercised a very great influence over Fakhr al-Dawla. In 377 (987-8) he undertook an expedition to Ṭabaristān, arranged affairs there and captured several fortresses. Ibn 'Abbād died in al-Raiy in Ṣafar 385 (March 995) and was buried in Isfahān.

'ABBĀD AL-NAFZĪ AL-ḤIMYARĪ AL-RUNDĪ, generally known as Ibn 'Abbād, a lawyer, mystic poet, and preacher, was born in 733 (1332-3) in Spain at Ronda, where he spent his youth, learned the Qur'ān by heart at the age of seven and began to study language and law. He then went to Fās and Tlemcen to complete his studies. He returned to Morocco, settled at Salā where he studied under Aḥmad b. 'Āshir; on the latter's death, after spending some time at Tangier under the Ṣūfī Abū Marwān 'Abd al-Malik, he was brought to Fās and entrusted with the post of khāṭib at the mosque of al-Qarawīyīn, which he held for fifteen years, i. e. till his death on Friday 3rd Radjab 792 (= 17 June 1390). He was buried inside the Bāb al-Futūḥ.

Among his teachers we may mention al-Sharīf al-Tilimsānī, al-Madjdjāsi, grandfather of the author of the Nafḥ al-Ṭib, Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Makḥārī, and among his pupils Yaḥyā al-Sarrādj, al-Khaṭīb b. Kunfudh and Abū 'Abd Allāh b. al-Sakkāk are specially noted.

A Ṣūfī of the order of al-Shadhili, Ibn 'Abbād is best known by his commentary on the Hikam of Ibn 'Aṭā' Allāh al-Iskandārī (Ghaith al-Marwāhib al-'aliya Sharḥ al-Hikam al-'Aṭā'iya) published at Būlak in 1285 and at Cairo in 1303, 1306.

IBN AL-ABBĀR, ABU 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. ABĪ BAKR B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. AḤMAD B. ABĪ BAKR AL-KUPĀTĪ, an Arab historian, a scion of the Qūḍā'īs settled in Onda, their ancestral estate in Spain, born at Valencia in Rabi' II, 595 (Febr. 1199), was a pupil of Abū 'Abd Allāh b. Nuḥ, Abū Djāfar al-Ḥassār, Abū 'l-Khaṭṭāb b. Wādijb, Abū 'l-Ḥasan b. Khaira, Abū Sulaimān b. Ḥawṭ, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Aziz b. Sa'āda etc.

For over twenty years he was on the closest terms of intercourse with the principal traditionist of Spain, Abū 'l-Rabi' b. Sālim, who induced him to complete the Ṣila of Ibn Bashkuwāl. He was also secretary to the governor of Valencia, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. AbĪ Ḥafs b. 'Abd al-Mu'min b. 'Alī, and afterwards to his son Abū Zaid, and lastly to Zaiyān b. Mardaniṣh. When Don Jayme, king of Aragon, besieged Valencia in Ramaḍān 635 (April—May 1238), Ibn al-Abbār travelled with an embassy to the Sulṭān of Tunis, Abū Zakariyā Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. AbĪ Ḥafs, to give him a document, by which the governor and people of Valencia recognised the suzerainty of the Ḥafṣid kingdom. He met Abū Zakariyā on the 4th Muḥarram 636 (17th August 1238) and recited to him a poem rhyming in sin, in which he appealed for help for the Muslims. Soon after his return to Valencia, only a few days before or after the capture of the town by the Christians in Ṣafar 636 (Sept.—Oct. 1238) he sailed with his whole family to Tunis. According to Ibn Khaldūn, he went straight to Tunis, while al-Ghubrīnī assures us that he went first to Bougie and taught there for a time. The Sultān of Tunis received him graciously and appointed him his secretary, with the duty of writing the king's style and titles immediately under the basmala in his edicts. But soon afterwards this office was taken from him and given to Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Ghasanī, who was a matchless expert in Eastern calligraphy, which the Sultān preferred to the Maghribī hand. Ibn al-Abbār felt this insult deeply but continued in spite of all warnings to place the king's title upon the documents, which had been drawn up by him. Confined to his own house, he composed an I'tāb al-Kuttāb which he dedicated to the Sultān. The latter pardoned him and restored Ibn al-Abbār to office, mainly through the intervention of his son al-Mustansir. After Abū Zakariyā's death his successor al-Mustansir made Ibn al-Abbār his trusted adviser, but the latter so offended the king and his courtiers by his behaviour that he was finally put to torture. Among his confiscated writings was found a satire against the Sultān, which so enraged the latter that he ordered its author to be slain by spear-thrusts. Ibn al-Abbār died on Tuesday morning, 20th Muharram 658 (6th January 1260) and on the following day, his body was burned along with his books, poems, and other products of his studies on one funeral-pyre. Ibn al-Abbār, who was called al-Fār (the mouse) for some unknown reason, composed a number of works on history, tradition, literature, and poetry, of which only the following have survived: 1. Kitāb al-Takmilā li-Kitāb al-Šila (ed. Codera, Madrid 1889); 2. al-Mu'djam fi Aṣḥāb al-Kādi al-Imām Abi 'Alī al-Šadafi (ed. IBN 'ABD AL-ḤAKAM, 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. 'ABD AL-ḤAKAM B. A'YAN, ABU 'L-KĀSIM, the earliest Arab historian of Egypt whose work has survived, was a member of a notable Egyptian family. His father, 'Abd Allāh (died 214 = 830), was very learned in tradition and jurisprudence, and the author of books in these fields; he was the head of the Mālikite school in Egypt, and was also associated with the Kādī as censor of witnesses. His four sons were all men of importance: Muḥammad, widely celebrated as a jurist and author, and his father's successor as leader of the Mālikites of Egypt; 'Abd al-Ḥakam, and Sa'd, also renowned (especially the former) for their learning; and 'Abd al-Raḥmān. The family suffered in the persecution under al-Wāṭḥik, refusing to subscribe to the doctrine of the created Kor'an; later, in the year 237, they became permanently disgraced in the community because of an embezzlement which was proved against them (al-Kindi, ed. Guest, p. 462 sqq., 472, 1 sqq.).

'Abd al-Raḥmān (generally known as Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam) died at al-Fusṭāt in 257 (871). He was mainly interested in tradition and made extensive collections based on the principal Egyptian authorities, of whom his father was one. His chief work was the Futūḥ Miṣr, in seven Divisions, as follows: 1. Egypt, and its ancient history; 2. The Muslim conquest; 3. The Khittā's of al-Fusṭāt and al-Djiza, and the Ikhādha's of Alexandria; 4. Organization and administration of Egypt under 'Amr b. al-'Āṣi, and the extension of the conquest beyond Egypt to the south and west; 5. The conquest of North Africa after the death of 'Amr, and the conquest of Spain; 6. The Kādīs of Egypt, down to the year 246; 7. Egyptian traditions derived from the Companions of the Prophet who came to Egypt. The manner of the whole compilation shows its author to have been an expert collector of traditions and not very critical of his material. His chief interest was in the period of the Companions and their immediate successors; hence in his treatment of the kādīs he gives much space to the earliest, but less and less to the later ones down to his own day; hence also in his important chapter on the khittās the formal tradition holds a subordinate place, and he simply collects whatever information he can find.

The work of Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam was extensively used by the early historians of Egypt. Among the later works, Suyūṭī's Ḥusn al-Muḥādara is in large part a transcript of it, and it furnishes Makrīzī with many chapters; in both cases the text quoted is much inferior to the original. Yāqūt cites it in extenso for a considerable part of his Egyptian material. See further the Introduction to the edition of the Futūḥ Miṣr now (1914) being published in the Gibb Memorial Series, London.

There are mss. of the work in the British Museum, Paris (2), and Leiden (an abridgment). Partial translations have been made by Ewald (Zeitschr. f. Kunde d. Morgenl., iii. 3, 1840, p. 336—352), de Slane, Karle, Jones, La Fucnte, and Torrey (in Bibl. and Semit. Studies, New York, 1901, p. 279—330; see Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., with the Nachträge).

IBN 'ABD RABBIHĪ, AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD ABU 'OMAR, a Spanish Arab author, born 10th Ramaḍān 246 = 29th Nov. 860 in Cordova, a freedman of the Umayyads ruling there, died 18th Djumādā I 328 = 3rd March 940. His principal work is the anthology al-'Ikd (the addition alfarid was made by later copyists); it is divided into 25 books, which are called after jewels; the 13th book is called al-Wāṣiṭa and the corresponding pairs on either side of it are called after the same jewels, in the second part with the addition of al-ḥāniya. The matter is taken from the usual adab books, the 'Uyūn al-Akhbār of Ibn Kṭaiba being particularly made use of; the ṣāḥib Ibn 'Abbād [q. v.] is said to have rejected the book as it disappointed his expectation of finding Spanish history in it. It was printed at Būlak 1293, Cairo 1303, 1305, 1317, 1321. Among his poems, of which al-Ḥumaidī was acquainted with more than 20 volumes, there were Muwashshahāt and a group which he called Mumahhaṣat; they were the love poems of his youth, to which he added in his old age concluding verses of ascetic tenor in the same metre and rhyme.

IBN 'ABD AL-WAHHĀB. [See MUḤAMMAD.]

IBN 'ABD AL-ZĀHIR, MUḤYI 'L-DIN ABŪ 'L-FADL 'ABD ALLĀH B. RASHĪD AL-DIN ABŪ MUḤAMMAD 'ABD AL-ZĀHIR B. NISHWĀN AL-SĀDĪ AL-RAWḤĪ, born in Cairo on the 9th Muharram 620 = 1223, and died there in 692 = 1292 (Durrat al-Aslāk fī Dawlat al-Aṭrāk, Orientalia, ii. 1846, p. 285; Wüstenfeld, Geschichtschreiber, N^o. 366). Not much is known about his life but he played an important part under the three Baḥrī Mamlūks al-Malik al-Zāhir Baibars, al-Manṣūr Ḳalā'ūn and al-Ashraf Ḳhalīl as private secretary, Kātib al-Sirr or Ṣāḥib Diwān al-Inshā' (on this office see Makrīzī, Khitaṭ, i. 402; ii. 225 sq.; Quatremère, Histoire des Sultans Mamlouks par Makrīzī, ii. 2, p. 222, Note 40, and 317 sqq.). According to some he was the first holder of this office, though others say his son; in other sources the office is said to be much older (see Moberg's work quoted below p. xiii. sq.) and he is said to have succeeded Ibn Loḱmān in 678 in the reign of Ḳalā'ūn (Quatremère, ii. 1, p. 7, 27). In this office he had to read all letters coming in and to compose all important letters and documents; he seems to have performed these tasks even in the reign of Baibars, for in 661, when Baibars took the oath of fealty to the Caliph, Ibn 'Abd al-Zāhir was present and composed the caliph's khutba (Quatremère, i. 1, p. 150, 183; Casanova, p. 495); in 662 he drew up the taḳlīd by which al-Malik al-Sāḍ was installed as heir-apparent (Quatremère, i. 1, p. 241), and later he drew up the marriage contract between him and Ḳalā'ūn's daughter (op. cit., i. 2, p. 132): he also wrote the taḳlīd which declared Ḳalā'ūn's son as heir-apparent (op. cit., ii. 1, p. 26). In 666 he was with an Emir in 'Akkā to receive the commandant's oath of fealty, but without success (op. cit., i. 2, p. 57) and he looked after the affairs of state when Ḳalā'ūn's son was governor during his father's journey (Casanova, p. 495). He spent some time in Damascus (Makrīzī, Khitaṭ, ii. 324).

The Annals which he compiled on the reigns of the three Sultāns above mentioned are of great importance. The biography of Baibars (Part i. to 663, Brit. Mus., N^o. 1229) was used by Makrīzī and al-Asḱalānī, Kitāb Iḥṣān al-Manāḱib (Moberg, p. xvii sq.) and al-Naṣrī Shāfi'ī made an excerpt from it (Casanova, p. 499 sq.). The history of Ḳalā'ūn is traced from 681 till his death and official documents are given (Casanova, p. 502). We only possess a third of the biography of al-Ashraf (years 690-691), published by Moberg except some waḱf documents (see Bibl.). Of importance also is his Kitāb al-Rawḱa al-baḥiya al-ṣāhira fī Khitaṭ al-Mu'izziya al-Ḳāhira (Hādijī Ḳhalifa, ii. 147; iii. 161, 499), which Makrīzī made great use of in his Khitaṭ chiefly for archaeology (Becker, Beiträge zur Gesch. Agyptens unter dem Islam, p. 23, 30; Guest in Journ. Roy. As. Soc., 1902, p. 120, 125). His Tamā'im al-Hamām treats of carrier-pigeons (Makrīzī, Khitaṭ, ii. 231 Quatremère, ii. 2, p. 118, Note 49; Casanova, p. 505). For his other works see Brockelmann.

His son FATH AL-DIN B. 'ABD AL-ZĀHIR is also mentioned as Kātib al-Sirr and seems to have attained an even higher position than his father in this capacity (Makrīzī, Khitaṭ, i. 226; Casanova, p. 497). He died before his father in 691.

IBN 'ABDŪN, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD 'ABD AL-MADJĪD IBN 'ABDŪN AL-FIHRI, a Spanish Arab poet, born in Evora, whose poetical talent early attracted the attention of the governor of Evora, 'Omar al-Mutawakkil Ibn al-Aṭas, and when the latter became ruler of Badajoz [see i. 178^b sq.] he became his secretary in 473 (1080). The fall of the Aṭasid kingdom in 485 (1092) forced him to enter the service of Sir b. Abi Bakr, leader of the Arab troops. We afterwards find him again as secretary at the court of the Almoravid 'Alī b. Yūsuf in 500 (1106). He died in his native town Evora in 529 (1134). Ibn 'Abdūn owes his fame chiefly to a poem, much admired by the Arabs, entitled al-Bashshāma and dealing with the fall of the Aṭasids. 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Abd Allāh al-Haḍramī wrote a historical commentary on it. The latter is known as Ibn Badrūn and was born in Silves and was still alive in 608 (1211) but nothing further is known of him. This commentary with Ibn 'Abdūn's poem was published by Dozy in 1846 under the title Commentaire historique sur le poème d'Ibn Abdoun par Ibn Badroun; Hoogvliet had previously published Prolegomena ad editionem celebratissimi Aben Abduni poematis in luctuosum Aḱtasisidarum interitum, Leiden 1839. The text of the poem itself is also given in al-Marrākushi's history, ed. Dozy, p. 53 sqq.; there is a French transl. by Fagnan and a Spanish by Pons Boigues (see Bibl.). Imād al-Dīn Ibn al-Aṭhīr [q. v.] also wrote a commentary on it.

Bibliography: The Arabic sources are detailed in Dozy's preface to his edition already

IBN ABĪ 'AMIR. [See AL-MANŠŪR.]

IBN ABĪ 'L-'AWDJA, 'ABD AL-KARIM, uncle on his mother's side of the celebrated Ma'n b. Ša'ida, a crypto-Manichaean, who was taken prisoner by Muḥammad b. Sulaimān governor of Kūfa and afterwards put to death in 155 (772) by him without the Caliph's authority, for which some sources say the governor was dismissed. When he was being led to death he is said to have boasted that he had invented 4000 traditions which were contradictory to the prescriptions and prohibitions of Muslim law. He is said, for example, to have invented in the name of Dja'far al-Šādiq [q. v.] a calculation of the commencement of the fast in the month of Ramaḍān, although the law is well known to lay it down that the exact moment for its commencement is not till the new moon has been seen. Among the Shī'is however the period of the new moon is fixed by calculation. Cf. Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., lxviii, 406.

IBN ABĪ DĪNAR, ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ABĪ 'L-KĀSİM AL-RU'AINĪ AL-KAIRAWĀNĪ, an Arab historian, wrote a history called al-Mūnis fī Akhbār Ifrikiya wa Tūnis in 1110 (1698) or according to a statement in a manuscript in 1092 (1681). As he mentions in the preface the work falls into eight divisions; the first contains the description of Tunis, the second of Ifrikiya, the third of the conquest of Ifrikiya by the Muslims, the fourth the history of the 'Ubaidis, the fifth that of the Šinhādja, the sixth that of the Banū Ḥafṣ, the seventh and eighth the history of Turkish rule. The final chapter discusses the latest events in Tunisia. The book was printed in Tunis in 1286 A. H. and translated into French by Pellissier and Rémusat, Paris 1845.

IBN ABĪ ḤADJALA, AḤMAD B. YAḤYĀ ABŪ 'L-'ABBĀS SHUHĀB AL-DĪN AL-TILIMSĀNĪ AL-ḤANBALĪ, an Arab poet, an imitator of 'Omar b. al-Fārid, born in 725 = 1325 in Tlemcen, settled in Cairo after making the pilgrimage and died of the plague as superior of the Šufi monastery founded by Mandjak, on the 20th Dhū 'l-Ḳa'da 776 = 2nd May 1375. Of his works that have survived (detailed in Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., ii. 13), the following are printed: 1. Dirwān al-Šabāba, a history of celebrated lovers with a selection of erotic poems, Cairo 1279, 1291, 1305 and on the margin of the Tarjīm al-Arwāḡ of Dā'ūd al-Anṭākī, Bulāḡ 1291, Cairo 1308. 2. Suk-kardān al-Sulṡān al-Malik al-Nāṣir, an anthology on the significance of the number 7 for Egypt, composed in 757 = 1356, Bulāḡ 1288.

IBN ABĪ RANDAQA AL-ṬURṬUŠĪ, ABŪ BEKR MUḤAMMAD B. AL-WALĪD B. MUḤAMMAD B. KHALAF B. SULAIMĀN B. AIYŪB AL-FIHRI, known by the names of al-Turṭuṣhī and Ibn Abī Randaqa (Ibn Farḡūn vocalises it Rundaqa), an Arab authority on law and tradition, born about 451 (1059-1060) at Tortosa, died in Šha'bān 520

(22th Aug.—19th Sept. 1126) or, according to another account, in Djumādā I 525 (April 1131) at the age of 75. After studying law and belles-lettres in his native town and afterwards in Saragossa with the Kaḏī Abu 'l-Walīd Sulaimān b. Khalaf al-Bāḏjī, he made the pilgrimage to Mecca in 476 (1083) and thereafter went to Baghdād, Baṣra, Damascus, and Jerusalem to teach as well as study. On his return he spent some time in Cairo and then settled in Alexandria as a teacher of law and Ḥadīth. He spent his whole life as a pious ascetic in contented poverty and self-denial. Among his teachers in the east we may specially mention Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. al-Husain al-Shāshī and Abū 'Alī Aḥmad b. 'Alī al-Tustarī. His most important pupils were Abū Bakr Ibn al-'Arabī, Abū 'Alī al-Ṣadafī, the Mahdī Ibn Tūmart and, in as much as he had obtained an idjāza from al-Turṭūshī, also the Kaḏī 'Iyād.

Of the twelve works ascribed to him by his biographers, only three are known to us. 1. Taḥrīm al-Istīmāʿ, a small treatise in which the illegality of onanism is demonstrated (Berlin, Ahlwardt, Verz., No. 4981); 2. A synopsis of al-Kaṣḥf wa 'l-Bayān 'an Tafsīr al-Kur'ān of Abū Ishāk Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Thaḥabī al-Nisābūrī (Cairo, Khed. Libr., Fihrr., i. 209); 3. Sirāḡ al-Mulūk, a kind of treatise on politics and government which contains a large collection of more or less interesting anecdotes in 64 chapters (cf. Th. Zachariae, Die Weisheitssprüche des Sānuq bei al-Turṭūshī, in Wien. Zeitschr. f. d. Kunde d. Morgenl., xxviii. 182 sqq.), completed on the 14 Raddjab 516 (19 Sept. 1122) at Fustāt and dedicated to the author's patron, the vizier al-Ma'mūn Abū Muḥammad b. al-Baṭā'ihī al-Umawī (printed, Būlāḡ, 1289, Cairo 1319).

(MOH. BEN CHENEb.)

IBN ABĪ 'L-RIDJĀL, whose full name was ABU 'L-ḤASAN 'ALĪ B. ABĪ 'L-RIDJĀL is the Arab astrologer often quoted in mediaeval Europe under the names ALBOHAZEN (also ALBOACEN) or ABENRAGEL. Whether he belonged to Spain (Cordova) or North Africa is uncertain; we only know that he spent a portion of his life at the court of the Zaid Mu'izz b. Bādīs b. al-Manṣūr (406—454 = 1016—1062) in Tunis. It is also probable that he is identical with the Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Maghribī, who attended the astronomical observations made in 378 (988) in Baghdād by order of the Būyid Sharaf al-Dawla under the supervision of the astronomer Abū Sahl Waḡḡan b. Rustam al-Kūhī. From a prophecy in his principal astrological work we may conclude that he cannot have died before c. 1040. This book is entitled al-Bārī fī Ahkām al-Nuḡdūm (the distinguished [book] on horoscopes from the constellations): it still exists in Arabic in various libraries (Brit. Mus., Ind. Off., Paris, Berlin, Escorial, etc.). It was translated by Jehuda b. Moses (1256) from Arabic into Spanish and soon afterwards from the latter language into Latin by Aegidius de Tebaldis and Petrus de Regio. The Latin translation was several times printed first of all in 1485 in Venice under the title: Præclarissimus liber completus in judiciis astrorum, quem edidit Albhazen Italy filius Abenragel, etc. He also wrote an Urḡūza on astrology on which Aḥmad b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Kunfūd al-Kustanīnī wrote a commentary in 1373 (Escorial, Brit. Museum, Oxford, Cairo).

IBN ABĪ 'L-RIDJĀL, AḤMAD B. ŠĀLIḤ, Arab historian, jurist and poet, belonging to the Shī'ī sect of the Zaidīs in Yemen, born in Shaḥbān 1029 (July 1620) at al-Shabaḡ, a place in the Bilād Dhurā in the district of al-Aḥnam, died in the night of Wednesday the 6th Rabī' I 1092 (25th—26th March 1681) aged 62 years and 7 months and was buried at al-Rōḍa (an hour's journey N. of Šan'a') near a house which belonged to him. He spent his whole life in Yemen. He studied the Kur'ān, tradition, and law at Shehāra, Šaḍa, Ta'izz, Ibb, al-Hardja and Šan'a' and studied under all the Zaidī, as well as the Šāfi'ī, Ḥanafī or Mālikī scholars, who lived in Yemen or travelled through it, notably the Mālikī Aḥmad b. Aḥmad al-Shābbī al-Kairawānī (died at Šan'a', where he was expounding the Taḡwīm of Euclid, on the 22nd Djumādā I 1064 = 10th April 1654). He finally settled in Šan'a' where the Imām al-Mutawakkil 'ala 'llāh Ismā'īl b. al-Manṣūr billāh al-Kāsim (died 1087 = 1677) granted him for the period of his reign (1055—1087 = 1645—1677) the offices of preacher in the mosque (Khaṭīb Šan'a') and secretary whose duty it was to compose official documents as well as the answers to the theological and legal questions laid before the Imām.

1. His chief work is a biographical dictionary, arranged in alphabetical order, entitled Maṭla' al-Budūr wa-Maḡma' al-Buḥūr, which contains about 1300 biographies of prominent members of the Zaidī sects of Irāk and Yemen, ranging from the sons and descendants of Zaid b. 'Alī (died 121 = 739) down to the author's own contemporaries. It was long thought to be lost and only known from the extracts given by al-Muḥibbī (Khulāṣat al-Aṭhar, i. 220; Wustenfeld, Geschichte, N^o. 583). It has only recently been discovered in its entirety in Milan (see Griffini, Lista dei manoscritti arabi nuovo fondo della Biblioteca Ambrosiana, in Riv. degli Studi Orient., iv. 1046—1048, N^o. 254—256 of the Lista; 18 of these biographies have been published by Griffini in his notes in an earlier essay, I Manoscritti Sudarabici di Milano in Riv. d. Stud. Or., ii. 1—38, 133—166; iii. 65—104). For his Maṭlaʿ al-Budūr the author used various biographical collections which only survive in fragments in Milan, Berlin, and London manuscripts, particularly the works of Aḥmad b. ʿAbd Allāh Ibn al-Wazīr (entitled Taʾrīkh ʿAl al-Wazīr), al-Aḥdal (al-Tuḥfa fi ʿUlamāʾ al-Zaidiyya), Ibn Fand (al-Lawāḥiḥ al-nadiyya), al-Ijākīm (al-ʿUyūn fi Ridjāl al-Zaidiyya), Yahyā b. al-Mahdī al-Ḥasanī (Ṣilat al-Ḥawān), the author of the Ṭabaqāt al-Zaidiyya, and others. But he was always careful to call attention to those points in which the authorities utilised did not agree among themselves or with the historical traditions surviving down to his time in Yemen. He had also a good knowledge of the geography and archaeology of those districts of South Arabia in which he had travelled and his dictionary therefore gives information concerning them, which is of importance even for the numismatics and Arab epigraphy of Yemen.

2. His gloss (Taʿlīq) on the Mushadḍajjar (genealogy of the Zaidī Imāms) of Ibn al-Djālāl likewise pertains to the history of the Zaidī sect (holograph of the author in Milan, Ambrosiana, Riv. d. St. Or., iii. 580). In his biography (Ambrosiana, n. f., B. 132; s. Riv. d. St. Or., iv. 1047-8) there are also mentioned 3. his Taisīr al-ʿIṭām bi-Tarājīm Aʾimmat al-Tafsīr al-ʿAṭām (biographies of Ḳurʾān commentators) as well as a genealogical study of his own family: Inbāʾ al-Abnāʾ bi-Tarīqa Salāfiḥim al-ḥusnā djāms li-Nasab ʿAl Abi ʿl-Ridjāl. Other works by him are 4. ʿIṭām al-Muwālī bi-Kalām Sādātihī al-ʿAṭām al-mawālī, a treatise on the evidences and authorities in support of the Imānate of ʿAlī. (Brit. Mus. Ms.; cf. Rieu, Suppl., N^o. 217, ii.); 5. Tafsīr al-Ṣharʿa li-Wurūd al-Sharʿa, a theological treatise in defence of the Zaidī doctrine (Brit. Mus. Ms.; cf. Rieu, Suppl., N^o. 217, i.). The same subject is discussed in 6. al-Riyāḍ al-nadiyya fi an al-Firka al-nāḍiyya hum al-Zaidiyya (Ambrosiana, n. f., B. 133, f^o. 3^a) and in 7. al-Mawāzīn, commentary on al-ʿAḳida al-ṣaḥīḥa, a treatise on the articles of the sect by the above-mentioned Imām al-Mutawakkil Ismāʿīl b. al-Manṣūr billāh al-Ḳāsim (Ambros., B. 133, 3^a); 8. Gloss (Hāshiya) on al-Azhār (essay on Zaidī Furūʿ); cf. Brockelmann, ii. 187) concluding with the chapter al-Wuḍʿ; 9. Madjālīs; 10. al-Wadīḥ al-awḍiḥ fi Ḥukm al-Rūḥ alladhī dāiṣ al-Zawḍja; 11. Madjās man arūda ʿl-Ḥaḳīqa; 12. al-Ḥadiyya ilā man nuḳhiba; 13. Bughyat al-Ṭalīb wa-Sūluḥ; 14. al-Djowāb al-shāfi ilā ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Damādī; 15. Tadhkirat al-Ḳulūb allatī fi ʿl-Sudūr fi Ḥayāt al-Adjām allatī ji ʿl-Ḳubūr; 16. a large number of Rasāʾil or treatises on different subjects. 17. His Diwān was collected by one of his brothers who gives us specimens of it in his biography of the author. In the latter besides a list of 47 scholars with whom Ibn Abi ʿl-Ridjāl kept up relations, we find the complete text of the Iḍjāzāt or diploma which granted the holder the right to teach als the sciences in which he had himself been instructed (see Ambrosiana, Nuovo Fondo, B. 132, f. 2^a—11^b, und Riv. d. St. Orient., iv. 1047 sq.).

IBN ABĪ ṬĀHIR ṬĀIFŪR, ABU ʿL-FAḌL AḤMAD, Arab man of letters and historian, born 204 (819) at Baghdād, died there in 280 (893), a descendant of an Irānian family from Ḳhurāsān (Marw al-Rūdḥ), which was among the devoted adherents (Abnāʾ al-Dawla) of the ʿAbbāsids, was first of all a teacher, then a private tutor in wealthy families and finally followed the trade of a copyist of manuscripts, for which he opened a shop in the Sūḳ al-Warrāḳin. A work by him on plagiarism (Kitāb Sariḳāt al-Shuʿaraʾ), now lost, made him several enemies who charged him with superficiality and the lack of a thorough knowledge of Arabic grammar. Al-Maʿsūdī (Murūḍ, vii. 333) thought highly of his poems, some of which he quotes, and al-Ḳhaṭīb al-Baghdādī praised his learning. His father's nickname Ṭāifūr, means a 'hopping little bird', if it is not to be derived from the Old Persian takaputhra, 'son of the crown'. Of his Taʾrīkh Baghdād only the sixth volume has survived in a unique manuscript in the British Museum, lithographed and translated into German by Dr. H. Keller (Leipzig 1908); it is the history of the city and the ʿAbbāsid state from 204 (819) to the death of the caliph al-Maʾmūn in 218 (833), and is one of the sources of the Annals of Ṭabarī. His Kitāb al-Manṭḥūr wa ʿl-Manẓūm is an anthology of poetry and rhetoric, of which the eleventh (Balāghat al-Nisāʾ wa-Tarāʾif Kalāmihinna etc., Cairo 1326) and twelfth parts (out of 13) are preserved in the Brit. Mus. His 45 other works are lost.

IBN ABĪ UṢAIBĪʿA, MUWAFFAḲ AL-DIN ABU ʿL-ʿABBĀS AḤMAD b. AL-ḲĀSIM AL-SAʿDĪ AL-ḲHAZRADJĪ, physician and biographer, born in Damascus in 600 (1203), studied medicine there and afterwards in Cairo at the al-Nāṣiri hospital. Among his teachers special mention may be made of the botanist Ibn al-Baitār [q. v.]. In 634 (1236) he received a position in a hospital in Cairo, which he exchanged in the following year for the office of physician to the Emir ʿIzz al-Dīn Aḳdemir in Ṣarkḥad. There he died in 668 (1270). Ibn Abi Uṣaibīʿa's chief work are his biographies of celebrated physicians and doctors, which he composed under the title ʿUyūn al-Anbāʾ fi Ṭabaqāt al-Aṭibbāʾ for the vizier Abu ʿl-Ḥasan b. Ghazzāl al-Sāmīrī, ed. A. Muller, Cairo 1299 (1882), Preface, Königsberg 1884.

IBN ABĪ ZAID AL-ḲAIRAWĀNĪ, ABU MUḤAMMAD ʿABD ALLĀH b. ABĪ ZAID ʿABD AL-RAḤMĀN, a Mālikī jurist, belonged to a family which came from Nafza whence the ethnic al-Nafzī, but he was born in 310 (922-3) at Kairawān, where he died on Monday 30th Shaʿbān 386 = 14 September 996 and was buried in his house.

He vigorously defended his school both in prose and verse and was perhaps the first who clearly expounded the principles of law. He was called Malik the younger and was and still is regarded as an authority. His teachers were numerous not only in Africa but also in the east on the occasion of his journey to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca. We may mention here his debt to Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. al-Labbād who is his best authority, Abū ʿI-Ḥasan Ḥasan b. Muḥammad al-Khawḷānī, Abū ʿI-ʿArab Muḥammad h. Aḥmad b. Tamīm, Muḥammad b. Musā al-Kaṭṭān, Ibn al-ʿArabi, and others; he received idjāza's from the most notable teachers of his time. Among his pupils are mentioned Abū ʿI-Ḥasim al-Barādīʿi, Ibn al-Faraḡī, etc. Of the thirty works mentioned by his biographers only the following survive: 1^o. al-Risāla, a compendium of Maliki law finished in 327 = 939, publ. several times in Cairo; ed. by A. D. Russell and Abdullah al-Maʿmūn Suhrawardī, First Steps in Muslim Jurisprudence consisting of excerpts from Bākūrat al-Saʿd of Abū Zayd, Arabic text, English transl., notes, and short histor. and biogr. introd., London 1906; Fagnan, La Risala de Kayrawani, French transl., Paris 1914; 2^o. A collection of traditions. Brit. Mus., Cat. Cod. MSS. Or., n^o. 888, viii.; 3^o. A poem in honour of the Prophet, Brit. Mus., Cat. n^o. 1617, xi.

IBN ABĪ ZARʿ, ABU ʿI-ḤASAN (var. ABU ʿABD ʿALLĀH (ALI) AL-FĀSĪ, historian of the Maghrib, author of two works, one entitled Zuhrat al-Bustān fī Akhbār al-Zamān, which seems lost, the other al-Anīs al-muṭrib bi-Rawḍ al-Kirtās fī Akhbār Mulūk al-Maghrib wa Taʾrīkh Madinat Fās. Nothing is known of the life of the author, who is also called Abū Muḥammad Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAbd al-Ḥalīm al-Ḡharnāṭī. His work, which begins with the Idrisid dynasty, is very important for the history of Morocco to 724 (1324), a date which cannot be much before the year of his death. He is some times quoted by Ibn Khaldūn. He made use, often without naming them, of a certain number of authorities and it seems, at least under the Marinids, of official documents also. His book forms the basis of a work (or was rewritten) by Muḥammad b. Kāsim b. Zakār (died 20 Muḥarram 1120 = 11 April 1708), entitled al-Muṭrib al-mubaiyin ʿammā taḍammānahu ʿI-Anīs al-muṭrib wa Rawḍat al-Nasrīn (al-ʿAlamī, al-Anīs al-muṭrib, Fās 1313, p. 28). It was published for the first time by Tornberg, Annales regum Mauritaniae, with Latin translation and notes, Upsala, 2. v., 1843—1846, and lithographed at Fās 1303 A. H. It was translated in a very unsatisfactory fashion into German by Dombay, Geschichte der mauritanischen Könige, Agram, 1794—7; into Portuguese by Moura, Historia dos soberanos moha- metanos, Lisbon, 1824; into French by Beaumier, Roudh al-Kartas, Histoire des souverains du Maghreb, Paris, 1860. A fragment of the text is given in the Crestomatia arabigo-española of Simonet and Lerchundi, Grenade, 1881. N^o. 63. A new edition, with French translation, is in preparation.

IBN ʿADHĀRĪ. [See IBN AL-ʿIDHĀRĪ.]

IBN AL-ʿADĪM. [See KAMĀL AL-DĪN.]

IBN ʿADJARRAD, (ABU AL-KARĪM, a Khāridjī sectarian, after whom his adherents are called ʿAdjārida. We possess no data for his biography; from al-Shahrastānī's account it can only be deduced that he was one of the followers of ʿAṭiya b. al-Aswad al-Ḥanafi. This ʿAṭiya however was at first a follower of Naḍjda b. ʿAmir [q. v.] but afterwards separated from him and became chief of the Khāridjīs of Sidjīstān, Khorāsān, Kirmān and Kūhistān. His date is thus the first half of the viiith century and although he, like ʿAṭiya, had separated himself politically from Naḍjda, both belonged, from the point of view of the historian of religions, to that section of the Khāridjīs who are called Naḍjadīt after Naḍjda or Naḍjdīya after the district in which he appeared, i. e. to those who occupy a position midway between the rigid Azrakīs and the milder Ibādīya. According to al-Baghdādī, the ʿAdjārida were divided into 10 minor divisions; the Khāzimiya, the Shuʿaibīya, the Maimūniya, the Khālafiya, the Maʿlūmiya, the Maḍjhaliya, the Ṣaltiya, the Ḥamziya, and the Thaʿaliba who are again divided into 6 sections. The tenth not mentioned by him is probably the Aṭrāfiya mentioned by al-Shahrastānī. Among these the Ḥamziya may be particularly mentioned on account of the part which their chief, Ḥamza b. Atrak, played in politics for many years, till he finally died of wounds in the reign of al-Maʿmūn. Ṭabari only briefly mentions him but al-Baghdādī gives many details of him.

Bibliography: al-Shahrastānī, ed. Cureton, p. 92, 95 sqq.; al-Baghdādī, al-Farq, p. 72 sqq.

IBN ʿADJURRŪM, ABU ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. DĀWŪD AL-ṢANHĀDJĪ, known as IBN ʿADJURRŪM, a Berber word which means, according to the commentators, religious man and ṣūfi (ascetic, Shilḥa: agurram). His grandfather Dāwūd is said to have been the first to bear this name. His relatives belonged to the neighbourhood of the little town of Ṣafrū but he was born at Fās in 672 (1273-4) and died there on Sunday 20th Ṣafar 723 (1st March 1323). He was buried the next day within the town in the Andalusian quarter near the Bāb al-Djizyin (wrongly Bāb al-Ḥadid) which now bears the name Bāb al-Ḥamrāʿ (it is now closed) to the right of the Bāb al-Futūḥ.

After studying in Fās he performed the pilgrimage to Mecca and, while passing through Cairo, studied under the celebrated Andalusian grammarian Abū Ḥaiyān Muḥammad b. Yūsuf of Granada (died at Cairo in 745 = 1345) who gave him an idjāza. He is said to have composed his Muḥaddima with his face turned toward the Ka'ba during his stay in the sacred city. According to his contemporaries, he was lawyer, man of letters, mathematician, and above all grammarian. He further possessed an extensive knowledge of the science of the orthography and recitation of the Qur'ān. He taught grammar and the Qur'ān in the mosque of the Andalusian quarter in Fās. He seems to have written a commentary on the didactic poem by al-Shāḥibī [q. v.] on the recitation of the Qur'ān and, according to the Tadhkira of Tādj al-Dīn b. Maktūm, several other works and numerous urdu'za on the variant readings and the recitation of the Qur'ān. The work which has come down to us and rendered him famous is al-Muḥaddima al-ʿĀdjurrūmiya fī Maḥādī ʿIlm al-ʿArabiya. Owing to its brevity, which is the cause of the favour in which it was and is still held even at the present day from the Atlantic to the Euphrates, this work, which is a synopsis, erring on the side of succinctness, of the Ḍumāl of Abu 'l-Kāsim 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Ishāq al-Zādīdjādī, has become the basis of grammatical studies. On account of its conciseness, often at the sacrifice of clearness, it is easily learned by heart in the schools, although it is not very useful to beginners who require more lucidity in the exposition of principles. In any case the grammar contains in a concise form information on the declension of nouns and conjugation of verbs and use of the cases. The ʿĀdjurrūmiya has been published in a number of European editions of which the most important are:

IBN AL-AḤMAR. [See MUHAMMAD B. YŪSUF.] | finally succeeded in driving out the undisciplined

(the modern citadel of the town) for his operations against Tripolis. Ibn ‘Ammār succeeded in defending himself for some years. Raymond died in 498, but his successor drew an even stronger ring round the town. In 501 ‘Ammār decided to seek the help of the Saldjūk Sultān Muḥammad in Baghdād and left Tripolis. His absence had disastrous results [see TRIPOLIS]. The inhabitants handed over the town to the Fātimid caliph. The latter seized ‘Ammār’s treasures, his followers and his family. Tripolis was thus deprived by him of its resources and its best defenders. ‘Ammār, who had not been able to persuade the Sultān to send an expedition to his help, did not return to Tripolis. He occupied Djabala for a time with the help of the troops of the Atābeg Toghtegin of Damascus. In 502 Tripolis and Djabala fell into the hands of the Franks. ‘Ammār remained for a time at Toghtegin’s court and was granted al-Zabadāni (in the valley of the Barādā) in fief by the latter. He then went to the court of Mas‘ūd, prince of Mōṣul, and remained his vizier till 512.

He was later in the service of the ‘Abbāsīd caliph (Ibn al-Athīr, ed. Tornberg, x. 365, 399). The family of ‘Ammār seems to have come to Egypt from the Maghrib with the Fātimid caliphs; al-Ḥasan b. ‘Ammār, the chief of the Kitāma, is mentioned towards the close of the 14th century A. H. as a high official in Egypt. A member of the family, kādī of Alexandria, was executed as a traitor in 487. The name of the Banī ‘Ammār is associated with the zenith of Tripolis’ prosperity. As Aleppo under the Ḥamdānīd Saif al-Dawla was a centre of poetry so Tripolis under the kādī al-Ḥasan b. ‘Ammār was a celebrated seat of learning. To the kādī Fakhr al-Mulk ‘Ammār fell the difficult task of defending Tripolis against the attacks of the Crusaders, but he could not hold out permanently on account of the discord among the Muslim chiefs.

IBN ‘AMMĀR, ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD, an Arab poet of Spain, of obscure origin but a cultivated man, lived in the 7th (xth) century and at first led a wandering life, singing the praises of any one who cared to reward him. He met the governor al-Mu‘tamīd, son of al-Mu‘taḍid, Emīr of Seville, in Silves. This young prince took a liking to the wandering poet and made him his favourite. The latter, as ambitious and talented as he was poor, knew how to flatter his patron’s wishes, took part in his amusements and abetted him in them. When scandalous rumours of their doings reached the Emīr of Seville’s ears, Ibn ‘Ammār was banished. Al-Mu‘tamīd did not forget him, however, and after al-Mu‘taḍid’s death, as heir to the throne he recalled Ibn ‘Ammār from exile and gave him an office as minister.

The poet’s ambition filled him with jealousy of his colleague at al-Mu‘tamīd’s court, the vizier and poet Ibn Zaidūn. After the capture of Cordova, to which al-Mu‘tamīd migrated with his whole court, Ibn ‘Ammār, by all sorts of intrigues and with the help of the chief of the body guard Ibn Martín, succeeded in having Ibn Zaidūn sent back to Seville. Ibn ‘Ammār now thought himself sufficiently free from observation and secure from punishment to devise a plot against his master. Entrusted with the conquest of Murcia, he took the town with the help of al-Mu‘tamīd’s troops and declared himself an independent emīr, but was soon driven from Murcia by Ibn Rashīk. He took refuge in a fortress, the commander of which, Ibn Mubārak, took him prisoner and sold him to the Emīr of Seville. When brought before the latter he might have won his favour again, had not his enemies, among whom was also a son of Ibn Zaidūn, denounced him as the instigator of a conspiracy. Aroused by this new treachery of his favourite, al-Mu‘tamīd cut off his head (479 = 1086).

Ibn ‘Ammār’s poems, which show the greatest originality and technical skill, do not appear to have been collected in a Diwān but there are copious extracts in al-Marrākushī, The Hist. of the Almohades, p. 77 sqq.; al-Makkarī, Analectes; Ibn Khakān, Ḳalā'id al-Ikhyān, p. 83—99; Ibn Bassām (Ms. 3322 of the Bibl. Nat. Paris) and in ‘Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣfahānī (Ms. 3330 of Bibl. Nat. in Paris). (A. COUR.)

IBN AL-ANBĀRĪ, s. AL-ANBĀRĪ, i. 349b. The work mentioned there was completely edited by G. Weil in 1913, Die grammatischen Streitfragen der Basrer und Kufer.

IBN (AL-)‘ARABĪ, ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. ‘ALĪ, MUḤYI ‘L-DĪN, AL-ḤATIMĪ AL-ṬĀ‘Ī (as a descendant of Ḥatīm al-Ṭā‘ī [q. v.]) AL-ANDALUSĪ, a celebrated mystic of pantheistic doctrine, styled by his followers al-Shaikh al-Akbar; in Spain he was also called Ibn Surāḳa but in the East generally Ibn ‘Arabī, without the article, to distinguish him from the Kādī Abū Bakr Ibn al-‘Arabī [see next art.]. He was born 17th Ramaḍān 560 (28th July 1165) at Murcia. In 568 (1172-3) he removed to Seville while he made his home for nearly thirty years. There and also at Ceuta he studied Ḥadīth and Fīkh. He had visited Tunis in 590 (1194), and in 598 (1201-2) he set out for the East, from which he did not return. In the same year (598) he reached Mecca: in 601 he spent twelve days in Baghdād, to which he returned in 608 (1211-2), and he was back in Mecca in 611 (1214-5). Here he stayed for some months, but the beginning of the following year finds him in Aleppo. He visited also Mōṣul and Asia Minor. His fame went with him everywhere and he was the recipient of pensions from persons of means, which he bestowed in charity. When in Asia Minor he received from the Christian governor the gift of a house, but he presented it to a beggar. Finally he settled in Damascus and died there in Rabī‘ II 638 (Oct. 1240); he was buried at the foot of Djabal Kāsiyūn, where his two sons were later buried.

As to ritual, Ibn ‘Arabī belonged nominally to the Zāhiri school of his compatriot Ibn Ḥazm (q. v., cf. Goldziher, Die Zāhiriten, p. 185 sq.), but he rejected taqlīd (recognition of authority in doctrinal matters) and in matters of belief he passed for a bāṭinī (esoteric). Although conforming to the practice of the Muslim faith and professing its beliefs, Ibn ‘Arabī’s sole guide was the inner light with which he believed himself illumined in a special way. He held that all Being is essentially one, as it all is a manifestation of the divine substance. The different religions were thus to his opinion equivalent. He believed that he had seen the beatified Muḥammad, that he knew the Greatest Name of Allāh, and that he had acquired a knowledge of alchemy, not by his own labour, but by revelation. He was denounced as a Zindīq.

and in Egypt there was a movement to assassinate him.

His principal work, al-Futūḥāt al-Makkīya, which was later epitomised by al-Shaʿrānī (d. 973), gives a complete system of mystic knowledge, in 560 chapters, of which chapter 559 contains a summary of the whole. His contemporary Ibn al-Fārid (d. 632), being asked by Ibn ʿArabī for a commentary on his Tāʾīya, replied that the best commentary was his own Futūḥāt. This work was printed in Būlāk in 1274, Cairo 1329. Next to the Futūḥāt comes the Fuṣūṣ al-Ḥikam, begun in Damascus in the beginning of 627 (end of 1229), printed with Turkish commentary, Būlāk 1252, and lithographed with the commentary of ʿAbd al-Razzāq al-Kāshānī, Cairo, 1309, 1321.

In 598 (1201-2), on his arrival at Mecca, Ibn ʿArabī had made the acquaintance of a learned lady of that town, and, on his return thither in 611 (1214-5), he wrote a small collection of love-poems celebrating her learning and loveliness and their mutual friendship, but in the following year he found it advisable to write a commentary on these, explaining them in a mystical sense. These poems with an English translation of both poems and commentary have been published by R. A. Nicholson (The Tarjuman al-Ashwāq, a Collection of Mystical Odes, Or. Transl. Fund, New Ser., vol. xx. (London 1911). This is the only one of Ibn ʿArabī's numerous works which has appeared in a European edition with the exception of a small glossary of Sūfī terms appended to the Taʿrīfāt of Djurdjānī edited by Flugel in 1845, and a short treatise, ascribed to him in a Glasgow MS., called the Kitāb al-Adjwiba, of which an English translation appeared in the Journal Roy. As. Soc. for 1901.

Other of his works which have been printed are: Muḥāḍarat al-Abrār, on literary and historical topics (Cairo 1282, 1305), a Diwān of religious poetry (Būlāk 1271, Bombay 1890); a commentary on the Kurʿān, Būlāk 1283, Cairo 1317; Kit. al-Aḥlāk Cairo s. a. (= Muḥāsini Aḥlāk), Turkish transl. of Aḥm. Muḥītār, Stambul 1314; Amr Muḥkam, with Turk. transl., Stambul 1315; Tuḥfat al-Safara al-Ḥaḍrat al-Barara, Constantinople 1300, Turk. transl., Stambul 1303; Madjmaʿ al-Rasāʾil al-Ilāhiya, Cairo 1325; Mawāḳif al-Nudjūm wa-Maʿālī Ahillat al-Asrār wa-l-ʿUlūm, Cairo 1325.

Altogether some 150 of his writings are known to exist, and this is said to be only half of what he actually composed.

Various theologians took exception to the contents of his writings and charged him with heretical doctrines such as ḥulūl [q. v.] and ittihād [q. v.] Still he found many followers and zealous defenders. Whilst Ibn Taimīya, al-Taftazānī and Ibrāhīm b. ʿUmar al-Biḡāʾī denounced him as a heretic, amongst his defenders were found ʿAbd al-Razzāq al-Kāshānī [q. v.], al-Firūzābādī (cf. H. al-Zaiyāt Khaṣāṣ al-Kutub fī Dimashk, etc., p. 50, n^o. 20, 2) and al-Suyūṭī).

IBN AL-ʿARABĪ, ABU BAKR MUḤAMMAD b. ʿABD ALLĀH, a Spanish traditionalist, born at Seville 468 (1076), travelled in the east while still a boy with his father and studied under the most famous jurists of the day in Syria, Baghdad, Mecca and Egypt, for example, al-Turṭuṣhī and al-Ḥazālī [q. v.]. When his father died in 493 (1099) at Alexandria, he returned to Seville and there filled the office of chief Qāḍī. He was afterwards forced to migrate to Fās and continued his studies there till his death in 543 (1148). He is said to have composed over 40 different works, which are however for the most part lost. The titles of several are given in the works mentioned below.

IBN ʿARABSHĀH, AḤMAD b. MUḤAMMAD b. ʿABD ALLĀH b. IBRĀHĪM SHIHĀB AL-DĪN ABU ʿL-ʿABBĀS AL-DIMASHQĪ AL-ḤANAFĪ AL-ʿADJAMĪ, born in 791 = 1392 in Damascus, was taken with his family to Samarkand in 803, when Timūr conquered Damascus and carried off many of its inhabitants (cf. Vita Timuri, ed. Manger, Leovardiae, 1767—1772, ii. 143 sqq.); there he studied with al-Djurdjānī, al-Djazārī and others, and learned Persian, Turkish, and Mongol. In 811 he went to Khātā in Mongolia where he studied Ḥadīth with al-Shirāmī, later to Khwāizm and Dasht (in Serāi and Ḥādjdjī Tarkhān), where he still was in 814 (Vita Timuri, i. 376). He came through the Crimea to Adrianople, where he became a confidant of Muḥammad I b. Bāyazid. He translated several books for him into Turkish (al-ʿAwfī, Djāmī Hikūyāt wa-Lāmīʿ al-Rivāyāt, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii. 510; Abu ʿl-Laiṭh, Tafsīr, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii. 352, Dinawarī, Taʾbir, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii. 312) and conducted the Sulṭān's correspondence in Arabic, Turkish, Persian, and Mongol. In 824 he went to Ḥalab, in 825 to Damascus, where he studied Ḥadīth with his friend Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad al-Bukhārī (cf. Vita Timuri, i. 32). In 832 he performed the Ḥādjdj, in 840 he migrated to Cairo and was there on friendly terms with Abū ʿl-Maḥāsīn al-Taḡhrībī amongst others. He died in 854. His chief work is the ʿAdjāib al-Maḥdūr fī Nawāʾib Timūr (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii. 122 sq.; editions in Brockelmann, besides Calcutta 1818; transl. into Turkish by al-Murtadā Nazmī Zādc al-Baghḍādī 1110 = 1698, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, iv. 190; vi. 544), in which Timūr's conquests and the conditions under his successor are described. Timūr is represented as a cruel profligate and tyrant, but towards the end

(ed. Manger, iii. 781 sqq.) his great qualities are appreciated. The book contains valuable descriptions of Samarkand and its learned world (iii. 855 sqq.). His Fākihāt al-Khulafā' wa-Mufākūhāt al-Zurafā' in ten chapters, written in the month of Safar 852 (Hādjdjī Khalifa, iv. 345) contains a mirror for princes and beast-fables, according to Hādjdjī Khalifa "like Kalila and Dimna and Sulwān al-Mutā'" (see Chauvin, Bibliographie, ii. n^o. 140—144), but, as Chauvin has shown (op. cit., ii. 145—149), is actually a version of the Persian Marzbān-Namāh in the recension of Sa'd of Warāwīn (cf. Houtsma in Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., lii. 350 sqq.; a selection in Freytag, Locmani Fabulae, p. 72 sqq.; complete edition see below). The introductory portion of an edition of his al-Ta'lif al-fāhīr fī Shiyam Abī Sa'īd Djaḡmaḡ was published as a posthumous work of S. A. Strong in the Journ. Roy. As. Soc., 1907, p. 395 sqq. 10 works are mentioned under his name, among them a work on Arabic, Persian, and Turkish, Tardjumān al-Murtadjim (Hādjdjī Khalifa, ii. 278). See also Hādjdjī Khalifa, iii. 158; iv. 190, 232, 270, 311; v. 479, and Freytag's work mentioned below.

Of his sons the following were authors: 1^o. AL-HASAN, wrote Idāḡh al-ḡulm wa-Bayān al-'Udwān fī Ta'rīkh al-Nābulusī al-Khārīdī al-Khawwān, in rhymed prose, on al-Nābulusī and his tyrannical proceedings against Damascus. See Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., ii. 30.

2^o. TĀLJ AL-DĪN 'ABD AL-WAHHĀB, born 813 = 1411 in Hādjdjī Tarkhān, died 901 = 1495, wrote a commentary on Abū Laith's Muḡaddima and various other works of little importance. See Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., ii. 19 sq.

IBN 'ASĀKIR, the name of several Arab authors, of whom the following are the best known.

1. The historian of Damascus, 'ALĪ B. AL-HASAN B. HIBAT ALLĀH ABU 'L-KĀSIM THIKAT AL-DĪN AL-SHĀFĪ, born in Muḡarram 499 = Sept. 1105 in Damascus, studied in Baghdad and the principal cities of Persia, became professor at the Madrasa al-Nūriya in his native city and died on the 11th Radjāb = 25th January 1176. In his principal work, the Ta'rīkh Madīnat Dimashq, he collected, after the fashion of the Ta'rīkh Baghdad of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, the biographies of all the men who had ever been connected with Damascus. Of the 80 volumes of the original, of which Vols. 1 and 2 were printed in Damascus 1329-1330, only odd ones have survived; in addition to those given in Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., I, 331, there are others in Strassburg (s. Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., xl. 310), Stambul (Dāmād Ibrāhīm Pāshā, N^o. 872—882, 'Atif Efendi, N^o. 1812—1819), Cairo (s. Fihrist al-Kutub al-maḡfūza bil-Kutubkhāna al-Khedīwiya, v. 25), Damascus (s. Ḥabīb al-Zaiyāt, Khasā'in al-Kutub fī Dimashq, p. 75 sq., cf. Horowitz in Mitt. d. Sem. f. or. Spr., x. 50 sq.), in Tunis, Zaitūna (Houdas-Basset, N^o. 65); cf. also the extract by Ismā'īl b. Muḡammad Djarrah al-'Adjlūnī (died 1162 = 1749) in Tübingen (s. Seybold, Verzeichnis, N^o. 6; cf. Sauvaire, Histoire de Damas in the Journ. As., 1894—1896). In addition to his other works mentioned by Brockelmann, loc. cit., we may now mention al-Mi'yan, notices of celebrated men, particularly Shāfī's, with an appendix, Kitāb al-Wahm, by Muḡammad b. 'Abd al-Wahid al-Muḡaddasi, died 643 (1245) in the Brit. Mus., Or. 7735 (s. Descriptive List of the Arab. Mss. acquired by the Trustees since 1894, London 1912, p. 35), as well as a fragments of his Amālī in Damascus, al-Zaiyāt, op. cit., p. 29, N^o. 5).

2. His son AL-KĀSIM, born 527 = 1132, died 600 = 1203, wrote in addition to other works al-Djāmi' al-mustakṡū fī Faḡā'il al-Masūdīd al-Aḡṡā, one of the two main sources of the Bā'iḡh al-Nuṡūf of Ibn al-Firkāh; cf. al-Subkī, Ṭabaḡāt al-Shāfī'iya, v. 148. (C. BROCKELMANN.)

IBN 'ĀSIM, ABŪ BAKR MUḡAMMAD B. MUḡAMMAD B. MUḡAMMAD B. MUḡAMMAD B. 'ĀSIM, a Mālikī jurist, author, and grammarian, born on the 12th Djumādā I 760 (11th April 1359) at Granada, where he died on the 11th Shawwāl 829 (15th Aug. 1426).

During his studies he continued to follow the trade of a bookbinder and latter filled the delicate duties of chief kaḡdī of Granada. His teachers were Abū Sa'īd Farādj b. Kāsim b. Aḡmad b. Lubb al-Tha'labī, chief muftī of Granada, the author Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḡammad b. Muḡammad b. 'Alī al-Ka'idjāṭī, the celebrated champion of the Sunna Abū Isḡāḡ Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. Muḡammad al-Shāṭibī, 'Abd Allāh b. al-Imām al-Sharīf of Tlemcen, etc. Of the ten works ascribed to him by his biographers we know only two: 1. Tuḡfāt al-Hukkām fī Nukat al-'Uḡūd wa 'l-Aḡḡām or briefly al-'Āsimiya, a sketch of Mālikī law in 1698 Radjāz-verses (printed Algiers 1322, 1327 and Fās; publ. in Cairo publ. in the Madjmu' al-Mutūn; with French transl. by Houdas and Martel, Traité de droit musulman, La Tuḡfat d'Ebn Acem, texte arabe avec trad. fr., comment., iurid., et notes philolog., Algiers 1882—3); 2. Ḥadā'ik al-Azḡhīr fī Mustahṡan al-Adjwiba wa 'l-Muḡḡhikāt wa 'l-Hikam wa 'l-Amḡḡāl wa 'l-Iḡkāyāt wa 'l-Nawādir, a collection of more or less interesting anecdotes, popular proverbs, answers to which there is no reply, etc., divided into 6 Ḥadiḡa (garden) of which each includes one, two or three chapters (printed in Fās n. d.; this edition should be compared with the Paris MS. Bibl. Nat., Catal., N^o. 3528 and the Brit. Mus. MS., Rieu, Suppl., N^o. 1145, i.).

IBN 'ASKAR, MUḡAMMAD B. 'ALĪ B. 'OMAR B. HUSAIN B. MIṡBĀḡ, was born at al-Hibṡ in the district of Kaṡr al-Saḡhīr in north Morocco. He is known to fame as the author of the Dawḡat al-Nāḡhīr li-Maḡḡasin man kāna min al-Maḡḡrib min Ahl al-Ḳarn al-ʿaṣīr, a collection of biographies of learned men and saints whom he had known personally or at second hand, composed about the year 1575. The Ḥasani Sharif 'Abd Allāh al-Ghālīb was, contrary to custom, succeeded by his son Muḥammad in 1573. War broke out between Muḥammad and his uncle 'Abd al-Malik. Ibn 'Askar threw in his lot with the former and was slain at the battle of Wādī 'l-Makhāzin close to Kaṣr al-Kabīr, in which Muḥammad along with Dom Sebastian of Portugal perished, 'Abd al-Malik dying at the commencement of the battle (August 1578: Wafrānī, Nuḣat al-Ḥādī, ed. Houdas, p. 73 sqq.). The Dawḥa is continued by al-Wafrānī, Ṣafwat man intaṣhar min Akhbār Ṣulḥā' al-Ḳarn al-ḥādī ʿaṣar, Fās n. d. Cf. also Nashr al-Mathānī of Muḥammad b. al-Taiyib. The Dawḥa has been lithographed at Fās, in 1891, Nashr al-Mathānī in 1892.

IBN AL-ʿASSĀL. During the first half of the xiith century A. D. there took place among the Copts a pronounced religious and intellectual renaissance, assuming, by the necessity of the case, an Arabic form. In it three brothers, known as the Aḥlād al-ʿAssāl, were prominent. Al-ʿAssāl, the father, to judge from the titles given to him in the MSS., was of high rank and good family, and there is mention also of a dār, or great house, in Cairo as belonging to an Ibn al-ʿAssāl. Unfortunately this name is given in the MSS. to all the three brothers, and the resultant confusion was first fairly disentangled by Rieu (Suppl. to Cat. of Arab. MSS. in Brit. Mus., p. 18) and Alexis Mallon (Journ. as., Nov.-Dec. 1905, p. 509 sqq.). Yet much remains uncertain. Of them al-ʿAssād Abū 'l-Faraj Hibat-Allāh was the philologist and exegete. He wrote in Arabic a Coptic grammar (Mallon, Une École de Savants égyptiens au Moyen Âge in the Beyrouth Mélanges, i. 122 sqq.); edited an eclectic Arabic version of the Gospels, in which he calls himself al-kātib al-Miṣrī (Guidi, Le traduzioni degli Evangelii in arabo e in etiopico; D. B. Macdonald, Ibn al-ʿAssāl's Arabic version of the Gospels in Homenaje á Codera, p. 375 sqq. — gives text and translation of introduction); also wrote an introduction to the Epistles of Paul (de Goeje in Cat. Cod. orient. (Leiden), v. p. 83). Al-Ṣafī Abū 'l-Faḍāl was a canonist and controversialist. Besides several theological tractates he compiled an abbreviated collection of the canons formulated at the Coptic synod held in Cairo in A. D. 1239 at the church of the Ḥārat Zuwēla (Renaudot, Hist. Patr. Alex., p. 585 sq. The third brother, Abū Ishāq, was apparently younger. He speaks of his two brothers as already famous, and in one place adds to their names a formula (raḥimahumā 'llāh) implying that they were dead. He himself apparently held some official position, for he is called al-Mu'taman, also Mu'taman al-dawla and al-dīn al-maṣīhī. His most important work was a Sullam, a Coptic-Arabic vocabulary, embracing the words used in the liturgical books, arranged in the alphabetic order of their rhymes. This vocabulary was published in 1643 by Kircher in his Lingua aegyptiaca restituta, pp. 273-493, and the introduction has been given in text and translation by Mallon in his École des Savants egyptiens in the Beyrouth Mélanges, ii. 214 sqq. A general collection of canons of the Church "from those of the Apostles to those of the Emperors" is assigned to him by Rieu on the authority of Brit. Mus. MS. Or. 1331; it was completed in A. D. 1238. In 1895 Arabic sermons (khutab) ascribed to him in some MSS. were published by Gommos Michā'il and in 1906 some theological tractates, from the Uṣūl al-Dīn, which are also ascribed to him in some MSS., by Louis Chcikho in his Seize traités théologiques (p. 110 sqq.). There they are assigned to Abū 'l-Faraj, just as Gommos gives the sermons to al-Ṣafī. Besides this uncertainty we have almost no precise dates for the lives of the brothers. The Khutab published by Gommos are ascertained to be from an autograph MS. dated 1214, which is against their being by the youngest of the brothers.

Bibliography is given above. The most important references are to Alexis Mallon.

IBN AṬĀ' ALLĀH, AHMAD B. MUḤAMMAD ABU 'L-FADL TĀDĪ AL-DĪN AL-ISKANDARĪ AL-ṢHĀḤĪLĪ, an Arab mystic and one of the most vigorous opponents of Ibn Taimiya [q. v.], died on the 16 Djumādā II 709 = 21 Nov. 1309 in the Madrasa al-Manṣūriya in Cairo. Of his works detailed by Brockelmann, Gesch. d. ar. Litt., II, 117-118, there have been printed 1) al-Ḥikam al-ʿAṭā'iya with the commentary of Muḥammad b. Ibrahim b. 'Abbād al-Naṣī al-Rondī, died 796 = 1394, Būlāk 1285, Cairo 1303, 1306 (with the commentary of 'Abd Allāh al-Sharkāwī on the margins). On it there is a Turkish commentary al-Muḥkam fī Sharḥ al-Ḥikam by Māhīr Kaṣtamunilī Ḥāfīz Ahmed, Stambul 1323; an anonymous Malay commentary printed in Mecca (1302), is mentioned by Snouck Hurgronje, Mekka, ii. 387, 7. 2) Tādī al-ʿArūs wa Ḳam' al-Nuṣūs (or al-Ḥawā li Tahdīb al-Nuṣūs), Cairo 1275, 1282, 1305, 1327. 3) Laṭā'if al-Minan fī Manāḳib al-Shaikh Abi 'l-ʿAbbās wa-Shaikhīhi Abi 'l-Ḥasan, biographies of the Ṣūfīs Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad al-Mursī (died 686 = 1287) and his teacher Taḳī al-Dīn 'Alī b. 'Abd Allāh al-Shādhilī (died 656 = 1258), Tunis 1304, lith. Cairo 1277, along with Miftāḥ al-Falāḥ wa Miṣbāḥ al-Arwāḥ, on the margin of the Laṭā'if al-Minan of al-Sha'rānī, Cairo 1321.

IBN A'THAM AL-KUFĪ, MUḤAMMAD B. 'ALĪ, Arab historian, of whom we only know that he died about 314 = 926 (s. Frāhn, Indications bibliographiques, p. 16), whom Wüstenfeld (Geschichtsschr., No. 541) erroneously places in the year 1003 A. H. He wrote from the Shī'ī point of view a romantic history of the early caliphs and their conquests, Pertsch, Verzeichnis der arab. Hds. der Herzogl. Bibl. zu Gotha, No. 1592, which Muḥammad b. Muḥammad Mustawfī al-Harawī translated into Persian in 596 = 1199, s. Rieu, Catalogue of the Persian Mss. in the British Museum, i. 150 (where other Mss. are detailed), from which is taken The History of the Conquest of Zoor and The Flight and Murder of Yesdegherd-Transl. from the Persian of Ahmed ibn Asem of Cufa, by B. Gerrans, in Ouseley's Oriental Collections, i.

63, 161 sqq. (Pers. text in Wilken's Pers. Christomathie, p. 152, I., Germ. transl. in Asiat. Museum, ii. 161) and The Invasion of Nubia and Historical Anecdote, transl. by W. Ouseley, in Oriental Collections, i. 333, ii. 58.

(C. BROCKELMANN.)

IBN AL-ATHĪR. This name was born by three brothers, natives of Dījazīra Ibn 'Omar [q. v.] who are among the most celebrated and important Arab scholars and authors.

1. The oldest brother was I. MAJDĪD AL-DĪN ABŪ 'L-ŠA'ADĀT AL-MUBĒRAK B. MUḤAMMAD, born in 544 (1149), died at Mōsul in 606 (1310) cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, xii. 190. He devoted himself mainly to the study of the Kūrān, tradition and Arabic grammar. The titles of the works composed by him are given by Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, ed. Wüstenfeld, N^o. 524, Yākut, Irshād, ed. Margoliouth, vi. 238 sqq., and by Brockelmann, Gesch., i. 357. As to the events of his life, he studied grammar with Ibn al-Dahhān at Mōsul, and Ḥadīth at Baghdād, then entered the service of the Emīr Kaīmāz, who acted as regent for a considerable period in the reign of Saif al-Dīn Ghāzī, and was chief of the chancellery under Ghāzī's successors Mas'ūd b. Mawdūd [q. v.] and Nūr al-Dīn Arslān Shāh [q. v.], although, as his brother tells us, he was reluctant to assume this high office, and only did so at the wish of Nūr al-Dīn. He became lame as the result of an illness and is said to have composed most, if not all as Ibn Khallikān tells, of his works after this misfortune. He made his house a ribāṭ for Sūfis.

2. The second brother, 'IZZ AL-DĪN ABŪ 'L-ḤASAN 'ALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD, born 555 (1160) at Dījazīra, died at Mōsul in 630 (1234) is the author of the famous history, al-Kāmil fī 'l-Ta'rīkh, often quoted here. He also wrote the history of the Atābegs of Mōsul (ed. in the Recueil des Historiens arabes des Croisades, vol. ii.), an alphabetical dictionary of the contemporaries of Muḥammad entitled Usd al-Ghāba fī Ma'rifat al-Shāba, ed. Cairo, 1280, and a synopsis of the Kutub al-Ansāb of al-Sam'āni [q. v.] entitled al-Lubāb, which was still further epitomised by al-Suyūfī under the title Lubb al-Lubāb (ed. Veth, Lugd. Bat. 1840). The most important of these works, the chronicle, ends with the year 628 and is a compilation of the greatest value. On the first part of it cf. Brockelmann, Das Verhältnis von Ibn-el-Athīr's Kāmil fī ta'rīkh zu Ṭabarī's Aḥbār errusūl walmulūk. 'IZZ AL-DĪN studied in Mōsul and Baghdād and also travelled in Syria, for the rest he lived only for knowledge as a private scholar. Cf. Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, ed. Wüstenfeld, N^o. 433; Brockelmann, Geschichte i. 345 (where other literature is given).

3. The third brother, DĪYĀ' AL-DĪN ABŪ 'L-FATH NAṢR ALLĀH, born 558 (1163) in Dījazīra, died 637 (1239) in Baghdād, was particularly distinguished as a stylist. His work on rhetoric, al-Mathal al-sā'ir fī Adab al-Kutib wa 'l-Shā'ir (printed Bulāḳ 1282), enjoys a great authority in the Muslim world. Other writings of his are given by Ibn Khallikān and Brockelmann, Gesch., i. 297. Unlike his brother the historian, Dīyā' al-Dīn led a very active life. Introduced to Salāh al-Dīn by the Kādī al-Fāḍil [q. v.] he entered his service in 587 and soon afterwards became vizier of al-Malik al-Afḍal, son of Salāh al-Dīn. When Damascus was taken from him, Dīyā' al-Dīn escaped with great difficulty to Egypt in a bolted box, and did not appear again till al-Afḍal had become lord of Sumaisāt in compensation for his previous territory. But he only remained a short time here, entered the service of the ruler of Ḥalab in 607 (1210) only to leave it soon after to seek his fortune first in Mōsul, then in Irbil und Sindjar. In 618 (1221) he obtained a position as chief of the Dīwān al-Inshā' at the court of Nāṣir al-Dīn Maḥmūd, prince of Mōsul. He died there an one of his journeys to Baghdād. His son Sharaf al-Dīn Muḥammad, who was also an author, died in his youth in 622 (1225).

Bibliography: Ibn Khallikān Wafayāt, ed. Wüstenfeld, N^o. 734; Brockelmann, op. cit.; Goldziher and Margoliouth in the references given by Brockelmann.

Still other authors are known under the name Ibn al-Athīr e.g. 'Imād al-Dīn Abū 'l-Fidā' Isma'il, died 699, on whom cf. Brockelmann, op. cit., i. 341; Goldziher, Abhandlungen zur arab. Philologie, i. 71, mentions another.

IBN AL-'AWWĀM, whose full name was ABŪ ZAKARĪYĀ YAḤYĀ B. MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD B. AL-'AWWĀM AL-ISHBĪLĪ, the author of a large work on agriculture, Kitāb al-Falāḥa. Practically nothing is known of the life of this author; we only know that he flourished towards to end of the xiith century and that he lived in Seville. Ibn Khaldūn mentions him although not being acquainted with his book which he considers a recension of al-Falāḥa al-Nabaṭiya [see IBN AL-WAḤSHIYA]; neither Ḥādjdjī Khalifa nor Ibn Khallikān quote him.

Casiri in his Catalogue was the first to call attention to the complete manuscript preserved in the Escorial. It was then edited with a Spanish translation in 1802 by his pupil J. A. Banqueri. The book is divided into 34 chapters of which the first 30 deal with agriculture and the last 4 with cattle-rearing. E Meyer gives a summary of it in his Geschichte der Botanik. Clément-Mullet published a French translation in 1864. Dozy (Suppl., Introd., p. xviii) and after him C. C. Moncada severely criticise both editor and translator.

IBN BĀBŪYA, ABŪ DJĀ'FAR MUḤAMMAD B. 'ALĪ B. ḤUSAIN B. MUSA AL-KUMMĪ AL-ŠADŪK, was one of the four greatest of the collectors of the Shī'a Traditions. In the prime of life, 355 (966), he went from Khurāsān to Baghdād and many learned men of the place became his pupils. He died in Rai 381 (991) and is also known as al-Šadūk. Of his writings the following may be mentioned: 1. Kitāb man lā yaḥḍur yuḥu 'l-Faḥīh, a work on the Shī'a Traditions. It is one of the four books of Shī'a Traditions, called al-Kutub al-Arba'a. [The other three are a. al-Kāfī by Abū DJā'far Muḥammad b. Ya'qūb al-Kulīnī, d. 328 (939) or 329 (940); b. Tahdhīb al-Aḥkām; c. al-Istibṣār both by Abū DJā'far Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī al-Ṭūsī, d. 460 (1067)]. 2. Ma'ānī al-Aḥbār, a collection of Shī'a Traditions. 3. Uyūn al-Aḥbār al-Riḍā, an account of the life and sayings and doctrines of 'Alī al-Riḍā, the eighth Imām of the Shī'as. 4. Kitāb Ikmāl al-Dīn wa Itmām al-Ni'ma, a work on the Shī'a doctrine of the hidden Imām, partly edited by E. Moller, Beiträge zur Mahdilehre des Islams, i., Heidelberg 1901.

It is said that he was the author of three hundred works; al-Nadǧāshī in his work Kitāb al-Riḍā, p. 276 (Bombay ed. 1317), enumerates 193 of his works.

IBN BĀDJĪJĀ, i. e. AVENPACE (according to Ibn Khaldūn bādǧija is a Frankish word, meaning silver) or to give him his proper name ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. YAḤYĀ, also known by the name of IBN AL-ŠA'ĪCH, i. e. filius Aurificis, a celebrated Arab philosopher. Ibn Bādjījā was born in Saragossa towards the end of the vth (xith) century and was for about 20 years vizier to Abū Bakr b. Ibrāhīm, a brother-in-law of the Almoravid 'Alī b. Yūsuf, who acted as the latter's governor in Granada and afterwards in Saragossa. He afterwards went to Fās and there fell a victim to the intrigues of his enemies. In 533 (1138) he is believed to have been poisoned at the instigation of the physician Ibn Zuhr. His enemies, among whom was Faṭḥ Ibn Khākān [q. v.], stirred up the populace and the authorities against him by decrying him as an atheist, who had rejected the Qur'ān and the dogmas of Islām.

Ibn Bādjījā, who died young, was not only a philosopher but was also well acquainted with natural science, astronomy, mathematics and medicine; he had also a great reputation as a musician. He wrote commentaries on several works of Aristotle and published other treatises also, which are detailed by Leclerc from Ibn Abī Uṣaibī'a but are for the most part now lost or have only survived in Hebrew or Latin translation. Cf. Die Abhandlung des Abū Bekr Ibn al-Sāig "Vom Verhalten des Einsiedlers" (Kit. Tadbīr al-Muta-waḥḥid), according to Moses Narbonis synopsis . . . ed. by Dr. D. Herzog, Berlin 1896 (Beitr. zur Philos. des Mittelalters, Heft 1). For an appreciation of his philosophical views the reader may be referred to the works of Munk and de Boer given below.

IBN BADRŪN. [See IBN 'ABDŪN.]

IBN AL-BAITĀR, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD 'ABD AL-LĀH B. AḤMAD DĪYĀ' AL-DĪN IBN AL-BAITĀR AL-MĀLAKĪ, the celebrated botanist and herbalist. He probably belonged to the Ibn al-Baitār family of Malaga (cf. Ibn al-Abbār, al-Mu'djam, N^o. 35, 165, 241) and was born in the last quarter of the vith (xiith) century. As his teacher of botanical subjects, special mention should be made of Abn 'l-Abbās al-Nabātī, with whom he used to collect plants in the vicinity of Seville. When about 20 he set out to travel through North Africa, Morocco, Algiers and Tunis to study botany. Reaching Egypt, where the Ayyūbid al-Malik al-Kāmil was then reigning, he entered his service, was appointed Ra'is 'alā sū'iri 'l-'Ashḥābin i. e. "chief botanist"; on al-Kāmil's death he continued in the service of his son al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Naǧm al-Dīn who lived in Damascus. From Damascus Ibn al-Baitār botanised in Syria and Asia Minor as a herbalist and wrote the two books, which have made his name famous, as the result of his studies and practical research: the Kitāb al-Djāmī fi 'l-Adwiya al-mufradāt (so Ibn Abī Uṣaibī'a, ii. 133); printed in 1291 under the title Kitāb al-Djāmī li-Mufradāt al-Adwiya wa 'l-Agh-dhiya, a collection of "simple remedies" from the animal, vegetable, and mineral worlds collected from Greek and Arabic authors and his own experiments and arranged in alphabetical order, and the Kitāb al-mughnī fi 'l-Adwiya al-mufrada, a book on materia medica arranged according to the organs affected, in brief form for the use of physicians. Ibn Abī Uṣaibī'a was a pupil of Ibn al-Baitār and accompanied him on botanical excursions in the neighbourhood of Damascus, but he does not give much information about him. Ibn al-Baitār died in 646 (1248) in Damascus.

J. v. Sontheimer's translation of the first named work is defective; the edition published by Leclerc in Notices et Extraits, xxiii. 1., xxv. 1., xxvi. 1. (1877—1883) may be considered reliable.

IBN BAKĪYA, NAṢĪR AL-DAWLĀ ABU 'L-TĀHIR MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. BAKĪYA, Bakhtiyār's vizier. Ibn Bakīya was born in Awānā and was of humble origin. He was first employed at Mu'izz al-Dawla's court as master of the kitchen and in Dhu 'l-Hidǧja 362 (Sept. 973) Bakhtiyār gave him the office of vizier. After the conquest of Baghdād and the imprisonment of Bakhtiyār in 364 (975) by 'Aḍud al-Dawla, Ibn Bakīya went over to the latter and was granted Wāsiṭ and the surrounding country. As soon as he entered this town he abandoned his allegiance to 'Aḍud al-Dawla. The latter was defeated and had to retire to al-Fārs and abandon the capital Baghdād to Bakhtiyār. Ibn Bakīya then reappeared in Baghdād where he did his utmost to incite Bakhtiyār against 'Aḍud al-Dawla. In 366 (976-7) the latter advanced and defeated Bakhtiyār at al-Ahwāz. The latter had to flee and went to Wāsiṭ. In Dhu 'l-Hidǧja of the same year (August 977)

he had Ibn Baḳiya seized and blinded as the latter had shown himself too independent. Soon afterwards the vizier was handed over to his enemy 'Aḳud al-Dawla, who had him trampled to death by elephants in Shawwāl 367 (May 978). Ibn Baḳiya was 50 years of age at the time of his death.

IBN AL-BALADĪ, SHARAF AL-DĪN ABŪ DJA^cFAR AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. SA'ĪD, al-Mustandjīd's vizier. In 563 (1166-8) Ibn al-Baladī, who at that time was Nāṣir in Wāsiṭ, was appointed vizier. There was an old feud between him and the Ustād-dar 'Aḳud al-Dīn Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh. After the murder of the caliph in Rabi' II 566 (December 1170) by 'Aḳud al-Dīn and the Emīr Kuṭb al-Dīn, they forced his successor al-Mustaḍīr to appoint 'Aḳud al-Dīn vizier, whereupon Ibn al-Baladī was executed.

IBN AL-BANNĀ' ('son of the architect'), whose full name was ABŪ 'L-'ABBĀS AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. OTMĀN AL-AZDĪ, a versatile Moroccan scholar, especially distinguished in mathematics, astronomy, astrology and other secret sciences, and also in medicine. He was born in Mafrākush on the 9th Dhū 'l-Hijja 654 = 38th Dec. 1256 (according to others 639, 649 or even 656). After studying grammar, Ḥadīth, Fīqh, and mathematics in his native town, he went to Fās where he studied under the physician al-Mirrikh, the mathematician Ibn Ḥaḍila, and the astronomer Ibn Makhlūf al-Siddilmāsi. He was for a considerable time a follower of the Šūfī 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Hazmī, who admitted him to his order. He often fasted in complete retirement; his biographers praise his noble character and pure life. Ibn al-Bannā' died on Saturday the 6th Raddjāb 721 (Aug. 1321) in Marrākush, where he was buried outside the Bāb Aghmāt; 723 or 1724 is also given as the year of his death. Of the 74 writings which are ascribed to him, a whole series of mathematical and astronomical works are still extant in libraries (cf. the references in Brockelmann, op. cit.). Here we will only mention Talkhīṣ A'māl al-Hisāb (Synopsis of the operations of Calculation), publ. in a French transl. by A. Marre in the Atti dell' Acad. pontif. de' Nuovi Lincei, Vol. xvii. 1864, repr. Rome 1865. Several Arab scholars have written commentaries on this Talkhīṣ which is said to be a synopsis of the arithmetic of a certain Abū Zakariyā al-Ḥaṣṣār (cf. Bibliot. mathem. 3^d Ser., Vol. ii., p. 12—40); among these we may mention Aḥmad b. al-Madīdī and 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Kalāṣādī (cf. Abhandl. z. Gesch. d. math. Wissensch., x. 180—182). F. Woeckle has made an excerpt on the summation of series from the first commentary, entitled Passages relatifs à des sommations de séries de cubes, Rome, 1864; the same scholar has given several passages in translation from the second in the above mentioned treatise and in the Journal Asiatique, Ser. vi., Vol. i. (1863), p. 58—62. — Ibn al-Bannā' shows some advance on the older Arab mathematicians of the East in Arithmetic, particularly in counting with fractions; he is also to be considered one of the chief users of Indian numerals in the form used by the Western Arabs (Ghubār figures). [Cf. the article ḤISĀB.]

IBN BARRĪ, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD 'ABD ALLĀH B. BARRĪ B. 'ABD AL-DJABBĀR B. BARRĪ AL-MAḲDISĪ AL-MIṢRĪ, Arab grammarian and philologist, born at Damascus 5th Raddjāb 499 (13th March 1106), died at Cairo in the night of Friday/Saturday 27th Shawwāl 582 (9th—10th Jan. 1187), a scholar of extraordinary repute, who is considered a philological authority and is called by many "king of the grammarians". The author of the Lisān al-'Arab has borrowed a great deal from him. His teachers were the grammarians Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Shantarīnī, Abū Ṭālib 'Abd al-Djabbār b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī al-Ma'afīrī al-Kurṭubī, Abū Šāḍik al-Madīnī, Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Rāzī etc. His best pupil was Abū Mūsā 'Isā b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Djazzūlī. He is the author of the following works. 1. Kitāb al-Tanbīh wa 'l-Idghā' 'anmā (var. 'alā mā) waḳ'a min al-Waḳm fī Kitāb al-Šiḥāh, corrections and additions to Djawhārī's Dictionary; he is said to have died when engaged on the root wḳṣh and 'Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Basīfī completed his work (Derenbourg, Mss. ar. de l'Escurial, N^o. 585); 2. Ḥawāṣhī 'ala 'l-Mu'arrab, critical notes and additions to al-Djāwāḥikī's dictionary of foreign words (Derenbourg, op. cit., N^o. 772, 5); 3. Kitāb Ghalaṭ al-Du'afā' min al-Fukahā', a collection of neologisms or errors of speech in the jurists (ed. by Ch. C. Torrey in Oriental Stud. Th. Noldeke gewidmet, Giesen 1906); 4. al-Dhabb 'an al-Ḥarīrī, a small pamphlet in defence of the Maḳāmas of al-Ḥarīrī against the sharp criticism of Ibn al-Khashshāb (pr. Constantinople 1320).

The thirteen verses on the different meanings of the word khāl, which Brockelmann ascribes to him and which are in the Lisān, are by Ṭa'lab (cf. Abū Hīlāl al-'Askarī, Kitāb al-Šinā'atāin, Constantinople 1320, p. 335).

IBN BARRĪ, ABŪ 'L-ḤASAN 'ALĪ B. MUḤAM-

MAD B. 'ALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤUSAIN AL-RIBĀṬĪ, an Arab philologist, born about 660 (1261-2) at Tāza, where he died in 730 or 731 or 733 (1329-1333) and was buried, although some place his tomb in Fās, wrongly.

Widely acquainted with Islāmic sciences he was particularly esteemed as an authoritative critic of the different recensions of the Qur'ān and his al-Durar al-Lawāmi' is as popular in North Africa as the Adjurrūmiya.

After being adl (professional witness) for a period he was appointed to conduct the official correspondence of the government at Tāza, an office which he held till his death, on the recommendation of a pupil of his, a qāḍī, who did not care to see his former teacher in this subordinate position.

Of his works only two have survived to us: 1. 30 radjab verses fī Maḥārīdī al-Ḥurūf, in which the author marks the place of articulation of the Arabic letters (Ms. Berlin, Verzeichn., No. 548); 2. al-Durar al-Lawāmi' fī Aṣl Maḥrā' al-Imām Nāfi', a poem of 242 Radjaz verses, which was completed in 697 (1298) and deals with the recension of the Qur'ān according to Nāfi' b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Nu'aim al-Madanī (d. 159 = 775-6 or 169 = 785), often published in Cairo and Tunis in the collections of treatises on recensions of the Qur'ān and its orthography).

IBN BASHKUWĀL, ABU 'L-KĀSIM KHALAF B. 'ABD AL-MALIK B. MAS'UD B. Mūsā B. BASHKUWĀL B. YUSUF B. DAḤA B. DAKA B. NAṢR B. 'ABD AL-KARIM B. WAKID AL-ANṢARĪ, Arabic biographer, a descendant of a family belonging to Shorroyon (Xorroyon, Sorrión) near Valencia, born on the 3^d Dhū 'l-Ḥijja 494 = 29th Sept. 1101 at Cordova, acquired here and in Seville a great knowledge of Tradition and the history of his native land and was for a period representative of the Qāḍī Abū Bakr Ibn al-'Arabī in a quarter of Seville. He died at Cordova on the night of Tuesday/Wednesday the 8th Ramaḍān 578 = 4th/5th Jan. 1183. His most important teachers were Abū Muḥammad Ibn 'Attab, Abū 'l-Walid Ibn Rushd, Abū Bakr Ibn al-'Arabī, etc.; among his pupils all of whom predeceased him, we may mention Abū Bakr b. Khair and Abū 'l-Kāsim al-Kanṭarī.

Ibn Bashkuwāl enjoyed a special reputation among all compilers of Arabic biographical dictionaries and, according to Ibn al-Abbār, he was the last authority on Tradition in Cordova and the soundest authority on the history of Spain.

Of the 50 works which he is said to have composed only two are known to us: 1. Kitāb al-Ṣila fī Tārīkh A'immat al-Andalus etc., a biographical dictionary of the Arab scholars of Spain, completed on the 3^d Djumādā I 534 = 27th Dec. 1139, a supplement to the biographical dictionary of Ibn al-Faraḍī (ed. F. Codera in Bibl. Arab. Hisp., Vol. i. and ii., Madrid 1883); 2. Kitāb al-Ghawāmiḍ wal-Mubhamāt min al-Asmiā', a dictionary of authorities on Tradition, whose names are difficult to spell or are easily confused with others (Berlin, Verz., no. 1673).

IBN BAṬṬŪṬA (BAṬṬŪṬA), MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. MUḤAMMAD B. IBRĀHĪM, ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH, AL-LAWĀṬĪ AL-TANJĪ, Arab traveller and author, born on the 14th Radjab 703 = 24th Febr. 1304 at Tangier, began the pilgrimage to Mecca 725 = 1325. He went via North Africa through Upper Egypt to the Red Sea. As he could not find a safe crossing here he turned back and reached his destination via Syria and Palestine. From Mecca he went through the Irāq and thence visited Persia as well as Mōṣul and Diyār Bakr. He next paid a second visit to Mecca where he spent the years 729 and 730. A third journey led him over South Arabia to East Africa and back to the Persian Gulf. From Hormuz he returned to Mecca and thence went via Egypt and Syria to Asia Minor and the Crimea. He visited Constantinople in the retinue of a Greek princess, wife of Sulṭān Muḥammad Uzbek. From the Volga he went through Khwārizm, Bukhārā, and Afghānistān to India. In Dīhlī he undertook the office of qāḍī. Two years later he joined an embassy setting out for China but only reached the Maldives where he filled a judicial office for 1½ years. From there he went to China via Ceylon, Bengal and Further India. Whether he went beyond Zaitun and Canton is uncertain. Via Sumatra (cf. Snouck Hurgronje, Arabie en Oost-Indië, Leiden 1907, p. 7 sqq.; French transl. Rev. de l'Hist. des Rel., lvii. 1908, 62 sqq.) he returned to Arabia where he landed in Muḥarrām 748 at Zafār. After a journey through Persia, Syria and Mesopotamia he made the pilgrimage for the fourth time, from Egypt. He then went back through North Africa and entered Fās in Sha'bān 750. After a very brief stay here he went to Granada. His last long journey took him in 753-4 to the Negro lands, to Timbuktū and Melli. He returned to Morocco via the oases of Agadez and Tawāt. Here he dictated the account of his travels to the scholar Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Djuzaī (cf. de Slane, Journ. As., 1843, i. 244 sqq.), who wrote the narrative in a literary style frequently modelled on Ibn Djubair's work. The latter died in 757 = 1356 soon after the completion of his task; his holograph is partly preserved in the Paris Ms. Suppl. 907. Ibn Baṭṭūṭa died in 779 = 1377 in Morocco. His work Tuhfat al-Nuṣṣār fī Ghawātib al-Amṣār wa 'Adjāib al-Asfār, was edited by Defrémery and Sanguinetti, 4 vols., Paris 1853-1859; 3rd ed. 1893; repr. Cairo 1287-1288, 1322. Further literature given is by H. von Mzik, Die Reise des Arabers Ibn Baṭṭūṭa durch Indien und China (XIV. Jahrh.), in Bibl. denkwürdiger Reisen, Vol. v., Hamburg 1911. (C. BROCKELMANN.)

IBN AL-BAWWĀB, "the porter's son" a name of ABU 'L-ḤASAN 'ALĀ' AL-DĪN 'ALĪ B. HILĀL, a celebrated Arab calligrapher, son of a porter of the audience hall of Baghdād. He was also called Ibn al-Sitri. He died in 413 = 1022 or 423 = 1032 and was buried beside the tomb of Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal. He had a wide knowledge of law, knew the Qur'ān by heart, and wrote out 64 copies of it. One of these written in Riḥānī-script is in the Lāleli mosque in Constantinople, to which it was given by Sulṭān Selīm I. The Diwān of the pre-Islamic poet Salāma b. Djandal, copied by him, is in the library of the Aya Ṣofya. He invented the Riḥānī and Muḥakkiḳ scripts and founded a school of calligraphy which survived to the time of Yāḳūt al-Mustaṣimī.

IBN BĪBĪ, NAṢĪR AL-DĪN YAḤYĀ B. MAḌJĀD AL-DĪN MUḤAMMAD TARJUMĀN (the "interpreter"), Persian historian. His father was munshī and interpreter at the court of the Salḡjuqs of Asia Minor and more than once a member of diplomatic missions to foreign princes. He died in 670 = 1272. He received the name Ibn Bībī from his mother, who had a great reputation as a fortune-teller and was therefore held in great esteem by Sulṭān Kaiḳubād I (616—634 = 1220—1237); we know nothing of the life of Ibn Bībī himself, but he appears to have been well acquainted with the famous Mongol vizier 'Atā' Malik Djuwainī [q.v.], for he dedicates to him his chief work, a history of the Salḡjuqs of Asia Minor in the viith (xiiith) century. This chronicle, which is composed in unusually florid Persian, is entitled al-Awāmir al-'alāniya fi 'l-Umūr al-'alā'iya, because it deals mainly with the history of 'Alā' al-Dīn (Kaiḳubād), and survives in a unique ms. (Aya Ṣofya, n^o. 2985). An unknown epitomiser composed a synopsis of it, which was published in 1902 by Houtsma in his Recueil de textes relatifs à l'histoire des Seldjoukides, Vol. iv. The latter also published a Turkish version of the same work in the 3rd volume of this collection (incomplete). At the time of the publication of his work, the existence of a manuscript of the original work was unknown to Houtsma.

IBN BUṬLĀN, JOANNES or ABU 'L-ḤASAN AL-MUKHTĀR B. ḤASAN, a Christian physician in Baghdād. From there he set out in 440 (1049) via al-Rahba and al-Ruṣāfa to Ḥalab and thence to Antākiya and Lādhikiya, finally reaching al-Fustāt in Egypt, where he met his colleague 'Alī b. Ridwān. Their intercourse led to sharp polemics and produced several controversial pamphlets. Extracts from Ibn Buṭlān's epistle are given in Ibn al-Kiṣṭī Ta'rikh al-Ḥukamā', ed. Lippert, p. 298 sqq. Relations finally became so strained that Ibn Buṭlān left Egypt and went to Constantinople, where the plague was then raging (446 = 1054). It is evident from this that the statement in Ibn al-Kiṣṭī, op. cit., that he died at Antākiya in 444 (1052) is wrong, although Ibn Abī Uṣaibī'a also tells us that he returned to Antākiya. He was still alive in 455 (1063). His principal work is called Taḳwīm al-Ṣiḥḥa, of which a Latin transl. was published in 1531 at Strassburg under the title: Tacuin sanitatis Elluchasem Elimithar medici de Baldath. In the following year there appeared at the same place a German transl. by M. Herum, Schachtafel der Gesundheit. Other works are given by Leclerc and Brockelmann, s. the Bibl. The Dawāt al-Aṭibbā' alā Madhhab Kalīla wa-Dimna mentioned there was published in 1901 by Dr. Bashshāra Zalzal in Alexandria.

IBN AL-DAIBA^c was called after his ancestor 'Alī b. Yūsuf (Daiba^c is said to mean "white" in Nubian, according to al-Muḥibbī, Khulūṣat al-Aṭhar, iii. 192, and Taḍy al-'Arūs, v. 325), the South Arabian Historian and Traditionist ABU 'ABD ALLĀH 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. 'ALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD B. 'UMAR... B. ALĪ B. YŪSUF, WADJĪH AL-DĪN AL-SHAIBĀNĪ AL-ZABĪDĪ, who was born on the 4th Muḥarram 866 (9th Oct. 1461) at Zabīd. From his tenth year he had the benefit of the tuition of his uncle, Djamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad b. Ismā'il, Mufti of Zabīd, under whose guidance, after learning the Qur'an, he proceeded to study various sciences, notably mathematics and fiqh. After studying under other teachers and making the pilgrimage in 884 and 885, he became a pupil of Zain al-Dīn Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Latif al-Shardjī (died 893), devoting particular attention to history. He afterwards went to Bait al-Faḳīh where he specially studied Ḥadīth under two members of the scholarly family of Ibn Dja'mān. After a third pilgrimage (896), with which he combined a stay in Mecca in order to study Ḥadīth under al-Sakhāwī (d. 902 = 1497), he began to devote himself to literature. Through his work as a historian he won high favour with the Tāhirid al-Malik al-Zāfir II Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn 'Āmir (894—923 = 1489—1517), who presented him with robes of honour, allotted him lands and gave him a professorship at the Djamī' of Zabīd. Ibn al-Daiba^c died in Rajab 944 (Dec. 1537). His works are: 1. Bughyat al-Mustafid fi Akhbār Madinat Zabīd, a history of Zabīd and its rulers to the year 901 (begins 21 Sept. 1495), the most important part of which is the section on the ixth (xvth) century; it finishes with his autobiography as khātima. This work has been rendered into Latin by C. Th. Johannsen, with introduction and notes, from the defective Copenhagen ms. (Historia Jemanae, Bonn 1828, Mss. in Brockelmann, i. c., and Aya Ṣofya, N^o. 2988; Blochet, Cat. de la Coll. . . . Schefer, N^o. 5897, 6069). Continuing this work down to 923 (1517) he wrote al-Faḍl al-ma'id. A second appendix brings it to 924 (Mss. in Brockelmann, o. c., and Aya Ṣofya, N^o. 2988); 2. Kurrat al-'Uyūn fi Akhbār al-Yaman al-maimūn, which is in part compiled from al-Khazraḡī's Kit. al-Ki-fāya, and in part contains the same material as the preceding work. (Mss. in Brockelmann and Blochet, o. c., N^o. 5821, 6058); 3. Aḥsanu 'l-Sulūk fi man (fi naẓm man) waliya Zabīd min al-Mulūk, a historical Rajaz poem on the princes of Zabīd, Berlin, Verz., N^o. 9763; Brit. Ibn al-Daiba^c further mentions in his autobiography Ghāyat al-Maṭlūb wa-ḍa'amu 'l-Manna fima yaḡfiru 'lāh bihi 'l-Dhunūb and Kashf al-Kirba fi Sharḥ Du'a' Abi Ḥirba; Ḥādījī Khalifa (iv. N^o.

IBN DAIŠĀN, a Syrian philosopher of Parthian origin, known by his graecised Syrian name Bardesanes. His father was called Nu-hama, his mother Nahsiram; both migrated from Persia to Edessa after 139 A. D. Their son was born in 154 and received his name from the river Daišān which waters Edessa. Brought up at the court of king Ma'nū along with the latter's son Abgar he learned astronomy and astrology; in 179 he was converted to Christianity by Bishop Hystaspes. Although an opponent of Valentine, Marcion and the other gnostics, he created a cosmological system closely allied to the gnostic. He died in 222. The Muslims are only acquainted with his speculations on good and evil and light and darkness, from which it appears that his system was dualistic. The school founded by him lasted till late in the middle ages. His followers were divided into two sects, of which one represented the view that light mixed with darkness of its own accord, in order to improve it, but could not free itself again; the others hold that light after it has felt the density and the evil smell of darkness, which involuntarily overwhelms the light, attempts to free itself from it. One section of his followers inhabited the swampy lands (baṭūiḥ) of the lower Euphrates, others were found scattered as far as Khurāsān and China. He was regarded as a precursor of Mānī. He actually seems to have been particularly an astrologer (Eusebius, Praepar. evang., vi. 9). As such, he teaches that individual beings are subject to the power of controllers or rulers above them, namely the planets. What is called fate is the mode of activity which God has allotted the planets and elements; this activity modifies the intelligence in its descent to the soul and the soul in its descent to the body. Human life is limited by natural laws and further by fate; human freedom consists in taking up the battle with fate and limiting its power as far as possible.

IBN DJAHĪR, the name of four viziers:

1. FAḤḤR AL-DAWLA ABŪ NAṢR MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. DJAHĪR, born in Mōṣul in 398 (1007-8). He first entered the service of the Banū 'Uḡail, who had been ruling in his native city since 386 (996); but when the 'Uḡailid Ḳuraish b. Badiān wished to throw him into prison he fled to Aleppo where the Mirdāsīd Mu'izz al-Dawla b. Ṣāliḥ appointed him his vizier. He next left Aleppo and was appointed vizier to Naṣr al-Dawla Aḥmad b. Marwān, lord of Diyār Bakr. After the latter's death in 453 (1061-2) he was confirmed in this office by his son and successor Nizām al-Dīn; but he refused to stay and went to Baghdād. Here the Caliph al-Ḳā'im appointed him vizier in the following year. In 460 (1067-8) Faḥḥr al-Dawla was dismissed but was restored to office in Ṣafar 461 (December 1068). The Caliph died in 467 (1075) and his successor al-Muktadī confirmed the vizier in his office but dismissed him in 471 (1078-9). Faḥḥr al-Dawla was sent in 476 (1083-4) by the Salḡūḡ sultān against Diyār Bakr, to take it from the Marwānids. Manṣūr b. Naṣr, the ruler of Diyār Bakr, thereupon allied himself with the 'Uḡailid Muslim b. Ḳuraish; the latter had however to flee to Āmid where he and Manṣūr were besieged by Faḥḥr al-Dawla. Muslim succeeded in escaping; but as Mōṣul was captured about the same time by 'Amīd al-Dawla, Faḥḥr al-Dawla's son, Muslim had to sue for peace and soon afterwards the governorship of Mōṣul was restored to him. After Za'īm al-Ru'asa', another of Faḥḥr al-Dawla's sons, had seized the town of Āmid, Faḥḥr al-Dawla took Maiyāfāriḡin and was appointed governor of Diyār Bakr. According to the usual account, this happened in 478 (1085). He was soon afterwards dismissed however, but in 482 (1089-1090) Malik-shāh sent him to Mōṣul of which he took possession. He died there in 483 (1090).

2. 'AMĪD AL-DAWLA ABŪ MANṢŪR MUḤAMMAD B. FAḤḤR AL-DAWLA B. DJAHĪR, son of the preceding, born in 435 (1043-4). By his marriage with a daughter of the vizier Nizām al-Mulk in 462 (1067-1070) he entered into closer relations with the ruling Salḡūḡ family. After her death in 470 (1077-8) he married her niece and in Ṣafar 472 (August 1079) the Caliph al-Muktadī appointed him his vizier at the request of Nizām al-Mulk. In 476 (1083-4) he was dismissed but restored to office in Dhū 'l-Hiḡḡa 484 (Jan.-Febr. 1062) and held this office for nine years. In Ramaḡān 493 (July-August 1100) he was dismissed through the efforts of Barkiyārūḡ. The latter accused him of embezzling the revenues of Diyār Bakr and Mōṣul, which his father and he had governed during the time of Malikshāh, and had him arrested with his brothers. 'Amīd al-Dawla had to pay a huge fine and died in prison on the 10th Shawwāl 493 (24th Aug. 1100).

3. Za'īm AL-RU'ASA' KAWĀM AL-DĪN ABU 'L-ḲĀSIM 'ALĪ B. FAḤḤR AL-DAWLA B. DJAHĪR, brother of the preceding. In 478 (1085) Za'īm al-Ru'asa' conquered Āmid [see under N^o. 1] and after Maiyāfārīkīn also had fallen into the hands of his father, the latter sent him with the booty, won from the Marwānids, to Isfahān to the Sultān Malikshāh. In Sha'bān 496 (May—June 1103) the Caliph al-Mustazhir appointed him vizier but dismissed him in Šafar 500 (October 1106). Za'im al-Ru'asā' then went to al-Ḥilla to the Mazyadī Saif al-Dawla Šadaqa; in 503 (1109-1110) he was again appointed vizier by the Caliph.

4. NIẒĀM AL-DĪN ABŪ NAṢR AL-MUẒAFFAR B. 'ALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD B. DJAHĪR AL-BAGHDĀDĪ (OR ABŪ NAṢR MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. DJAHĪR). NiẒām al-Dīn was first of all Ustād-dār (master of ceremonies); after the death of the vizier Saḍid al-Dawla Ibn al-Anbārī in 535 (1140-1) the Caliph al-Muṭtafi appointed him his successor.

IBN DJAMĀ'A; the name of family of scholars belonging to Ḥamāt, whose members are therefore quoted by this name only and not infrequently confused with one another. Here may be mentioned:

1. BADR AL-DĪN ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. IBRĀHĪM AL-KINĀNĪ AL-ḤAMAWĪ an Arab. jurist, born 639 (1241) and died 733 (1333). He studied at Damascus and was afterwards mudarris there; in 687 (1288) he became kāḍī of Jerusalem, in 690 (1291) chief kāḍī of Cairo, in 693 (1294) chief kāḍī of Damascus. From 702 he again held the office of chief kāḍī of Cairo, with one brief interruption till 727 (1327). His official duties did not prevent him teaching in several madrasas and also engaging in literary work. His most important work is his book on constitutional law, Tahrīr al-Aḥkām fī Tadbīr Ahl al-Islām, on which cf. von Kremer, Culturgesch. des Orients, i. 403 sq. Through an error in Ḥāḍijī Khālifa, ii. 210, also in Flügel, Cat. Wiener Hofbibliothek, N^o. 1839. Brockelmann, Geschichte etc., ii. 94, has ascribed this work to N^o. 4 below, although he attributes it correctly on ii. 75, (only with a slightly different title which he gives from Cod. Berol., Ahlwardt, N^o. 5613). For other writings of Ibn Djamā'a see Brockelmann.

2. ABŪ 'OMAR 'ABD AL-AZĪZ, 'IZZ AL-DĪN, certainly the son of the preceding, born in 694 (1294) at Damascus, afterwards chief kāḍī of Egypt and Syria. But when his representative at Damascus died in 765 (1364), he resigned the office and became mudarris in Cairo. He died in 767 (1366) on a pilgrimage to Mecca. On his writings cf. Brockelmann, ii. 72, and references given there.

3. IBRĀHĪM B. 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN, BURḤĀN AL-DĪN, grandson of N^o. 1., born 725 (1325) in Cairo. He studied in his native city and in Damascus, became khaṭīb in Jerusalem in 773 (1371), chief kāḍī of Egypt and mudarris at the Šalāhiya, but returned to Jerusalem in the following year. In 781 (1379) he again became chief kāḍī of Cairo and finally in 785 (1383) kāḍī of Damascus, where he died in 790 (1388). See Brockelmann, ii. 112.

4. ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. AĒĪ BAKR, grandson of N^o. 2, born in 759, became a physician and teacher of philosophy in Cairo. He died in 819 (1416) of the plague. See Brockelmann, op. cit., ii. 94. He wrote a commentary on the dogmatic poem, Bad' al-Amālī, see Brockelmann, op. cit., i. 429.

Bibliography: given in the article.

IBN AL-DJARRĀH, the name of two viziers:

1. 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. 'ISĀ B. DĀ'UD. After the dismissal of Ibn Muḥla in 324 (936) the Caliph al-Rāḍī offered the vacant office to the former vizier 'Alī b. 'Isā, but as he declined the offer, on the grounds of old age and feeble health, the office was given to his brother 'Abd al-Raḥmān. But the latter was not fit for the onerous duties and only held office for three months; he was then thrown into prison with his brother and condemned to pay a heavy fine. In 329 (941) he again appears in history; after the appointment of Kūrtegin as Amir al-Umarā' he performed the duties of a vizier for a period at the court of the Caliph al-Muttaḥī but without receiving the corresponding title.

2. 'ALĪ B. 'ISĀ B. DĀ'UD, brother of the preceding, born in 245 (859). As a supporter of the pretender 'Abd Allāh b. al-Mu'tazz, 'Alī was banished to Wasiṭ in 296 (908) after the murder of 'Abd Allāh, but received permission to go to Mecca from al-Muṭtadī's vizier Ibn al-Furāt. In 300 (912-3) the Caliph appointed him vizier and he reached the capital in the beginning of the following year. He materially improved the finances of the state by his rigid economy; the troops were discontented however because he decreased their pay and his measures also brought him into disfavour in other quarters. He therefore asked the Caliph to accept his resignation; but the latter declined. Towards the end of 304 (917) however he was dismissed and imprisoned. Ibn al-Furāt was appointed his successor. The latter clung to office for a year or two, until he was replaced in Djumādā I 306 (November 918) by Ḥāmid b. al-'Abbās, who was old and feeble and at first allowed himself to be guided by 'Alī b. 'Isā. 'Alī however soon quarrelled with Ḥāmid and, after a rising in Baghdād in 308 (920-1) on account of the increased cost of living, 'Alī was offered the vizierate but declined it. As Ḥāmid lost the Caliph's favour and 'Alī's economy aroused discontent, the vizierate was again given to Ibn al-Furāt in Rabi' II 311 (August 923). 'Alī was thrown into prison and after Ibn al-Furāt had extorted a considerable sum from him, he banished him to Mecca and gave the governor there instructions to send him on to Šan'a'. On the intercession of Mu'nis, the prefect of police, 'Alī was pardoned on the fall of Ibn al-Furāt and returned from exile in 312 (925). In Dhū 'l-Ka'da 314 (Jan.—Feb. 927) he was summoned to Baghdād from Damascus, where he was then living, through the influence of Mu'nis and given the vizierate. He did not take up office till the beginning of the following year; but when it was found that the finances were again in a chaotic condition and the Caliph declined to follow his advice, he asked leave to resign on the ground that he was too old for the duties of the office. The Caliph at first declined but was finally persuaded and in Rabī' I 316 (May 978) 'Alī was dismissed and replaced by Ibn Muḳla [q. v.]. The Caliph al-Rāḍī afterwards twice offered him the vizierate, first immediately after his accession and again in 324 (936). As he refused on both occasions, Ibn Muḳla and the brother of 'Alī, 'Abd al-Rahmān, respectively were given it. 'Alī b. 'Isā died in Dhū 'l-Hijja 334 (July-August 946).

IBN AL-DJAWZĪ, 'ABD AL-RAHMĀN B. 'ALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD ABU 'L-FARĀḌĪ (ABU 'L-FADĀ'IL) DJAMĀL AL-DĪN, an Arab author, Ḥanbalī faḳīh, preacher and universal historian, born in 510 = 1116 at Baghdād, settled there after the usual journeys of study, and died in 597 = 1200. His ardent devotion to his madhhab led to the strictest criticism of Tradition; he even prepared an edition of al-Ghazālī's Ihyā' purified of all weak traditions. His literary activity covered all the knowledge of his time. He exercised the greatest influence as a preacher (cf. Ibn Djubair, 2nd ed., p. 220 sqq.); his numerous edifying works are recommended for public reading even by al-Subkī, Mu'id al-Ni'am, p. 163, 7. Brockelmann, Gesch., i. 502 sq. gives a list of his writings. Of his history of the world, al-Muntazam wa-Multaḳaṭ al-Multazam, the most important of his works to us, there have since become known the mss. in Paris, Bibl. Nat. (Blochet, Catal. de la Coll. . . . Schefer), No. 5909, in the British Museum (Add. 7320; s. Amedroz, *Journ. Roy. As. IBN AL-DJAWZĪ, SIBT, SHAMS AL-DĪN ABU 'L-MUZAFFAR YUSUF B. KIZOĞLU, grandson of the preceding on his mother's side. His father Kizoghlu was a Turkish slave of the vizier Ibn Hubaira [q. v.] and afterwards manumitted by him. Yūsuf was born in 582 (1186) in Baghdād and brought up by his grandfather; he studied in his native city, set out to travel in 600 and finally became professor and preacher in Damascus, where he died in 684 (1257). He is the author of a universal history (not yet printed) in several volumes, entitled Mir'āt al-Zamān fi Ta'rikh al-A'yān. The latter part of it covering the years 495—654 has been reproduced in facsimile by J. R. Jewett (Chicago 1907), while some extracts from the years 450—532 were given in the Recueil des Historiens des Croisades, Historiens Orientaux, Vol. iii. p. 65 sqq.

IBN AL-DJAZARĪ, SHAMS AL-DĪN ABU 'L-KHAIR MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. 'ALĪ B. YUSUF AL-DJAZARĪ, an Arab theologist and authority on the readings (qirā'āt) of the Qur'ān, born at Damascus in the night of Friday/Saturday 25th Ramaḍān 751 (30th Nov.—1st Dec. 1350), knew the Qur'ān by heart by the year 763 (1363) and a year later was able to recite pieces from it in prayer. After devoting some attention to Ḥadīth, he studied the various ways of reading the Qur'ān, of which he mastered seven in 768 (1367). In the same year he made the pilgrimage to Mecca and thereafter went to Cairo where by the year 769 (1368) he had mastered thirteen ways of reading the Qur'ān. Returning to Damascus he devoted himself to Ḥadīth and law and studied under the two pupils of al-Dim'yānī, al-Abarḳūhī and al-Asnawī. He then went back to Cairo to study rhetoric and the sources of law, and then went to Alexandria to hear the pupils of Ibn 'Abd al-Salām. In 744 (1373) he received permission to deliver fatwās from Abu 'l-Fida' Ismā'il b. Kaḥḥr, in 778 (1376) from Diyā' al-Dīn, and in 785 (1383) from the Shaikh al-Islām al-Bulḳinī.

After teaching Qirā'āt for a period he was appointed ḳāḍī of Damascus in 793 (1391). But when his property in Egypt was confiscated in 798 (1795), he went to Brusa to the court of Sulṭān Bāyazīd b. 'Othmān. After the battle of Angora (end of 804 = 1402), he was sent by Timūr to Kashsh in Transoxania, and later to Samarḳand, where he lectured publicly and met the Sharīf al-Djurdjānī. After Timūr's death in Sha'bān 807 (Febr. 1405) Ibn al-Djazari went to Khorāsān, then to Herāt, Yazd, Isfahān and finally to Shirāz, where, after teaching for some time, he was appointed ḳāḍī by Pīr Muḥammad against his will. He then went to Baṣra and thence to Mecca and Medina (823 = 1420). After a stay of several years in these towns he returned to Shirāz where he died on Friday the 9th Rabī' I 833 (2nd Dec. 1429).

He is the author of the following works: 1. Kitāb al-Nashr fi 'l-Qirā'āt al-ashr (Berlin, No. 657; Escorial, Derenbourg, Les mss. arab., No. 129; Constantinople, Nūr-i 'Osmāniya, No. 97; Khed. Libr., Fihrr., i. 117; Tunis, Maktaba 'Abdalliya, i. 176); 2. Tahbīr al-Taisir fi 'l-Qirā'āt, commentary on the Taisir of al-Dānī on the readings of the Qur'ān (Khed. Libr., Fihrr., i. 92; Berlin, N^o. 590; Constantinople Nūr-i 'Osmāniya, N^o. 60); 3. Taiyibat al-Nashr fi 'l-Kirā'at al-ashr, poem of 1000 Radjāz verses on the ten ways of reading the Qur'ān, completed in Sha'bān 799 = Mai 1396 (pr. Cairo 1282, 1307); 4. al-Durra al-muḍīya fi Kirā'at al-A'imma al-thalātha al-marḍīya, poem of 241 Ṭawil verses, finished 823 = 1420; pr. Cairo 1285, 1308); 5. Hidāyat (var. Ghāyat) al-Mahara fi Ziyādat al-ashara, poem on the same subject (Aya Sofya, N^o. 39); 6. Mundjid al-Mukarrabin wa-Murshid al-Tālibin, treatise in seven chapters on the same subject (Berlin, N^o. 656); 7. 41 Ṭawil verses rhyming in lā on 40 difficult questions of Qur'ān readings (Berlin, N^o. 526); 8. al-Mukaddima al-Djazariya, a poem of 110 Radjāz verses on the recitation of the Qur'ān (pr. Cairo 1282, 1307); 9. al-Tamhid fi 'Ilm al-Tadrijid, treatise on the recitation of the Qur'ān, finished 769 = 1367 (Paris Bibl. Nat., N^o. 592, ii.); 10. Kifāyat al-Alma'i fi Ayat ya Arḍi 'blā'i, on the different ways of reciting Sūra xi. 46 (Khed. Libr., Fihrr., vii. 578); 11. Mukhtaṣar Ṭabaḳāt al-Kurra' al-musammā bi-Ghāyat al-Nihāya, the shorter of two works which the author devoted to the same subject (Constantinople, Nūr-i 'Osmāniya, N^o. 85); 12. Mukaddimat 'Ilm al-Hadith, on the technology of Hadith (Berlin, Vers., N^o. 1084); 13. al-Hidāya ilā Ma'ālīm al-Riwāya, a poem of 370 Radjāz verses on the tradition of Qur'ān recitation preserved by the Qur'ān readers (Escorial, Casiri, N^o. 1786, 1808); 14. Iḳd al-La'āl fi 'l-Aḥādith al-musalsala wal-awālī, finished 808 = 1405 at Shirāz (Paris, Bibl. Nat., N^o. 4577, iii.; a similar work is contained in N^o. 4577, iv.); 15. al-Risāla al-bayāniya fi Haḳḳ Abawāt al-Nabī, a treatise on the conversion of the parents of the prophet to Islām (Berlin, N^o. 10343); 16. al-Mawlid al-kabīr, a biography of the Prophet (Brit. Mus., Suppl., N^o. 515); 17. Dhāt al-Shifā fi Sirat al-Nabī wa 'l-Khulafā, a Radjāz poem on the biography of the Prophet and the first four caliphs with a brief survey of the history of Islām to the reign of Bāyazīd and the siege of Constantinople by the Turks, composed at the request of Pīr Muḥammad, ruler of Shirāz, and finished on the 25th Dhū 'l-Hijja 798 = 30th Sept. 1396 (Mss. in Brockelmann); 18. al-Hiṣn al-ḥaṣin min Kalām Saiyid al-Mursalin, a Hadith collection for use in prayers (pr. Cairo 1279, 1315; Algier 1328); 19. Mukhtaṣar al-Naṣiḥa bi 'l-Adillat al-ṣāḥiḥa, a treatise on ethics based on Hadith texts (Khed. Libr., Fihrr., vii. 564); 20. al-Zahr al-fāḥiḥ, an exhortation to virtue (pr. Cairo 1305, 1310); 21. al-Isāba fi Lawāzim al-Kitāba, a short treatise on calligraphy (Berlin, N^o. 6); 22. 52 Radjāz verses on astronomy (Berlin, N^o. 8159, iii.).

IBN DJAZLA, ABŪ 'ALĪ YAḤYĀ B. 'ISĀ of Baghdad, known in the West as Ben Gesla, was a Christian, but, under the influence of his Muṭtazili schoolmaster, he turned Muḥammadan on the 11th Djumādā II 466 (11th Febr. 1074). On account of his fine handwriting he was employed as copyist by the Ḥanafī kādī at Baghdad. He learnt medicine from Sa'īd b. Hibat Allāh, physician to the Caliph al-Muḳtaḍī. He lived in the Karkh quarter of Baghdad and not only gave his services both to the people of that quarter and to his own acquaintances without reward, but supplied them with medicine as well. He died in Sha'bān 493 (June 1100). His best known work is the Takwīm al-Abdān fi Tadbīr al-Insān, tables in which diseases are arranged as are the stars in astronomical tables, of which a Latin version was printed at Strassburg in 1532. He also drew up an alphabetical list of medicinal herbs and drugs called Minhādī al-Bayān finā yasta'miluhū 'l-Insān for the Caliph al-Muḳtaḍī. He composed, besides, a treatise against Christianity, and wrote verses.

IBN DJINNĪ, ABŪ 'L-FATH 'UTHMĀN, was born in Mōsul before 300 A. H. (Pröbster, p. x., ca. 320), the son of a Greek slave belonging to Sulaimān b. Fahd b. Aḥmad al-Azdī. His teacher was the Baṣrī Abū 'Alī al-Fārisī al-Fasawī, with whom he was associated for forty years till the latter's death, partly at the court of Saif al-Dawla in Ḥalab and partly at the court of 'Aḍud al-Dawla in Persia; according to Yāḳūt, he held the post of Kātib al-Inshā' at the court of the latter and his successor. In both places he was on friendly terms with al-Mutanabbī, with whom he discussed grammatical questions and on whose Diwān he wrote a commentary. He also sought other teachers (Rescher, p. 5 sq.). He succeeded al-Fārisī in Baghdad and died in 392 = 1002. He devoted himself especially to grammar and is celebrated as the most learned authority on taṣrif; he occupied a position midway between the Kūfa and Baṣra schools. His most important works are Kitāb Sirr al-Ṣinā'a wa-Asrār al-Balāgha (on Arabic vowels and consonants) and Kitāb al-Khaṣā'is fi 'Ilm Uṣūl al-'Arabiya; besides other philological works he also wrote poems.

IBN DJUBAIR, ABŪ 'L-ḤUSAIN MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD AL-KINĀNĪ, Arab traveller, born at Valencia in 540 (1145), studied fiqh and ḥadīth at Játiva, to which his family belonged. As secretary to the governor of Granada Abū Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Mu'min, he is said to have been forced to drink wine on one occasion and to atone for this sin he undertook a pilgrimage. From Granada he set out in 1183 via Tarifa to Ceuta and thence by ship to Alexandria. As the Christians barred the usual way to Mecca he had to travel by Cairo, Kūs, 'Aidhāb and Djidda. He afterwards visited Medina, Kūfa, Baghdād, Mōsul, Aleppo, and Damascus and then embarked at Acre for Sicily to return to Granada via Cartagena in 1185. He travelled in the East on two further occasions, 585—587 (1189—1191) and 614 (1217), but on the latter journey he only reached Alexandria, where he died. His description of his travels is one of the most important works in Arabic literature, and is also particularly important for the history of Sicily under William the Good. Cf. M. Amari, Voyage en Sicile sous le règne de Guillaume le Bon, texte arabe suivi d'une traduction et de notes, 1846, and his Bibliotheca Arabico-Sicula; edition of the Arabic text by Wright, Leiden 1852, new edition by de Goeje, 1907 (Gibb Memorial, vol. v.); Italian transl. by Schiaparelli: Viaggia in Ispagna, Sicilia, Siria e Palestina, Mesopotamia, Arabia, Egitto etc., 1906.

IBN DUḲMĀK, ŠARIM AL-DĪN IBRĀHĪM B. MUḤAMMAD AL-MĪSĪ (the name is derived from the Turkish tuḡmak "hammer", cf. Ḥādjī Khalifa, ii. 102) was a zealous Ḥanafī and wrote a work on the ṭabaqāt of the Ḥanafis, Naẓm al-Djumān, in 3 volumes, the first of which deals with Abū Ḥanīfa (Ḥādjī Khalifa, iv. 136, vi. 317); on account of his depreciatory references to al-Shāfi'ī he was flogged and thrown into prison. His history of Egypt, Nuẓhat al-Anām, in about 12 vols. to the year 779, was of the greatest importance (Ḥādjī Khalifa, ii. 102; vi. 323; G. Weil, Gesch. d. Chalifen, iv. vii. sq.). By command of the Sultān al-Malik al-Zāhir Barkūk he wrote a history of the rulers of Egypt to the year 805; he further wrote a separate history of this Sultān, ʿIqd al-Djawāhir fī Sirat al-Malik al-Zāhir Barkūk, abbreviated under the title Yanbūʿ al-Maẓāhir (Ḥādjī Khalifa, ii. 102; iv. 230; vi. 514). According to Ḥādjī Khalifa, his historical works were largely utilised by al-ʿAini and al-ʿAskalānī (i. 442; ii. 118). A work now lost dealt with Cairo and Alexandria. He wrote a large work on 10 cities of Islām, Kitāb al-Intiṣār li-Wāsiṭat ʿIqd al-Amṣār, devoting one volume to each city; of these the volumes describing Cairo and Alexandria are preserved in Cairo and have been published by Vollers. According to Vollers (p. 4) he used better authorities than al-Makrizī. The latter, for a time his pupil, did not use his work, according to Vollers. Ibn Duḡmāk also wrote a work on Ṣūfī biographies, al-Kunūs al-maḥḥfiya fī Taʾriḫ al-Ṣūfiya, also a book on the organisation of the army, Tarājumān al-Zamān (Ḥādjī Khalifa, ii. 277), and a book on the interpretation of dreams, Farāʾid al-Fawāʾid (l. c., iv. 392). According to al-Suyūṭī, Ḥuṣn al-Muḥādara fī Akhbār Miṣr wa 'l-Kāhira, i. 255, he died in 790 = 1388, aged over 80; so also Ḥādjī Khalifa, i. 447; ii. 102, 277; but in any case he was still alive in 793 (s. Vollers, Introduction) and Ḥādjī Khalifa elsewhere gives the date of his death as 809 = 1406 (ii. 149; iv. 230, 392; vi. 323, 357, 514).

IBN L-DUMAINA, ʿABD ALLĀH B. ʿUBAID ALLĀH B. AḤMAD, ABU 'L-SARĪ, an Arab poet of the clan of ʿĀmir b. Taim Allāh of Khathʿam. Very little is known of his life. In the Kit. al-Aghānī it is related that he treacherously slew Muzāḥim b. ʿAmr, a relative of his wife Ḥammā' who had relations with her and had reviled him in a poem, and then strangled Ḥammā' and beat to death her little daughter. Ibn al-Dumaina was arrested on the accusation of Djanāḥ, the murdered man's brother, but was released for want of evidence. A long time afterwards he was attacked in Tabāla, while reciting his poems, by Muṣʿab, another brother of Muzāḥim, and mortally wounded. According to another tradition, a (second?) attempt by Muṣʿab on his life in the market place of al-Ablā' was successful. If the Aḥmad b. Ismāʿil, mentioned in Aghānī, xv. 153, 9 sqq., is identical with the governor of Mecca who appears in Ṭab., iii. 740, Ibn al-Dumaina was a contemporary of al-Rashid.

His poems were highly prized and several were set to music. The Mss. Berl., Verz., No. 7476, i., and No. 8255, i., are said to contain several of his kaṣidas with biographical details. Al-Zubair b. Bakkār wrote a Kit. Akhbār Ibn al-Dumaina, as did Ibn Abī Ṭāhir Ṭāifūr (Fikr., p. 111, 12 sq., 147 s.).

IBN DURAID, ABU BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤASAN B. ʿATĀHIYA AL-AZDĪ (on the name Duraid, see Ḥamāsa, ed. Freytag, p. 377 i. m.), according to his own account, a native of Ḳaṭṭān, was born in the reign of al-Muʿtaṣim in 223 = 837 in Baṣra (in the Sikka Ṣāliḥ). He studied in Baṣra under such teachers as Abū Ḥatīm al-Sidjistānī, al-Riyāshī, al-Uṣhnandānī and al-Aṣmaʿī's nephew. In 257, when the Zandj were massacring in Baṣra, he escaped the danger and went with his uncle al-Ḥasan (others al-Ḥusain), who had undertaken his education, to ʿOman where he spent 12 years. He then went to Djazirat Ibn ʿOmar (read this for ʿUmāra; Ibn Khallikān has Baṣra) and thence to Fārs, where he stayed at the court of the Mikālids as their favourite and was chief of a Diwān. He compiled for them a Kitāb al-Djamhara fī 'Ilm al-Lughā, which is dedicated to Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Ismāʿil b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Mikāl (Ḥādjī Khalifa, ii. No. 4202), and he wrote in honour of the Mikālids his famous poem Maḳṣūra (on the difference between Ibn Hishām, al-Masʿūdī, and Ibn Khallikān with regard to the names of the corresponding Mikālids see Axel Moberg, Gedichte von ʿObeidallāh b. Aḥmed al-Mikālī, Leipzig, 1908, p. 10). He had older models for this kind of poetry, in which each verse ends in an alif maḳṣūra (see al-Masʿūdī, Murūdī, viii. 304) and was himself imitated by his successors; this poem has been several times annotated and published. When the Mikālids were deposed in 308 = 920 and migrated to Ḳhurāsān Ibn Duraid went to Baghdād; here he was recommended by al-Khuwārī to the Caliph al-Muḡtadir and received from him a pension of 50 dinārs a month. In spite of the fact that he was a noted spendthrift and winedrinker, he reached a great age. When 90 he was seized with paralysis; he recovered however and lived two more years in spite of a second shock. He died in 321 = 933 on the same day as al-Djubbā'i and was buried in the 'Abbāsiya cemetery in Baghdād. He is represented as the most learned philologist of his time and the best critic of poetry; he is also called al-ʿlamu 'l-Shu'arā' wa-ash'aru 'l-ʿUlamā'. Besides the great dictionary, al-Djamhara, he wrote on various special branches of lexicography, e.g. Kitāb al-Sarj wa 'l-Liḡām (ed. Wright, in Opuscula Arabica, Leiden 1859), two books on the horse, one on weapons, on clouds and rain, on ambiguous expressions useful for one forced to swear an oath (Kitāb al-Malāhin, ed. Thorbecke, Heidelberg 1882) etc. His philology was to him a patriotic duty; against people like the Shu'ūbiya he wrote the Kitāb al-Ishṭikāḡ (ed. Wustenfeld, Göttingen 1854) to explain the etymological connections of Arab names (see Goldziher, Muhammadianische Studien, i. 209). Among his pupils were al-Shirāfi, al-Marzubāni, Abu 'l-Faradī 'Alī al-Iṣbahāni.

IBN FAḌL ALLĀH. [See FAḌL ALLĀH.]

IBN FAḌLĀN, properly Aḥmad b. Faḍlān b. al-ʿAbbās b. Rāshid b. Ḥammād, Arab author, composer of an account (risāla) of the embassy sent by the Caliph al-Muqtadir to the king of the Volga Bulgḥārs [cf. BULGHĀR, i. 786 sqq.]. As he was a client (marwā) of the Caliph and of the conqueror of Egypt Muḥammad b. Sulaimān [see CAIRO, i. 818^a] he was certainly not of Arab origin. He seems to have taken part in the embassy as a theologian and authority on religious matters. The real ambassador appointed by the government was Susan al-Rassi, a client of Nuḡhair al-Ḥarami mentioned by Arib (ed. de Goeje, p. 58). The embassy left Baghdād on the 11th Ṣafar 309 (21st June 921), went first to Bukhārā, thence to Khwārizm, and only then to the land of the Bulgḥārs, the capital of which was reached on the 12th Muḥarram 310 (12th May 912). Nothing is known of the route or time of the return to Baghdād; as little is known of the life of the author of the Risāla. The latter seems to be used as early as the 10th (xth) century by al-Iṣṭakhrī and al-Mas'ūdī; it is expressly quoted and extracts given by Yāqūt (s. v. Itil, Bāshghird, Bulgḥār, Khazar, Khwārizm and Rūs); the work is only known to later writers from these quotations, although Yāqūt (i. 113, 15) mentions specially that in his time the Risāla was extant in numerous copies. Cf. C. Brockelmann, Gesch. der arab. Litt.,

i. 227 sq.; Bar. V. Rosen, Prolegomena k novomu izdaniju Ibn Fādlaana (Zapiski Vost. Otd. Imp. Russk. Arkh. Obsht., xv. 39 sq.); bibliographical references also there. (W. BARTHOLOD.)

IBN AL-FAḌĪH, Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Ishāḡ al-Ḥamadhāni, Arab geographer, wrote a comprehensive Kitāb al-Bulḍān, about the year 290 (903), which is often quoted by al-Muḥaddasi and Yāqūt. The work itself is lost; a compendium prepared from it which, according to de Goeje, is possibly the work of a certain 'Alī b. Ḥasan al-Shaizari (about 413 = 1022) was published by the latter scholar in 1885 (Bibl. Geogr. Arab., Vol. v.). He is further said to have written a book on the best poets of his time. Practically nothing is known of the life of the author; to the few data collected by de Goeje in his Praefatio may be added a brief notice in Yāqūt's Irshād al-Arib, ed. Margoliouth, ii. 63, from which it appears that he and his father were both celebrated as traditionists.

IBN AL-FARĀḌĪ, Abū 'l-Walīd 'Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad b. Yūsuf b. Naṣr al-Azdi b. al-Farāḍī, an Arab biographer, born in the night of the 23rd Dhū 'l-Ka'da 351 = 22nd/23rd Dec. 962 in Cordova, studied law and tradition there as well as literature and history, particularly with Abū Zakariyā Yahyā b. Malik b. 'Ā'idh and with the ḡaḍī Muḥammad b. Yahyā b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, known as al-Kharraz.

In 382 (992) he made the pilgrimage and on his way attended the lectures of the jurist Ibn Abī Zaid al-Kairawāni and Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Khalaf al-Kābisī in Kairawān and also studied in Cairo, Mecca and Medina. Returning to Spain he taught for a time in Cordova and then became ḡaḍī of Valencia in the reign of the Marwānīd Muḥammad al-Mahdī. During the conquest and sack of Cordova by the Berbers he was murdered in his house on Monday the 6th Shawwāl 403 = 20th April 1013. His body was not found till the fourth day after his death in a heap of rubbish, already so disfigured and decomposed that it had to be buried without washing and without a winding-sheet. It is said that on his pilgrimage to Mecca Ibn al-Farāḍī seized the covering of the Ka'ba and prayed God that he might die a martyr's death, but afterwards regretted his prayer when he thought of the horrors of a violent end, although he hesitated to recall his petition out of reverence for the pact he had made with God. He had an extensive knowledge of law, Ḥadīth, literature, and history and had collected a valuable library on his travels. Only one work of his has survived, a Kitāb Tarīkh 'Ulamā' al-Andalus, a collection of biographies of the Arab scholars of Spain (ed. by Codera, Bibl. Ar.-Hisp., vii. viii., Madrid 1891).

IBN FARĀḤ AL-ISHBĪLĪ, whose full name was SHIHĀB AL-DĪN ABU 'L-'ABBĀS AḤMAD B. FARĀḤ B. AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD AL-LĀḤMĪ AL-ISHBĪLĪ AL-SHĀRĪFĪ, born in 625 (began 10th December 1227) at Sevilla (Ishbiliya), was taken prisoner in 646 (began 26th April 1248) by the Franks (al-Ifrandj) i. e. the Spaniards under Ferdinand III the Saint, of Castile (1217—1252) at the conquest of the Spanish capital of the Almohads [q. v.], Seville, but escaped and afterwards went, in the sixth decade of the century (650 sqq. = 1252 sqq.), to Egypt; after hearing the most celebrated teachers of Cairo, he studied under those of Damascus, where he settled and gave lectures in the Umayyad mosque, as a great authority on Tradition, while he declined the professorship offered him in the school of Tradition, Dār al-Hadīth al-Nuriya. Among those who heard him were al-Dimiyāṭī (cf. al-Kutubī, Fawā'id al-Wafayāt, ii. 17), al-Yūnīnī [q. v.], al-Mukāṭilī, al-Nābulusī, Abū Muḥammad b. al-Walīd, al-Birzālī [q. v.], and notably the great authority on history and tradition al-Dhahabī [q. v.]. He died in the tūrbe of Umm al-Sālīḥ of diarrhoea (bi 'l-ishāl) on the 9th Dju-mādā II 699 = 19th February 1300. Nur al-Ṣuyūfī, Ṭabaqāt al-Mufasssīn (ed. Meursinge), N^o. 88, (wrongly) makes our Ibn Farāḥ the son of another, the well-known author of the eschatological Tadhkira bi Aḥwāl al-Mawtā wa Umūr al-Akḥira and of the great Kūr'ān-commentary, Djāmi' Aḥkām al-Kur'ān, Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Abī Bakr b. Farāḥ (al-Makḥkarī, i. 600, wrongly b. Fardj) al-Anṣārī al-Mālikī al-Kurtubī, died 9th Shawwāl 671 = 29th April 1273.

Ibn Farāḥ al-Ishbīlī's most celebrated work is the scholastic didactic poem on 28 technical expressions of the science of Tradition in 20 (Hādjdjī Khalifa, vi. 190, wrongly gives 30) Ṭawīl verses with the rhyme-letter (rawī) l (hence Lāmiya) in the form of a love-poem, so that it was described correctly by al-Ṣafādī in al-Makḥkarī, i. 819, as a Ḳaṣīda ḡhasaliya fī Alḳāb al-Hadīth (a love-poem on technical expressions of Tradition) (Brockelmann's quotation, i. 372, al-Makḥkarī, i. 819, l. 819). It is usually called Manẓūmat Ibn Farāḥ or Ḡharāmī Ṣaḥīḥ after the two opening words of the first verse: Ḡharāmī ṣaḥīḥ wa 'l-Radjā fika muḍālu — wa-Huṣnī wa-Dam'i mursal wamu-salsalu "My longing is real, but my desire which is set on thee is difficult to gratify; my misery unceasing, my tears uninterrupted."

The text of the Ḳaṣīda was first printed by Krehl in al-Makḥkarī's Analectes, i. 819 sq. (from al-Ṣafādī) and again in Madmūc al-Mutūn, Cairo 1313, p. 51 sq., and in al-Subkī's Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'iya al-kubrā, v. 12 sq. (Cairo 1324 = 1906-7), where only 18 verses are given. The commentary of 'Izz al-Dīn Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Djāmā'a al-Kinānī, died 816 = 1413, Zawāl al-Tarāḥ fī Sharḥ Manẓūmat Ibn Farāḥ, is published by Fr. Risch, Leiden 1885 (there is another Ms. not yet used, in the British Museum, Cat. Cod. Orient., ii. N^o. 169, ii.); in the notes there is also published almost the entire commentary of Shams al-Dīn Abū 'Abd Allāh b. 'Abd al-Hādī al-Makḥdisī, died 744 = 1343 (s. al-Dhahabī, Ṭab. al-Huffāz, ed. Wüstenfeld, xxi. N^o. 12) from the Mss. Leiden, Cat. Cod. Or., iv., N^o.

1749, and Gotha, N^o. 578 (s. Pertsch, v. 20). We may also mention that Berlin, Verz., N^o. 1055, Ta'liq 'alā Manẓūmat Ibn Farāḥ, gloss on Ibn Farāḥ's poem of the year 894 = 1489, is not a gloss on 'Izz al-Dīn's commentary, as Brockelmann says, but belongs to the poem itself: Cairo i. 2, 250, contains the commentary of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Khālil al-Titāi (Boinet, Dictionnaire, p. 154 and 899) al-Mālikī, died 937 = 1530-1, al-Bah-djat al-saniya fī Hall al-Ishārāt al-Sunniya. The principal nisba of the commentator Yahyā b. 'Abd al-Raḥman al-Iṣfahānī, i. e. al-Karāfi, by which alone he is often quoted, is not given by Brockelmann [Paris 4267, l. 4257, i. (Cat. de Slane)]. Muḥammad b. al-Amīr al-Kathīr in Brockelmann is rather Muhammad (b. Muhammad) al-Amīr al-Kabīr, according to Berlin, Verz., N^o. 1056.

Besides Ibn Farāḥ's didactic poem there is also a commentary by him on al-Nawawī's [q. v.] 40 Traditions, Sharḥ al-arbā'in Hadīth al-Nawawīya, Berlin, N^o. 1488-9.

IBN FARḤŪN, BURḤĀN AL-DĪN IBRĀHĪM B. 'ALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD B. ABU 'L-KĀSĪM B. MUḤAMMAD B. FARḤŪN AL-YAMAKĪ, a Mālikī jurist and historian, descendant of a family belonging to Uiyān, a village near Jaén in Spain, was born in Medina, where he died, heavily in debt, on the 10th Dhū 'l-Hijja 799 = 4th Sept. 1397, as the result of paralysis of his left side.

In addition to his father, his teachers were his father's brother, Abū Muḥammad Sharaf al-Dīn al-Asnawī, Djāmāl al-Dīn al-Damanhūrī Muḥammad b. 'Arafa, and the latter's son, whose teaching Ibn Farḥūn received on his pilgrimage in 792 = 1390, and others. He often visited Cairo and in 792 (1390) Jerusalem and Damascus. In Rabī' II, 793 = March 1391 he became kādī of Medina. As a devout Muslim he frequently recited the Kūr'ān and often repeated the Kūr'ānic prayers (wird); he also reintroduced the Mālikī rite into Medina. He is the author of the following works:

1. Tabṣīrat al-Hukkām fī Uṣūl al-Aḳdiya wa Manāhidj al-Aḥkām, a treatise on legal practice according to the Mālikī school (pr. Cairo 1301; 1302; Bulāḳ 1300); 2. al-Dibādj al-mudḥhab fī Mārīfat A'yān 'Ulamā' al-Madḥhab, a collection of about 630 biographies of Mālikī jurists compiled from about 20 works detailed at the end and finished in Sha'bān 761 = June 1360 (according to Codera, in 857 = 1453 the text was revised cf. also Houtsma, Catal. d'une Coll. de manuscr., etc., Leiden 1889, N^o. 204; pr. Fās 1316, Cairo 1329). This work is often quoted as Ṭabaqāt 'Ulamā' al-'Arab oder Ṭabaqāt al-Mālikīya; 3. Durar (var. Nubdhāt) al-Ḡhawwās fī Muḥādarat al-Khawwās, a collection of riddles on various points of Mālikī law (Khed. Libr., Fikr., iii. 187); 4. Tashīl al-muḥimmāt fī Sharḥ Djāmi' al-Ummahāt, a commentary on the legal handbook of Ibn al-Hādij (Brit. Mus., Cat., N^o. 872, ix.).

IBN AL-FĀRĪD. [See OMAR B. AL-FĀRĪD.]

IBN FĀRIS, ABU 'L-ḤUSAIN AḤMAD B. FĀRIS B. ZAKARIYĀ B. MUḤAMMAD B. ḤABĪB, philologist and grammarian of the school of Kūfa, died at al-Raiy in Ṣafar 395 = Nov.—Dec. 1004. The date and place of his birth are unknown but it is supposed that he was born in a village named Kursuf in the district of al-Zahrā. He studied in Kāzwin, Hamadhān, Baghdad, and on the occasion of his pilgrimage, in Mecca. Among his teachers we may specially mention his father, who was a philologist and Shāfi'ī jurist, Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. al-Ḥasan al-Khaṭīb, Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī b. Ibrāhīm al-Kaṭṭān, Abū 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad b. Tāhir al-Munadjiḡim, etc.

After teaching for some time in Hamadhān, where the celebrated Badī' al-Zamān al-Ḥamadḥānī was his pupil, the Būyid Fakhr al-Dawla summoned him to al-Raiy as tutor to his son Maḥdī al-Dawla Abū Tālib. Originally an adherent of the Shāfi'ī school, he afterwards went over to the Māliki. He was so generous that he frequently gave the clothes he was wearing to the poor.

The Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād, who out of modesty called himself his pupil, declared that the works of Ibn Fāris were free from error. Although he himself was of Persian origin, Ibn Fāris defended the Arab grammarians in their controversies with the Shu'ūbiis.

He left the following works: 1. Kitāb al-Muḍjmal fī 'l-Lughā, an Arabic dictionary arranged after the first radical (Mss. cf. Brockelmann, l. c.); 2. al-Ṣāhibī fī Fikḥ al-Lughā wa-Sunan al-'Arab fī Kalāmihā, treatise on Arabic literature, lexicology and syntax (pr. Cairo 1910); 3. Kitāb al-Thalāṭha, in which the author endeavours to prove that words of 3 like consonants, in which 3 combinations are possible, are synonymous (Derenbourg, Les mss. arab. de l'Esc., N^o. 363, 3); 4. Awḍjaz al-Siyar li-Khaṭir al-Baṣhar, a brief biography of the Prophet (8 pp. Bombay n. d.); 5. Dhamm al-Khaṭa' fī 'l-Shi'r, a treatise on poetic license (Berlin, Verz. N^o. 7181); 6. Kitāb al-Itbā' wa 'l-Muḥawwajja, a collection of words which have similar form and are used in inseparable pairs (ed. by Brünnow in Orient. Studien, Th. Noldeke zum 70. Geburtstag gewidmet, Giessen 1906); 7. Kitāb al-Nairūz, Ḥabīb al-Zaiyāt, Khaṣā'in al-Kutub fī Dimashq etc., p. 29, N^o. 9, 3; 8. Kitāb al-Lāmāt, ib., p. 33, N^o. 71, 2.

(MOH. BEN CHENEB.)

1. ABU 'L-ḤASAN 'ALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD B. Mūsā B. AL-ḤASAN B. AL-FURĀT, born in 241 = 855.

'Alī belonged to the district of al-Nahrawān and was first of all secretary of State in Baghdad. After the unsuccessful attempt to place Ibn al-Mu'tazz [q. v.] on the throne, 'Alī was appointed vizier in Rabī' I 296 (December 908) by the Caliph al-Muqtadir and became the real ruler. In Dhu 'l-Ḥijja 299 (July 912) he was dismissed on the pretext that he had arranged a raid on the capital with the rapacious Bedouins. To make his former favourite harmless, the Caliph had him imprisoned and confiscated his vast wealth. He managed to regain the Caliph's confidence however and was set free in Dhu 'l-Ḥijja 304 (June 917) and restored to office. The wars and extravagances of the vizier brought the finances of the State into disorder and this brought about his fall. In Djumādā I 306 (November 918) he was dismissed for a second time, imprisoned and had all his property confiscated. He succeeded in being pardoned again through the influence of his son al-Muḥassin and in Rabī' II 311 (August 923) the Caliph made him vizier for the third time. His avacious and revengeful nature made him so hated however that al-Muqtadir had finally to get rid of him. In Rabī' I 312 (June 924) 'Alī and al-Muḥassin were arrested and executed on 13th Rabī' II of the same year (July 19th 924).

2. ABU 'ABD ALLĀH (or ABU 'L-KHAṬṬĀB) DĪA' FAR B. MUḤAMMAD, brother of the preceding. After 'Alī b. al-Furāt had been appointed vizier in 296 (908), he entrusted his brother with the administration of the finances of the eastern and western provinces. According to the usual date Dīa'far died as early as Shawwāl 297 (Juni-July 910). His office was then divided between the vizier's two sons, al-Faḍl and al-Muḥassin, so that the former administered the eastern and the latter the western provinces.

3. ABU 'L-FATH AL-FADL B. DĪA' FAR B. MUḤAMMAD, son of the preceding, born in Sha'bān 279 (November 892), also called Ibn Ḥinẓaba after his mother Ḥinẓaba, a Greek slave. In 320 (932) he was appointed vizier by al-Muqtadir, but absolute anarchy was then reigning in the capital and, as the new vizier was not able to cope with the situation, he had to call in the aid of Mu'nis, the commander of the body guard. When the latter advanced in the town, the Caliph was persuaded to go out against him. Al-Muqtadir's troops were defeated and he himself slain. Al-Faḍl thus lost his office. He was appointed collector of taxes for Egypt and Syria under the caliphate of al-Rāḍī; the actual ruler however was not the Caliph but the Amir al-Umarā' Muḥammad b. Rā'ik. In 324 (936) or 325 (937) the latter induced the Caliph to make al-Faḍl vizier; but he was weak and not fitted for such a post and by the next year we find him begging permission from Ibn Rā'ik to retire to Syria to attend to the revenues of that province and of Egypt. Ibn Muḳla succeeded him as vizier. Al-Faḍl died in 327 (939).

4. ABU 'L-FADL DĪJĀFAR B. AL-FADL B. DĪJĀFAR B. MUḤAMMAD, son of the preceding, born in Dhū 'l-Hijja 308 (April 921). DĪJĀFAR, who was also called Ibn Hinzāba, held the office of vizier to the Ikshidids in Egypt. The real ruler however was the Abyssinian Kāfur, under whose protection DĪJĀFAR held office and who was soon recognised in name also as king. On Kāfur's death in 357 (968) the minor Aḥmad b. 'Alī b. al-Ikshid became head of the dynasty, while DĪJĀFAR continued in office. Although the vizier by no means omitted to practice all kinds of extortion he was unable to satisfy the claims of the Kāfurids, the Ikshidids and the Turkish mercenaries, and had twice to hide while the mutineers plundered his palace and the houses of some of his followers. The real ruler was now Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan b. 'Abd Allāh b. Tughdī, the commander of the Syrian troops. In 358 (969) the latter appeared in Egypt, arrested DĪJĀFAR and appointed al-Ḥasan b. DĪJĀBIR al-Riyāḥī vizier. DĪJĀFAR was soon released and when Ḥasan returned to Syria, he restored the government of Egypt to his hands. In the same year however the Ikshidids were overthrown. DĪJĀFAR died in Ṣafar or in Rabī' I 391 (January 1001) or, according to another authority, in Ṣafar 392 (Jan. 1002).

IBN AL-FURĀT, NĀṢIR AL-DĪN MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABD AL-RAḤM B. 'ALĪ AL-MIṢRĪ, Arab historian, b. 735 (1334), d. 807 (1405), author of a comprehensive chronicle, Tārīkh al-Duwal wa 'l-Mulūk. He began with the viiith century and worked backwards but only reached the fourth century A. H. He gave extracts from his predecessors verbatim which adds a high value to his work. The only manuscript (Vienna, cf. Flügel, Die arab. . . . Hss., No. 824) is still unedited, although it has been used by several scholars.

Bibliography: See Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., ii, 50 and Nachträge.

IBN GHĀNIM, 'IZZ AL-DĪN 'ABD AL-SALĀM B. AḤMAD AL-MAQDISI, author of the well-known Kashf al-Asrār 'an Hikam al-Tuḡūr wa 'l-Azhār, which was published in 1821 by Garcin de Tassy under the title Les oiseaux et les fleurs (repr. in Allégories, récits poétiques, etc., 1876); German transl. by Peiper, Stimmen aus dem Morgenlande, Hirschberg 1850. Other works are detailed by Brockelmann, Geschichte etc., i, 450 (cf. ii, 703). Biographical details are lacking. The year 678 (1279) is given as the year of his death.

The same name Ibn Ghānim al-Maqdisi is also given to a Hanafī jurist on whom cf. Brockelmann, op. cit., ii, 312.

IBN GHĀNIYA, YAḤYĀ B. 'ALĪ B. YUSUF AL-MASŪFĪ, Governor of Spain under the Almoravids, born in Cordova, according to Ibn al-Khaṭīb, and died in 543 (1148) at Granada. He is best known as Ibn Ghāniya, after his mother, a relative of the great Yūsuf b. Tāshfin, the real founder of the Almoravid empire.

Ibn Ghāniya, as well as his brother Muḥammad grew up at the Almoravid court of Marrākush, where their father seems to have held a high position. In 520 (1126) 'Alī b. Yūsuf appointed Ibn Ghāniya governor of Western Spain. From 520—538 (1126—1143) he successfully warded off the attacks of the Christians and completely defeated the army of Alfonso the Fighter, King of Aragon in 528 (1133—1134) at Fraga. Beginning about 538 (1143) however, the revolutionary movement of the Andalusian Muslims (Agarenos) against the Almoravid empire, led by chiefs like Abu 'l-Kāsim Aḥmad (Abencasi), the Qāḍī Ibn Ḥamdīn of Cordova, Abu 'l-Hākim b. Ḥassūn of Malaga, al-Mustanṣir b. Ḥud (Zafadola) of Saragossa and many others so shattered Almoravid dominion in Spain that it soon fell to pieces.

The governor Ibn Ghāniya, who lived in Seville, performed prodigies of valour and showed great qualities in organising the resistance. He recaptured Cordova in 539 (Jan. 1146) from Ibn Ḥamdīn, who then obtained the support of Alfonso VII of Castile. Ibn Ghāniya had to retire before the latter's army to the citadel of Cordova in 540 (1146). The arrival in Spain of the first Almohad armies forced Alfonso VII to abandon Cordova to Ibn Ghāniya, who however became his vassal. In face of Alfonso VII's increasing demands, Ibn Ghāniya allied himself with the Almohad general Barrāz, governor of Seville, with whom he exchanged Cordova and Carmona for Jaén in 543 = 1148.

The successes of the Almohads were rapid and soon Grenada alone remained to the Almoravids, while Ibn Mardaniṣh [q. v.], an independent lord, was master of Murcia, Valencia and the whole of Eastern Spain.

One of Ibn Ghāniya's last acts of loyalty to the Almoravid empire was to send to Ceuta the governor al-Saḥrāwī at the Qāḍī 'Iyād's request in 543 (1148). He died soon afterwards in Granada on the 10th Sha'bān 543 (December 1148), when the ruin of the Almoravids had been completed in Spain.

Ibn Ghāniya seems to have left no children. If we may believe Ibn al-Khaṭīb in the Iḥāṭa, he early sent away his wife, lest her company might diminish his warlike ardour. His brother Muḥammad, appointed governor of the Balearic Islands [q. v., i, 617^b] in 520 A. H., left sons, who with their descendants maintained Almoravid rule there till 580 (1188). It was the grandsons of Muḥammad who attempted an Almoravid restoration in Barbary, where they fought till 633 (1235—1236) against the Almohads.

IBN AL-HABBĀRIYA, NIZĀM AL-DĪN ABŪ YA'LA MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD, a celebrated Arab poet, a descendant of the 'Abbāsīd prince ʿĪsā b. Mūsā [q. v.]; cf. his genealogy in Wüstenfeld, Tabellen, W, 35. His maternal grandfather was a certain Habbār, whence his name the "son of the Habbārī lady". Born at Baghdād about the middle of the 10th (xth) century he received his education at the madrasas, which had just been founded there, presumably at the Nizāmiya founded by Nizām al-Mulk in 459 (1067); but he could take no pleasure in theological disputes (cf. Ibn al-Athīr, x, 71, 80). He therefore spent his youth in the taverns of Kutrabbul, a suburb of Baghdād, in the company of the gay spirits and the jeunesse dorée of the capital of his day. He also fell a victim to sexual perversities, as he himself tells frankly in his poems. His great poetic gifts, his keen wit, his skill in the Arabic language, however, preserved him from utter ruin, but poverty forced him to come forward as a panegyrist of the rulers of his time, the Banū Dījāhīr and Nizām al-Mulk. His high birth and his fondness for satire unfitted him for this sycophantry and he soon quarrelled with his noble patrons. When, for example, the younger Ibn Dījāhīr became the Caliph's vizier for the second time in 484 (1091) through the favour of his father-in-law Nizām al-Mulk, our poet greeted this appointment with a biting satire which was soon on every one's lips. He did not even spare the Caliph and the all-powerful Nizām al-Mulk, so that it was only through the intercession of the influential Šadr al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Khūḍjandī, that the incident had no evil consequences for him. In the meanwhile, he had migrated from Baghdād to Isfahān, but his new patrons, the unfortunate viziers Tādī al-Mulk and Maḍdī al-Mulk, met a miserable fate in the troubled times that followed the death of Malikshāh and there was an end to his stay in Isfahān. He finally went to Kirmān, where the Salḍjūk Irānshāh had been reigning since 490 (1096), a prince in whom al-Habbāriya found a kindred spirit. Nothing is known with certainty of the rest of his life and various dates are given for his death. The correct one is perhaps that given by Sibṭ Ibn al-Djawzī, according to whom he died in 509 (1115).

The Diwān of Ibn al-Habbāriya which, according to Ibn Khallikān, contained four volumes, has unfortunately not survived to us, which is a great loss, for the study of contemporary history also. ʿImād al-Dīn gives rather long extracts in his Kharīda. He also wrote a rhymed version of the Kalīla wa-Dimna entitled Natāʾidj al-Fiṭna fi Naẓm Kalīla wa-Dimna (cf. Orientalische Studien, Th. Noldeke gewidmet, i, 41 sqq.); 2. a kind of anthology in 12 chapters entitled Fuḵ al-Maʿānī; cf. Barthold in Zapiski Vost. Otd. Imp. Arch. Obz., xviii, 0144 sqq.; 3. Kitāb al-Šādih wa ʿl-Bāghim, rhymed tales of a didactic nature after the style of Kalīla wa-Dimna. This poem is very popular in the East; the author worked on it for 10 years and dedicated it to the Mazyadī Šadaḳa b. Maṣṣūr. Ed. Cairo 1292, Bairūt 1886.

IBN ḤABĪB, ABŪ MARWĀN ʿABD AL-MALIK B. ḤABĪB AL-SULAMĪ, on Arab jurist, born at Ḥiṣn Wāt (Huétor Vega, according to Simonet) near Granada. He studied at Elvira and Cordova, then made the pilgrimage to Mecca and at Medina became acquainted with the Mālikī school of law which he introduced into Spain. He died at Cordova 238 (853). He is said to have published over 1000 writings on different subjects, but the only work (with the exception of an unimportant fragment), which has come down to us under his name, is, as Dozy, Recherches 3, i, 28, has pointed out, a later compilation.

IBN ḤABĪB, MUḤAMMAD, an Arab philologist, a pupil of Kutrūb [q. v.], died at Samarrā in 245 (859). Of his many works only a treatise on the similarities and differences between Arab tribal names has come down to us and was published by Wüstenfeld (Ueber die Gleichheit und Verschiedenheit der arabischen Stämmennamen, Göttingen 1850).

IBN ḤABĪB, BADR AL-DĪN ABŪ MUḤAMMAD AL-ḤASAN B. ʿOMAR AL-DIMASHQĪ AL-ḤALABĪ, an Arab historian and scholar, born at Damascus in 710 (1310). He studied at Ḥalab, where his father filled the office of muḥtasib and also taught tradition. In 733 (1332) he made the pilgrimage and again in 739 (1338). During these journeys he stayed in various towns of Egypt and Syria. We afterwards find him now at Ṭarābulus, now back in Damascus, then in Ḥalab, where he died in 779 (1377). Of his works, which are detailed by Wüstenfeld and Brockelmann, we may here mention his history of the Mamlūk Sulṭāns of Egypt from 648—777 (1250—1375), Durrat al-Asṭāk fi Mulk al-Aṭrāk, of which extracts have been published by Weyers and Meursinge in Orientalia, ii, 196 sq. Of quite another character is his work in rhymed prose, intermingled with verse, called Nasīm al-Šabā, and repeatedly printed in the East, e. g. Alexandria, 1289; Constantinople, 1302; Cairo, 1307.

IBN ḤADJAR AL-ʿAṢKALĀNĪ, whose full name was AḤMAD B. ʿALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿALĪ B. AḤMAD, SHUHAB AL-DĪN ABŪ ʿL-FADL, AL-KINĀNĪ AL-ʿAṢKALĀNĪ AL-MIṢRĪ AL-KĀHIRĪ, a famous authority on tradition, faḳīh and historian, of the Shāfiʿī school. He was born on the 12th Šaʿbān 773 (18th February 1372) in Old Cairo; his father Nūr al-Dīn, whom he lost along with his mother at a very early age, was a notable scholar and was entitled to deliver fatwās and impart instruction. The son grew up under the protection of one of his guardians, Zakī al-Dīn al-Kharrūbī, a prominent merchant. Even by his ninth year he knew the Qurʾān by heart and soon mastered the elementary works on Fīḵ and grammar. He then studied for a considerable period with the most noted scholars of his day, for example, Ḥadīth and Fīḵ with al-Bulḳīnī [q. v.], Ibn al-Mulakkīn (d. 804), ʿIzz al-Dīn Ibn Djamāʿa [see IBN DJAMĀʿA, 4], the various readings (kirāʾāt) of the Qurʾān with al-Tanūkhī, Arabic language and lexicography with Muḥibb al-Dīn Ibn Hishām (d. 799) and al-Firūzābādī [q. v.]. From 793 (beginning Dec. 1390) he devoted himself by preference to the study of Ḥadīth. For this purpose he undertook several journeys in Egypt, Syria Ḥidjāz and Yemen, which brought him into contact with philologists and literary men. He studied Ḥadīth for ten successive years with Zain al-Dīn al-ʿIrāqī (d. 800). The majority of his teachers granted him authority to deliver fatwās and impart instruction.

After several times declining to fill a judicial office he finally yielded to the entreaties of his friend, the Kāḍī ʿI-Kuḍāt Djamāl al-Dīn al-Bulḡinī, to act as his deputy. In Muḥarram 827 (Dec. 1423) he was appointed Chief Kāḍī. He held this office for about 21 years in all, being repeatedly dismissed and restored to office. At the same time he held professorships in various (al-Sakhāwī, mentions 10) mosques and madrasas, lecturing on Qurʾān exegesis, Ḥadīth and Fiqh. The lectures of the "authority on Ḥadīth of his day" (ḥāfiẓ ʿaṣ-rihi) were eagerly attended even by specialists. He was also mufti of the Dār al-ʿAdl, rectorwarden of the Baibarsiya, khatīb first in the Azhar and then in the Ḳubba al-Mahmūdiyya.

Ibn Ḥadjar, who was also esteemed as a writer both of prose and poetry, displayed a considerable literary activity; his works, several of which are very important for the study of Islām, were much sought after even in his lifetime, notably his commentary, Faṭḥ al-Bārī fī Sharḥ al-Bukhārī (Bulāḳ 1300-1), which was sold for 300 dinārs. Of his writings, the number of which is estimated at over 150, we may here mention: al-Isāba fī ʿam-yiz al-Ṣaḥāba (ed. Sprenger etc., Calcutta 1856-73, and Cairo 1323-5); Tahdhib al-Tahdhib (ed. Haidarābād 1325-27); Taʿdīl al-Manfaʿa bi-Zawāʿid Riḍāl al-ʿAimma al-arbaʿa (ibid. 1324); al-Kawāl al-musaddad fī ʿl-Dhabb ʿan al-Musnad li ʿl-Imām Aḥmad (ibid. 1319); Bulūgh al-Marām min Adillat al-Aḥkām fī ʿlīm al-Ḥadīth (Cairo 1330); Nukhbat al-Fikar fī Muṣṭalah Ahl al-Aḥzar and Nushat al-Naṣar fī Tarwīḥ Nukhbat al-Fikar (ed. Lees etc., Bibl. Ind., New Ser., No. 37, Calcutta 1862); al-Durar al-kāmina fī ʿAʿyān al-Mīʾa al-thāmina; Inbāʾ al-Ghumr bi-Aḥnāʾ al-ʿUmr; Rafʿ al-ʿIṣr ʿan Kuḍāt Miṣr (MSS. of these three works in Brockelmann; select biographies from the latter are published by R. Guest in the appendix to The Governors and Judges of Egypt, Gibb Mem., Vol. xix.); Tawālīf al-Taʿsis fī Maʿālī Ibn Idrīs and Dirwān (printed together Bulāḳ 1301); Ghibṭat al-Nāṣir fī Tardjamat al-Shaiḫh ʿAbd al-Ḳādir, ed. E. D. Ross, Calcutta 1903. — Further information on these works is given in Brockelmann, op. cit., where several other writings are mentioned; cf. also Landberg, Cat. de Mss. arabes..., No. 31, 32, 53, 67, 88, 98, 106, 228, 279, 319; Houtsma, Cat. d'une Coll., No. 763, 764 (?), 783 II, 1026 (?); Vollers, *Die islam. ... Ibn Ḥadjar died towards the end of Dhu ʿl-Hidjja 852 (Febr. 1449). His pupil al-Sakhāwī wrote a very full biography of him entitled al-Djawāhir wa ʿl-Durar fī Tardjamat Shaiḫh al-Islām Ibn Ḥadjar.

IBN HADJAR AL-HAITAMĪ, whose full name was Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī Ibn Ḥadjar, Shihāb al-Dīn, Abu ʿl-ʿAbbās, al-Haitamī al-Saʿdī (after the Banū Saʿd in al-Sharḳiya, where his family was originally settled), a famous Arab jurist of the Shāfiʿī school, was born at Maḥallat Abi ʿl-Haitam in al-Ḥarbiya [q. v.] towards the end of the year (some say Radjab) 909 (1504). After, while still a child, he lost his father, the latter's shaiḫs Shams al-Dīn Ibn Abi ʿl-Hamāʾil (died 932), a noted mystic, and Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Shanāwī, a pupil of the latter, undertook his maintenance and education. Al-Shanāwī placed him in the Makām of Saiyid Aḥmad al-Badawī; on the completion of his elementary education he let his ward prosecute his studies from 924 onwards in the Azhar mosque. In spite of his youth, he studied here under the scholars of the day, such as Zakariyā al-Anṣārī [q. v.], ʿAbd al-Ḥaḳḳ al-Sunbātī (d. 931), Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad al-Ramlī (d. 958), Naṣir al-Dīn al-Tablāwī (d. 966), Abu ʿl-Ḥasan al-Bakrī (d. 952), Shihāb al-Dīn Ibn al-Nadjdjār al-Ḥanbalī (d. 949). Distinguishing himself in theological and legal studies he received, when barely 20 years of age, authority to deliver fatwās and impart instruction. After marrying at al-Shanāwī's suggestion in 932 the latter's niece, he made the pilgrimage in 933 to Mecca, where he also spent the following year. The start which he made there as a legal writer, he followed up on his return to Egypt, till in 937 he undertook the pilgrimage with his family and again made a stay in Mecca. After a third pilgrimage in 940 he settled permanently in the holy city where he devoted himself to authorship and teaching and was appealed to for fatwās from far and near. That his authority there was not entirely undisputed is evident from a statement by al-Fākihi (Chron. d. Stadt Mekka, ed. Wüstenfeld, iii. 56 sqq.). He conducted a series of vigorous polemics with the Shāfiʿī mufti of Zabid, Ibn Ziyād (cf. Brockelmann, op. cit., ii. 404) (Snouck Hurgronje, Islam and Phonograph, p. 4 sqq. = Tijdschr. van het Bataviaasch Genootschap, xlii. 396 sqq.). He died on the 23rd Radjab 974 (3 Febr. 1567) in Mecca and was buried on the Maʿlāt.

Ibn Ḥadjar's commentary on the Minḥādī al-Tālibin of al-Nawawī [q. v.], Tuhfat al-Muḥtādī li-Sharḥ al-Minḥādī, was with the Nihāya of al-Ramlī [q. v.] the authoritative textbook of the Shāfiʿī madhhab. After the Ḥadjarīyūn (chiefly in Ḥadramūt, Yemen and Ḥidjāz) and the Ramlīyūn (in Egypt and Syria) had at first disputed fiercely with one another, the opinion finally prevailed that Ibn Ḥadjar as well as al-Ramlī had to be considered the indispensable transmitter of the correct Shāfiʿī point of view, (Snouck Hurgronje, l. c., and in Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., liii. 142 sq.). Among his writings we may further mention al-Fatāwā al- kuhrā al-fikḥiyya (Cairo 1308), in which are inserted several lengthy treatises with separate titles, e. g. his two polemics against Ibn Ziyād; al-Fatāwā al-ḥadīthiyya (Cairo, 1307); al-Ṣawā'iq al-muḥriḡa fī 'l-Radd 'alā Ahl al-Bida' wal-Zandaqa (Cairo 1308), a polemic against the Shī'a, discussed by Goldziher, Sitzungsber. d. Kais. Akad. d. Wiss. zu Wien, phil.-hist. Cl., lxxviii. 453 sqq.; on the margin of the latter: Kit. Taḥṣir al-Dīnān wal-Lisān 'an al-Khutūr wal-Tafawwuh bi-Thalḥ Saiyidinā Mu'awwiya b. Abi Sufyān. Besides the editions given by Brockelmann, l. c., we may mention: al-Zawādīr 'an Iktirāf al-Kabā'ir with marginal editions of Kaff al-Ra'ā' 'an Muḥarramāt al-Lahw wal-Simā' and al-'lām bi-Kawāṭif al-Islām (Cairo 1325) and al-Minaḥ al-Makkiyya fī Sharḥ al-Ḥamziyya (ib. 1307 in two ed., and 1322); Riṣāḍ al-Riḍwān fī Ma'āthir al-Musnid al-'ālī Aṣafkhān, cf. An Arabic Hist. of Gujarat, ed. E. D. Ross, London, 1910, p. 333 sqq. IBN AL-ḤADJĪDĪ ABU 'ABD ALLĀH AL-ḤUSAIN B. AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. DĪ'FAR, poet of the Būyid period. He belonged to a family which was engaged in the public service, and was himself trained by Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm al-Ṣābi' in secretarial work. He found however that he could earn more by verse, and became an encomiast of the most important among his contemporaries, especially 'Izz al-Dawla Bakhtiyār, who appointed him to the office of muḥtasib or censor in Baghdād; a most unsuitable appointment, since this poet specialized in obscenity, and indeed against one of the headings in the Paris abridgment of his Diwān "encouragement to fornication" a reader has written the question "Is this the business of the censor?" After a time he was deprived of this office and vainly endeavoured to recover it. In his poems he mentions various estates which he had acquired or inherited, and several odes deal with a dispute between himself and a Kurd for the possession of one of them.

Among the eminent men with whom he came in contact were the vizier Muḥallabī, who desired him to satirize Mutanabbī: Sābūr b. Ardashīr: Ibn Bakīya: 'Aqūd al-Dawla and Bahā al-dawla: Ibn 'Abbād and Ibn al-'Amīd. He earned 1000 dinārs by an encomium on "the ruler of Egypt" who feared his satire; and much of his wealth appears to have been acquired by blackmail of this sort. Ibn al-Ḥadjdīdī died 391 (1001).

His Diwān when complete filled many volumes; a volume preserved in the British Museum contains rhymes in dāl and part of those in rā. A selection of the less obscene poems was made by his contemporary and friend the Sharif al-Raḍī, called al-Naḥf min al-sakhif; a selection by no means free from obscenity was made in 510 by Hibat Allāh al-Iṣṭarlābī, in 141 sections; this is preserved in the Paris MS. 5913, with prefatory note by the grammarian Ibn al-Khashshāb. A considerable collection of his verses is also given by Tha'libī in the Yatima ii. 211—270. Other selections are mentioned by Brockelmann i. 82.

The subject with which the poems chiefly deal is the vice explained by Mcz, Ein ba. hddier Sittenbild, p. xxvii; the society in which the poet moved is that which is known from the Yatima, especially vol. ii.; the Sharif al-Raḍī is said to have incurred infamy by his lament over Ibn al-Ḥadjdīdī (Diwān, p. 862—864), who however had earned it by his attacks on the Companions, which the Sharif as an 'Alawid approved.

IBN AL-ḤĀDJIB, DĪMĀL AL-DĪN ABU 'AMR 'OTHMĀN B. 'OMĀR B. ABĪ BAKR B. YŪNUS, an Arab grammarian, son of a Kurdish chamberlain of the Emir 'Izz al-Dīn Mūsak al-Ṣalāḥī, born in the village of Fanā in Upper-Egypt in the closing days of the year 570 = 1175, studied the Qur'ān and the sciences connected with it, Mālikī law and its sources, grammar, and belles lettres, in Cairo. His chief teachers were the Imām al-Shāṭibī, the jurist Abū Maṣṣūr al-Abyārī, etc.. He made a journey to Damascus and after spending a long time there teaching publicly in the Mālikī zāwiya of the great Umayyad mosque he went to Cairo and afterwards moved to Alexandria, where he died on the 26th Shawwāl 646 = 11 Febr. 1249.

Although he also wrote works on law and prosody, it is as a grammarian that he is specially celebrated and in this field he differs in many points from his predecessors. As a jurist he was the first to combine the doctrines of the Mālikīs of Egypt with those of the Maghribī Mālikīs. We owe to him the following works, of which those in prose are so clear in their style that they require no commentary: 1. al-Kāfiyya, a short manual of Arabic syntax (naḥw; Rome 1591; Cawnpore 1888, 1891; Kazan 1889; Tashkent 1311, 1312; Constantinople 1305; Cairo repeatedly; commentary Constantinople 1319); 2. al-Shāfiyya, short treatise on Arabic accidence (ṣarf; pr. 1805; Constantinople 1850; Cawnpore 1885; extracts publ. with notes by F. Buhl, Sprogtige og historiske Bidrag til den arab. Gramm. med udv. Tekststykker af Ibn al-Hāgib al-Sāfiyya, Leipzig 1878); 3. al-Maḥṣad al-djālil fī 'Ilm al-Khaṭīl, a didactic poem in the Basīṭ metre on prosody (Leiden, Cat. 2, N^o. 273; Berlin, Verz., N^o. 7126; Bodl., Cat., I, MSS. Hebr., N^o. 36, ii., MSS. Arab., N^o. 1267, ii.; publ. with transl. by Freytag in his Darstell. der arab. Verskunst, Bonn 1830, p. 334—371); 4. al-Amālī, discourses on the Qur'ān, on al-Mutanabbī etc. (Berlin, N^o. 6613; Wien, Flügel, Die arab. . . . Hss., N^o. 386; Paris, Bibl. Nat., N^o. 4392, iii.—vi.; Khed. Libr., Fihrr., iv. 24); 5. al-Kāṣida al-muwashshaha bi 'l-Asmā' al-mu'annatha, on the feminine nouns of masculine form, publ. by Ilafin and Cheikh, Dix anciens traités de philol. arabe, Beyrouth 1908, p. 157); 6. Risālat fi 'l-Ushr, a short treatise on the use of the word ushr with the adjectives awwal and ākhir (Berlin, No. 6894); 7. Muntaha 'l-Sifāt wa 'l-Amāl fi 'Imai al-Uṣūl wa 'l-Djadal, a handbook of the sources of Mālikī law (Mss. cf. Brockelmann, op. cit.); 8. Mukhtaṣar al-Muntahā, known as al-Mukhtaṣar al-Uṣūl, a synopsis of the preceding work (pr. Būlak 1316—9, with 'Aḍud al-Dīn al-Idjī's commentary and the glosses of al-Taftazānī and al-Djurdjānī on it and supergloss by al-Ḥasan al-Harawī to al-Djurdjānī's Hāshiyā); 9. Mukhtaṣar fi 'l-Furū' or Djāmi' al-Ummahāt or simply al-Mukhtaṣar al-far'ī, compendium of Mālikī law, annotated (Tawdhīh) and afterwards imitated Sidi Khalil (India Office, Loth. Cat., No. 298; Brit. Mus., Cat. Cod. Or., ii. No. 226; Khed. Libr., Cairo, Fih., iii. 159; Algiers, Fagnan, Cat., No. 1074—1076).

IBN AL-HAIṬHĀM, whose full name was ABŪ 'ALĪ AL-ḤASAN B. AL-ḤASAN (or AL-ḤUSAIN) B. AL-HAIṬHĀM, in mediaeval European sources usually called ALHAZEN, was one of the most important mathematicians and physicists of the Arabs, learned also in medicine and the other sciences of the ancients notably in the philosophy of Aristotle. He was born about the year 354 (965) in Baṣra, wherefore he is sometimes called Abū 'Alī al-Baṣrī, moved when fairly old to Egypt, where he was for some years in the service of the Fātimid al-Ḥākim, to whom he had offered to regulate the course of the Nile, but soon had to give up this undertaking; on al-Ḥākim's death he earned his living by copying mathematical and other books. He died in Cairo towards the end of the year 430 = 1039 or soon after as the authorities note. — Ibn Abī Uṣaibi'a quotes about 200 mathematical, astronomical, physical, philosophical, and medical works and treatises by Ibn al-Haiṭham, for which we may refer the reader to the sources quoted below, particularly (besides Ibn Abī Uṣaibi'a) F. Woepcke and E. Wiedemann. His chief work on physics is his Optics, Kitāb al-Manāẓir, published in a Latin translation in 1572 in Basle by F. Risner, together with his treatise on twilight, entitled Opticae thesaurus Alhazeni Arabis libri septem nunc primum editi. Eiusdem liber de crepusculis et nubium ascensionibus, etc., a Fred. Risnero. The latter treatise was translated into Latin by Gerhard of Cremona; this is probably true also of the Optics but not certain. The Optics of Ibn al-Haiṭham had a great influence in the middle ages on the study of optics in Europe from Roger Bacon to Kepler. There still survives also a large Arabic commentary on the Optics by Kamāl al-Dīn Abū 'l-Ḥasan al-Fārisī (died c. 1320) on this and Ibn al-Haiṭham's Optics cf. the works of E. Wiedemann mentioned below.

Of treatises by Ibn al-Haiṭham some published in Arabic and some accessible only in translations, we have to mention the following in addition to those mentioned in the authorities quoted below: Über die Beschaffenheit der Schatten (fi Kaṣfiyat al-Aṣṭāl), published by E. Wiedemann in an abbreviated form in a German translation in the Beiträge z. Gesch. d. Naturwissenschaft., xiii. (Sitzungsber. der phys.-mediz. Societät in Erlangen, Vol. 39 (1907), p. 226 sqq.); Über parabolische Hohlspiegel (fi 'l-Marāyā al-muhrikā bi 'l-kuṭf), publ. in a German transl. by J. L. Heiberg and E. Wiedemann, in the Biblioth. Mathem., 3^d Ser., Vol. x. (1910), p. 201—237; Über sphärische Hohlspiegel (fi 'l-Marāyā al-muhrikā bi 'l-Dawā'ir), transl. by E. Wiedemann, ibid., p. 293—307; Über die Ausmessung des Paraboloides (fi Miṣāḥat al-Mudjasam al-mukāfi), transl. with commentary by H. Suter in the Biblioth. Mathem., 3^d Ser., Vol. xii. (1912), p. 289—332; Extracts from the treatises fi 'l-Makān (Über den Ort (oder Raum)), fi Mas'ala 'adadiya (über ein Zahlenproblem), fi Shah Bani Mūsā (über einen Satz der Banū Mūsā), fi Uṣūl al-Miṣāḥa (über die Elemente der Ausmessung), published in German translation by E. Wiedemann, in Beiträge z. Gesch. d. Naturwissenschaft., xvii. (Sitzungsber. der phys.-mediz. Societät in Erlangen, Vol. xli. (1909), p. 1—25).

IBN HAIYĀN R. KHALAF, ABŪ MARWĀN HAIYĀN AL-KURṬUBĪ, usually called after his grandfather Ibn Haiyān, one of the earliest and best historians of Muslim Spain. Almost nothing is known of his biography except the year of his birth 377 (987—988) and his death 469 (1076). He was a very prolific writer: the list of his works contains no less than 50 titles, which include poems and theological treatises. His history al-Maṭin is said to have comprised not less than 60 volumes, but of all his writings only the historical work entitled al-Muktabis fi Tawrikh Andalus has survived; there is one volume in Oxford (Cod. Bodl. in Nicoll, ii. No. 137) and a second at Constantine; there are transcriptions of both in Madrid.

Bibliography: The bibliography on Ibn Haiyān is given in Pons Boigues, Ensayo bibliogr., p. 152 sqq. Cf. also Brockelmann, Geschichte etc., i. 338.

IBN HAMDĪS, ABŪ MUHAMMED 'ABD AL-DIAB-BĀR B. ABĪ BAKR, an Arab poet, born about 447 (1055) in Syracuse in Sicily and distinguished at an early age as a poet. When the Normans captured Sicily in 471 (1078), he retired to Spain and spent some time at the court of the 'Abbādid al-Mu'tamid [q. v.] in Seville. He followed the latter in his imprisonment in 484 (1091) and lived at al-Mahdiyya after his death (488 = 1095). He spent the last years of his life at Bougie where he died in 527 (1132); according to other accounts, he died on the island of Majorca. He left a Diwān of which Amari has published specimens. Cf. C. C. Moncada, Il Divan del poeta 'Abi Muhammad 'Abd al Gabbar Ibn Hamdis il siciliano pubblicato, Palermo 1883, and Il Canzoniere di Ibn Hamdis, publ. by C. Schiaparelli, Roma 1897. According to Ḥādjdī Khalifa, ii. 196, he also wrote a history of Algeciras.

IBN ḤAMDŪN, BAḤĀ' AL-DIN ABU 'L-MĀ'ĀLI MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤASAN, an Arab philologist, born in 495 (1101) at Baghdād. He held several offices at the court of the Caliph, so that he received the title Kāfi 'l-Kufāt. But his frankness aroused the enmity of the Caliph al-Mustandjīd who threw him into prison in 562 (1167). Soon afterwards he died in prison. He was the author of a large anthology of philological and historical matter entitled al-Tadhkira. Cf. Amedroz, Tales of official Life from the "Tadhkira of Ibn Hamdun, etc. in Journ. Roy. As. Soc., 1908, p. 409 sqq.

Bibliography: Brockelmann, Geschichte etc., i. 280 sq. (with further references).

IBN ḤAMMĀD, ABU 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. 'ĀLĪ, an Arab historian, author of a history of the Fāṭimids. Neither the date of his birth nor death is known; we only know that he flourished after the rise of the Almohad dynasty and before Ibn Khaldūn, who quotes a passage from him about the Banū Khazrūn of Tripolis (Kitāb al-'Ibar, vii. 43). The text is still unpublished in a manuscript of the Bibl. Nat. of Paris (n^o. 1888) and in another of the Bibl. Nat. of Algiers (n^o. 1988, imperfect). Two fragments, one on 'Ubad Allāh and one on Abū Yazīd al-Mukhalad were translated by Cherbonneau (Journ. Asiat., 1862, ii. 470 sq.; 1869, i. 199 sq.).

(RENÉ BASSET.)

IBN HĀNĪ', ABU 'L-KĀSIM (also ABU 'L-HASAN) MUḤAMMAD B. HĀNĪ' B. MUḤAMMAD B. SA'DŪN AL-AZDĪ, usually called IBN HĀNĪ' AL-ANDALUSĪ to distinguish him from Ibn Hānī' al-Ḥakamī [see ABŪ NUWĀS], an Arab poet of Spain. His father Hānī' was a native of a village near al-Mahdiyya in Tunisia, who had moved to Elvira in Spain or, according to others, to Cordova. Ibn Hānī' was born in one of these two towns. He studied in Cordova and then proceeded to Elvira and Seville. In the latter city his frivolous way of living and too free speech brought upon him the wrath of the people who accused him of agreeing with the Greek philosophers and of heresy, so that he was finally banished from Seville at the age of 27 by his patron, who was afraid of being suspected of agreeing with him. He then went to Africa to Djawhar, a freeman and general of the Fāṭimid al-Mansūr. When he received only 200 dinars from the latter for a qaṣida addressed to him, he went to al-Masila (Msila) in Algiers where his compatriots Dja'far b. 'Alī b. Falāh b. Abī Marwān and Yahyā b. 'Alī b. Ḥamdūn al-Andalusī were ruling. Treated with great respect by them he composed some notable poems in their honour. The Fāṭimid Caliph al-Mu'izz Abū

Tamīm Ma'add b. Ismā'īl, son of al-Manṣūr, summoned the poet to him and attached him to his court, overwhelming him with tokens of esteem. When al-Mu'izz went to Egypt in 361 (972) to take up his residence in Cairo, Ibn Hānī' left him and returned to the Maghrib to bring back his family, but was murdered in Barḳa in Cyrenaica on his road on Wednesday 24 Rādjab 362 = 30th April 973 at the age of 36. Accounts of his murder differ. When al-Mu'izz in Egypt heard of the poet's death, he lamented: "He was a man whom we hoped to rival the poets of the East, but this was not granted to us".

In spite of the gross exaggerations in some of his panegyrics, which made him suspected of infidelity among the orthodox, Ibn Hānī' enjoyed as great esteem among the Arabs of the West as his contemporary al-Mutanabbī did in the East. Abū 'l-'Alā' al-Ma'arri, who esteemed the latter highly used to say of Ibn Hānī': "he is like a mill, grinding corn, so little sense is there in his verse".

His Diwān, arranged in alphabetical order, was published at Bulāk in 1274 and at Beyrouth in 1886, 1326. It contains panegyrics of al-Mu'izz, Dja'far b. Ghālūn, Abū 'l-Faraj Muḥammad b. 'Omar al-Shaibānī, Dja'far b. 'Alī b. Ghālūn, Ṭāhir and Ḥusain b. al-Manṣūr, Yahyā b. 'Alī, Ibrāhīm b. Djawhar b. Kātib, satires against al-Wahrān, two elegies, one on the mother of Dja'far and Yahyā b. Yahyā b. 'Alī, the other on the son of Ibrāhīm b. Dja'far b. Alī and several impromptu pieces.

(MOH. BEN CHENEB.)

IBN ḤAWḲAL, ABU 'L-KĀSIM (MUḤAMMAD), an important Arab traveller and geographer. Very little is known of his life. He tells of himself that he left Baghdād in Ramaḍān 331 (May 943) with the intention of becoming acquainted with other lands and peoples, and making money by commerce. He travelled through the whole Muslim world from east to west, at the same time studying eagerly the works of his predecessors al-Djāhānī, Ibn Khordādhbih and Ḳudāma. According to Dozy, he was a spy in the service of the Fāṭimids. On his travels he met al-Iṣṭakhḱrī [q. v.] probably about 340. At the latter's request he made improvements in some of this geographer's maps and revised his work. He afterwards however decided upon rewriting it and completed the new version under his own name with the title al-Masālik wa 'l-Mamālik not before 367 (977); it was published by de Goeje in Vol. ii. of the Bibl. Geogr. Arab. On earlier editions of separate portions and part translations see the Praefationes to op. cit. and vol. i.

IBN ḤAZM, whose full name was ABŪ MUḤAMMAD 'ALĪ b. AḤMED b. SA'ĪD b. H., a versatile Spanish Arab scholar, a notable theologian, historian and distinguished poet, born on the last day of Ramaḍān 384 (7th Nov. 994) at Cordova. His family belonged to the village of Manta Lisham (var. M-t-lidjam, according to the Irshād al-Arib, v. 88 infra, ½ farsakh from Huelva at the mouth of the Odiél) in the district of Niebla; his great-grandfather had been a convert from Christianity to Islām. His father, who had risen to the rank of a vizier of the major-domo al-Manṣūr and his son al-Muzaffar, assumed a genealogy which led back to a Persian client of Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān. As the son of a high official Ibn Ḥazm naturally received a good education; the atmosphere of the court in which he spent his youth did not prevent his active mind striving to develop in all directions. As his teacher in various branches of knowledge he mentions (Tawḥ, p. 110, 5, 118, 13 sq.) 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Abī Yazīd al-Azdi (left Spain during the civil war, see Ibn Bashkuwāl, No. 753). Before 400 he studied under Aḥmad Ibn al-Djāsūr (died 401, Ibn Bashkuwāl, No. 37, cf. Tawḥ, p. 136, 22, 144, 9) and in the midst of the political turmoils we find him a student of Ḥadīth in Cordova (Tawḥ, p. 127, 16 sq.).

The revolution which overthrew the 'Āmirids (cf. Dozy, Hist. des Musulmans d'Espagne, iii. 271 sqq.) considerably affected the position of father and son. Especially after Hishām II was replaced on the throne (Dhu 'l-Hijja 400 = July 1010), both had to suffer many mortifications. Ibn Ḥazm's father died towards the end of Dhu 'l-Kāda 402. In Muharram 404 he left Cordova, which had been sorely tried by the civil war; the beautiful palace of his family at Balāt Mughith had been destroyed by the Berbers (Tawḥ, p. 104, cf. 87 infra sq.). He next chose Almería for his home; there he seems to have been able to live in comparative quiet till 'Alī b. Hammūd in alliance with Khairān, ruler of Almería, overthrew the Umayyad Sulaimān (Muharram 407). Khairān induced to suspect him of intriguing in favour of the Umayyads, imprisoned him for some months with his friend Muḥammad b. Ishāk and then banished them. The two friends went to Ḥiṣn al-Qaṣr, whose ruler received them kindly. On learning that 'Abd al-Rahmān IV al-Murtadā had been appointed Caliph in Valencia, they left their host after a few months and travelled by sea to this town, where Ibn Ḥazm met other friends (Tawḥ, p. 110 sq.). In the army of al-Murtadā, whose vizier he was, he fought before Granada; he was captured by the enemy but was released after a while (Cat. Cod. Arab., i. 273). After an absence of six years he returned in Shawwāl 409 to Cordova, where al-Kāsim b. Hammūd was now Caliph (Tawḥ, p. 104, 22, cf. 112, 2). After the latter's expulsion, the intellectual 'Abd al-Rahmān V al-Mustaḥhir was chosen Caliph (Ramaḍān 414 = Dec. 1023); the latter chose his friend Ibn Ḥazm as vizier. They only enjoyed the new state of affairs for a brief period, for 'Abd al-Rahmān was murdered seven weeks later (Dhu 'l-Kāda 414 = Jan. 1024) and Ibn Ḥazm found himself once more within prison walls. How long he was confined cannot be definitely ascertained; it is certain however that he was living in Játiva about 418 (1027). According to al-Djāyānī (in Yāqūt), he filled the office of vizier again under Hishām al-Mu'tadd. Only scanty notices of his later life are available. But he kept clear of politics in order to devote himself entirely to sciences, authorship, and the propagation and defence of his doctrines.

One of his earliest works is that which was made known by Dozy (Tawḥ al-Ḥamāma fi 'l-Ulfa wa 'l-Ullāf, ed. by D. K. Pétrouf, Leiden 1914, cf. the review by Goldziher in Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morg. Gesellsch., lxix. 192 sqq.), which he wrote in Játiva (p. 1, s), about 418 (Tawḥ, p. 79 sq., before the death of Khairān in 419; an attack of Abu 'l-Djāish [so to be read] Muḍjahid on Khairān would suggest after their estrangement in Rabī' II 417, cf. Ibn al-Athīr, ed. Tornberg, ix. 195; a second terminus ad quem is given Tawḥ, p. 42, 7: Hakam b. Mundhir died about 420 according to Ibn Bashkuwāl No. 332). In this treatise on love and its different phases in which he illustrates his views on psychology by short stories from his own experiences and those of his contemporaries and by his own poems, Ibn Ḥazm shows himself a keen observer, a brilliant stylist and charming poet. He affords us not only a glimpse into his own character, but also throws an interesting light on a little known side of the life of his time. — Probably about the same time he wrote the treatise called Risāla fi Faḍl al-Andalus, dedicated to his friend Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Ishāk (according to al-Dabbī, No. 59), which is given in al-Maḥḥārī, ed. Dozy etc., ii. 109, 18—121 (ed. Būlak, ii. 767, 8 sqq.). This Risāla, composed at the instigation of the lord of Kal'at al-Būnt (al-Maḥḥārī, ii. 110, cf. Ibn al-Abbār, al-Tamīla, No. 432), gives an interesting survey of the most important early literature of the Spanish Muslims. — Of his historical works there still survive Nuḳat al-'Arūs fi Tawārīkh al-Khulafā' (ed. with Spanish translation by C. F. Seybold in Revista del Centro de Estudios históricos de Granada y su Reino, i. 160 sqq., 237 sqq., Granada 1911) and the Djāmhārāt al-Ansāb (Ansāb al-'Arab) written about 450 (cf. Codera, Misión histórica en la Argelia y Túnez, Madrid 1892, p. 24 sqq., 83) (Mss. Tunis, Masdjid al-Zaitūna, No. 5014, and copy of this Ms. in Madrid, Real Acad. de la Hist., Codera, o. c., p. 165; Paris, Bibl. Nat., Blochet, Cat. de la Coll. . . . Schefer, No. 5829; containing the biography of Muḥammad, Berlin, Verz., No. 9510), a work highly esteemed and often quoted by Ibn Khaldūn (Ibar, ed. 1284, VI, 8, 89 sq., 97, etc.), on the genealogy of the Arab and Berber families in Maghrib and Spain, which Codera used as a source for his articles on the Hammūdids, Tudjībids (these two articles also in his Estudios críticos de Historia árabe española, Zaragoza 1903, p. 301 sqq.), Umayyads in op. cit., p. 29 sqq., 41 sqq., cf. 147 sqq., 75 sqq., et passim.

But it was particularly as a traditionist and theologian that Ibn Ḥazm displayed great literary activity. At first an ardent follower of the Shāfi'i school he afterwards went over to the Zāhiri [cf. ZĀHIRĪS] of which he became a devoted advocate. This change had apparently been completed by the time he wrote the above mentioned Risāla (cf. al-Maḥḥari, ii. 120, 9 sqq.). Possibly the instruction of his teacher Abū 'l-Khiyār (so to be read Tawḥ, p. 98, 10) i.e. Mas'ūd b. Sulaimān b. Muḥṣi, who was a Zāhiri (Ibn Bashkuwāl, n^o. 1238, al-Ḍabbi, n^o. 1361), was not without influence upon him. [For Zāhiri contemporaries cf. Ibn Bashkuwāl, n^o. 1195, 1196]. He defended with vigour his position that the details of legal deduction not resting on tradition and revelation must be rejected in the treatise Iḥḥāl al-Kiyās wa 'l-Ra'y wa 'l-Istiḥṣān wa 'l-Taḥlīd wa 'l-Ta'īl (Ms. Gotha, Pertsch, Verz., n^o. 640), which Goldziher (Die Zāhiriten, Leipzig 1884) first thoroughly studied. From the title Ibn Ḥazm evidently discussed similar subjects (cf. Faṣḥ, iii. 76) in the Kit. al-Iḥkām fī (li-) 'Uṣūl al-Aḥkām (Mss. Khed. Libr., Fihrr. [ed. 1305], ii. 236). A small work by him on Mas'ūd 'Uṣūl al-Fiḥḥ was printed, according to the Fihris Maktabat al-Manūr (1332), with notes by Ibn al-Amīr al-Saghānī and al-Kāsimī in Egypt. He published a Zāhiri system of Fiḥḥ in his Kit. al-Muḥallā bi 'l-Āḥḥār fī Shurḥ al-Mudjallā bi 'l-Iḥṣār (Iḥṣār), which is presumably contained in its entirety in the many volumes of this work in the Khed. Libr. (Fihrr., iii. 297 sq.); incomplete in Leiden, Landberg, Cat., n^o. 646, and Constantinople Aya Sofya, n^o. 1259, 1260. Similar in content was his Ṭīṣ ilā Fahm al-Khiṣāl (Faṣḥ, i. 114, 7 sqq.) which exists in a Muḥḥaṣṣar of his son Abū Rāfi' in the Khed. Libr. (Fihrr., iii. 297, 13 sq.).

Ibn Ḥazm was original in his application of Zāhiri principles to dogmatics. Here also only the primary meaning of the written word and established tradition was to be decisive. From this point of view he sharply criticised religious groups in Islām in his most celebrated work, the Kit. al-Faṣḥ fī 'l-Mīḥal wa 'l-Aḥwā' wa 'l-Nīḥal (pr. Cairo 1317—21) and particularly attacked the Ash'arīs [see AL-ASH'ARĪ], notably their views on the divine attributes. As regards anthropomorphic expressions in the Qur'ān, however, Ibn Ḥazm found himself forced to bring these into conformity with a spiritual interpretation. An appreciation of Ibn Ḥazm's views on dogmatics and philosophy in their mutual relations has still to be made. Goldziher has touched on the main points; cf. also the excerpts in Horten (see below). On the influence of Ibn Ḥazm's principles on the domain of ethics see Goldziher, o. c., p. 162 sq. and on I. Ḥ. as champion of the monotheistic reaction against the cult of saints, Sūfi doctrines, and astrology, see Schreiner, Beitr. In the work just named, which was first more fully made known by Goldziher, Ibn Ḥazm also criticises non-Islāmic creeds, such as those of the Jews and Christians, and endeavours to find contradictions and incompatibilities in their writings to justify the accusation of falsification of texts. (Cf. Goldziher, Festschurun, Zeitschr. für die Wiss. Judenthums, viii., 1872, p. 76 sqq., and Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morg. Gesellsch., xxxii. 1878, p. 363 sqq.; Schreiner, ibid., xlii. 612 sqq.). As Isr. Friedländer, following Goldziher, has shown in more detail (Zur Komposition von Ibn Ḥazm's Mīḥal wa 'n-Nīḥal in Orient. Stud. Th. Nöldeke gewidmet,

i. 267 sqq.), the logical arrangement of this work (the author repeatedly styles it Dīwān, e. g. i. 107, 11, iv. 178, 16, v. 79, 18) is to some extent destroyed by the incorporation in it of works originally separate. The mss. of this work, the references in which are to very different dates, show, according to Friedländer, two recensions. The incorporated parts are: a) i. 116—ii. 91 of the published text, apparently identical with Kit. Iḥḥār Tubḥil al-Yaḥḥūl wa 'l-Naṣārā li 'l-Tawwāt wa 'l-Indjil wa Ḥayān Tanāḥūd mā bi-Aidihim minḥa minmā tā yaḥḥamilu 'l-Ta'wīl; b) iv. 178—227, containing the treatise al-Naṣā'ih al-mundjiya min al-Faḥḥ al-mukḥḥiya wa 'l-Kabā'ih al-murdiya min Aḥwāl Ahl al-Bida' wa 'l-Firaḥ al-arba' al-Mu'tazila wa 'l-Murḥi'a wa 'l-Khawāridj wa 'l-Shi'a; from it Friedländer has translated the chapter on the Shi'is (iv. 178—188) with a general survey of heterodox views (ii. 111—117) and two passages regarding Shi'ite doctrines, making use of manuscript material and adding illuminating notes (The Heterodoxies of the Shi'ites, New Haven, 1909, from Journ. of the Amer. Orient. Soc., xxvii. and xxix.; ibid. on Mss. [cf. also Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. d. Morgenl. Gesellsch., lxvi. 166] and recensions); c) perhaps also iv. 87—178, a work on al-Imām wa 'l-Mufaḥḥala, with the title of which Fr. compares Kit. al-Imām wa 'l-Siyāsa fī Kīṣam Siyar al-Khulafā' wa-Marātibihā wa 'l-Wādjiḥ minḥa (so Ibn Haiyān in Yāḥūt); Ibn Ḥazm's treatise Fī 'l-Mufaḥḥala baina 'l-Saḥāba may be identical with this, Ms. Damascus, Ḥabīb al-Zaiyāt, Khawā'in al-Kutub fī Dimāshq etc., p. 82, 3. — A fragment of his al-Nuḥḥa al-kāfiya fī 'Uṣūl Aḥkām al-Dīn is contained in Ms. Berl., N^o. 5376.

In the domain of logic Ibn Ḥazm wrote a Kīṭāb al-Taḥrīb fī Ḥudūd al-Manṭiq, which has not survived; something would be known of its contents if the statements in Faṣḥ, i. 4, 10, iii. 90, v. 20, 2, v. 70 infra, refer to the same work under a slightly different title. It might be presumed that the same work is meant by a treatise on 'Ilm al-Kalām, the only one (and first?) of his own which he mentions in his Risāla on literary history, but out of modesty he does not give the title. His work on this science in which his teacher (Ibn Khalīkān, al-Dhahabī) was Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan al-Maḥḥidjī (Ibn al-Abbār, al-Takmilā, N^o. 411), whom he praises as a philosophic author, found but little approval and he was held to be at fault because he contradicted Aristotle, whom on the whole he held in high esteem however (Die Zāhiriten, p. 157), and departed entirely from the usual treatment of the subject. In this connection it should be noted that he laid great emphasis on the perception of the senses.

Ibn Ḥazm devoted to Qur'anic studies and tradition his Kit. al-Nāsikh wa 'l-Mansūkh (pr. Cairo, on the margin of editions of the Tafsīr al-Djālāin, 1297, 1308) and other works which have probably not survived. — Among his polemical writings there is still to be mentioned a satirical ḥaṣida (cf. Abū Bakr b. Ḥair, Fihrr., ed. Codera and Ribera, i. 409 sq.) preserved in al-Subkī, Ṭabaḥāt al-Shāfi'iya, ii. 184—9, the reply to a poetical attack on the part of the Byzantine Emperor Nikephoros II Phokas (cf. al-Subkī, o. c., ii. 178 sqq. and Flügel, Die Arab. . . Hss. . . der Hofbibl. zu Wien, i. 449 sqq.). — The fruit of his mature years and of much bitter experience was his ethical tractate Kit. al-Akhḫāk wa 'l-Siyar fī Mudāwāt al-Nufūs (pr. Cairo n. d.), an exhortation to pious life, which holds up Muḥammad's example as the moral ideal (cf. Goldziher, Vorlesungen, p. 30). This tractate has been discussed and translated into Spanish by Miguel Asín (Los Caracteres y la conducta. Tratado de moral práctica per Aben Hazm de Córdoba, Madrid 1916).

A controversialist by nature, as he was (cf. Tawḥīd, p. 43, 8), Ibn Ḥazm challenged Jews, Christians, and Muslims of different schools. He was a doughty opponent: "whoever resisted him bounced off him as from a stone" (Ibn Ḥaiyān). He overwhelmed with scorn and contempt men whom the majority of Muslims held in the highest reverence such as al-Ash'arī, Abū Ḥanifa, Mālik. According to a proverbial saying, Ibn Ḥazm's pen was like al-Ḥaǧǧāǧī's sword in sharpness. Yet he always endeavoured to do his opponents justice; it was against his nature to make intentionally baseless charges against them. In his ethical treatise he ascribes his vehemence to the influence of an illness. He only succeeded to a modest extent in gaining a hearing for his views. For a time he found a supporter in Aḥmad b. Rashīk (al-Dabbī, N^o. 400), Muǧǧāhid's walī in Majorca, who was interested alike in theology and literature; Ibn Ḥazm found protection with him when Cordovan and other theologians derided him as an opponent of the Mālikī school (Dozy, Notices, p. 190 sq.). Under this patronage he succeeded in winning adherents on the island in the 430's A. H. (cf. Ibn al-Abbār, al-Takmila, N^o. 1467, N^o. 2027; Ibn Bashkuwāl, N^o. 903). He disputed before Ibn Rashīk (died soon after 440) with the celebrated theologian Abū 'l-Walīd Sulaimān al-Baǧǧī, who had returned from the East about 440. This same opponent summoned by a Majorcan faqīh afterwards forced Ibn Ḥazm to leave the island (Ibn al-Abbār, o. c. N^o. 443; cf. Codera, Estudios críticos etc., p. 264—9).

His charge of heresy against the great orthodox authorities brought upon him the wrath of the theologians, some of whom probably also envied him his learning. They warned their hearers against the errors of his doctrine and made him suspected by the princes, who soon no longer tolerated him in their lands. His strong sympathy (tashayyū', Ibn Ḥaiyān) for the Umayyads was a further reason why he appeared dangerous. This constant baiting forced him to retire to his family estate in Manta Lishām. His writings were publicly burned in Seville; their author pilloried the foolishness of this proceeding in sarcastic epigrams. In his retirement he continued to study and write. According to a statement by his son Abū Rafī' the number of his writings was 400 in 80,000 folios, but the "majority did not cross the threshold of his district" (Ibn Ḥaiyān). A small circle of pupils who dared to brave the anathema of the theologians sought instruction from him here. Among them was the historian al-Ḥumaidī. Ibn Ḥazm died in his village on the 28th Shawwāl 456 (15th August 1064). The Almohad al-Manṣūr is said to have remarked on one occasion at his tomb: "All scholars have to apply to Ibn Ḥazm when in difficulty" (al-Maǧǧarī, ii. 160, 12).

Of his sons there are mentioned Abū Rafī' al-Faḍl (died 479) as a learned author (Ibn Bashkuwāl, N^o. 994), Abū Usāma Ya'qūb (ib., N^o. 1407) and Abū Sulaimān al-Muṣ'ab (Ibn al-Abbār, al-Takmila, N^o. 1097) as transmitters of their father's learning.

Ibn Ḥazm's teachings were particularly attacked in writings after his death. When the faqīh Ibn al-'Arabī [q. v.] returned from the east towards the turn of the fifth century (al-Dhahabī, Tadhk., ii. 90 sqq.), he found the heresy widespread in the Maghrib. To confute it he wrote Kit. al-Kawāṣim wa 'l-Anwāṣim, which al-Dhahabī, Tadhk., iii. 323 sq., quotes, and other treatises. About the same time Muḥammad b. Ḥaidara (al-Dhahabī, o. c. iv. 52) and 'Abd Allāh b. Ṭalḥa (Ibn al-Abbār, o. c., N^o. 1330, al-Maǧǧarī, i. 905, 8) came to his assistance. About a century later, the Mālikī theologians 'Abd al-Iḥāk b. 'Abd Allāh (Ibn al-Abbār, o. c., N^o. 1812) and Ibn Zarḳūn (ib., N^o. 967) came forward to refute I. Ḥ., the latter with a Kit. al-Mu'allā directed against the Kit. al-Muḥallā. On the other hand, a pupil of Ibn Zarḳūn, Ibn al-Rūmiyā, the botanist, came forward as a fanatical adherent of Ibn Ḥazm and the celebrated mystic Ibn 'Arabī [q. v.] transmitted his works and wrote a synopsis of the Kitāb al-Muḥallā, likewise entitled al-Mu'allā.

IBN ḤIBBĀN, MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD AL-BUSTĪ, Arab author and authority on Tradition, born at Bust in Siǧǧistān, after extended travels in pursuit of knowledge, filled a judicial office in Samarḳand, but was driven from it as a heretic, because he had defined the prophethood as a combination of Ilm and Amal (cf. Goldziher on Mu'ānī al-Nafs, p. 57). After staying in Nāsā and in 334 = 465 in Nisābūr, he settled in Samarḳand as a teacher of Tradition and died there at the age of 80 on the 22nd Shawwāl 354 = 21st October 965. His chief work is the collection on Tradition famous for its artificial arrangement entitled Kitāb al-Taḫṣīm wa 'l-Anwā', see Fikrist al-Kutub al-maḥṣū'a fī 'l-Ḳutubkhāna al-Khedi- viya, i. 250 (Diwān in Berlin, Ahlwardt, Verz. N^o. 1268), revised by 'Alī b. Balabān al-Fārisī (died 739 = 1338, according to al-Suyūṭī, Bughyat al-Wu'at, p. 331), with glosses by Ibn Ḥadjār in the Brit. Mus., see Cat. Cod. Ar., N^o. 1570 (cf. Goldziher, Muh. Stud., ii. 269, Note 5). Traditionaries are the subject of his two works, Kitāb al-Thikāt, rearranged by Ibn Ḥadjār al-Haitamī, Ms. in Cairo, see Fihrist, i. 230-231, and Maṣḥūr 'Ulamā' al-Amṣūr, Ms. in Leipzig, see Vollers, Die Islam... Hdss., N^o. 688. Finally he wrote an adab-book of an edifying character entitled Rawḍat al-'Uḳalā' wa-Nuḥat al-Fuḍalā' (Ms. in Hamburg, see Brockelmann, Verz., N^o. 96), pr. Cairo 1328: in it he quotes 11 other works.

IBN HĪDĪDJA, ABU 'L-MAḤAṢIN TAḲĪ AL-DĪN ABU BAKR B. 'ALĪ B. 'ABD ALLĀH AL-HAMAWĪ AL-ḲĀDĪRĪ AL-HANAFĪ AL-AZRĀRĪ (the button-maker, so called after the trade he had followed in his youth), an Arab author, one of the most celebrated poets and stylists of the Mamlūk period, born 767 (1366) in Hamāt. While returning to Cairo in 791 (1390) after travelling for study, he witnessed the great conflagration in Damascus at the siege by al-Zāhir Barkūk and was moved by it to his first rhetorical effort, an epistle to Ibn Makānis (see Ahlwardt, Verzeichnis der arab. Hdss. von Berlin, N^o. 9784). He reached the zenith of his creative ability in his office as Munshi in the Diwān of Cairo which he owed to his patron al-Bārīzī, the private secretary to the Sultān al-Mu'ayyad Shāikh (815—824 = 1412—1421). After the latter's death in 830 (1427) he returned to his native town and died there on the 15th Shābān 837 = 28th March 1434. Of his poems, which he collected under the title al-Thamarāt al-shahiya fi 'l-Fawākih al-Hamawiya wa 'l-Zawā'id al-Miṣriya, the best known is his Bad'iya entitled Khizānat al-Adab wa-Ghāyat al-Arab; on it he wrote in 826 (1423) the commentary Takdīm Abi Bakr (cf. Mehren, Rhet., p. 12), pr. Calcutta 1230 (as an appendix to the Diwān of al-Mutanabbī), Būlāk 1273, 1291, Cairo 1301. His collection of letters and firmans from the Mamlūk chancery, Qahwat al-Inshā', which exists in numerous manuscripts, will probably be found useful for historical purposes. His anthology, Thamarāt (Thimār) al-Awrāk, with Dhail, pr. Būlāk on the margin of the Muḥāḍarāt al-Uḍabā' of al-Rāghib al-Isfahānī, Cairo 1300, and with a second appendix by Ibrāhīm b. al-Aḥḍab on the margin of al-Ibshāhi's al-Mustafāf, Cairo, 1320-1321, was also highly esteemed. Finally he published new editions and synopses of older works, such as al-Ṣādīq wa 'l-Būghim of Ibn al-Habbāriya; al-Shirwānī gives a synopsis of this version in Nafhat al-Yaman (Cairo 1326), p. 150—161.

IBN HISHĀM, 'ABD AL-MALIK B. HISHĀM B. AYYUB AL-HIMYARĪ AL-BASRĪ, an Arab grammarian, born in Basra, died in Fustāt in Egypt on the 13th Rabi' II 218 = 8th May 834, according to others in 213 A. H., wrote, besides his version of Ibn Ishāk's [q. v.] biography of the Prophet, a collection of biblical and South Arabian legends, entitled, Kitāb al-Tibān, s. IBN HISHĀM, DĪMĀL AL-DĪN ABU MUḤAMMAD 'ABD ALLĀH B. YUSUF B. AHMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. HISHĀM AL-ANṢARĪ AL-MĪSĪRĪ, was born in Dhu 'l-Ka'da 708 = April-May 1309 in Cairo, where he died in the night of Thursday-Friday, 5th Dhu 'l-Ka'da 761 = 17-18 September 1360. A pupil of the Spanish grammarian Abū Haiyān for the study of the Diwān of Zuhair b. Abī Sulmā, he also studied with Shihāb al-Dīn 'Abd al-Laṭīf b. al-Murāḥḡal, al-Fākihānī, etc.

As a Shāfi'ī doctor, he became professor of Qur'anic exegesis at the Kubbat al-Manṣūriya in Cairo; but five years before his death he went over to the Hanbalī school to obtain the post of professor at the Hanbalī madrasa in Cairo and for this purpose learned by heart the Mukhtaṣar of al-Khirākī in less than four months.

Ibn Khaldūn sums him up in these words: "Ibn Hishām was profoundly learned in grammar and possessed perfect knowledge of it. He followed in the path of those of the grammarians of Mōṣul who accepted Ibn Djinī's views and followed this scholar's method of teaching. The knowledge displayed by Ibn Hishām is truly remarkable and shows that he had a perfect mastery of his subject and that he was very clever".

Ibn Hishām has left the following works:

1^o. Ḳaṭr al-Nadā wa-Ball al-Sadā, a short treatise on syntax, several times published; 2^o. Commentary on the preceding, publ. at Tunis in 1281, Būlāk 1253, 1282, Cairo 1274, transl. into French by Goguyer, La pluie de rosée, épanchement de la soif, Leyden 1887; 3^o. Shudhūr al-Dhahab fi Marifat Kalām al-'Arab, a short treatise on grammar, less extensive than the preceding; 4^o. Commentary on the preceding, publ. at Būlāk in 1282, Cairo 1253, 1305; 5^o. al-'Irāb 'an Kawā'id al-'Irāb, a succinct treatise on logical analysis, publ. Būlāk 1253, at Constantinople in 1298, publ. and transl. into French by de Sacy in his Anthologie grammaticale, Paris 1829, pp. 73—92 et 155—223 of the transl.; 6^o. Mughnī 'l-Labīb 'an Kutub al-'Arabī (the author had written another at Mecca in 749 = 1348 which was lost on his return to Egypt and on his second sojourn in Mecca in 756 = 1353 he wrote this one), a complete treatise on syntax divided into two parts or eight chapters containing a detailed exposition of the particles and the rules for the construction of sentences publ. Teherān 1274, Cairo 1305, 1307; 7^o. Mukid al-Adhḡān wa-Mukiz al-Wasnūn, the solution of several difficult points in grammar, Paris Bibl. Nat., N^o. 4115, ii.; 4162, i.; Berlin, Verz.,

N^o. 6748-6749; Khed. Libr., Fihrr., vii. 69, 104, 172, 598; 8^o. Alghāz, a collection of grammatical puzzles prepared for the library of Sultān al-Malik al-Kāmil, publ. at Cairo in 1304; 9^o. al-Rawḍat al-adabiya fī Shawāhid 'Uṭm al-'arabiya, a commentary of "vers témoins" quoted by Ibn Dīnnī in his Kit. al-Lam', Berlin, N^o. 7652; 10^o. al-Djūmī' al-ṣaghīr fī 'l-Naḥw, a treatise on grammar, Paris, Bibl. Nat., N^o. 4159; 11^o. Risāla fī 'ntiṣāb lughatān wa-faḍlān wa-'l-rūb khilāfān wa-aḍḡan wa-'l-Katām 'alā ḥalummā djarṣan, a grammatical study of the words lughatān etc., Berlin, Vers., N^o. 6886; Leiden, Cat., 1², N^o. 221, under the title Masā'il fī 'l-Naḥw wa-Adjwibatuhā; Khed. IBN HUBAIRA, I. ABU 'L-MUTHANNA 'OMAR B. HUBAIRA AL-FAZĀRĪ, governor of the 'Irāk. Ibn Hubaira was a native of Kinnasrān and is mentioned in the reign of Sulaimān b. 'Abd al-Malik as one of the leaders in the war against the Byzantines. In the summer 96-97 (715) the fleet was equipped and in the autumn he attacked Byzantine territory with it, while Maslama b. 'Abd al-Malik conducted the operations on land. Ibn Hubaira spent the winter in Asia Minor and the following summer hostilities were resumed. At the end of 97 (August 716) the Arabs began to besiege Constantinople; after the siege had lasted for a year, they had to abandon it and return home. In 100 (718-719) 'Omar II granted him the governorship of Mesopotamia. After a successful expedition against the Byzantines in Armenia in 102 (720-721) he was appointed governor of al-'Irāk and Khōrāsān by Yazid II. In the constant feuds between northern and southern Arabs, on account of his lineage he always took the side of the former, while the latter were in consequence neglected. In Shawwāl 105 (March 724), soon after the accession of the Caliph Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik, Ibn Hubaira was dismissed and Khālid b. 'Abd Allāh al-Kasrī appointed his successor. According to another statement, this did not happen till the following year. His son Yazid is also called Ibn Hubaira.

Yazid was appointed governor of Kinnasrān by the Caliph al-Walid II. In the beginning of 128 (autumn 745) Marwān II appointed him governor of the 'Irāk and sent him with an army against the Khāridjīs. In Ramaḍān 129 (May-June 747) Yazid entered Kūfa. He next captured Wāsiṭ and took 'Abd Allāh b. 'Omar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz [q. v.] prisoner who had been forced to make peace with the Khāridjī chief al-Ḥaḥḥāk b. Kaīs al-Shaibānī [q. v.] and had remained in the town as Khāridjī governor. The whole of the 'Irāk was then subdued. Like the other enemies of the 'Umayyad caliphate the Khāridjīs also made an alliance with the 'Alid rebel 'Abd Allāh b. Mu'āwiya [q. v.]; the latter was defeated by Yazid's general 'Amir b. Dubāra and the Khāridjīs could no longer hold out in the 'Irāk. The 'Abbāsids then appeared in the field. When their general Kaḥṭaba b. Shabīb advanced against Kūfa, Yazid hastened to meet him but was defeated in Muharram 132 (August 749) and had to take to flight. Kaḥṭaba lost his life — how it is not known — and his son Ḥasan undertook the supreme command, while Yazid fell back on Wāsiṭ, where he was besieged by Ḥasan. In the same year the 'Abbāsīd dynasty was formally recognised. Abū Dja'far, brother of the Caliph Abū 'l-'Abbās went to Wāsiṭ to the assistance of Ḥasan b. Kaḥṭaba and after a siege of several months Yazid had to surrender. Although the 'Abbāsids had expressly promised to pardon him, he was soon afterwards put to death. According to Ibn Khallikān Yazid's execution took place in Dhū 'l-Ka'da 132 (June 750); according to another account, however, he did not enter into negotiations with the besiegers till he had received news of the death of the Caliph Marwān II [q. v.] According to this, Yazid could not have been put to death before the early months of the next year (= autumn 750).

IBN HUBAIRA, the name of two viziers:

1. ʿAWN AL-DĪN ABU ʿL-MUZAFFAR YAḤYĀ B. MUḤAMMAD B. HUBAIRA AL-SHAIBANĪ, born in 490 (1096-1097) or, according to another statement, in 497 (1103-1104). He was a native of Dūr Banī Awḡar, a place five parasangs from Baghdād, and studied in the latter city. After filling several offices he was installed in 542 (1147-1148) as chief of the Diwān al-Zimām and in Rabiʿ II 544 (August 1149) the Caliph al-Muḡtafi appointed him vizier. After the death of the Saldjūk Sultān Masʿūd b. Muḡammad in Radjab 547 (Oct. 1152) the governor of Baghdād, Masʿūd al-Bilālī, seized the town of al-Hilla, but was soon defeated by Ibn Hubaira and had to flee to Takrit, whereupon not only al-Hilla, but also Kūfa and Wāsiṭ fell into the vizier's hands. When Sultān Muḡammad b. Maḡmūd sent an army against Wāsiṭ, the Caliph himself hurried to his vizier's assistance and the Sultān's troops had to retire. In 548 (1153-1154) al-Muḡtafi besieged Takrit but had to abandon the enterprise. In the following year the Caliph and then the vizier made a renewed attempt to take the town but without success. Nevertheless, Masʿūd al-Bilālī was twice defeated in the open field, by the Caliph near Baʿkūbā and by Ibn Hubaira near Wāsiṭ. After this victory the latter received the honorary title of "Sultān of the ʿIrāk". When al-Muḡtafi in the year 555 (1160) died and al-Mustandjīd succeeded him, Ibn Hubaira was confirmed in his office. He died on the 13th Djumādā I 560 (28th March 1165). He was also celebrated as a scholar.

IBN HUBAL, MUḤADHDHIB AL-DĪN ABU ʿL-ḤASAN ʿALĪ B. AḤMAD, a physician, born in Baghdād 515 (1122), studied grammar and fiḡḡh at the Nizāmiya but later turned to medicine. He became court physician to the Shāh-i Arman at Khilāṭ and there amassed great riches; he next entered the service of Badr al-Dīn Luʿlū at Mardīn and finally went to al-Mawṣil. When he was 75 years old, he unfortunately became blind but lived till 610 (1213). His chief work is entitled al-Muḡḡtār fī ʿl-Ṭibb, from which de Koning has published two chapters in Traité sur le calcul dans les reins et dans la vessie, p. 186 sqq. Ibn Hubal, who was also a poet, left a son, Shams al-Dīn Abu ʿl-Abbās Aḡmad, who was likewise a physician and practised in Asia Minor at the court at the Saldjūk Kaikāwus [q. v.], where he died.

IBN ʿIDHĀRĪ (IBN ʿADHĀRĪ), ABU ʿABD AL-LĀH MUḤAMMAD AL-MARRĀKUSHĪ, Arab historian of the Maḡrib and Spain, about whom we have no information further than that he flourished about the end of the viith (xiiith) century, with which his chronicle concludes. The latter is of special interest as it contains portions of lost works. It is called al-Bayān al-maḡrib fī Aḡḡbār al-Maḡrib and is not preserved in its entirety. Ibn ʿIdhārī also wrote a history of the East, which we only know by name. Dozy published the text of al-Bayān al-Maḡrib: Histoire de l'Afrique et de l'Espagne (Leyden 1848—1851, 2 vols.); a fragment is given in the Crestomatia arabigo-españolā of Simonet and Lerchundi (Grenada, 1881), N^o. lxi. The entire work is translated by Fagnan, Algiers 1901—1914, 2 vols.; a fragment on the invasion of the Normans by Dozy, Recherches, 2nd ed., ii. 288-289. Cf. also Dozy, Corrections sur le texte du Bayano ʿl-Maḡrib, Leyden 1883, p. 1—91.

IBN ISFANDIYĀR, MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤASAN, a Persian historian, of whom we only know what little he tells us in the beginning of his chronicle of his native land of Ṭabaristān, returned in 606 (1210) from Baghdād to ʿIrāk ʿAdjamī after hearing of the murder of his patron Rustam b. Ardashīr, governor of Ṭabaristān. In deep grief he spent two months in Raiy collecting material for his work and studying in the libraries. He then spent five years in the town of Khwārizm, where he found by accident in a bookseller's shop certain new documents, including the letter of Tansar, Ardashīr Bābakān's minister, to Djasnaf, king of Ṭabaristān (Journ. Asiat., ixth Ser., Vol. iii., 1894, p. 185 and 502). His chronicle begins with this letter, then follows after a brief description of his native land and its remarkable features, the history of Ṭabaristān under the dynasties of Washmḡr and Buwaih [v. BUVIDS], under the sway of the Ghaznawids and Saldjūks and under the second native Bāwend dynasty, with which the work closes. An abridged English translation by E. Browne appeared in 1905 in the Gibb Memorial Series, Vol. ii.

IBN ISHĀK, ABU ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD, an Arab author and authority on Tradition, was the grandson of Yaṡār, who was captured in the year 12 = 633 in the church at ʿAin al-Tamr in the ʿIrāk and brought to Medina, where he became a client of the tribe of ʿAbd Allāh b. Kaīs. Muḡammad also grew up there; he devoted his attention to the collection of stories and legends of the life of the Prophet and thus soon came into conflict with the representatives of religious and legal tradition which dominated public opinion in the town, notably with Mālik b. Anas who decried him as being a Shīʿī and as being the inventor of many legends and poems transmitted by him. He therefore left his native land and went first of all to Egypt and then to the 'Irāk. The Caliph al-Manṣūr induced him to come to Baghdād, where he died in 150 = 767, or 151 or even 152. He seems to have gathered the materials for the Prophet's biography in two volumes, the Kitāb al-Mubtada' (Fihrist, p. 92) or Mubtada' al-Khalq (Ibn 'Adī in Ibn Hishām (ed. Wustenfeld), II, p. VIII, l. 23) or Kitāb al-Mabda' wa-ḥiṣṣat al-Anbiyā' (al-Ḥalabī, al-Sira, ii. 235), the history of the Prophet to the Hijra, and the Kitāb al-Maghāzī. His Kitāb al-Khulafā' seems early to have taken a second place before this, his chief work. Karabacek believed he had found a leaf of the original text of the biography of the Prophet in a papyrus of the Rainer collection (see Führer durch die Sammlung, n^o. 665); on the other hand, the alleged Kitāb al-Maghāzī of Ibn Ishāk in the library of the Koprulu Madrasa in Stambul (Defter, N^o. 1140) has been shown to be a copy of Ibn Hishām's recension (see Horowitz, in Mitt. des Sem. für Orient. Sprachen, x. Westas. Stud., p. 14). Al-Mawardi, however, seems still to have had access to the original. He quotes from the Maghāzī in his al-Aḥkām al-Sulṭāniya (ed. Enger), p. 65, 11 sqq., 65-6, 67-8, 68, stories which are given in an abridged form in Ibn Hishām, p. 677, 561, 445, 841. His work is preserved in comprehensive extracts in Ṭabarī, but independently only in the version of Ibn Hishām [q. v.], who knew the book through a pupil of Ibn Ishāk, the Kūfī Ziyād b. 'Abd Allāh al-Bakkā'ī. He combined the two independent parts with occasional considerable abridgments into the Kitāb Sirat Rasūl Allāh. The book received its present form in the fourth century A. H. from al-Wazīr al-Maghribī [q. v.]. A commentary was written on it by al-Suhailī (died 508 = 1114) and another, very superficial, by the Moroccan Abū Dharr Muṣṭab b. Muḥammad b. Mas'ūd (died 604 = 1207 in Fās).

IBN IYĀS (in the popular dialect pronounced "Ayās"). MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD, is the most important Arab chronicler of the period of the decline of the Mamlūks. Born in 852 (1448) he seems to have been nearly 80 when he died, for his history comes down to the year 928. His family was of Turkish origin. His paternal grandfather, Iyās al-Fakhrī, a Turkish slave, called 'min Djinnaid' after his owner, was sold to Sulṭān Zāhir Barkūk [q. v.], enrolled among his Mamlūks and reached the rank of second Dawādār. His great grandfather (his father's maternal grandfather) had risen further in the official scale. Ezdemir al-Khaznadār, sold into Egypt as a slave, ultimately filled the very highest offices in Cairo under Sulṭān Ḥasan and Sulṭān Ashraf Sha'bān and governed successively Tripolis, Aleppo and Damascus. Ibn Iyās' father belonged in Cairo to the Awlād al-Nās, a kind of military reserve, who were bound to give military service at the Sulṭān's command. In return they received a fief or a sum of 1000 dinārs or a yearly allowance (1000 dirhams under Kā'it Bey) [see Ibn Iyās, ed. Bülāḡ, ii. 195 et passim]. Aḥmad Ibn Iyās was a prominent man, related both by birth and marriage to many emirs and high officials. Of his 25 children only three boys and three girls survived him: one of them is our author; another was master of ordnance (zerdekāsh).

Ibn Iyās' chief work, the only one which can claim lasting importance is a detailed chronicle of Egypt entitled Bad'ī' al-Zuhūr fī Wakā'if al-Duhūr. He treats briefly of the early history of Egypt to the end of the Aiyūbid period, and even the account of the Mamlūk period down to Kāit Bey is rather cursory. It is only from the accession of this ruler that he relates events in detail, along with biographies of the high officials and monthly lists of obituaries. A closer study of this work reveals a problem. The chronicle seems to be extant in two versions. The shorter is clearly the author's diary; for the events of the year 921 for example were, according to the text, already completely noted on the 1st Muḥarram 922. Further evidence is that the shorter version is written in the vernacular, while the fuller text of the longer version in the London Ms. appears finished and polished (cf. Vollers' comprehensive article in the Revue d'Égypte, iii. 551). The description of the years 922-928 is moreover much fuller than the preceding parts and might, if Ibn Iyās is really the author, belong to the larger recension. It is remarkable that the reign of Sulṭān Ghūrī, the years 906-912 (Paris Ms.) and 913-921 (Petrograd Ms.), is not found in other copies (hence not printed in the Cairo edition). This circumstance brought Vollers in his article above mentioned to conclude that this portion of the chronicle is not by Ibn Iyās. But it is just this part that is certainly from his pen; this is proved by the fact that he writes as an eye-witness. For example, he mentions that he was present at a procession himself, or that he was personally affected by events (e.g. robbery by Mamlūks). Further evidence is the accurate account of his family affairs on his father's death as well as the occasional mention of his brother. Ibn Iyās' chronicle is an account of the doings of the rulers of the time, at the same time mentioning other events. He cannot be denied a certain critical ability, although his verdict is often too severe. Yet he was conscious that the utterly corrupt financial administration and the neglect, so often censured by him, of artillery brought about the decline of the empire, although he unjustly gives the whole blame for the wretched financial situation to Sultān Ghūrī. The great value of this chronicle consists also in the fact that in part it is the only Arabic source for the beginning of the xth century.

Of less importance are his other works: 1. Nashh al-Ashūr fī 'Adjā'ib al-Aḥqār, a cosmography with special reference to Egypt much used and often quoted by European scholars of the sixteenth century. 2. Mardj al-Zuhūr fī Waḳā'if al-Duhūr, a popular history, dealing with the patriarchs and prophets, of little value, and perhaps not by our author. 3. Nuḥat al-Umam fī 'L-'Adjā'ib wa 'L-Hikam, also a work on history, little known, only extant in one Ms. in Constantinople.

Bibliography: See Brockelmann, Geschichte d. arab. Lit., ii. 295, and Vollers' article. Ibn Iyās' chronicle was printed in Cairo (1301—1306) and in the state press of Cairo-Bulāḳ 1311-1312. (M. SOBERNHEIM.)

IBN AL-KĀDĪ, ABU 'L-ABBĀS AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD B. 'ALĪ B. 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. ABĪ 'L-ĀFIYA AL-MIKNĀSĪ, known as IBN AL-KĀDĪ, a descendant of Mūsā b. Abī 'L-Āfiya al-Miknāsī, belonging to the great tribe of Zenāta of Morocco, born in 960 (1552-1553). Jurisconsult, man of letters, historian, poet and above all mathematician, he studied with his father, Abu 'L-Abbās al-Mandjūr, al-Kaṣṣār, Abū Zakariyyā Yahyā al-Sarrāḳ, Ibn Muḍjīb al-Massārī, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. Djallāl, Aḥmad Bābā, Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Sidjilmāsi, mufti of Marrākosh, etc. He was on intimate terms with the Ṣūfī Abu 'L-Mahāsīn al-Fāsi and attended his conferences. He went to the east for the first time to make the pilgrimage to Mecca and heard the lectures of Ibrāhīm al-'Alkamī, Sālim al-Sanhūrī, Yūsuf b. Faḍla al-Zarkānī, Yahyā al-Ḥaṭṭāb, Badr al-Dīn al-Karāfi, etc. On returning a second time to the east in 991, he was captured by Christian corsairs on Thursday 14th Sha'bān 994 = 31st July 1585 and his ransom of 20,000 ounces was paid by Sultān Abu 'L-Abbās al-Manṣūr al-Sa'dī on the 17th Rajab 995 = 23rd June 1587, i.e. after 11 months' captivity during which he had to suffer, as he tells us himself, all kinds of privations and ill treatment. After occupying the post of Kādī at Salā (Salé) he was recalled and settled at Fās, where he devoted himself to teaching in the mosque al-Abbārīn. Among his pupils may be mentioned Abu 'L-Abbās Aḥmad b. Yūsuf al-Fāsi, and notably the author of Nafḥ al-'Iṭib, Abu 'L-Abbās Aḥmad al-Makkarī, who pronounced his funeral prayers. He died at Fās on the 6th Sha'bān 1025 = 19th August 1616 and was buried near the Bāb al-Djisa.

Of the 13 works enumerated by his biographers, we only know the following: 1^o. Djadhwat al-

Iktibās fī man ḥalla min al-'Ālām Madīnat Fās, biographical dictionary of famous men and scholars who lived in Fās, publ. at Fās in 1309; 2^o. Durāt al-Hudūd fī Asmā' al-Riḍā', a biographical dictionary completing the Wafayāt al-'Ayan of Ibn Khallikān and stopping at the beginning of the xth (xviiith) century, Bibl. Univers. of Algiers, n^o. 2022; 3^o. Lakḥ al-Fawā'id min Luḡat al-Fawā'id, complement to the Ṭabaḳāt of Ibn Kunfudh in which each century is divided into ten classes each containing 10 very succinct biographies (in the writer's library); 4^o. Al-Muntaḥa 'l-makṣūr 'alā Ma'āthir (var. Maḥāsīn) al-Khalīfa Abī 'L-Abbās al-Manṣūr, a panegyric history of Sultān al-Manṣūr, a source of Nuḥat al-Iḥādī of al-Wafrānī and al-Istikṣā' of al-Salāwī.

IBN KĀDĪ SHUHBA, TAḤAL-DIN ABU BEKR AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. 'OMAR AL-ASADĪ AL-DIMASHQĪ, an Arab biographer, born in 779 (1377), died 851 (1448). He successively filled various offices, as Mudarrī, Kādī, chief Kādī, etc. and devoted particular attention to the Chronicle of al-Dhahabī [q.v.], which he continued and of which he prepared a synopsis. Another work of his is the Ṭabaḳāt al-Shāfi'iya.

His son ABU 'L-FADL MUḤAMMAD, died 874 (1469), wrote not only a biography of his father but also several other less important works which are detailed by Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., ii. 30.

IBN KĀDĪ SIMĀWNA, BADR AL-DIN MAḤMUD B. ISMĀ'ĪL, a Turkish jurist and mystic, born at Simaw, a town in the Sandjāk of Kutahiya, where his father was Kādī. According to an uncorroborated statement, he was a descendant of the Saldjūk Sultāns; we have more authority for the statement that he studied in Cairo, was the teacher of Faradj afterwards Mamlūk Sultān, and later went to Armenia, where he entered a Ṣūfī order, whose shāikh was Ḥusain Akhlātī. He is said to have disputed about this time in Tiflis before Timūr, with other jurists, and came in Timūr's train to his native land again. During the wars of succession after the death of Bāyazid he attached himself to Mūsā, who had proclaimed himself sultān in European Turkey, and the latter made him kādī'askar. Mūsā however lost his life in 816 (1413) in battle with his brother Muḥammad I; Ibn Kādī Simāwna was pardoned but had to settle in Iznik. A short time afterwards, a religious movement began in Asia Minor, the leader of which was a certain Borakludjī Muṣṭafā, whom his followers used to call Dede Sultān. A detailed account of him is given by Ducas, ed. Bonn, p. 111 sqq. The accounts of the movement are not quite clear but it seems to have aimed at the abrogation of Muslim law and the introduction of a limited communism, so that Jews and Christians also took part in it. One of the leaders is said to have been a Jew, although his name, transmitted in different forms, Ṭurḷak Kamāl (Ṭorḷak Hnt or Hū) does not sound at all Jewish. Borakhdjī Muṣṭafā was, according to some, Ibn Qāḍī Simāwna's ket-khoda when he was qāḍī'askar; in any case, he seems to have been one of his pupils. When the movement started, however, Ibn Qāḍī Simāwna was no longer in Asia Minor, but in European Turkey, either because he had connections there and was seeking a career in it, or because he feared to be drawn into the movement on account of the relations between him and Muṣṭafā and therefore retired to Europe. The statement in Kutb al-Dīn, Die Chroniken des Stadt Mekka, ed. Wüstenfeld, iii. 255, that he had himself claimed the sultanate is improbable. In any case, Sulṭān Muḥammad sent troops against Muṣṭafā and Ṭurḷak, who were both taken prisoner and executed. Ibn Qāḍī Simāwna was thereupon also arrested and executed under a fatwā of Ḥaidar Harawī at Seres in 818 (1415).

Ibn Qāḍī Simāwna composed several legal and mystic works, whose titles are given by Brockelmann. The mystical writings Masarrat al-Kulūb, al-Waridāt (extant in Leiden, with commentary, cf. Cal., v. 23), are not yet investigated.

IBN KAIS AL-RUKĀYĀT, 'UBAID ALLĀH, a notable poet of the Umayyad period. By descent he was a Qurashī although he did not belong to one of the most distinguished families of this tribe. His life is bound up with the wars waged about the caliphate between Ibn al-Zubair in Mecca and the Umayyads in Damascus. The poet who had lost several relatives in the battle of the Harra [q. v.] was a passionate champion of the Zubairids; but he seems to have had sufficient political insight to regret profoundly the struggle in which he found himself involved. That the Qurashīs were predestined to rule the Arabs with a firm hand was clear to him; and he made no secret of the fact that such political convulsions were bound to undermine the power of the Qurashīs. Our poet was particularly attached to Muṣ'ab, the Zubairid governor of the 'Irāq. When the latter was defeated and fell at Maskin, the fate of his brother 'Abd Allāh, the Meccan anticaliph, was also decided. Ibn Kais al-Rukāyāt now remained in concealment for a considerable time; the story of his disappearance and his reappearance among the Umayyads in Syria has been romantically adorned. Just as previously Ibn Kais had been more attached to Muṣ'ab than to his brother in Mecca, so now he seems to have found less favour and kindly welcome with 'Abd al-Malik, the ruler in Damascus, than with 'Abd al-'Azīz, the governor who ruled Egypt in his brother's name. The Umayyad Caliph had, it is true, little reason to love the poet, in however moving a way the latter might now beg for grace.

Of his poems a selection made by al-Sukkari in the third century A. H. has come down to us. From this we receive a direct impression of the events which convulsed the world of Islām at this time as revealed in the descriptions and impressions of one concerned in them. The political poems of the Diwān may be considered as political pamphlets of the time. It also contains numerous trifling and sensual poems usually quite conventional love poems. Our poet indeed owes his name al-Rukāyāt to a lady he addresses, named Rukāiya. Even the earliest critics compared Ibn Kais al-Rukāyāt with 'Umar Ibn Abī Rabi'a. The latter towers above him — not only as a poet of love but also as a man — but the former may be credited with greater versatility. The madīh, the praise of high and noble patrons, is a favourite form of poem of his and in its composition he shows much skill. But he wanders all over the well trod paths of post-classic Arabic archaizing poetry, although here and there he makes concessions to contemporary styles. At least he does not fall into the errors of other singers of this epoch by seeking after unintelligible ancient expressions. A freshness and directness of style cannot be denied to some descriptions in his Diwān, for example the short but charming description of Ḥulwān (Diwān, iii. 6 sqq.) and some amorous trifles.

IBN AL-QAISARĀNĪ, under this name are known:

1. ABU 'L-FADL MUḤAMMAD B. ṬĀHIR AL-MAQDISĪ, an Arab philologist, born 448 (1058), died 507 (1113). De Jong has published an edition of one of his writings under the title Homonyma inter nomina relativa (Lugd. Bat. 1865). The Arabic title is given in Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., i. 355, where further references are given. There has also been printed his Kit. al-Djam' baina Kitābai Abi Naṣr al-Kalābādhī wa-Abi Bakr al-Iṣbahānī fī Ridgāl al-Bukhārī wa-Muslim, Ḥaidarābād 1323.

2. ABU 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. NAṢR, SHARAF AL-DĪN, an Arab poet, born 478 (1085) at 'Akkā, d. 548 (1153) at Damascus. On him cf. Ibn Khallikān, ed. Wüstenfeld, N^o. 688.

IBN QĀYIM AL-DJAWZĪYA, i. e. the son of the director of the Madrasa al-Djawziya at Damascus, whose real name was SHAMS AL-DĪN MUḤAMMAD B. ABĪ BAKR, a Hanbali theologian and disciple of the celebrated Ibn Taimiya, 691—751 (1292—1356). "He was in every respect a faithful disciple of his teacher and he adopted the latter's literary mode. Even during the lifetime of Ibn Taimiya he was persecuted and as he condemned the pilgrimage to Hebron, he was thrown into prison. Like his teacher he combats the philosophers, the Christians, and the Jews; he holds up the doctrine of the eternity of rewards and of the finiteness of the punishments of hell". (Schreiner in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesells., liii. 56). Of his numerous writings (cf. the list in Brockelmann, Gesch. der arab. Litt. ii. 106) are printed amongst others: Kitāb al-Fawā'id al-mushawwiḥa ilā 'Ulām al-Kur'ān wa-'Ilm al-Bayān, Cairo 1318, 1327; Kitāb al-Rūḥ, Ḥaidarābād 1318, 1324; Akhbār al-Nisā', Cairo 1307, 1319; Shifā' al-'Alīl fī 'l-Ḳaḍā' wa-'l-Ḳadr etc., Cairo 1323; de Vlioger, Kitāb al-Qadr, Matériaux pour servir à l'étude de la doctrine de la prédestination dans la théologie musulmane, al-Turuk al-hikmiya fī 'l-Siyāsa al-shar'iya, Cairo

IBN KALĀKIS, ABU 'L-FUTUḤ NAṢR ALLĀH B. 'ABD ALLĀH, an Arab poet, born in Alexandria in 532 (1138). He spent the years 563—565 (1168-1169) in Sicily where a certain Ka'id Abu 'l-Kāsim Ibn al-Ḥaḍjar was his patron; to him he dedicated a work entitled al-Zuhūr al-bāsim fī Awṣāf Abi 'l-Kāsim; he then went to Yemen and died at 'Aidhāb in 567 (1171). His not very extensive Diwān was published in Cairo in 1323 by Khalil Maṭrān; this edition is very incomplete in comparison to the ms. Paris Bibl. Nat., N^o. 3139.

IBN AL-KALĀNISĪ, ABU YA'LAḤ ḤAMZA B. ASAD AL-TAMĪMĪ, an Arab historian, belonged to a prominent family in Damascus and died there in 555 (1160). He continued the chronicle of Hilāl al-Ṣābi', which stops in the year 448, down to 555 and gave his work the simple title Dhail. The work was frequently copied by later authors and has been published by H. F. Amedroz (1908) from the Oxford Ms., which is defective at the beginning, and starts in the year 363. Cf. the editor's preface.

IBN KASĪ, AḤMAD, shaiḫ of the Ṣūfis, set up in Spain about 1140 as a Mahdi and took possession of Mertola and other places (1144). He was then delivered up by his followers to the Almohads and pardoned by 'Abd al-Mu'min. He lived for a time at the court of these rulers till one of his former followers murdered him. He was also an author and wrote a book called Khal' al-Nālain fī 'l-Taṣawwuf. Cf. Ḥādīdjī Khalifa, iii. 171; Cat. Wien (Flügel), iii. 401.

IBN KĀSIM, ABU 'ABD ALLĀH 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. AL-KĀSIM AL-UTAKĪ, was the Imām Mālik's most prominent pupil. He studied under him for 20 years and after Mālik's death was regarded as the greatest Mālikī teacher. Through him Mālikī teaching was disseminated in the Maghrib, where it is still predominant. He died in Cairo in 191 (806).

One of the chief works of the Mālikīs, the so-called Mudawwana is usually ascribed to Ibn al-Kāsim. It was originally put together by Asad b. al-Furāt and consists of the answers of Ibn al-Kāsim to Asad's questions on the doctrine of Mālik b. Anas. Saḥnūn Abū Sa'īd al-Tanūkhī (died 240 = 854), the ka'dī of Kairawān, copied the work. When he went to see Ibn al-Kāsim in 188 = 804, the latter gave him many emendations and after his death Saḥnūn arranged the whole book. In Ibn al-Kāsim's Mudawwana we therefore have an account of the doctrines of Mālik b. Anas in Saḥnūn's recension. The work was printed in 20 vol. at Cairo in 1323 (1905). Various Mālikī scholars have written commentaries on the Mudawwana.

IBN KATHĪR 1. 'ABD ALLĀH, ABU BAKR, ABU MA'AD (corrupted to Abū Sa'īd), one of the seven canonical Ḳur'ān readers, born in 45 (665) in Mecca, belonged to a Persian family which had migrated to South Arabia, was a client of 'Amr b. 'Alkama al-Kinānī and from his trade of druggist was called al-Dārī or al-Dārānī; he filled the office of Ka'dī 'l-Djama'a in Mecca and died there in 120 = 738. His manner of reciting the Ḳur'ān was transmitted by the two readers Kanbal i. e. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Makhzūmī (died 291 = 904) and al-Bazzī i. e. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Fārī'ī (died 270 = 883) and is known to us from the anonymous description in a Berlin Ms. (s. Ahlwardt, Verzeichn., N^o. 632).

2. ISMĀ'IL B. 'OMAR 'IMĀD AL-DĪN ABU 'L-FIDĀ' B. AL-KHAṬĪB AL-ḲURASHĪ AL-BOSRAWĪ AL-SHĀFI'Ī, Arab historian, born in 701 (1301) at Damascus, taught there as professor of Tradition and shared the persecution of his teacher, the celebrated Ḥanbalī Ibn Taimiya; he died in Sha'ban 774 = Febr. 1373. His chief work is the universal history, al-Bidāya wa 'l-Nihāya, from the creation to his own time, based to the year 738 = 1337 on al-Birzālī's chronicle. Of the Mss. of this work detailed by Brockelmann in his *Gesch. d. ar. IBN KHĀKĀN, the name of three viziers:

1. ABU ʿL-ḤASAN ʿUBAID ALLĀH B. YAḤYĀ B. KHĀKĀN. Appointed secretary of state in 236 (850-851), ʿUbaid Allāh was raised to the vizierate by al-Mutawakkil and held this office till the latter's assassination in 247 (861). Towards the end of the year 245 (860) he brought about the fall of Naḍjāh b. Salama, the minister of finance; the latter was tortured to death and his property confiscated. Along with al-Fath b. Khākān [q. v.] ʿUbaid Allāh was the declared favourite of al-Mutawakkil and they used their influence to favour his son al-Muʿtazz at the expense of his brother al-Muntasir b. al-Mutawakkil. After the accession of al-Muʿtamid in the year 256 (870) ʿUbaid Allāh, in spite of vigorous protests was again appointed vizier and remained in this office till his death in Dhu ʿl-Ḥaḍa 263 (July 877).

2. ABU ʿALĪ MUḤAMMAD B. ʿUBAID ALLĀH B. YAḤYĀ, son of the preceding. After the fall of Ibn al-Furāt in 299 (912) Muḥammad, who had filled several offices since the death of his father, was appointed vizier through the influence of a harem lady but proved so incapable that the caliph al-Muqtadir wished to replace him in the following year by Ibn Abi ʿl-Baḡhl, governor of Fārs. He succeeded in saving himself by harem intrigues and Ibn Abi ʿl-Baḡhl, who had already arrived in the capital to take over the office, returned to his governorship. Towards the end of the year, however, the Caliph had to look round for a more suitable vizier and summoned ʿAlī b. ʿIsā b. al-Djarrāh [q. v.] to Baghdād. After the latter had entered into office in the beginning of 301 (913), Muḥammad was arrested with his two sons, ʿAbd Allāh and ʿAbd al-Wāhid. In Djumādā II 301 (Jan. 914) he received his freedom again. He died in 312 (924-925).

3. ABU ʿL-ḲĀSIM ʿABD ALLĀH (ʿUBAID ALLĀH) B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿUBAID ALLĀH B. YAḤYĀ, son of the preceding. In 312 (924) ʿAbd Allāh succeeded Ibn al-Furāt when the latter was finally dismissed. When he was intriguing against the high chamberlain Naṣr al-Ḳuṣhūrī, the latter got wind of it and soon brought about ʿAbd Allāh's fall. Besides he was an invalid and had to trust the business of his offices to others for a period. At the same time a famine broke out in the capital and as usual the discontent of the people found vent against the vizier. Naṣr finally succeeded in overthrowing him and after Abd Allāh had held the vizierate for about a year and a half, he was dismissed and imprisoned in Ramaḍān 313 (Nov. 925). His property was confiscated; after some time al-Muqtadir released him and he died in 314 (926-927).

IBN KHĀLAWAIH (KHĀLŌYA), ABU ʿABD ALLĀH AL-ḤUSAIN B. AḤMAD B. ḤAMDĀN AL-HAMDĀNĪ, a notable Arab grammarian and lexicographer. The year of his birth is not mentioned; he was a native of Hamadḥān and came in 314 to Baghdād, where he studied the Kur'ān with Ibn Muḍjāhid (d. 324) and Abū Saʿīd al-Sirāfi (d. 368), grammar and Adab with Ibn Duraid [q. v.], Niftawāh (d. 323), Ibn al-Anbārī [q. v.], Abū ʿOmar al-Zāhid (d. 345), and ḥadīth with Muḥammad b. Maḳhlād al-ʿAṭār (d. 331) and others. He afterwards went to Syria and settled in Ḥalab; according to al-Dhahabī he also lived in Maiyāfārḳīn and Hims. He took up an eclectic standpoint in relation to the grammatical schools of Kūfa and Baṣra. He won a high reputation as a teacher. He was in high favour with the Ḥamdānī Saif al-Dawla, whose sons he taught; as a poet he was also appreciated; and he often disputed vigorously with al-Mutanabbī [q. v.]. The grammarian Ibn Durustawāh (d. 347) argued against him in his Kit. al-Radd ʿalā Ibn Khālawaih ji ʿl-Ḳull wa ʿl-Ḍaʿl (Fihrist p. 63, 15). Ibn Khālawaih died in 370 (980) in Ḥalab.

Of his works (detailed in Flügel, l. c.) there are preserved: a) Kitāb Laṣa, the first half of which was published by H. Derenbourg in Hebraica, x. 88—105, Amer. Journ. of Sem. Lang. and Lit., xiv. (1898), 81—93, xv. (1898-9), 32—41, 215—223, xviii. (1901), 36—51; also, hardly completed, printed at Cairo in 1327 (ed. Aḥmad b. al-Amin al-Shinkīṭī); b) Kit. (Risāla fī) ʿl-ʿArab ṭhalāthīn Sūrat al-Mufaṣṣal (Mss. in Brockelmann); c) Sharḥ Maḳṣūrat Ibn Duraid, Mss. Paris Bibl. Nat., No. 4231, iv. and in Brockelmann, o. c., i. 111; d) his recension of the Diwān of Abū Firās [q. v.] with an introduction; e) Refutation of some grammatical explanations of Thaʿlab in al-Suyūṭī, al-Ashbāḥ wa ʿl-Naṣāʾir (Ḥaidarābād 1317), iv. 137—140. — The Kit. al-Shaḍḍar ascribed to him is, as S. Nagelberg shows in the preface to his edition (Kitāb al-Shaḍḍar, Diss. Zürich, Kirchhain 1909), the work of Abū Zaid [q. v.] on which his lectures were based. This is probably also the case with the Kit. al-Aṣḥarāt mentioned among his works which is probably his edition of the work of his teacher Abū ʿOmar al-Zāhid (Berl., Verz., No. 7014).

IBN KHALDŪN, ^{ABD AL-RAḤMĀN and YAḤYĀ.} two Arab historians, descendants of a Seville family, who migrated to Tunis about the middle of the viiith (xiiith) century and belonged to the Arab tribe of Kinda. Their ancestor Khālid, known as Khaldūn (whence the name Ibn Khaldūn for all members of the family) migrated from the Yemen to Spain in the iiird (ixth) century.

There his descendants filled various important administrative offices, some in Carmona and some in Seville. The fall of the Spanish Almohad kingdom and continued conquests of the Christians caused the Khaldūn family to migrate to Ceuta and the great grandfather of the two brothers 'Abd al-Raḥmān and Yahyā, al-Hasan, finally settled in Bona on the invitation of the Ḥafṣid Abū Zakariyā. The Ḥafṣid Emirs and Ra'īs showered favours on al-Hasan and his son Abū Bakr Muḥammad. The latter, who bore the title ʿAmīl al-Ashghāl "chief accountant", was strangled in prison. His son Muḥammad attained various important offices at the Ḥafṣid court. The latter's son, also called Muḥammad, declined all offices of state, although he remained in Tunis, in order to devote himself entirely to study and pious meditations; he died of the plague in 750 (1349) and left 3 sons of whom the eldest, Muḥammad, played no part either in literature or politics, while the two younger brothers, 'Abd al-Raḥmān and Yahyā, obtained renown as politicians and historians.

1. 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN (ABŪ ZAID) surnamed WALI AL-DĪN, born in Tunis on the 1st Ramaḍān 732 (27th May 1332), died at Cairo on the 25th Ramaḍān 808 (19th March 1406), after learning the Qur'ān by heart, enjoyed the instruction of his father and the most prominent teachers of Tunis and devoted himself ardently to grammar, language, law and tradition and also to poetry. When the Marīnid Abū 'l-Ḥasan took Tunis in 748 (1347) 'Abd al-Raḥmān heard the lectures of the Maghribī scholars in the retinue of this prince and perfected his knowledge of logic, philosophy, dogmatic theology, canon law and other branches of Arab learning. The connections he made at this time with the scholars and high officials of the Marīnid court, later helped him to high offices at the court of Fās. When barely 21 he was appointed writer of the al-āma of the king of Tunis, but left the office soon afterwards, when trouble broke out in the city, and fled to Biskra to Ibn Muzni, lord of Zāb. After the Marīnid Abū 'Inān had seized Tlemcen, and the whole country east as far as Bougie, 'Abd al-Raḥmān entered his service and took part in a campaign under a Marīnid general. Invited by the sultān at the request of scholars to Fās (755 = 1334) he went there, became secretary to Abū 'Inān and continued his studies under the best teachers of his time. In 757 (1356) he fell into disgrace and was twice imprisoned, the second time till the death of Abū 'Inān in 759 (1358). The new sultān Abū Sālim, appointed him secretary again (760 = 1359) and later chief qāḍī. After Abū Sālim's violent death he was again disgraced under the notorious vizier 'Omar b. 'Abd Allāh, but received permission to go to Granada (763-764 = 1361-1362), where he stayed at the court of the Banu 'l-Aḥmar and formed a friendship with the famous vizier Ibn al-Khaṭīb. Two years later, when this friendship had cooled down, he went to Bougie on the invitation of the ruler there, the Ḥafṣid Abū 'Abd Allāh, who appointed him his chamberlain (ḥāḍib); at the same time he held the office of khaṭīb and a teaching post (766 = 1364). When in the following year Bougie fell to the ruler of Constantine 'Abd al-Raḥmān retired to Biskra. Soon afterwards he entered into communication with Abū Ḥammū II [q. v.], the 'Abdalwāḍid king of Tlemcen, sent him, as he tells us himself, his brother Yahyā as chamberlain and procured for him the support of various Arab tribes and the alliance with Abū Ishāk, king of Tunis, and his son and successor Khālid. He then went himself to Tlemcen, but soon afterwards left the unfortunate Abū Ḥammū II in the lurch, when he was driven from his capital by the Marīnid sultān 'Abd al-'Azīz and offered his services to the latter. From his safe refuge in Biskra he continued to support 'Abd al-'Azīz against Abū Ḥammū while the Maghrib was tormented with wars and rebellions. He did not go to Fās till 774 (1372) and from there in 776 (1374) to Granada, but the sultān of Granada, at the instigation of the Marīnids, soon had him taken to Ḥunain, the harbour of Tlemcen. In Tlemcen he again found a friendly reception from Abū Ḥammū. He now resolved to shun the friendship of princes and retired to the Ḳal'a Ibn Salāma (Taughzūt) where he began his history and lived till 780 (1378). He then went to Tunis to consult several books which he required for his work. In 784 (1382) he set out on the pilgrimage to Mecca, but broke his journey in Alexandria and in Cairo where he lectured in the Djāmi' al-Azhar and later in the Ṣaḥīya and in 786 (1384) was appointed Mālikī chief qāḍī by sultān al-Zāhir Barḳūk. Soon afterwards he lost his whole family and all his property by shipwreck and then devoted himself to pious works and completed his pilgrimage in 789 (1387). From 801 (1399) he was again chief qāḍī in Cairo with a short interruption and in 803 (1401) he accompanied the sultān al-Nāṣir to Damascus with the other qāḍīs on his campaign against Timūr. Returning to Cairo he again filled the office of qāḍī and held it till his death with several interruptions.

From those biographical notes we see that 'Abd al-Raḥmān perhaps showed a great and statesmanlike ability in the administration of important offices but that he never hesitated to leave one of his masters in the lurch and to enter the service of another, often the enemy of the former. We have further seen that he played a great part in the politics of North Africa and Spain and had very special opportunities of giving a considered judgment on what happened. His A'itāb al-Ibar (Cairo 1284, in 7 vols.), in spite of the unequal value of the separate parts, is an important work for the history of his time. Although certain parts of this comprehensive history leave much to be desired in the presentation of facts and documentary value, others contain, in spite of some stylistic defects, very important documents for the study of history. His History of the Berbers will always remain a valuable guide for everything that refers to the life of the Arab and Berber tribes of the Maghrib and the mediaeval history of this country; it is the fruit of 50 years' (2nd half of the xivth century) direct observation and industrious study of books and chronicles as well as diplomatic and official documents of his time. His Muḥaddima which deals "with all branch of Arab sciences and culture, remains, as regards the depth of thought, clearness of exposition and correctness of judgment undoubtedly the most important work of the age, which seems to be surpassed by no other work of a Muslim author".

2. YAḤYĀ, ABŪ ZAKARĪYĀ, born in Tunis about 734 (1333), died at Tlemcen in Ramaḍān 780 (Nov.-Dec. 1378), like his brother and probably with him, devoted industriously to study in his native town and was intimate with all the important scholars of his time in the Ḥafṣid capital. To judge from his book, on which see below, he seems to have had a special preference for poetry and belles lettres. We know very little of his personality; the references are scattered in various sources, e.g. 'Abd al-Rahmān's autobiography and that portion of the Kitāb al-'Ibar which deals with the history of the Berbers. This last book gives a detailed account of the murder of Yaḥyā in Tlemcen; Yaḥyā himself also gives a few details of his career in his Buḥyāt al-Ruwwād.

Yaḥyā's political life did not begin till 757 (1356), when he was with his brother (who was soon afterwards imprisoned) at the court of Abū Sālim, sulṭān of Fās, and the latter sent two Ḥafṣid emirs, his prisoners, from Tlemcen back to Bougie. He accompanied these two princes in place of his brother and acted as chamberlain to one of them, the emir Abū 'Abd Allāh. As the latter, in spite of a long siege could not regain Bougie, he sent Yaḥyā to Abū Ḥammū II, king of Tlemcen, to ask for his assistance (764 = 1362). Yaḥyā found a kindly reception in Tlemcen and his request was granted. After the Mawlid festival, which he attended there and commemorated in a poem, he went back to his master to bring him to the 'Abdalwādid court on the 8th Djumādā II (26th March 1363). Both returned to Bougie with a column of troops sent by Abū Ḥammū.

In 767 (1365-1366) the Ḥafṣid emir of Constantine, after taking Bougie, imprisoned Yaḥyā in Bona and confiscated his property; he escaped soon afterwards and went to Biskra to Ibn Muzni and his brother. It was probably at this time that he made the pilgrimage to the tomb of 'Oḳba, which he describes in his Buḥyāt al-Ruwwād. From Biskra he returned to Tlemcen at Abū Ḥammū's request, arrived there in Radjab 769 (Feb. 1368) and was appointed Kātib al-Inṣhā'. When he learned that Tlemcen was threatened by the Marinids, he forgot the kindnesses shown him by Abū Ḥammū and left him (772 = 1371) to enter the service of the Marinid sulṭān 'Abd al-'Aziz and afterwards of his successor Muḥammad al-Sa'īd. It was only after the capture of Fās al-Djadid by Sulṭān Abū l-'Abbās in 775 (1373) that Yaḥyā returned to Tlemcen, where Abū Ḥammū again welcomed him and gave him his former secretarial office. He soon won the king's confidence again but thereby aroused the jealousy of the other court officials, notably Abū Ḥammū's eldest son and probable successor Abū Tashfin II. The latter with a few hired assassins fell upon Yaḥyā, as he was leaving the palace one night in Ramaḍān 780 (1378), and murdered him. When Abū Ḥammū learned that his son had been the instigator of the crime, he had not the courage to take steps against the murderers.

Although Yaḥyā's political career was shorter and less brilliant than that of his brother, yet it gave him the opportunity to write a historical work of great learning, the Buḥyāt al-Ruwwād fī Dhikr al-Mulūk min Banī 'Abd al-Wād. It was much used by Brosselard and Barges in their history of Tlemcen and I have published the Arabic text with translation under the title Histoire des Beni 'Abd al-Wād, rois de Tlemcen (2 vols., Algiers 1904—1913). His history of the kingdom of Tlemcen is particularly important for a knowledge of the long and in a way brilliant reign of Abū Ḥammū II, whose secretary and trusted adviser the writer was. In this capacity he was no doubt able to consult political documents and even quotes some in full in his book. Although the book neither covers so wide a field as his brother 'Abd al-Rahmān's work nor shows such a lofty point of view or critical spirit, it is far superior in literary value. Yaḥyā reveals in it not only literary but also poetical skill, his elegant style is often lyrical and his narrative is adorned with quotations from the best old Arab writers. He gives us not only a sketch of the political history of the central Maghribi kingdom, he has also preserved for us in his work poems by contemporary court poets and gives information about scholars of his time and about the poetical meetings at the court of Tlemcen, all information hardly to be found elsewhere and affording a rather accurate glimpse into the intellectual life of the 'Abdalwādid capital in the 14th century. IBN KHALLIKĀN, AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. IBRĀHĪM, SHAMS AL-DĪN ABU l-'ABBĀS AL-BARMAKĪ AL-IRBILĪ AL-SHĀFI'Ī, an Arab author, born on the 11th Rabi' II 608 = 23rd Sept. 1211 at Arbela, studied from 626 under al-Djawālīkī and Ibn Shaddād in Ḥalab and afterwards in Damascus. In 636 = 1238 he went to Cairo and became deputy of the chief ḳāḍī Yūsuf b. al-Ḥasan al-Sindjārī. In 659 = 1201 he went as chief ḳāḍī to Damascus, but lost his office, the tenure of which after five years was limited to the Shāfi'is and after ten years abolished. After serving 7 years in Cairo as professor at the al-Fakhriya madrasa, he received his former office again but lost it for the second time in Muḥarram 680 = May 1281 and died on Saturday 16th Radjab 681 = 21st Oct. 1282 as professor at the Madrasa al-Aminiya. He began his chief work Wafayāt al-A'yān wa-Anbā' Abnā' al-Zamān in Cairo in 654 = 1256 but had to stop it during his work in Damascus and completed it on 12th Djumādā II 672 = 4th Jan. 1274. His autograph Mss. is in the British Mus. (see Catalogus, No. 1505, Suppl., No. 607, cf. Cureton, Journ. Roy. As. Soc., vi., 1841, p. 225; Wüstenfeld, Gött. Gel. Anz., 1841, p. 286. For us, as the majority of his predecessors are lost (cf. Wüstenfeld, Ueber die Quellen des Werkes Ibn Chalikani Vitae illustrium hominum, Gött. 1837), it is one of the most important aids to the study of biography and literary history, s. Ibn Chalikani Vitae illustrium virorum nunc primum arab. ed. IBN AL-KHAṬĪB, DHU 'L-WIZĀRATĪN (holder of the two vizierates, wizārat al-ḥalam, vizier of the pch, secretary of state, and wizārat al-saif, vizierate of the sword, generalissimo = Grand Vizier, Prime Minister, cf. Dozy, Supplement) LISĀN AL-DĪN (Iḥṣān) ABU 'ABD ALLĀH MUHAMMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. SA'ĪD B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. SA'ĪD B. 'ALĪ B. AHMED AL-SALMĀNĪ (from the clan of the Yemenī Murād, Salmān, with an allusion to the name of Salmān al-Fārisī [q. v.]) a member of a family, which had migrated from Syria to Spain, Cordova, Toledo, Loja, Granada, and which had formerly been called Banū Wazīr, but Banū 'l-Khaṭīb after the elder Sa'īd al-Khaṭīb. Our Muḥammad is therefore usually only called Lisān al-Dīn b. al-Khaṭīb or Ibn al-Khaṭīb al-Salmānī; he was born on the 25th Raddjāb 713 = 15th Nov. 1313 probably in Loja (Arab. Lōsha, the ancient Ilipula Laus) below Granada on the Genil (Shin-[d]il = Singilis) on the western edge of the Vega (al-Mardj), but spent his youth in Granada, whither his father had moved as a court official of the Nasrids and where he pursued various studies under able teachers with such success that he became the greatest and the last important author, poet and statesman of Granada, if not of the whole of Arab Spain. After the martyr death of his father in the battle of Tarifa (Ṭarīf) on the 7th Djumādā I 741 = 29th Oct. 1340, he entered the service of and studied under the learned vizier Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī b. al-Djāi'yāb, but the latter died of the great plague (the Black Death, al-ḥā'un) on the 23rd Shawwāl 749 = 14th Jan. 1349 (cf. his biography in al-Maḥḥarī, Cairo 1302, iii. 222—240, iv. 55). Appointed his successor by Sulṭān Abu 'l-Ḥadīdjādī Yūsuf I (1333—1354), he continued in office after Yūsuf's murder under his son and successor Muḥammad V (1354 = 1359), after his dethronement in 1360 was a prisoner in Granada and then went with him into exile in Morocco (Ibn al-Khaṭīb lived in retirement in Salā) till 1362, when he returned to Granada as vizier when Muḥammad V was restored by the Marinids (—1391), and lived in peace. To escape dangerous plots of his enemies he fled in 1371 from Gibraltar to Ceuta and Tlemcen to Sulṭān 'Abd al-Azīz Abu 'l-Sa'īd (1366—1372) (of whom A. Müller, Der Islam, ii. 669 sq., wrongly makes two persons, 'Abd al-'Azīz and Abū Sa'īd!). He was condemned as a heretic in Granada and his extradition demanded, but 'Abd al-'Azīz and his son and successor Muḥammad III al-Sa'īd (1372—1374) declined to deliver him up, while the pretender Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Mustanṣir set about it. While the case was being conducted in Fās by his pupil and successor as vizier of Granada, Abū 'Abd Allāh (Brockelmann, ii. 259, 'Ubaid Allāh) Muḥammad b. Zūmrūk (al-Maḥḥarī iv. 274—322), Ibn al-Khaṭīb was strangled in the night by assassins hired by Sulaimān b. Dā'ūd, the deputy of the vizier Muḥammad b. 'Uṭhmān in revenge for a private feud, who broke into his prison, an outrage at which the people were very indignant in the morning.

Of the 60 or so writings of Ibn al-Khaṭīb, chiefly historical, geographical, poetical, belletristic, mystical, philosophical or medicinal in subject, about a third have survived on which see Pons Boigues, Ensayo-bio-bibliográfico, N^o. 294 p. 334—347; Brockelmann, Gesch. der arab. Litt., ii. 260—263, and their sources. The most important work for us is the extensive "history of Granada", al-Iḥṣān fi Ta'rikh Gharnāṭa, which however consists mainly of biographies of scholars, a critical edition of which from the scattered manuscripts and extracts with a translation is a desideratum. The edition of an abbreviation, Cairo 1319, 2 vols. (the 3rd not yet published) is quite insufficient and very deficient as regards the Spanish names; on manuscripts cf. also Cat. Cod. Arab. Bibl. Acad. Lugd. Bat., ii. 2 (1907), N^o. 1001 sq. (p. 103 sq.). The historical works Ḥulal al-marḥūma and al-Lamḥa al-badriya fi 'l-Dawla al-Nasriya, of which Casiri has given extracts in Bibliotheca, ii. 177—246 and 246—319, also deserve a critical edition and translation (the printed edition Tunis 1315, given by Brockelmann, ii. 710, is unknown to the writer; there is perhaps some confusion with the following). Raḥm al-Ḥulal fi Naḥm al-Duwal was printed at Tunis in 1316. Khaṭrat al-Ṭaif fi Riḥlat al-Shitā wa 'l-Saif is said by Derenbourg (and Casiri, i. 136^b) and Brockelmann, p. 262, to be a description of a journey to Africa, while the edition by M. J. Müller, Beiträge, i. 14—41, shows that it is a "journey by the prince Abu 'l-Ḥadīdjādī into the eastern provinces of Granada". (al-Maḥāla) Muknīat al-Sā'il 'an al-Maraḍ al-ḥā'il, on the plague (ḥā'un), the Black Death of 749 = 1348-49, has been edited and translated in 1863 in the Sitzungsber. der Bayr. Akad. der Wissenschaften (in Casiri, Pons Boigues, and Brockelmann, called Manṣū'at al-Sā'il). The Mf'yūr al-Ikhtiyār fi Dhikr al-Ma'ahid wa 'l-Diyār, already completely published by M. J. Müller in Beiträge, i. 45—100, was again published in Fes 1325. Of the great collection of diplomatic documents in the ornate style, Raiḥanat al-Kuttab wa-Nuḍḍat al-Muntāb, Mariano Gaspar Remiro in his periodical Rev. del Centro de Estudios Histór. de Granada y su Reino has given numerous texts and translations since 1912. Mufakharat (Mufāḍalat) Mālaka wa-Satū was edited by M. J. Müller, Beiträge, i. 1—13. Ḥabīb al-Zaiyāt's Catalogue of Damaskus mentions on p. 53 a Rawḍat al-Ṭarīf bi 'l-Ḥubb al-Sharīf li-Lisān al-Dīn al-Khaṭīb, Munich, N^o. 421, contains a Ḥaṣida by him. Munich, N^o. 991 sqq., contain several copies by M. J. Müller. The mediocre edition of al-Ḥulal al-marḥūma fi Dhikr al-Akhhār al-Mar- rākushīya, printed at Tunis in 1329, is wrongly ascribed to our author, cf. my remarks Rev. del Centro etc., iv. 137 sq.; 14 very inaccurate pages on the biography of Ibn al-Khaṭīb, according to al-Maḥḥārī and Ibn Khaldūn, are prefixed.

IBN KHORDĀDHBEH, ABU 'L-KĀSIM 'UBAID ALLĀH B. 'ABD ALLĀH, an important geographer of Persian descent who was apparently born in the early years of the iiird century A. H. (c. 820). His grandfather had been a convert to Islām; his father had filled the high office of governor of Ṭabaristān. Little too is known of his own career; he held the important office of controller of the post and intelligence service (Ṣāhib al-Barīd wa 'l-Khabar) in al-Djābal (Media); when and how he got this office cannot be ascertained. The Caliph al-Mu'tamid made an intimate friend of him; al-Mas'ūdī gives a discourse pronounced by him at court on musical instruments, song, rhythm, and dance. He owed his musical knowledge to Ishāk al-Mawṣilī [q. v.] who had been a great friend of his father's. Of his works, some of which were of a learned character (e. g. on the genealogies of the Persians), some belonged to the domain of Adab (on game, music, wine, culinaria, boon companions), there has only survived the Kit. al-Masālik wa 'l-Mamālik, composed at the request of an 'Abbasid prince, for which he was able to collect materials in the archives. It forms an important source for historical topography and was often used by later geographical writers (Ibn al-Faḥīh Ibn Ḥawḳal, al-Muḥaddasī, al-Djāhānī). This work first edited and translated by Barbier de Meynard (Journ. Asiat., 1865) and again by de Goeje (Bibl. Geogr. Arab., vi.) who used further mss. is, as the latter shows, not extant in a complete version. The investigations of de Goeje led to the conclusion that Ibn Khordādhbeh wrote his book about 232 (846-7) and then gradually increased it by additions so that a second edition appeared, which was not however completed before 272 (885-6).

According to Ḥādīdjī Khalīfa, Ibn Khordādhbeh died towards 300 (912-3).

IBN AL-KIFTĪ, ABU 'L-ḤASAN 'ALĪ B. YŪSUF AL-KIFTĪ, called DJAMĀL AL-DĪN, was born in 568 (1172) in Kift [q. v.] in Upper Egypt, came early to Cairo where he was instructed in the most varied branches of Arab-Muslim learning, and continued his studies in Jerusalem, to which his father was summoned to an important office in 583 (1187). After spending about 15 years there he went to Aleppo, where he devoted himself entirely for ten years to his literary studies, until in 610 (1213) he was entrusted with the administration of finance, an office which he held till 628 (1230) except for a break in 613-616. After spending five years in private literary activity, he was appointed vizier by al-Malik al-'Aziz in 633 (1236) and held this high office till his death in 646 (1248). His official position gave him an opportunity of helping other scholars, in addition to his own literary activity. For example, he gave great assistance to Yāḳūt [q. v.] when he fled before the Mongols, for which the latter repeatedly shows his gratitude.

Of his numerous works, among which historical writings predominate, (a history of Cairo; a history of Yemen; a history of the Maghrib; a history of the Saldjūks etc.) only one has come down to us and that only in extracts. The original was probably called Kitāb Iḥḥār al-'Ulamā' bi-Aḥḥār al-Hukamā', while al-Zawzani's synopsis is called al-Muntakhabāt al-multaḥafāt min Kitāb Ta'rikh al-Hukamā', usually quoted briefly as the Ta'rikh al-Hukamā'. The work which was edited by J. Lippert (see Bibliography; also printed at Cairo in 1326), contains 414 biographies of physicians, astronomers, and philosophers from the earliest times to the days of the author and is of great value because it "forms an inexhaustible mine of information regarding the knowledge possessed by the Arabs of Greek literature and even gives information about Greek antiquity, which is no longer preserved in classical sources".

Bibliography: Ibn al-Kiftī's Ta'rikh al-Hukamā', edited by Prof. Dr. Julius Lippert, Leipzig 1903, on materials collected by Aug. Müller (further sources given in the Introduction); Yāḳūt, Irsḥād, ed. Margoliouth, v. 477 sqq. (E. MERTWORTH.)

IBN KILLIS, Fāṭimid vizier. ABU 'L-FARĀDĪ YĀ'QUB B. YŪSUF, called Ibn Killis, was a Baghdad Jew, an excellent business man, whose ability raised him to the highest civil post in the Fāṭimid empire. Born in 318 (930-1), he came early in life with his father to Syria and in 331 (942-3) to Egypt, where he began to play a part at Kāfir's (q. v.) court and by his financial ability won an influential position in politics. He remained a Jew till 356 (967), when he adopted Islām, as he saw a chance of becoming vizier. Thanks to his intellectual ability and power of hard work, he soon became an authority on Muslim sciences. His increasing influence aroused the jealousy of the vizier Ibn al-Furāt, whose intrigues caused him to flee to the Maghrib. He returned to Egypt with Djawhar or Mu'izz. The Fāṭimid government could find no more capable and expert administrator of the country's economic policy and thus it happens that the great prosperity of the Nile valley under the Fāṭimids is associated with his name. The results of his budgets show, according to the sources, figures quite unknown before. But at the same time the country flourished, and the gratitude shown him, notably by 'Aziz, was well deserved. In Ramaḍān 368 (April 979) he was given the honorific title, al-Wazīr al-Adjall. Many pleasing features of Ibn Killis' character are described, although he is also said to have worked against his enemies with poison and other means. He was able to please the taste of the time in poetry and literature, in benevolence and in the splendour of his menage, in external piety and learning; he wrote amongst other works a fiḥḥ book on the Fāṭimī rite (Khiṭaṭ, ii. 6). In any case, he was a financial genius and organiser of the first order. The internal administration of the Fāṭimid empire is said to have been created by him. In 373 (983-4) he fell for a time into disgrace, but was soon restored to his old office and died at the end of 380 (991), deeply regretted by the Caliph 'Aziz and all Egypt.

Bibliography: Isolated data in all the sources for the history of Kāfir and the early Egyptian Fāṭimids [q. v.]. Longer notices, based on al-Musabbiḥī and al-Ṣairafī, in al-Maḥḥārī, IBN ẸOZMĀN, also called ABŪ BAKR B. ẸOZMĀN (Ibn Khaldūn, i. 524; al-Maḳḳārī, Index; al-Muḥibbī, Khulāṣat al-Aḥwāl, i. 108, is of course to be read B. Ẹozmān al-Maghribi or al-Ẹorṭubī in place of AbŪ Bakr Ẹozmān al-Mghrsānī), in Ibn Khāḳān, Ḳatā'id al-Iḳyān, p. 187, and in Ibn Bassām with the title al-Wazīr al-Ḳatīb, as well as in the unique copy of his Diwān published in facsimile by Günzberg he is called al-Wazīr al-Adjall AbŪ Bakr Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Ẹozmān, in Ibn al-Abbār, Tuḥfat al-Ḳādim (Casiri, i. 96^b), and in Ibn al-Khaṭīb, Iḥāṭa (Casiri, ii. 77^b), more accurately AbŪ Bakr b. 'Isā b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Ẹozmān, died in 555 = 1160 (Tunis MS. of the Iḥāṭa more accurately the last night of 555 = 30 Dec. 1160). The quotation Catalogus Lugduno-Batav., ii. 208, "khadama fī awwal 'unrihi al-man'ūta bil-Mutawakkil" (cf. Ibn Khāḳān) shows that in his early youth he had been in the service of the last Aḫṣid of Badajoz, al-Mutawakkil, who was overthrown by the Almoravids in 488 = 1094-5. From his home and usual abode, Cordova, he set out on constant journeys through Spain, chiefly to Seville and Granada where he met the learned poetess Naḫūn (al-Maḳḳārī, ii. 636). The unfounded objection to the title Wazīr, raised by Rosen, Notices sommaires, p. 242, n. 2, and supported by Brockelmann, Geschichte, i. 272, n. 2, was refuted by Dozy in a letter to Rosen in 1881 (publ. in Günzberg's preface). Ibn Ẹozmān wrote popular muwaṣṣaḥaḥa's (q. v. and M. Hartmann, Muwaṣṣaḥa, Index) but has also become the most important representative of another kind of popular poetry, which is based not on quantity but on accent, and occurring in various metres, the zajal (q. v. and Dozy, Supplément), which had previously been used for short improvisations but was raised by him to the higher level of long ḳaṣida-like pieces. Günzberg's (died 28th Dec. 1910) facsimile published in 1896 was not followed by any of his promised researches on the poet and his works. Codera has published some notes on the name Ẹozmān, which he thought to be Arabic rather than identical with the West Gothic Guzman, in his Discursos leídos ante la Real Academia Española, 1910: Importancia de las fuentes árabes para conocer el estado del vocabulario en las lenguas ó dialectos españoles desde el siglo VIII al XII, p. 13, 43. We may specially note Julián Ribera y Tarragó's study in Discursos leídos ante la Real Academia Española, 1912, particularly on our Diwān "Cancionero de Abencuzmán", in which he champions in his new thesis, a view in contradiction to that generally held by Arabic and Romance scholars (p. 50): "La clave misteriosa que explica el mecanismo de las formas poéticas de los varios sistemas líricos del mundo civilizado en la Edad Media está en la lírica andaluza, a que pertenece el Cancionero de Abencuzmán". On p. 25, n. 2, a joint study with Menéndez Pidal on the Spanish dialect of the Spanish words and phrases found in the 149 surviving poems is promised. Arabic and Romance scholars are all the more interested in the further detailed study of Ibn Ẹozmān's exceedingly important zajal poems. A scholarly edition, translation and annotation of the Diwān or Cancionero must be undertaken as soon as possible; the biographies of the poet in Ibn Bassām, Ibn al-Abbār and Ibn al-Khaṭīb must also be edited from the scattered manuscripts.

Bibliography: See above; cf. also Bus-tānī's Encyclopédie arabe (Dā'irat al-Ma'ārif), i. (1876), 648^b, which follows Ibn Khāḳān except for the closing remark: date of birth and death are not mentioned, cf. also Samy-Bey in Ḳāmūs al-Aḫṣān, p. 657^a; Codera, Decadencia y desaparición de los Almoravides en España, p. 134. IBN ẸUTAIBA, ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. MUSLIM (often also called AL-ẸUTAIḐI or AL-ẸUTAIḐI) AL-ḲUḐḐI (from his birthplace) AL-MARWAZI (from his father's) AL-DINAWARI, an Arab author, born in 213 = 828 at Kūfa, was for a time ḳādi of Dinawar in the province of Ḑjabal, then lived as a teacher in Baghdād and died there in Raddj 276 = Nov. 889 (according to others 270 or 271). In literary tradition he is regarded as the representative of the so-called mixed or eclectic Baghdād grammatical school. As a matter of fact however his activities, like those of his contemporaries, AbŪ Ḥanīfa al-Dinawari and al-Ḑjāḥiz, covered the whole learning of his period. He sought to make available the lexical and poetical material which had been collected especially by the Ḳuḏī grammarians, as well as historical information, for the requirements of the man of the world, particularly the kuṭṭāb, who were then beginning to gain influence in the administration. But he also took part in the theological disputes of his time, and defended the Ḳur'ān and Tradition against the attacks of philosophic scepticism; but he himself fell under the suspicion of heresy and had to write a book against the Mushabbihā to defend himself against the reproach of belonging to them. His two most important philological works are Ḳitāb Adab al-Ḳatīb, ed. M. Grünert, Leiden 1900, Cairo 1300, and the Ḳ. Ma'āni 'l-Shi'r in 12 books, probably the same as Abyāt al-Ma'āni, Aya Ṣofya, N^o. 4050. In Adab, p. 71, 5, he quotes his Ḡharīb al-Ḥadīth, Vol. i. and iii., Damascus, Ḥabīb al-Zaiyāt, Ḳhaṣā'in al-Kutub etc., p. 62, N^o. 34—55, the counterpart Ḡharīb al-Ḳur'ān, eb., p. 62, N^o. 33 (to the end of Sūra 26). His chief work is the Ḳitāb 'Uyūn al-Aḫḅār, a model of the scholastic adab in 10 books, often imitated later, 1—4 ed. by C. Brockelmann, Berlin 1900, Strassburg 1903—1208. According to 'Uyūn, p. 12, 3, the following are supplementary to it: 1. Ḳitāb al-Sharḥ, ed. A. Guy in al-Muḳtabas, ii. (Damascus 1325 = 1907), p. 234—248, 387—392, 529—535; 2. Ḳitāb al-Ma'ārif, Handbuch der Geschichte, ed. F. Wüstenfeld, Göttingen 1850, Cairo 1300; 3. Ḳitāb al-Shi'r, Liber Poesis et Poetarum, ed. M. J. de Goeje, Lugd. Bat. 1904; 4. Ḳitāb Ta'wīl al-Ru'yā, lost. Of his smaller philological works the Ḳitāb al-Rahl wal-Manzil still exists, ed. by Cheikho in Dix anciens Traités de Philologie arabe, Beyrouth 1908, p. 121—140. His two chief theological works are the Ḳitāb Ta'wīl Muḳhtalif al-Ḥadīth, Cairo 1326 (cf. Goldziher, Muh. Stud., ii. 136; Houtsma, De Strijd etc., p. 13), and Ḳitāb Muḥḳil al-Ḳur'ān, Hs. in Leiden, s. Catalogus Codd. Mss. Ar., N^o. 1650, in Stambul, Koprulu Defteri, N^o. 211. Theological also is his Ḳitāb al-Masā'il wal-Djawābāt on questions of Tradition, Hs. in Gotha, s. Pertsch, Verz. der ar. Hdss. der herz. Bibl., N^o. 636. The pseudohistorical Ḳitāb al-Imāma wal-Siyāsa, Cairo 1322 and 1327, is ascribed to Ibn Ẹutaiba but, according to de Goeje, Riv. Stud. Or., i. 415—421, was probably written in his life-time by a Maghribi or an Egyptian.

IBN AL-ẸUTĪYA, ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. ʿOMAR B. ʿABD AL-ʿAZĪZ B. IBRĀHĪM B. ʿISĀ B. MUZĀHĪM, usually known as Ibn al-ẸutĪya "the son of the Gothic woman" because his ancestor ʿIsā, a freedman of ʿOmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAziz, had married a Spanish princess named Sāra, a daughter of the Gothic king Oppas (Olemundo, according to Ibn ẸutĪya) and grand daughter of Witiza. The latter had gone to Damascus to make a complaint to the Caliph Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik against her uncle Ardabast. ʿIsā was sent with his wife to Spain and his descendants lived in Seville. Ibn ẸutĪya himself was born in Cordova and studied in Seville, the home of his family, under MuḤammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Kūn, Hasan b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Zubairī, Saʿīd b. Ḍjābir etc. He then went to his native town and completed his studies under ʿTāhir b. ʿAbd al-ʿAziz, MuḤammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Muḡthib, MuḤammad b. ʿOmar b. Lubāba, Kāsim b. Aṣḡagh, MuḤammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Aiman etc. Among his pupils were the Ḳāḍī Abu ʿl-Hazm Ḳhalaf b. ʿIsā al-Waṣḡḡī and the historian Ibn al-Faraḡī. He was introduced to the Caliph al-Ḥakam II by Abū ʿAlī al-Ḳālī, the author of the Amālī, as the greatest scholar of the land and put over the shurṭa of Cordova after holding for a time the office of Ḳāḍī. He was a philologist, a grammarian, a historian and even a poet, but was reputed not to know much about Ḥadīth and law. Nevertheless people came to him for his advice on passages in Ḥadīth and legal points which offered special philological difficulties. He died at a great age in Cordova on Wednesday 23rd Rabīʿ 1 367 = Nov. 6th 927.

He is the author of the following works: 1. Taʾrīkh Fath (var. Iftitāh) al-Andalus, a history of Spain from the Muslim conquest to the reign of the Caliph ʿAbd al-Rahmān III, published by the Academy of Madrid in 1868; by Houdas in Recueil de textes etc., t. i., Paris 1889, p. 219—280, from the Ms. in Paris, de Slane, Cat., n^o. 1867 (from the same ms.: Cherbonneau, Histoire du règne d'Elhakam fils de Hichām, Journal As., 1853, i. 458 sqq.); 2^o. Kitāb al-Afʿāl, a catalogue of verbs of three and four radicals, ed. by Guidi, Leiden 1894: Il libro dei verbi.

IBN ẸUTLUBOGHA, ZAIN AL-MILLA WA ʿL-DĪN ABU ʿL-FADL AL-KĀSIM B. ʿABD ALLĀH, an Arab biographer and traditionist, a pupil of Ibn Ḥadjar [q. v.], b. 802 (1399), d. 879 (1474). Of his works detailed by Brockelmann, Geschichte, II, 82, Flügel has edited the biographies of the Ḥanafis in the Abhandl. f. d. Kunde der Morgenl., Vol. II.

IBN MĀḌJA, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. YAZĪD AL-ḲAZWĪNĪ, compiled one of the six canonical collections of traditions (Sunan, Dihlī, 1282, 1289). He was born in 209 (824), travelled in ʿIrāk, Arabia, Syria, and Egypt to collect traditions and died in 273 (886). According to Ibn Khallikān, he also wrote a commentary on the Ḳurʾān and a chronicle (Taʾrīkh).

IBN MAIMÜN, ABŪ ʿIMRĀN MUSA B. MAIMÜN B. ʿABD ALLĀH AL-ḲURṬUBĪ (AL-ANDALUSĪ) AL-ISRĀʿĪLĪ is the Arabic name of Maimonides famed alike in Jewish theology, medicine, and philosophy. His Hebrew name was Rabbi Mōšeh ben Maimon and from the initial letters of this name he is shortly known as RaMBaM. In Arabic he had the honorary title al-Raʾīs (al-Umma or al-Milla), chief of the (Jewish) nation" the equivalent of the Hebrew Nāgīd. He is also called Mōšeh haz-Zemān, the "Moses of his time".

He was born at Cordova on March 30, 1135, where his father was a daiyān or judge in the ecclesiastical court. From him the boy received his education in Rabbinical studies and he was also taught Arab sciences by Muslim scholars. When he was 13, Cordova fell into the hands of the Almohades [q. v.] and Christians and Jews were not tolerated in the town; they were given the choice of migrating or adopting Islām. Maimonides left the town with his father (on his alleged conversion to Islām see below); the family led a nomadic life for a long time, even in Fez where they settled, their stay was not permanent. In 1165 they sailed for Palestine, reached ʿAkkā, thence went to Jerusalem and finally settled down in Fuṣṭāt. Soon afterwards the father of Maimonides died, and he met with many other misfortunes. As he was unwilling to make a livelihood by a Rabbinical career, he decided to practise medicine. He soon made such a name that he won the particular confidence of Ṣalāh al-Dīn's vizier, al-Ḳāḍī al-Faḍīl al-Baisānī, who gave him his protection for the rest of his life. Ṣalāh al-Dīn and later his son made him court physician. He was so much sought after elsewhere as a doctor that it is difficult to see where he found the time for his manysided literary activity.

Ibn Maimün died on Dec. 13th 1204. In accordance with his desire, his body was taken to Tiberias in Palestine. His tomb is still shown and visited there. All his works except one were written in Arabic and in so far as they were concerned with philosophy and medicine they were read and studied not only by his co-religionists but also by Muslim scholars and through the medium of Latin translations exercised a profound influence on the scholasticism of the Christian west (Albertus Magnus, Duns Scotus). His chief work on philosophy is the Dalālat al-Hā'irīn "Guidance for those who are confused" (Hebr.: Mōrēh Nēbhūkhīm, Latin: Doctor Perplexorum), "by which those who have been confused between Reason and Revelation are to be brought back to a comforting harmony". No contradiction between the revealed scriptures and the principles of metaphysics as laid down by Aristotle and following him al-Fārābī [q. v.] and Ibn Sīnā [q. v.] can or may exist. All the anthromorphism of the Bible is interpreted in this light. We may here call attention to the concise synopsis of the teachings of Muslim theology and philosophy in this book.

The Dalāla soon found enthusiastic admirers but also bitter opponents, to whom it seemed too freethinking, and they used to call it Ḍalāla, temptation, by a slight variation in the name. It has been edited and translated by Salomon Munk as the Guide des Égarés (3 vol., Paris 1856—1866). Among his other philosophical works we shall only mention the Makāla fī Šin'at al-Manṭiq (Hebr. Millōth ha-Higgāyōn).

His medical works in which he chiefly quotes Rāzī, Ibn Sīnā [q. v.], Ibn Wafīd, and Ibn Zuhr [q. v.], deal with haemorrhoids (šī 'l-bawā'ir), asthma (šī 'l-rabw), etc. His medical aphorisms, known as Fuṣūl Mūsā, are modelled on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates on which he wrote a commentary. He also wrote a treatise on the computation of the Jewish calendar.

Here we can only touch upon his thorough and fruitful work in the field of Jewish literature; we may mention three works, his commentary (Šarḥ) on the Mishnāh (later known as Šiv'at "lamp"), his Kitāb al-Šar'at (Hebr. Sepher ham-Mišvōt) in which he discussed all the orders and prohibitions of Jewish canon law, and particularly his Mishnēh Ṭhorāh (also called Yad ha-ḥazaka), a masterpiece of systematisation, in which he arranged for the first time all the vast material of Talmudic tradition — similar to the corresponding Muslim works — according to subject matter, and discusses it.

Ibn al-Kifī and Ibn Abī Uṣaib'a say that Maimonides adopted Islām in Spain to avoid persecution and professed Islām in public but in secret practised Judaism. At a later date a certain Abu 'l-ʿArab b. Ma'īsha is said to have accused him in Egypt of having recanted from Islām and gone back to Judaism. His powerful patron al-Kāḍī al-Fāḍil however declared that a forced conversion to Islām was not a conversion at all and so saved his life. Ibn al-Kifī's and Ibn Abī Uṣaib'a's accounts — the latter however, as his wa-kīla shows, gives it under reserve — have no claim to historical accuracy. Quite apart from the fact that the biographical notices of Ibn Maimūn contain much else that is inaccurate, although according to Muslim law a recantation of Islām to save one's life is judged less severely than a voluntary one, on the other hand a compulsory convert to Islām is a full Muslim and his later secession would meet with the death sentence. The most convincing argument is the following. In the bitter struggle which arose round Ibn Maimūn's Dalālat al-Hā'irīn in which his enemies did not spare their insults and reproaches, not even his most bitter antagonist made this accusation against him. This would certainly have been the case if his conversion to Islām — which could not have remained concealed — had been a fact.

IBN MAKHLAD, the name of two viziers:

1. AL-HASAN B. MAKHLAD B. AL-DJARRĀH of Dair Ḳunnā, administrator of the domains from 243 (857-8) onwards. After the death of 'Ubad Allāh b. Yahyā in Dhū 'l-Ḳa'da 263 (July 877) [see IBN KHAKKĀN, I.] al-Ḳāṣim was appointed vizier by al-Mu'tamid. At the same time he was secretary to the latter's brother al-Muwaffaq but after about a month he fled to Baghdād on the arrival of Mūsā b. Boghā in Sāmarrā, the capital of that time. Sulaimān b. Waḥb then took over the vizierate and his son 'Ubad Allāh the secretaryship. In Dhū 'l-Ḳa'da of the following year (July 878) Sulaimān was dismissed and his house plundered, whereupon Hasan was made vizier a second time on the 27th of the same month (31st July). In Dhū 'l-Hijja (August 878) Sulaimān regained his freedom; Ḳāṣim fled and his property was confiscated.

2. ABU 'L-ḲĀSIM SULAIMĀN B. AL-HASAN, son of the preceding, secretary of state from 301—311 (913—923). After the dismissal of Ibn Muḳla [q. v.] in Djumādā I 318 (June 930) Sulaimān was made vizier by the Caliph al-Mu'tadir. The experienced 'Alī b. 'Isā [s. IBN AL-DJARRĀH, 2] supported him by word and deed; Sulaimān was not fit for his difficult position and as there was a want of money and his attitude did not make him popular, he was dismissed on the 24th Radjab 319 (12th August 931). In 324 (935-6) al-Rāḍī dismissed the vizier Abū Dja'far Muḥammad al-Karkhī and appointed Sulaimān his successor; but as the disorder increased the Caliph had to turn to Ibn Rā'ik [q. v.] and Sulaimān was dismissed for a second time. At the end of 328 (Oct. 940) he regained his office and after the death of al-Rāḍī in Rabi' I 329 (Dec. 940) he was recognised as vizier by his successor al-Muttaḳī. He administered his office in name only however, and was only able to hold it for four months after the accession of al-Muttaḳī.

IBN MĀKŪLĀ, ABU 'L-KĀSIM HIBAT ALLĀH B. 'ALĪ B. DJĀ'FAR AL-IDJLĪ, called IBN MĀKŪLĀ, vizier to the Bayid Djalāl al-Dawla, born in 365 (975-6). Djalāl al-Dawla appointed him vizier in 423 (1032) but soon afterwards dismissed him. His successor Abū Sa'd Muḥammad b. al-Husain b. 'Abd al-Rahīm only held the office a few days; as he was attacked and ill-treated by the Turkish mercenaries in the capital, he had to go into hiding. Ibn Mākūlā received the office again. In 424 (1033) Djalāl al-Dawla had to flee to al-Karkh; the vizier followed him and was soon afterwards again replaced by Abū Sa'd. Next year Djalāl al-Dawla dismissed the latter, and Ibn Mākūlā resumed the office although only for a few days. In 426 (1034-1035) the same thing occurred again. Abū Sa'd who was again made vizier, set out against Fāris b. Muḥammad [q. v.] and Ibn Mākūlā again became vizier. On this occasion he held the office for two months and eight days. He was then driven out by the troops and Abū Sa'd became vizier. After a year or two Ibn Mākūlā was handed over to the 'Ukailid Karwāsh b. al-Muḥallad, who imprisoned him in Hit. Here he died in 430 (1038-1039) after being in prison for two years and five months.

IBN MĀLIK, DJAMĀL AL-DĪN ABU 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. MĀLIK, better known as IBN MĀLIK, was born, contrary to the assertion of Brockmann and those who follow him, in Spain, at Jaén in 600 = 1203-4; some say that he was born a year or two later. He studied in his native town with Abū 'l-Muzaḥfar (and Abū 'l-Ḥasan) Thābit b. Khayr surnamed Ibn al-Tailāsān, Abū Razin b. Thābit b. Muḥammad b. Yūsuf b. Khayr al-Kulāṣ of Niebla, Abū 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad b. Nuwār, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. Mālik al-Marshāni, etc. He then went to the east and studied under the grammarians Ibn al-Ḥādij, Ibn Ya'ish, Abū 'Alī al-Shalpin. At Damascus he studied ḥadīth under Mukrim, Abū 'l-Ḥasan b. al-Shakhawī, etc. Among his pupils we may mention his son Badr al-Dīn Muḥammad who commented on several of his father's grammatical works, the chief qāḍī Badr al-Dīn Ibn Djamā'a, the poets Bahā' al-Dīn b. al-Naḥḥās al-Ḥalabi, the jurist Abū Zakariyā al-Nawawī, the Shāikh Abū 'l-Husain al-Yūnīni, etc. After completing his studies he began to teach grammar in Aleppo, became imām of the al-'Ādiliya at Aleppo, later taught at Ḥamāt, and finally at Damascus where he died on the 12th Shā'bān 672 = 21 Febr. 1274. He was a Māliki but on going to the east became a Shāfi'i. Ibn Mālik was considered a great philologist, whose reputation almost overshadowed that of Sibawaihi. On examining his works and the appreciations of them by his friends and criticisms by his enemies, one can say that he rendered a real service to the study of grammar by coordinating and simplifying the rules, although he may very occasionally be reproached with a want of that clearness and simplicity, which is necessary in didactic works.

He wrote the following works: 1. Kit. Tashīl al-Fawā'id wa-Takmil al-Makāsid, a manual of grammar the conciseness of which verges on obscurity, publ. at Fās in 1323; 2. al-Kāfiya al- shāfiya, treatise on grammar in 2757 or 3000 radjās verses, Krafft, Die arab. . . Hss. der . . . Ak. zu Wien, N^o. 31; Algiers Fagnan, Cat., N^o. 67, 1; Algiers Grand Mosque, N^o. 14, iii. (fragm.); 3. Kit. al-Khulāsa al-alfiya also called shortly Kit. al-alfiya, a résumé in 1000 radjās verses of the preceding, publ. at Beyrouth in 1888. Cairo 1306, 1307, etc., Lahote 1888; de Sacy has published an edition with French commentary (Alfiyya ou la quintessence de la gr. ar., Paris—London 1833) and has translated 8 chapters in his Anthologie gramm., Paris 1829, pp. 134—144, and 315—347 of the transl.; L. IBN MANẒŪR, DJAMĀL AL-DĪN ABŪ 'L-FADL MUHAMMAD B. MUKARRAM AL-KHAZRĀDĪ AL-IFRĪKĪ, Arab philologist, born in 630 (1232), died in 711 (1311). He is the author of the celebrated Arabic dictionary Lisān al-'Arab, ed. Būlak 1299—1308, 20 vol.

IBN MARDANĪSH, ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUHAMMAD B. AĦMAD (the latter usually omitted; correct in Ibn Khaldūn, iv. 166; the nephew of 'Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad b. Sa'd, who fell in the battle of Albacete in 540 = 1146, cf. Zeitschrift d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., lxiii. 1909, p. 352) B. SA'D B. MUHAMMAD B. AĦMAD B. MARDANĪSH AL-DJUDHĀMĪ (according to others, al-Toḍjibī) was born 518 = 1124-5 at Bunushkula = Benishkola = Peñíscola between Tortosa and Castellón de la Plana, died on 29th Raddjāb 567 = 27th March 1172. In spite of the nisba, he was apparently of Spanish descent as his great-great-grandfather after whom he is usually called for short, was called Martinus or Martínez "the son of Martin", so that Mardaniṣh seems to be a corruption of Mardinash, (for Arabic d from t cf. Emerita = Mārida, Mérida) in spite of Codera's doubt about Dozy's derivation; it is much more difficult to agree with his suggestion of the Byzantine Mardonius. The popular etymology from merda, Arabic 'adhiya, "excrement" in Ibn Khaldūn, Biographical Dictionary, iv. 473, is of course a mere play on words. On the collapse of Almoravid rule the unusually capable tyrant Ibn Mardaniṣh made himself master of Valencia and Murcia in 540 = 1146 and by further conquests (Guadix, Jaen a vassal principality of his father-in-law Ibn Hemoshk = Hemochico, Ubeda, Baeza, Almería etc.) he became king of the whole of South-eastern Spain. As Rey Lobo or Lope, often in coalition with the Christian rulers of Castile, Aragon, and Barcelona, he was able to resist the advance of the Almohad 'Abd al-Mu'min (died 1163) and his son Yūsuf (died 1189), till the treachery of his father-in-law in the last years of his life. He died in 1172 during the siege of his capital Murcia; his sons then surrendered and secured lucrative positions for themselves, while the whole of Muslim southern Spain became Almohad.

IBN MĀSAWAIH, or IBN MĀSŌYA (MESUA in Latin translations of the middle ages), ABŪ ZAKARĪYĀ YUḤANNĀ (YAḤYĀ), a christian physician, whose father was a druggist at Djundeshāpūr. In the reign of Hārūn al-Rashīd he was engaged in translation work and studied medicine under Gabriel b. Bakhtishū' [q. v. i. 602^a supra], the Caliph's court physician. In the reign of al-Ma'mūn he himself was appointed to this office and held it till his death in 243 (857). Among his pupils was Hunain b. Ishāq [q. v.] for whom he wrote his al-Nawādir al-ṭibbiya. A Latin translation, ascribed to John of Damascus, appeared at Basle in 1579, as a supplement to the Aphorismi Maimonidis, p. 528—542. He also wrote a number of treatises, the titles of which Leclerc gives from Ibn Abī Uṣaibi'a. In the Library at Bankipore, there is a copy of his Kitāb al-Mushāḥḍajār.

IBN MAS'ŪD, 'ABD ALLĀH B. GHĀFIL B. HĀBIB B. SHAMKĦ B. FA'R B. MAKHZŪM B. ŠĀHILA B. KĀHIL B. AL-HĀRITH B. TAMĪM B. SA'D B. HUDHAIL, a Companion of the Prophet. Like many of Muḥammad's first adherents he belonged to the lowest stratum of Meccan society. As a young man he herded cattle for 'Okba b. Abī Mu'ait; Sa'd b. Abī Waḥḥāš at a later date in a polemic calls him a Hudhail slave (Ṭabari, i. 2812). He is usually described as a client (ḥalīf) of the Banū Zuhra; his father is also so described. Nothing more is known of the latter; 'Abd Allāh's brother 'Okba and his mother Umm 'Abd bint 'Abd Wudd b. Sawā' belong to the older Šahāba so that he is called by al-Nawawī (ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 370) Šahābī b. Šahābiya. His conversion is given as a miracle. When Muḥammad and Abū Bakr were fleeing before the heathens (on what occasion is not stated), they met 'Abd Allāh who was herding sheep. Their request for some milk was refused out of conscientiousness. Muḥammad then took a ewe lamb and stroked its udder which swelled and yielded an abundant flow of milk; he then made it resume its former size.

'Abd Allāh is regarded rightly as one of the first converts; he was fond of calling himself the "sixth of six" (Muslims); according to other traditions, he was converted before Muḥammad entered the house of Arḳam, or even before 'Umar. He is said to have been the first to recite the Kur'ān openly in Mecca, although his friends found him unfit for the task, as he did not have his clan with him for protection; he was therefore badly received. Of course he went to Abyssinia, according to same traditions twice.

In Medina he lived behind the great mosque; he used to be so often seen entering Muḥammad's house with his mother that strangers thought they were members of the family. But 'Abd Allāh was only the faithful servant "of the slippers, the cushion, and the dung hill". He imitated his master in externals; but was often mocked for his thin legs. He wore his red hair, which he did not dye, very long; this peculiarity as well as his white garments and his constant use of scent are probably to be attributed to religious views. He laid great value on the ṣalāt and fasted relatively little to preserve his strength for the divine service.

He took part in all the maṣāhid; at Badr he cut off the head of the severely wounded Abū Djahl and carried it in triumph to his master. He was also one of those to whom Paradise was promised by the Prophet. When Abu Bakr during the Ridda thought it necessary to make Medina capable of defence, 'Abd Allāh was one of the men chosen to guard the weak points of the town. He was also present at the battle of the Yarmūk.

He was naturally as little fitted to rule as any other representative of the pious of Medina. 'Omar sent him to Kūfa as administrator of the public treasury and as a teacher of religion. He was much consulted on account of his knowledge of the Qur'ān and Sunna; he is said to be the authority for 848 traditions; it was a peculiar feature of his that in giving information about the Prophet, he trembled, the sweat even broke out on his forehead and he used to express himself with great caution, less he should say anything incorrect. His authority is relied upon for a mild interpretation of the interdiction of wine (Goldziher, Vorlesungen, p. 65, and Uyūn al-Akhbār, ed. Brockelmann, p. 373 13).

The accounts of his end are contradictory. It is said that 'Omar deprived him of his office in Kūfa. When the news came, the people wished however to keep him. He then said: "Leave me; if there must be offences (fiṭan), I will not be the instigator of them" (cf. Matthew, xviii. 7). He is said to have returned to Medina and to have died there in 32 or 33 A.H. over 60 and to have been buried by night on the Baḳī' al-Gharkād.

When 'Othmān visited him on his deathbed and solicitously asked how he was and what were his desires he is said to have given answers which are typical of ancient piety. He appointed al-Zubair his executor and expressed a desire to be buried in a ḥulla with 200 dirhams.

According to others, however, he died in Kūfa and was not dismissed from office in 26 along with Sa'd b. Abi Waqqās by 'Othmān.

'Abd Allāh is best known as a traditionist and authority on the Qur'ān. His traditions are collected in Musnad Aḥmad, i. 374—466.

IBN MISKAWAIH (properly MUḤKÖVE), ABŪ 'ALĪ AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. YĀKŪB, philosopher and historian; Yāḳūt simply calls him Miskawaih, without ibn, and says that he was a Magian converted to Islām, which can hardly be correct in view of the name of his father and grandfather and his mistake is probably due to his wrongly giving the name Miskawaih to the philosopher instead of his grandfather. The latter may really have been a converted Magian. Little is known of his career. We know that he was secretary and librarian to the vizier al-Muhallabī [q. v.] and afterwards enjoyed the favours of the vizier Ibn al-'Amīd [q. v.] and his son Abu 'l-Faṭḥ in the reigns of the Būyids 'Aḍud al-Dawla and Šamsām al-Dawla, and held an influential position in al-Raiy. At first he seems to have been much occupied with philosophy, medicine, and alchemy; his history called Taǧrīb al-Umam (a complete edition in a photographic reproduction is appearing in the Gibb Memorial Series, vii., under the editorship of L. Caetani; de Goeje edited a portion in 1871, Fragmenta Historicorum Arabicorum, ii.), comes down to 369 (979-980), although Ibn Miskawaih lived till 421 (1030). He carried on a literary correspondence with Abū Ḥaiyān [q. v.] and al-Ḥamadḥānī [q. v.]. Ibn al-Ḳifī (see Bibl.) gives the titles of his writings on medicine. But he was mainly concerned with ethics and wrote several works on this subject, of which we may here mention the Tahdhīb al-Akhḫār wa-Tāṭhīr al-A'rāḳ, ed. Constantinople 129S, 1299, Cairo, 1307, and a collection of ethical aphorisms by Persian, Indian, Arab and Greek sages, the first part of which is based on the Persian Djāwīdān Khirad ("eternal Reason"). A Persian lithographed edition was produced in 1246 by Manukdji; as early as 1640 Elichman published from the Greek section the Tabula Cebetis, new edition by Bassot Le tableau de Cèbes, vers. arabe d'Ibn Miskaweh etc., Algiers 189S. Leclerc also mentions a Spanish translation of Lozano 1793. On the Persian Djāwīdān Khirad cf. Ethé in the Grundriss der iran. Philologie, ii. 346, and Inostrančev in Zapiski Vost. Otd. Imp. Arch. Obščē., xviii, 180 sq., and in Sasanijskie Etiudi, p. 22 sqq. A general appreciation of Ibn Miskawaih's philosophical works, in de Boer, History of Philosophy in Islam, p. 128 sqq.

IBN AL-MUKAFFA', ABŪ 'AMR (afterwards ABŪ MUḤAMMAD), the "son of the cripple", an Arab author of Persian origin, whose real name was Rōzbih son of Dādōye; his father, a native of Džūr (Firzābād, so correct Fihrist, i. 118) in Fārs, who was entrusted with the collection of taxes in 'Irāk and Fārs under the governorship of al-Ḥaǧǧādī b. Yūsuf, was accused of extortion in the exercise of his duty; he was put to the torture and his hand remained maimed, whence his surname. His son, entering the service of 'Isā b. 'Alī, paternal uncle of the Caliphs Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Saffāh and al-Manšūr, abjured Mazdeism, and became a convert to Islām. He was entrusted with the drawing up of the act of amnesty accorded by the second of these Caliphs to his uncle 'Abd Allāh, but was accused of having cleverly turned the language in a way not entirely pleasing to his sovereign; the latter vowed vengeance and sent secret orders to Sufyān b. Mu'āwiya al-Muhallabī, governor of Baṣra, to put the culprit to death; his limbs were cut off one by one and thrown into a blazing furnace. Ibn al-Mukaffa's orthodoxy was suspected and the suspicion that he continued to practise Mazdeism in secret contributed to his fall. This event took place about 139 = 757.

Ibn al-Mukaffa' translated from Pehlevi into Arabic the book of Katila wa-Dimna, brought from India by the physician Burzōye in the reign of Khusrāw I Anōshak-Rawān (cf. the article KALILAH), and the Khudāi-nāma (Book of Lords), a collection of biographies of Persian kings, under the title Siyar Mulūk al-'Aǧam, which was one of the sources of the Šāh-nāma of Firdawsī (many fragments in Ibn Ḳutaiba, Uyūn al-Akhbār). He wrote in Arabic al-Durra al-Yaṭima fī Tā'at al-Mulūk, "on the obedience due to kings" (pr. Cairo n. d. [1893], 1326, and 1331), al-Adab al-ṣaḡīr (transl. by O. Rescher, Stuttgart 1915) on morals, and other short treatises published at the same time as the Durra; al-Adab al-kabīr was published by Aḥmad Zakī-Pasha (Cairo 1330 = 1912).

IBN AL-MUKĀFFA', ABU 'L-BASHAR, the Arab name of Severus, Monophysite bishop of Ushmunain, a contemporary of the Copt patriarch Philotheos (979—1003). Nothing is known of his life except that he was authorised by the Fātimid Caliph al-Mu'izz to dispute with the kādīs on religious questions (Huart, Hist. des Arabes, i. 344). He wrote a history of the dignitaries who had occupied the patriarchal see of Alexandria, which forms the basis of Abbé Renaudot's Historia Patriarcharum Alexandrinorum Jacobitarum (Paris 1713). The municipal library of Hamburg possesses the most ancient Mss. (1266) which only contains however, although in a more complete form than the usual text, the first part from St. Mark to Michael I (61—767), published in the original text by Chr. F. Seybold (vol. iii. of the Veröffentlichungen aus der Hamburger Stadtbibliothek, 1913; Brockelmann, Katal. d. orient. Hss. der Stadtbibl. zu Hamburg, vol. i. p. xiii. and 160 sqq.; A. v. Gutschmid, Kleine Schriften, ii. 511). Seybold had already published an edition of the text in the Corpus Script. Christian. Orientalium (Script. arabici, iii. Series, Vol. ix. fasc. 1 et 2, Paris and Leipzig, 1904—1910), as had Evetts in the Patrologia Orientalis (Vol. i., fasc. 2, 4, History of the Patriarchs of the Coptic Church of Alexandria). The Ms. Paris Bibl. Nat., N°. 303, gives the order of the patriarchs from the 49th, Mark II (799—819) to Sanuthios (1032—1046). His "History of the four first Councils" has been published in Arabic, Ethiopic, and French by L. Leroy and S. Grébaut in Vol. vi. of the Patrologia Orientalis of R. Graffin and F. Nau. It is an apologia for the Monophysite doctrine. There are other works by him in Ms. in Paris and the Vatican.

IBN MUḤLA, ABU 'ALĪ MUḤAMMAD B. 'ALĪ B. AL-HASAN B. MUḤLA, an 'Abbāsīd vizier, born in Baghdād in 272 (886). He was first of all collector of taxes in a district of Fārs, but in the middle of Rabi' I 316 (May 928) he was appointed vizier by al-Muqtadir. After two years of beneficial activity, he was dismissed on Djumāda I 318 (June 930) because he was on intimate terms with Mu'nis, the chief of the Praetorians, whom the Caliph hated, and his enemy the chief of police, Muḥammad b. Yāḳūt, had him arrested and burned his house. After a considerable sum had been extorted from him, he was banished to Fārs. In Dhu 'l-Hidjja 320 (Dec. 932) the Caliph al-Kāhir restored him to office. But Ibn Muḥla soon began to intrigue against Ibn Yāḳūt and when he also planned the deposition of the Caliph, the plot was betrayed. Ibn Muḥla had to save himself by flight and the vizierate was given to his secretary Muḥammad b. al-Ḳasim. After his fall he conducted a vigorous campaign for the deposition of al-Kāhir and wandered about the country in disguise, stirring up hatred of the Caliph. When al-Rāḍī ascended the throne in Djumāda I 322 (April 934), Ibn Muḥla was appointed by him vizier; the real ruler however was the commander-in-chief of the army, Muḥammad b. Yāḳūt. Although Ibn Muḥla did succeed by his intrigues in overthrowing the powerful favourite of the Caliph in the following year, as a result of an unfortunate campaign against Mōsul, where the Ḥamdānīd Ḥasan b. Abi 'l-Haidjā 'Abd Allāh had set himself up as an usurper, he was at the same time preparing his own fall. In the middle of Djumāda I 324 (April 936) he was attacked and taken prisoner by al-Muẓaffar b. Yāḳūt, Muḥammad's brother. The Caliph was forced to approve and the vizier was dismissed, but received his freedom on payment of 1 000 000 dinārs. After a few years, he was appointed vizier, in name at least, for the fourth time [see IBN AL-FURĀT, 3]. But when he began to intrigue against the powerful 'Amir al-Umarā' Muḥammad b. Rā'ik, the latter learned of it and had him seized in Shawwāl 326 (Aug. 936) and frightfully mutilated. According to the usual statement, Ibn Muḥla died in prison on Shawwāl 10th 328 (19th July 940). He was also known as a scholar and as one of the founders of Arab calligraphy.

IBN AL-MUNDHIR, ABU BAKR, chief of the stables and chief veterinary surgeon to Sulṭān al-Nāṣir b. Ḳalāūn, died 741 (1340) author of the Kūmil al-Ṣinā'atain al-Baitara wal-Zarṭaka (or Kāshif al-Wail fī Ma'rifat Amrūd al-Khail), which is called al-Nāṣiri in honour of the Sulṭān and is usually quoted by this name. M. Perron has translated it with a full introduction in a volume entitled: Le Nāṣiri: la perfection des deux arts ou traité complet d'hippologie et d'hippiatrie arabes, trad. de l'arabe d'Abou Bekr Ibn Bedr. The first volume appeared in 1852, it is introductory and contains a wealth of information about the Arab horse, al-Nāṣir's particular services to horse breeding in Egypt, and a collection of passages from poems; the second volume (1859) is the translation of the hippology, and the third (1860) of the hippiatry. J. v. Hammer-Purgstall in his treatise Das Pferd bei den Arabern criticises the introduction in a very high-handed fashion, but did not live to deal with the others; but it may well be doubted if this critic possessed the scientific, particularly veterinary, knowledge to enable him to surpass Perron's meritorious work. The book is a valuable corpus of information and the first collection of widely scattered references to the horse and must form the starting point of any further work on the subject.

IBN AL-MUSLIMA, the kunya of Aḥmad b. 'OMAR (died in 415 = 1024) which was transmitted to his descendants. Another name for the family is Āl al-Raḳīl. This family, the members of which held the office of Ra'īs was held in great honour in Baghdād. The grandson of the above mentioned Aḥmad, Abu 'l-Kāsim 'Alī b. al-Ḥasan, is better known in history as Ra'īs al-Ru'asā'. He acted for a time (437—450 = 1045—1058) as vizier of the Caliph al-Kā'im bi-Amr Allāh and it was he who induced the latter to make an alliance with Toghrulbeg in order to counteract the machinations of the Fātimids. This policy saved the 'Abbāsīd caliphate but was fatal for its originator, for when Toghrulbeg, who came to Baghdād in 447 (1055), had to undertake a campaign against Mōsul in 450 = 1058, al-Basāsīrī [q. v. i. 669a] seized the opportunity to have the khutba pronounced in Baghdād in name of the Fātimid Caliph. Ibn al-Muslima had the misfortune to fall into his hands and was executed in the cruellest fashion in 450 = 1058, as al-Basāsīrī particularly hated him. His son Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al-Muzaffar was vizier for a short time in 476 = 1083. The latter's great-grandson, 'Aḍud al-Dīn Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh b. Hibat Allāh b. al-Muzaffar, held the same office under al-Mustaḍīr for 566 to 573 (1171—8). The Caliph was at last forced to dismiss him by the Turk Kaimāz, on which occasion the Turks plundered his dwelling thoroughly; it was not till Kaimāz had to leave Baghdād (570 = 1174) that 'Aḍud al-Dīn was restored to office. He fell a few years later at the hands of a Bāṭinī when about to undertake the pilgrimage to Mecca. Like other members of the family ('Imād al-Dīn devotes a special chapter to him in his Khariḍa) he was a man of great erudition and is celebrated in several of Sibī Ibn al-Ta'awīdhī's panegyrics.

IBN AL-MU'TAZZ 'ABD ALLĀH, ABU 'L-'ABBĀS, poet and prince, son of the Khalifa al-Mu'tazz, was born of a slave mother in the year 247 (861). From his youth he devoted himself to literary pursuits, studying the Arabic language and literature under al-Mubarrad, Tha'lab, and other eminent masters with great zeal and success, and composing works in prose and (especially) poetry which attracted ever wider attention. At the court of his cousin, the Khalifa al-Mu'taḍid (279—289 = 892—902), he stood in high esteem, and was closely associated with the principal scholars, poets, and literary leaders of Baghdād. He had held himself remote from the intrigues of the 'Abbāsīd court, which during his lifetime had been passing through the worst period of its history; but when, on the death of al-Muktafi, the dissatisfaction with al-Muktaḍir, whom he had named as his successor, culminated in an uprising, Ibn al-Mu'tazz was drawn into the conspiracy, and on the 20th of Rabi' I 296 (17th Dec. 908) was proclaimed khalifa under the name al-Murtaḍā. His party remained in power for only one day, however; and he, having concealed himself in a private house, was discovered after a few days and put to death (2 Rabi' II = 29 Dec.).

Ibn al-Mu'tazz was one of the most important poets of the 'Abbāsīd period. To his native talent, which included originality of a high order, he added sound learning and good taste. He did not imitate the ancient Arab poets, but could bear comparison with them in elegance of manner and purity of diction. His style, moreover, is remarkably simple and direct. His poems covered the whole range of subjects then generally recognized as belonging to the province of poetry (Dirwān, Cairo, 1891, 2 vols.). They are prevaillingly poems of high life, however, reflecting all its luxury and some of its affectation. A field which he cultivated especially was that of songs praising wine and celebrating drinking customs (Kitāb fuṣūl al-tamāthīl fī tabāshīr al-surūr, an anthology in which his own verses held the principal place; see Goldziher, Abhandl. zur arab. Philol., i. 166 sqq.; also Kitāb al-sharāb). His Tabakāt al-shu'arā' al-muḥdithīn, classifying and estimating the "modern" poets, is preserved only in part. A pioneer work of considerable importance was his Kitāb al-badī', a treatise on poetics. For his other works, see Ibn Khallikān; Fihrist, p. 116; Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., i. 80 sq.; and Orient. Stud.... Th. Nöldeke... gewidmet, i. 168.

IBN MU'ṬĪ, ZAIN AL-DĪN ABU 'L-ḤUSAIN YAḤYĀ B. ['ABD AL-]MU'ṬĪ B. 'ABD AL-NŪR AL-ZAWĀWĪ AL-MAGHRIBĪ, known as Ibn Mu'ṭī, was born in 564 (1168—9). He studied grammar and law in Algiers with Abū Mūsā al-Djazzūlī and then went to the east. He spent a very long time in Damascus, where he studied under the traditionalist Ibn 'Asākir and then taught grammar there. To earn a livelihood he also acted as a shāhid. When the Aiyūbid al-Malik al-Kāmil visited the Syrian capital, he invited him to follow him to Egypt and appointed him professor of literature at the 'Amr mosque in Cairo. Here he died on Monday the 30th Dhū 'l-Ḳa'da 628 = 29th Sept. 1231. Ibn Mu'ṭī was a Mālikī in the Maghrib, a Shāfi'ī in Damascus, and a Ḥanafī in Cairo. He seems to have been the first to compose a poem of 1000 verses (Alfiya) as a grammatical textbook.

Of his works only the following are preserved: 1. al-Durra al-Alfiya fī 'ilm al-'Arabiya or simply Alfiyat Ibn Mu'ṭī, a grammar in 1021 verses (radjaz and sarī' muḍdawiḍj), completed in 595 (1198—1199) in Damascus, according to Ḥādjdjī Khalifa, according to others, in Cairo, ed. with notes by Zetterstéen, Die Alfiye des Ibn Mu'ṭī, Leipzig 1900. 2. Kitāb al-Fuṣūl al-khamsin, a short grammar in prose, Berlin, Verz. N°. 6556; Bodleiana, Cat., ii. 247, iii. 3. al-Badī' fī Shinā'at al-Shi'r, poetics in verses, Fleischer, Die Refaiya, N°. 246.

IBN NUBĀTA, the name of two Arabic authors.

1. 'ABD AL-RĀḤĪM B. MUḤAMMAD B. ISMĀ'IL AL-ḤUDHĀKĪ AL-FĀRIKĪ, born in 335 = 946 in Maiyā-fāriḡin, lived at the court of Saif al-Dawla in Ḥalab as a preacher and died in 374 = 984 in his native town. His sermons (khūṭab), mainly short, in rhymed prose and elegant in style, deal with questions of religion and ethics in a threefold arrangement, often with reference to contemporary events; they were collected with some sermons of his son Abū Ṭāhir Muḥammad (390 = 999) and of his grandson Abu 'l-Faraj Ṭāhir (about 420 = 1029) about 629 = 1223 and printed in Cairo, 1286, 1292, 1302, 1304, 1309, Bairūt 1311.

2. His descendant MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤASAN, DĪMĀL AL-DĪN OR SHĪḤĀB AL-DĪN, ABŪ BAKR AL-ḲURASHĪ AL-UMAWĪ, born in Rabi' i. 686 = April 1287 at Maiyāfāriḡin, lived in Damascus after 716 = 1316, from there often visited the learned Aiyūbid prince Abu 'l-Fidā' in Ḥamāt, migrated in Rabi' i. 761 = Jan.-Febr. 1360 as secretary to Sulṭān al-Nāṣir Ḥasan to Cairo and died there in Ṣafar 786 = October 1366. As a poet he cultivated besides the panegyric ḡaṣṣida chiefly short poems, which Ibn Djuzaīy in Ibn Baṭṭūṭa (ed. Paris), i. 41, 17 thought very highly of. His Diwān of which there are several recensions (cf. Rieu, Suppl. to the Cat. of the Arab Mss. in the Brit. Mus., No. 1086) was printed at Alexandria n. d., Cairo, 1323 = 1905. His other poetical and rhetorical works are given by Brockelmann, Geschichte etc., ii. 11, where No. 13 should be deleted and Zahr al-Manṭhūr added, on letter writing, Brit. Mus. Or. 5656, see Descriptive List, etc., p. 64.

IBN NUDJAIM, ZAIN AL-'ĀBIDĪN B. IBRĀHĪM B. NUDJAIM AL-MISRĪ, was one of the distinguished scholars of the Ḥanafī school in the xth (xvth century), whose writings on Islāmic law are well known and popular in the east. He died in 970 (1562). Of his works we may mention the principal ones: 1. Al-Ashbāḥ wa 'l-Naṣā'ir al-fikhiya 'alā Madhhab al-Ḥanafīya, printed at Calcutta in 1826; 2. al-Badr al-rā'ik, a commentary on al-Nasafī's well known fiḥh book Kanz al-Daḡā'ik, printed at Cairo in 1311 (1893) 8 vols.; 3. Al-Fatāwī al-Zainīya fī Fikḥ al-Ḥanafīya, a collection of fatwā's collected after his death by his son Ahmad (cf. W. Pertsch, Die Arabischen Hss. zu Gotha, ii. p. 351 sqq.). See also C. Brockelmann, Geschichte der arab. Litteratur, ii. 310 sq. (TH. W. JUYNBOLL.)

IBN RĀ'IK, ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD, AMĪR AL-UMARĀ'. In 317 (929-930) Ibn Rā'ik was appointed prefect of police in Baghdād along with his brother

Ibrāhīm. Both were dismissed in the following year but Muḥammad b. Rā'ik received his office back in 319 (931-2), while Ibrāhīm was appointed at the same time high chamberlain. After the murder of al-Muktadir in 320 (932) the two brothers fled with others to al-Mada'in and thence to Wāsiṭ, and after al-Rāḡī became Caliph in 322 (934) he appointed Muḥammad b. Rā'ik governor of Wāsiṭ and Baṣra. Towards the end of 314 (Nov. 936) the latter was summoned to Baghdād and given the highest military and civil authority with the title Amīr al-Umarā'. In order to overthrow the powerful general Bedjekem [q. v.] in Wāsiṭ he entered into negotiations with 'Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Baridī [v. AL-BARIDĪ] and promised him the governorship of Wāsiṭ after the fall of Bedjekem. But al-Baridī was defeated; Bedjekem entered Baghdād in Dhu 'l-Ḳa'da 326 (Sept. 938) and was appointed Amīr al-Umarā', while Ibn Rā'ik had to go into hiding and al-Baidī was given the governorship of Wāsiṭ. After Bedjekem accompanied by the Caliph had set out against the Ḥamdānids, Ibn Rā'ik appeared in the capital, but promised to withdraw, if he received the governorship of Ḥarrān, al-Ruḥā, and Ḳinnasrīn along with the districts on the upper Euphrates and the frontier fortresses, which was granted him. As he invaded Syria the Ikhshid Muḥammad b. Tuḡḡdī set an army against him in 328 (939). The details are variously given; in any case, after some time peace was made according to which the Ikhshid retained Egypt and Ibn Rā'ik had to be content with Syria as far as al-Ramlā. Quarrels soon broke out between the Turks and Dailamīs in Baghdād; the latter won the upper hand and the Dailamī captain Kūrtegin was appointed Amīr al-Umarā'. To get rid of him, al-Muttaḡī appealed to Ibn Rā'ik. In Ramaḡān 329 (June 941) the latter set out from Damascus. He met Kūrtegin at 'Ukbarā and after several days fighting entered Baghdād. When Kūrtegin appeared with his troops in Baghdād he was defeated and captured whereupon the Caliph again gave Ibn Rā'ik the rank of Amīr al-Umarā'. In the meanwhile al-Baridī had seized Wāsiṭ. In Muḥarram of the next year (Oct. 941) Ibn Rā'ik set out against him but a peaceful arrangement was come to and al-Baridī promised to pay an annual tribute for Wāsiṭ. Soon afterwards the Turks deserted Ibn Rā'ik and when trouble broke out in Baghdād on account of famine and scarcity, al-Baridī sent his brother Abu 'l-Husain with an army against the capital. The Caliph and the Amīr al-Umarā' had to take refuge with the Ḥamdānids of Mōsul and in Radjab 330 (March—April 942) Ibn Rā'ik was slain.

IBN RASHĪD, the name of the Wahhābī rulers (Shaikh al-Mashā'ikh) of Djabal Shammar in Naḡd. The founder of the dynasty was:

1. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Alī al-Rashīd of the Dja'far clan of the Shammar tribe of al-'Abda, 1250—1263 (1835—1847). In 1835 he seized the town of Ḥa'il and deposed Shaikh Ṣāliḥ of the Ibn 'Alī family, which had previously ruled the Djabal Shammar under the suzerainty of the Wahhābī princes of Dar-īya [q. v.] and Riyāḍ. He was recognised by Faṣāl, Amir of Riyāḍ, who according to tradition owed his throne to him, and with the help of his brother ʿObaid succeeded in maintaining and extending his rule. In 1838 at the same time as Faṣāl, Amir of Riyāḍ, was expelled and replaced by Khālīd [cf. IBN SAʿŪD under viii and ix.] the Djabal Shammar was also occupied by Khūrshīd Pasha and ʿAbd Allāh banished. After the departure of the Egyptians in 1841, ʿAbd Allāh regained his kingdom. On his death he was succeeded by his son.

II. Ṭalāl b. ʿAbd Allāh, 1263—1283 (1847—1867); he subdued the oases of al-Djōf (Dawmat), Khaibar, Taimā and a portion of al-Ḳaṣīm and was able to keep the predatory Bedouins in check. By these and other clever measures he brought peace and prosperity into the land ruled by him. His dependence on Riyāḍ, which had become loose even in ʿAbd Allāh's reign, became limited to occasional military service; payment of tribute was replaced by more or less regular presents of horses. Ṭalāl was also on good terms with Egypt, the Porte and Persia; Palgrave (1862—1863) and Guarmani (1864) were able to travel in his county in his reign; he committed suicide according to Huber in Ṣafar 1283 (June—July 1866), according to Euting on the 17 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 1284 = 11th March 1868.

III. Miṭʿab, 1283—1285 (1867—1869), Ṭalāl's brother, who succeeded him, was treacherously murdered before he had reigned two full years on the 2nd Rabiʿ II 1285 = 4th January 1869 (Huber; according to Euting, 2nd Rabiʿ II 1285 = 23rd July 1868) by his nephews Bandar and Badr, Ṭalāl's sons.

IV. Bandar, the usurper, 1286—1289 (1869—1872) was in his turn disposed of along with his brothers and nephews by his uncle Muḥammad.

V. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Rashīd, 1289—1315 (1872—1897), next to his brother Ṭalāl, the most vigorous ruler of the Shammar dynasty, continuing the wise policy of his great predecessor strengthened the rising kingdom at home and abroad. Favoured by the Porte, he not only made himself independent of the Amirs of Riyāḍ but in 1891 he occupied Riyāḍ and combined the two rival kingdoms under his own sway. During his reign European travellers repeatedly visited the Djabal Shammar (Doughty, Mr. and Lady Anne Blunt, Huber, Euting, and v. Nolde); he died in the middle of December 1897 without issue and left the kingdom to his nephew.

VI. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Miṭʿab 1315—1324 (1897—1906). The latter came into conflict with the powerful Shaikh Mubārak of Kuwait, the protector of the princes of Riyāḍ possessed by Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh and a fierce battle took place at al-Ṭurfiya in 1318 (1901), in which ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Faṣāl and the Muntafiḳ Shaikh Saʿdūn fought on the side of Mubārak. In February 1902 ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān of the dynasty of Ibn Saʿūd took the town of Riyāḍ and maintained himself there against the attacks of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz of Djabal Shammar. The latter was finally forced to call in the help of the Turks (1322); he fell in a night battle with his enemy on the 18th Ṣafar 1324 (13th April 1906). His son and successor

VII. Miṭʿab b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz was murdered in Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 1324 (Dec. 1906—Jan. 1907; according to another account in Shaʿbān 12th by

VIII. Sulṭān b. Ḥamūd, a grandson of ʿObaid, young brother of ʿAbd Allāh (I above); after reigning a few months, Sulṭān was disposed of in the beginning of 1326 (Feb. 1908) by his brother

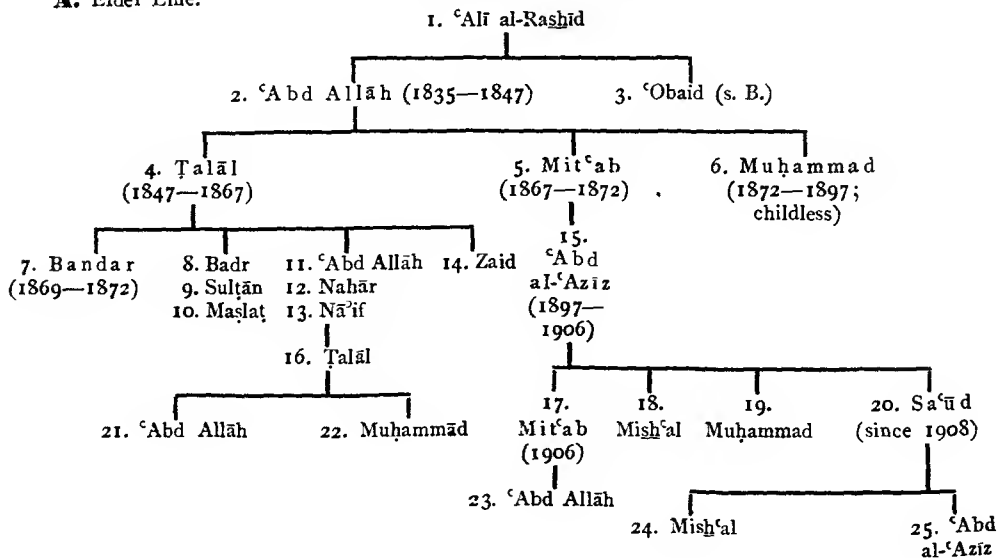

IX. Saʿūd b. Ḥamūd who was in his turn speedily made away with by Ḥamūd Ibn Ṣubḥān, who placed the sole surviving son of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (VI), X. Saʿūd, on the throne on the 17th Shaʿbān 1326 (14th Sept. 1908); and since then Saʿūd has been reigning with full recognition in the Djabal Shammar.

'Alī al-Rashīd (Miss Bell).

IBN RASHĪQ, ABŪ 'ALĪ AL-ḤASAN B. RASHĪQ AL-AZDĪ, whose father was perhaps of Greek origin but a client of the Azd, was born at al-Muḥammadiya (al-Masila) in Algiers about 385 (995) or 390 (1000). He studied first in his native town where he learned his father's trade of a jeweller, but went to Ḳairawān in 406 (1015-6) and was appointed court-poet by the Fāṭimid Caliph al-Mu'izz. This appointment earned him the enmity of his contemporary Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. Abī Sa'īd b. Aḥmad, known as Ibn Sharaf al-Ḳairawānī, who was also a poet and man of letters. This quarrel which resulted in the publication of several of their works finally induced Ibn Sharaf to migrate to Sicily. When Ḳairawān was plundered in 449 (1057) of the Arabs, al-Mu'izz fled, accompanied by his favourite poet, to al-Mahdiyya, where he died in 453 (1061). Ibn Rashīq went in the same year to Mazara in Sicily, where he died in the night of Friday/Saturday 1st Dhū 'l-Ḳa'da 456 (15th/16th Oct. 1064), according to others in 463 (1070-1071).

Ibn Rashīq was a historian, poet, and philologist and among his teachers were the man of letters Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Ḳarīm b. Ibrāhīm al-Nahshālī, the grammarian Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. Dja'far al-Ḳazzāz, etc. He is the author of: 1. al-'Umda fī Ṣinā'at al-Shi'r wa-Nakdihi, a treatise on poetics, commended by Ibn Khaldūn (al-Muḳaddima, transl. de Slane, iii. 380) as the best work on the subject; publ. in Tunis about 1285 (only the 1st vol.), Cairo 1325. 2. Ḳurūḍat al-Dhahab fī Naḳd Ash'ār al-'Arab, Letter to Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī b. Abī 'l-Ḳāsim al-Lawātī, on poetic plagiarisms, Paris, Bibl. Nat., N^o. 3317, vii. 3. A fragment of his Diwān, see Derenbourg, Les Mss. arab. de l'Esc., N^o. 467.

IBN AL-RĀWANDĪ. [See AL-RĀWANDĪ.]

IBN ROSTA, ABŪ ʿALĪ AHMAD B. ʿOMAR, an Arab-Persian scholar of the second half of the 10th (ixth—xth) century. Almost nothing is known of his life. He lived in Isfahān, where several persons were known as scholars under the name Ibn Rosta. In 290 (903) he visited Medina on the occasion of the pilgrimage. About the same time he wrote his Kitāb al-ʿĀlāq al-Nafisa; of this only the seventh part (ed. by de Goeje, Bibl. Geogr. Arab., vii. 1, Leiden 1892) has survived; in it after an introduction on the celestial sphere and the terrestrial globe he proceeds to describe lands and cities. He took his material for the most part from older or contemporary works. Various extracts had previously been published by Chwolson with Russian translation.

IBN RŪḤ, ABU ʿL-KĀSIM AL-ḤUSAIN B. RŪḤ B. BAḤR AL-BAYYĪ AL-NAWBAḤHTI, third nāʾib of the expected Imām (ṣāhib al-amr) of the Shīʿi sect of the Ithnāʿashariya [q. v.] during the short absence (al-ghaiba al-yughrā) 264—334 (878—945). In his capacity of nāʾib (synonyms, bāb, wakil, safir ʿan al-nāhiya al-muḥaddasa) he had to issue bulls (ṭawāqif) in the name of the "absent" Imām, which had legal authority among the Shīʿis. He resided in Baghdad, in the Dār al-Nāʾib. He seems to have been appointed by the previous nāʾib, Abū Djaʿfar al-ʿUmarī, before 305 (917). He won so many adherents at the Caliph's court that the vizier Ḥamid had him imprisoned. Released in 317 (929) he became implicated in the Karmatian schemes and laid a curse upon al-Shalmaghānī. He died in 326 (937) or 329 (940) after designating Abū ʿL-Ḥasan al-Sāmarrī as nāʾib. The parents of the great Shīʿi theologian Ibn Bābūya [q. v.] claimed that they owed his birth to the prayers of Ibn Rūḥ.

IBN AL-RŪMĪ, ʿALĪ B. AL-ʿABBĀS B. DJURAJDĪ (GEORGIOS), an Arab poet, born at Baghdad in 221 (836), as the name Ibn al-Rūmī suggests and the name of his grandfather proves, belonged to the land of the Byzantines. He was distinguished for his poetic gifts, but made many enemies by his lampoons, including the vizier of al-Muʿtaḍid, al-Kāsim b. ʿUbaid Allāh, grandson of Sulaimān b. Wahb [q. v.], who is said to have got rid of him by poisoning him in 283 (896). The date is not quite certain, for the years 284 and 276 are also given. He left a fairly extensive Dīwān, which was collected and arranged by al-Sūlī.

IBN RUSHD, ABU ʿL-WALĪD MUḤAMMAD B. AHMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. RUSHD, celebrated in mediaeval Europe as AVERROES, the greatest Arab philosopher of Spain, was born at Cordova in 520 = 1126. His grandfather had been kādi of Cordova and had left important works, while his father also held the office of kādi. He studied law and medicine in his native town; one of his teachers was Abū Djaʿfar Ḥarūn of Truxillo. He lived in 548 = 1153 in Marrākush, whither Ibn Ṭufail [q. v.] had probably induced him to go. The latter introduced him to the Almohad Abū Yaʿqūb Yūsuf who became his patron. An account of this interview is preserved (see Hist. des Almohades de Merrakech, transl. by Fagnan). The Caliph asked Ibn Rushd what was the view of the philosophers on heaven (the universe), whether it was an eternal substance or had a beginning. "I was so overcome with terror" says Ibn Rushd "that I could not answer". The Caliph put him at his ease and began to discuss the question himself by expounding the views of various scholars with an intimacy and learning rare among princes. The Caliph then dismissed him with rich presents.

It was Ibn Ṭufail who advised Ibn Rushd to comment on Aristotle and told him that the commander of the faithful often lamented the obscure language of the Greek philosophers or rather of the available translations and that he (Ibn Rushd) ought to undertake to explain them.

In 565 = 1169 he became kādi of Seville and two years later kādi of Cordova. In spite of the burden of work of this office he composed his most important works in this period. In 578 = 1182, Ibn Yūsuf summoned him to Marrākush as his physician to replace the aged Ibn Ṭufail, but soon afterwards sent him back to Cordova with the rank of chief kādi.

At the beginning of the reign of Yaʿqūb al-Manṣūr, Yūsuf's successor, Ibn Rushd was still in favour with the Caliph, but he fell into disgrace as the result of the opposition of the theologians to his writings and after being accused of various heresies and tried, he was banished to Lucena near Cordova. At the same time, the Caliph ordered the books of the philosophers to be burnt except those on medicine, arithmetic and elementary astronomy (about 1195). Duncan Macdonald observes that these orders of the Almohad ruler who had hitherto encouraged philosophical studies, probably were a concession to the Spanish Muslims, who were much more orthodox than the Berbers. At the time the Caliph was actually waging a religious war against the Christians in Spain. On returning to Marrākush he raised the ban and recalled Ibn Rushd to his court (D. Macdonald, Development of Muslim Theology, New York 1903, p. 255).

Ibn Rushd did not long enjoy the restoration of his fortunes for he died soon after his return to Marrākush (9th Šafar 595 = 10th Dec. 1198) and was buried near the town outside the gate of Tagazūt.

A great part of the Arabic original of Averroes' works is lost. There have survived in Arabic his Tahāfut al-Tahāfut, the "Collapse of the Collapse", an answer to Ghazālī's celebrated Tahāfut al-Falāsifa, "Collapse", or perhaps "Collapse of the philosophers" (cf. Miguel Asín y Palacios, Sur le Sens du mot "Tahāfut" dans les œuvres d'al-Ghazālī et d'Averroès in Revue Africaine, 1906, No. 261, 262, particularly p. 202), also the medium commentaries on the Poetics and Rhetoric of Aristotle (ed. and transl. by Lasinio); the exposition of fragments of Alexander of Aphrodisias on the Metaphysics (s. J. Freudental and S. Fraenkel, op. cit.); the large commentary on the Metaphysics in Leiden (Cat. Cod. orient., No. MMDCCXXI); small commentaries at Madrid Kitāb al-Djawāmī (Guillén Robles, Catálogo . . . Bibl. Nacion., No. 37; cf. H. Derenbourg, Notes sur les mss. arab. de Madrid, No. 37, in Homenaje á D. Franc. Codera, p. 577 sq.) referring to Aristotle's treatises De Physica, De Caelo et Mundo, De Generatione et Corruptione, De Meteorologia, De Anima, and certain metaphysical questions; cf. also H. Derenbourg, Le commentaire arabe d'Averroès sur quelques petits écrits physiques d'Aristote in Arch. für Gesch. der Philos., xviii. (1905), p. 250, and lastly two interesting treatises on the relations between religion and philosophy (discussed by Léon Gauthier and by Miguel Asín). One of these writings is entitled Kitāb Faṣl al-Maḳāl and vigorously champions the agreement between religion and philosophy, the other is called Kitāb Kashf al-Manāhid, etc. Both works are edited and translated into German by M. J. Müller (see Bibl.) and printed at Cairo under the joint title Kitāb Falsafat Ibn Rushd (1313, 1328). There also exists in Arabic in Hebrew characters an abstract of the Logica, the medium commentaries on De Generatione et Corruptione, De Meteoris, De Anima, a paraphrase of the Parva Naturalia (Paris, Bibl. Nat., No. 303, 317), the commentaries on De Caelo, De Generatione and De Meteoris (Bodleiana, Uri, Cat., codd. hebr., p. 86) (Renan, Averroès, 3^e ed., p. 83).

The celebrated commentaries of Averroes on Aristotle are of three kinds or rather one in three editions, a large, medium and small edition. This threefold arrangement corresponds to the three stages of instruction in the Muslim universities, the small commentaries, are for the first, the medium for the second and the large for the third year. The exposition of the 'aḳā'id is similarly arranged.

We possess in Hebrew and Latin translation the three commentaries of Averroes on the Second Analytics, the Physics and on the treatises of the Universe, the Soul and the Metaphysics; the large commentaries on the other works of Aristotle are lacking and no commentary on the Zoology has survived.

Ibn Rushd also wrote a commentary on Plato's Republic, and criticisms on al-Fārābī's logic and his interpretation of Aristotle as well as discussions on certain theories of Avicenna and glosses on the 'Aḳida of the Mahdī Ibn Tūmart. He also wrote several legal (Kit. Bidāyat al-Mudjtahid wa-Nihāyat al-Muḳtaṣid, Cairo 1329), and astronomical and medical works. His work on the 'whole art of medicine', al-Kulliyāt (codd. Granada, s. Dozy, Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., xxxvi. 1882, p. 343; Petersburg, Dorn, Cat., No. 132, and probably Madrid, Robles, Catal., No. 132, cf. H. Derenbourg, Notes etc. No. 132, Homenaje, p. 587 sq.), corrupted in the Latin translations to Colliget, enjoyed a certain renown in the middle ages, but cannot be compared with the Canon of Avicenna.

The philosophy of Averroes cannot be considered original (cf. Renan, Averroès 3, p. 88). It is rather the philosophy of the Hellenising school of the Falāsifa [cf. FAILASUF, ii. 39^b] which had already been taught in the east by al-Kindī, al-Fārābī, and Avicenna and in the west by Ibn Bādīdja. On some points, however, he contests the views of his great predecessors but these points are only subsidiary and on the whole his philosophy runs on the same lines.

He owes his fame mainly to his acute analysis and his gift of annotation, qualities which we can hardly appreciate accurately at the present day on account of the differences in our mode of thought, our methods and scientific resources, but they were all the more appreciated by the scholars of the middle ages, notably in Jewish and Christian circles. His commentaries aroused great admiration, even among theologians who saw in his system a danger to faith.

The school of philosophers had already been vigorously attacked by the theologians in the Muslim east. The Tahāfut of al-Ghazālī directed mainly against al-Fārābī and Avicenna is the most important memorial of this struggle in the east. In the west the school was first attacked by the Muslim theologians of Spain, and later by the Christian theologians also after the commentaries of Averroes had been made known to them in translations. In the xiiith century Ibn Rushd was condemned by the bishops of Paris, Oxford and Canterbury for reasons similar to these that had earned his condemnation by the orthodox Muslims of Spain.

The main doctrines of Ibn Rushd's system, that brought the charge of heresy upon him, concern the question of the eternity of the world, the nature of God's apprehension, and His foreknowledge, the universality of the soul and of the intellect, and the resurrection. Averroes may easily appear heretical on these doctrines; he does not deny dogma, but expounds it in such a way as to bring it into conformity with philosophy.

Thus in the doctrine of the eternity of the world he does not deny the creation but only gives a rather different explanation from the theological one. For him there is no creation ex nihilo once and for all, but rather a creation renewed from moment to moment whereby the world is maintained and changes. In other words: a creative power is perpetually at work on the world, maintaining and moving it. The constellations in particular exist only through motion, and they receive this motion from the moving force which is acting on them from all eternity. The world is eternal but in consequence of a creative and moving cause: God is eternal and without cause.

In the chapter on the apprehension of God Ibn Rushd repeats the principle of the philosophers that "the first principle only apprehends his own being". According to that school this presupposition is necessary in order that the first principle may retain his unity, for if he recognised multiplicity of being, he would himself become multiple. Interpreted strictly according to this principle, primal being must live entirely within himself and have knowledge of his own existence only and foreknowledge would then be impossible. The theologians endeavoured to force the philosophers to this conclusion.

But Ibn Rushd's system has more elasticity. He grants that God in His own essence knows all the things of the world. But His knowledge is neither to be called particular or universal and is therefore not like man's knowledge, but rather of a higher kind of which we can form no conception. [Cf. FALSAFA, ii. 50^a]. God's knowledge cannot be the same as that of man's, for God would then have 'sharcs' in His knowledge and He would no longer be the one God. Moreover God's knowledge is not like man's knowledge derived from things, nor is it produced by them. On the contrary, it is the cause of all things. Therefore the assertion of the theologians that the system of Averroes denies fore-knowledge is incorrect.

Concerning his teaching regarding the soul, Ibn Rushd has been reproached with teaching that the individual souls after death pass into the universal soul, and thereby denying the personal immortality of the soul of man. But this is not at all correct. The soul must be distinguished from the intellect in Averroes' system as well as in the systems of other philosophers. The intellect is quite abstract and immaterial and only exists in reality when it is associated with the universal or active intellect. What we call intellect in the individual is strictly a faculty for grasping the ideas that come from the active intellect, a faculty to which the name 'passive' intellect is given and which is not permanent by itself. It must realise itself and become the 'acquired' intellect (intellectus adeptus). Then it is bound up with the active intellect, in which the eternal ideas rest, and merged into it this faculty becomes itself eternal.

It is not the same with the soul. This with the philosophers is the driving force which effects the life and growth of organic bodies. It is a kind of energy which gives life to matter not free from the qualities of matter like the intellect, but on the contrary closely associated with it. It perhaps may even consist of a kind of half or very fine matter. These souls are the form of bodies, and are therefore independent of the body, but continue to exist after the death of the body and can remain individual.

The latter according to Averroes is a bare possibility. He does not believe that a convincing proof of the immortality of the soul so conceived can be established by purely philosophical means. The task of solving the question is left to revelation. (See Tahāfut al-Tahāfut, p. 137).

The theologians have further charged Averroes with denying the resurrection of the body. Here also his teaching is rather an exposition than a denial of the dogma. The body which we shall have in the next world is according to him not the same as our earthly body, for what has passed away is not reborn in its identity, it can at best appear again as something similar. Averroes moreover remarks that the future life will be of a higher kind than earthly life; bodies there will therefore be more perfect than in this world. For the rest, he disapproves of the myths and representations which are made of the life in the next world.

As this philosopher was more attacked by orthodoxy than his predecessors, he made more definite pronouncement than they on the relations between philosophical research and religion. He expounds his views on this subject in the above mentioned works Faṣl al-Maḳāl and Kashf al-Manūhidj. His first principle is that philosophy must agree with religion. This is an axiom of the whole of Arab scholasticism. There are in a way two truths or so to speak two revelations, the philosophic truth and the religious truth, both of which must agree. The philosophers are prophets of their class, prophets who appeal by preference to scholars. Their teaching may not contradict the teaching of the prophets in the proper sense, who appeal particularly to the people; it must rather give the same truth in a higher, less material form.

In religion a distinction must be made between the literal sense and its exposition. If for example a passage is found in the Qur'ān which appears to contradict the results of philosophy, we must believe that this passage really has another than the apparent sense and seek the true meaning. It is the duty of the multitude to keep to the literal meaning; to seek the correct interpretation is the task of the learned. Myths and allegories must be understood by the people as revelation presents them; the philosopher, however, has the right to seek out the deeper and purer meaning concealed in them. Finally the learned should make it a practice not to communicate their results to the masses.

Averroes has expounded how religion must be taught according to the intellectual standard of the hearer. He distinguished three classes of men according to their mental endowments: the first and most numerous comprises those who believe as a result of preaching the divine word and are susceptible almost only to oratorical effect. The second class includes those whose beliefs are based on reasoning but only on such as proceeds from a priori premisses assumed quite uncritically. The third and smallest class finally consists of those whose beliefs are based on proofs which rest on a chain of established premisses. This method of coordinating religious instruction to the mental endowment of the hearer is evidence of a keen psychological insight but it may run the risk of not appearing sincere and it was natural that it should arouse the distrust of professional theologians.

Finally we do not think that Averroes was an infidel, who was trying to protect himself from the attacks of the orthodox with more or less skilful interpretations; we are inclined to think that in general agreement with the attitude of many scholars in the east he was a syncretist, who honestly believed that one and the same truth could be presented under very different aspects and who was able by his great philosophical ingenuity to reconcile doctrines which must have appeared directly contradictory to less elastic minds.

The commentaries of Averroes were translated in the xiiith and xivth century into Hebrew by Jacob ben Abba Mari Anatoli of Naples (1232), Judah b. Salomon Cohen of Toledo (1247), by Moses b. Tibbon of Lunel (1260), Samuel b. Tibbon, Shēm Tob b. Joseph b. Falaquera and Kalonymus b. Kalonymus (1314). Levi b. Gerson of Bagnols (Gersonides) wrote a commentary on Averroes just as the latter had commented on Aristotle. In the Christian west, Michael Scott and Hermann, both connected with the House of Hohenstaufen, began in 1230 and 1240 a Latin translation of the Arabic text of Averroes.

Towards the end of the xvth century Niphus and Zimara made some improvements in the old translations. New translations based on the Hebrew text were later made by Jacob Mantino of Tortosa, Abraham de Balmes and Giovanui Francesco Burana of Verona. The two best Latin editions of Averroes are those of Niphus (1495—1497) and of the Juntas (1553).

IBN AL-SĀ'ĀTĪ (the son of the clockmaker), FAKHR AL-DĪN RIDWĀN (or RUDWĀN) B. MUHAMMAD B. 'ALĪ B. RUSTAM AL-KHORĀSĀNĪ was born in Damascus whither his father had migrated from Khorāsān. The latter was a skilful clockmaker who made the clock at the gate of the great mosque of Damascus, at the request of the Zangid al-Malik al-'Ādil Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd (d. in Shawwāl 569 = 1174); he was also learned in astronomy. Ibn al-Sā'ātī was a physician but had also an extensive knowledge of literature, logic and other branches of philosophy, as well as in clockmaking. He was first of all vizier to al-Malik al-Fā'iz b. al-Malik al-'Ādil Muḥammad b. Aiyūb (a nephew of Saladin) and afterwards vizier and physician to his brother al-Malik al-Mu'azzam b. al-Malik al-'Ādil (d. 624 = 1227). He died in Damascus c. 1230. There still exists a manuscript of a work by him in Gotha on the construction of clocks (the Arabic title is lacking) written in Muḥarram of the year 600 (1203), in which he is mainly concerned with his father's clock which he repaired and perfected.

His brother BAḤ' AL-DĪN ABU 'L-ḤASAN 'ALĪ likewise called IBN AL-SĀ'ĀTĪ, was a well known poet who died as early as 604 (1207) at Cairo; on him cf. Ibn Khallikān, ed. Wustenfeld, n^o. 489.

The Hanafi jurist MUẒAFFAR AL-DĪN AḤMAD B. 'ALĪ AL-BAGHDĀDĪ, died in 694 (1295), is known by the same name; he was the author of a much used compendium of fiqh, which bears the title Maḍjma' al-Baḥrain wa-Multaḥa 'l-Nayirain, because it is a compilation from the Mukhtaṣar of al-Kudūrī [q. v.] and the Maḥṣūma of al-Nasafi. On him cf. Ibn Kuṭūboghā's Tabaqāt al-Hanafīya, ed. Flügel, p. 4, and Brockelmann, o. c., i. 382 sq.

IBN SAB'ĪN, ABU MUHAMMAD 'ABD AL-ḤAḤẖ B. IBRĀHĪM AL-ISḤBĪLĪ, Arab philosopher and founder of a Sūfī brotherhood, a native of Murcia, is best known in Europe by his reply to some philosophical questions put by Frederick II to the scholars of Ceuta, where Ibn Sab'īn then lived. Cf. A. F. Mehren, Correspondance du philosophe soufi Ibn Sab'īn Abd oul-Hagg avec l'empereur Frédéric II de Hohenstaufen in Journ. Asiat., Ser. vii. Vol. 14, p. 341 sqq. cf. ibid., Ser. v. IBN SA'D, ABU 'ABD ALLĀH, MUHAMMAD B. SA'D B. MANĪ' AL-BAṢRĪ AL-ZUḤRĪ, a client of the Banū Hāshim known as Katīb al-Wākidī (secretary to al-Wākidī). He studied tradition under Hushaim, Sufyān b. 'Uyaina, Ibn 'Ulayya, al-Walid b. Muslim, and notably with Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wākidī [q. v.]. Abū Bakr b. Abi 'l-Dunyā and other traditioners derived tradition from him. His great work, the Kitāb al-Ṭabaqāt i. e. the book of the classes, is famous and gives the history of the Prophet, the Companions and Successors down to his own time. Besides the large, Ibn Khallikān and Ḥādījī Khālifā mention his smaller book of classes. When the author of the Fihrist speaks of a Kitāb Akhbār al-Nabi of Ibn Sa'd, this is probably not a separate work but the first part of the book of classes, which deals with the Sira of the Prophet. The whole work is being published under the title: Ibn Saad, Biographien Muhammads, seiner Gefährten und der späteren Träger des Islams bis zum Jahre 230 der Flucht, im Verein mit C. IBN ŠADAQA, the name of three viziers:

1. DJALĀL AL-DĪN 'AMĪD AL-DAWLA ABU 'ALĪ AL-ḤASAN B. 'ALĪ, al-Mustarshid's vizier. In 513 (1119-20), he was appointed vizier, but in Djumādā I 516 (July-August 1122) the Caliph dismissed him. His house was plundered and his nephew Abu 'l-Ridā fled to Mōsul. The office was then given to 'Alī b. Tīrād al-Zainabī and in Shā'ban (Oct.-Nov.) of the same year, to Aḥmad b. Nizām al-Mulk. When the latter demanded that Ibn Šadaqa should leave the capital, he went to Haddithat 'Ana to the Amir Sulaimān b. Muhārīsh, but in the following year he was restored to the office of vizier. When the Saldjūk Toḡhrul b. Muḥammad was persuaded by Dubais b. Šadaqa [q. v.] to march on Baghdād to subdue the whole of 'Irāk, the Caliph set out to meet him in Šafar 519 (March 1125). Toḡhrul and Dubais encamped at Djalūlā, the Caliph and the vizier at al-Das-kara, N. E. of Baghdād. Toḡhrul and Dubais, then resolved to reach Baghdād by a circuitous route. The latter was sent ahead with 200 horsemen and occupied the ford of the Diyāla near al-Nahravān; but as Toḡhrul was delayed partly by an attack of fever and partly by inundations which made his advance difficult, the Caliph succeeded in anticipating him and took Dubais by surprise. When the latter wished to come to terms with al-Mustarshid, the Caliph was willing to make peace but was dissuaded by the vizier, and Toḡhrul and Dubais continued their journey on Khorāsān to seek help from the Saldjūk Sultān Sanḡar. Djalāl al-Dīn Ibn Šadaqa died on Raḡjab 1st 522 (July 1st 1128).

2. DJALĀL AL-DĪN ABU 'L-RIDĀ MUḤAMMAD, nephew of the preceding, al-Rāshid's vizier. Ibn Šadaqa was appointed vizier after the accession of al-Rāshid in 529 (1135). In the following year, when the Caliph had several high officials arrested, he sought protection with the governor of Mōsul, Zankī b. Aḳ Sonḡor, and was able to hold his office till the deposition of al-Rāshid in Dhu 'l-Ka'da 530 (August 1136). He afterwards filled several high offices. He died in 556 (1160-1).

3. MU'TAMAN AL-DAWLA ABU 'L-KĀSIM 'ALĪ, al-Muṭtafi's vizier. He is said to have been a very pious but uneducated man, who knew little of the duties of a vizier, although he belonged to a famous family.

IBN SA'ĪD, ABU 'L-ḤASAN 'ALĪ B. Mūsā AL-

MAGHRIBĪ, an Arab philologist, was born in 610 = 1214 (according to others, 605 = 1208) at Kal'at Yaḥsub (Alcalá la Real) near Granada and studied at Seville. With his father he made the pilgrimage to Mecca but when they arrived in Alexandria in 639 (1241-2) his father died there in 640 (1243). He himself remained in Alexandria but travelled in 648 (1250) to Baghdād and from there with Kamāl al-Dīn [q. v.] to Ḥalab, thence to Damascus, Mōsul, Baghdād, Baṣra, and Mecca. He then went to Tunis and entered the service of Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Mustanṣir. In 666 (1267) he went again to the East and reached Armenia via Alexandria and Ḥalab, then returned to Tunis and died on returning to Damascus in 673 (1274). According to another statement, he did not die till 685 (1286) in Tunis. He wrote a history of the Maghrib entitled al-Mughrib fi Hula 'l-Maghrib, cf. K. Vollers, Fragmente aus dem Mughrib des Ibn Sa'id. Semitist. Studien, Heft 1; Ibn Sa'id, Kitāb al-Mughrib . . ., Buch IV, Gesch. der Iḥsiden . . ., Textausg. etc. by K. L. Tallquist, Leiden, 1899. He wrote various other works, the titles of which are detailed by Brockelmann and Pons Boigues.

IBN SAIYID AL-NĀS, FATH AL-DĪN ABU 'L-FATH MUḤAMMAD B. ABĪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD AL-YA'MARĪ AL-ANDALUSĪ, an Arab biographer, born in Cairo in 661 = 1263 (according to others, in 671 = 1273), studied there and in Damascus and became a teacher of Ḥadīth in the Zāhiriya at Cairo. He composed a full biography of the Prophet entitled 'Uyūn al-Aṭhar fi Funūn al-Maghāzī, al-Shamā'il wa 'l-Siyar (somewhat differently given in Brockelmann, see below). He also wrote a number of qaṣidas in praise of the Prophet, entitled Buṣṣra 'l-Lubīb fi Dhikra 'l-Ḥabīb. One of these is published by Kosegarten (Stralsund 1815) and Basset (Louvain 1886).

Ibn Saiyid al-Nās died in 734 (1334).

IBN SARĀYĀ. [See AL-HILLĪ.]

IBN AL-SARRĀDJ, MUḤAMMAD B. 'ALĪ B. 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN AL-KURASHĪ AL-DIMASHQĪ, Arab mystic, compiled about 714 (1314) a collection of edifying anecdotes entitled Tuḥfah al-Arwāḥ wa-Miftāḥ al-Arbāḥ, which formed a part of his lost work Tashwīḥ al-Arwāḥ wal-Kutub ilā Dhikr 'Allām al-Ghuyūb (s. Ahlwardt, Verzeichnis der ar. Hdss. von Berlin, N^o. 8794). (C. BROCKELMANN.)

IBN SA'UD, the name of the Wahhābī dynasty of Dar'īya [q. v.] and Riyāḍ. Muḥammad b. Sa'ūd, the founder of this dynasty was a member of the Muḡrin clan of the tribe of Masālikh of the Wuld 'Alī, who are considered to belong to the great 'Anaza group of Arabs. His father Sa'ūd ruled over Dar'īya and died in the fourth decade of the xth century A. H., i. e. between 1727 and 1737; according to the genealogy of the Ibn Sa'ūd, he left 3 sons besides Muḥammad: Thunaiyān, Mushārān, and Farḥān. The suzerainty of the Wahhābīs of Dar'īya and later of Riyāḍ has remained in the line of Muḥammad b. Sa'ūd to this day; the collateral lines of Ibn Thunaiyān and Ibn Mushārī produced two usurpers (see vii. and x. below) but attained little prominence in the history of the dynasty; Farhān and his descendants only figure in the genealogical lists.

The history of the Wahhābī kingdom of Dar'īya-Riyāḍ may be divided into three periods: the first runs from the foundation to the conquest of the land by the Egyptians in 1820 (Dar'īya as capital). The second covers the period from the restoration by Turki and Fai-al to the conquest by the Ibn Rashīd of Ḥa'il, 1820—1896 (Riyāḍ capital); the third began with the reconquest of Riyāḍ in 1902.

I. Muḥammad b. Sa'ūd, 1735 (?)—1766. About 1740 Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb, the founder of the Wahhābī doctrine, was driven from 'Aiyene where he had been active and found shelter with Muḥammad b. Sa'ūd, a friend of his. The two combined to spread the new doctrine with preaching and the sword. The fighting with the surrounding towns and tribal districts began in 1159 (begins 24th Jan. 1746) and soon led to the intervention of some powerful neighbours, like the Banī Khālid of Laḥsā and the Makramī of Naḍjīān, who were however unable to check the progress of the Wahhābīs. The Wahhābī pilgrims were regarded as sectarians by the Sharifs of Mecca and excluded from visiting the holy places. The reports of the Sharifs on this matter in 1162 (begins 25th Dec. 1749) brought the first news of the new sect to Constantinople. Muḥammad b. Sa'ūd died in 1179 (1765—6) after reigning about 30 years.

II. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muḥammad b. Sa'ūd, 1179—1218 (1766—1803). The first decades of his reign were passed in constant fighting with the neighbouring towns and tribes, the Banī Khālid, the Makramī, and the Muntafik. In 1795 the Wahhābīs stormed Laḥsā and Kaṭīf and thus established themselves on the coast of the Persian Gulf; the repeated attempts of the Turkish governors of Baṣra and Baghdād and their allies the Muntafik to oust them from there (1797 the Muntafik Shaikh Thuwainī's campaign; 1798 K'āyā 'Alī Pasha's campaign) ended unsuccessfully and led in 1799 to a six years' truce between 'Abd al-'Azīz and the Pasha of Baghdād. The Sharif Surūr of Mecca had in 1186 (1772-3) granted the Wahhābīs the right of entry to the holy places on payment of a tax; his successor Ghālib (from 1202) withdrew this concession and undertook unsuccessful campaigns in 1790, 1795, and 1798 to check the advance of the Wahhābīs into the Ḥijāz; he had to make peace with them in 1798 and allow them to make the pilgrimage, and they in return pledged themselves not to make further raids into the Sharifs' sphere of influence.

The peaceful relations with Baghdād and the Sharifs were of short duration. To revenge an attack by the Shī'ī Khazā'il on a Wahhābī caravan, Sa'ūd, son of 'Abd al-'Azīz, fell upon Karbalā on the 18th Dhu 'l-Ḥijja 1216 (21st April 1802), plundered and laid waste the Shī'ī sanctuaries there, and massacred most of the inhabitants. In 1214 and 1215 (April 1800 and 1801) Sa'ūd had made the pilgrimage; about the same time the tribes of 'Asir and Tihāma as well as the Banī Harb, who had hitherto been subject to the Sharif Ghālib joined the Wahhābīs, which led to open hostilities. On the 25th Shawwāl 1217 (18th Febr. 1803) the Wahhābīs stormed Ta'if and on the 8th Mu-ḥarrām 1218 (30th April 1803) Sa'ūd made his triumphal entry into Mecca. After Sa'ūd's return the Sharif Ghālib drove out the Wahhābī garrison in Mecca (22nd Rabī' I 1218 = 11th July 1803) but was forced to make further concessions to the Wahhābīs.

About 1800 the Wahhābīs began to extend their power along the coast of the Persian Gulf where in the course of the next few years they subjected Bahrain and the coast tribes, namely the Djawāsimī tribes of Ra's al-Khaima.

On the 18th Rājab 1218 (4th Nov. 1803) 'Abd al-'Azīz was stabbed by a Shī'ī from 'Amādiyya in the mosque of Dar'īya.

III. Sa'ūd b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, 1218—1229 (1803—1814). After several smaller enterprises against Baghdād and 'Omān, Sa'ūd resolved to put an end to the rule of the Sharif Ghālib and occupied Medina in 1220 (1805) and Mecca in Dhu 'l-Kāda of the same year (January 1806). To save the remnants of his power Ghālib submitted absolutely to the Wahhābīs, who now introduced their teaching into the Ḥijāz. The pilgrim caravans equipped by the Turkish government were forbidden admission to the sacred territory, the khutba in the name of the Sulṭān abolished, and Sa'ūd demanded in a formal letter that not only the governor of Damascus, but the Sulṭān himself should adopt the Wahhābī creed. To the emphatic refusal of the Pasha of Damascus, Sa'ūd replied by plundering Ḥawrān in July 1810. Sa'ūd organised the piracy of the coast tribes on the Persian Gulf on a great scale so that the Indian Government was forced in 1809 to equip an expedition which stormed Ra's al-Khaima on Nov. 13 of this year and destroyed the pirate fleet.

The Porte unable to defend its own territory from the attacks of the Wahhābīs finally commissioned Muḥammad 'Alī, Pasha of Egypt, to reconquer the Ḥijāz.

The first campaign of the Egyptian forces under Ṭūsūn Pasha began with the reconquest of Yanbu' al-Baḥr and Yanbu' al-Barr at the end of Oct. or beginning of Nov. 1811; on his advance on Medina Ṭūsūn Pasha however was defeated on the 7th Dhu 'l-Kāda 1226 = 23rd Nov. 1811 in the narrow pass of Djedeide by 'Abd Allāh and Faīṣal, Sa'ūd's sons, and had to retire to Yanbu'. It was not till the late autumn of 1812 that he resumed operations, this time with more success; Medina capitulated in November, Mecca at the end of January 1813 and Ta'if was stormed a few days later; on the other hand the Wahhābīs succeeded in checking the further advance of the Egyptians at Taraba (summer 1813). At the end of August Muḥammad 'Alī himself landed in Djidda and Sa'ūd sought in vain to negotiate peace with him. A second attempt of Ṭūsūn Pasha against Taraba (at the end of 1813) was as unsuccessful as the first and the operation of the Egyptians came to an end till the beginning of 1813. In the meanwhile Sa'ūd died on the 8th Jumādā I 1229 = 27th April 1814 in Dar'īya at the age of 68.

IV. 'Abd Allāh b. Sa'ūd (1229—1233 = 27th April 1814—9th Sept. 1818). In the beginning of 1815 Muḥammad 'Alī resumed his march against Taraba, defeated the Wahhābīs at Taraba on the 15th January and took the town; he next advanced against 'Asir and returned via Kunfuda to Mecca. Ṭūsūn Pasha entered Naḍj via Ḥanākiya in March and seized the fortified town of al-Rass where 'Abd Allāh b. Sa'ūd met him. A longish truce followed and peace negotiations which lasted till 1816. In Sept. 1816 Ibrāhīm Pasha, son of Muḥammad 'Alī, took over the supreme command in Arabia and lead his army amid great privations and fierce fighting for eighteen months up to the gates of Dar'īya (defeat of 'Abd Allāh at Māwiya on 2nd May 1817, capture of al-Rass in the 21st Oct. 1817 after a three months' siege, storming of Ḍorāma in March 1818). The siege of the capital defended by 'Abd Allāh and his relatives lasted from the beginning of April to the beginning of Sept. 1818; after the town had fallen on the 6th Sept. 'Abd Allāh held out a few days longer in the Kaṣr Dar'īya and surrendered on the 9th Sept. to the victor who sent him to Cairo with his family and the descendants of Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb. Muḥammad 'Alī sent 'Abd Allāh with his secretary and khazandār to Constantinople, where they were all beheaded on the 17th Dec. 1818.

V. After Ibrāhīm Pasha had left Najd in the first half of 1819, Muṣḥārī b. Sa'ūd, a brother of the executed 'Abd Allāh, succeeded in establishing himself in Dar'īya; after a short time he was captured by Husain Bey whom Muḥammad 'Alī sent against him and deported to Egypt but died on the way; the Chronicle of Rāshid al-Ḥanbalī allots the years 1233—5 (1818—1820) to his reign.

VI. Turkī b. 'Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad b. Sa'ūd, 1235—1249 (1820—1834). He had fled to Sedair during the Egyptian invasion and endeavoured to establish himself in Riyāḍ after the death of Muṣḥārī b. Sa'ūd (V), but was driven out by the Egyptians. In 1822, however, he succeeded in surprising the weak Egyptian garrison of Riyāḍ, and after fighting with varying success against the governors of the Ḥijāz, he finally agreed to pay tribute to Muḥammad 'Alī. In 1830 he seized the district of Laḥsā which had been occupied by the Turks in 1813 and subdued Bahrain. Riyāḍ became capital of the new Wahhābī kingdom in place of the destroyed Dar'īya. He was murdered in 1249 (1834) by

VII. Muṣḥārī b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muṣḥārī b. Ḥasan b. Muṣḥārī b. Sa'ūd, but the latter was attacked in Hufhuf 40 days later and slain by Faiṣal, the son of VI.

VIII. Faiṣal b. Turkī, first reign 1249—1255 (1834—8). In 1837 Khālīd, a son of Sa'ūd (III), rose against him with Egyptian help, took Dar'īya, and defeated Faiṣal at Riyāḍ. Khūrshīd Pasha, the commander of the Egyptian troops, defeated Faiṣal a second time on the 25th Ramaḍān 1254 (10th Dec. 1838) at al-Delem, took him prisoner, and deported him to Egypt.

IX. Khālīd b. Sa'ūd, 1255—7 (1839—1841). After the withdrawal of the Egyptian troops in 1840, he was driven out of Riyāḍ by 'Abd Allāh b. Thunaiyān in Dec. 1841 and retired to Dīdda, where he died in 1861.

X. 'Abd Allāh b. Thunaiyān b. Ibrāhīm b. Thunaiyān b. Sa'ūd, 1257—9 (beginning of 1842 to beg. 1843). After reigning barely a year he was besieged at Riyāḍ by Faiṣal (VIII) who had regained his liberty in 1841, and taken prisoner. He died in confinement.

XI. Faiṣal b. Turkī, second reign 1259—1282 (beg. 1843—beg. Dec. 1865). By a wise and peaceful policy he was able to establish the rule of his dynasty in Najd; in his time began the rise of the Ibn Rashīd [q. v.] of Ḍjabal Shammar, who were his allies. He was on good terms with Egypt and the Sultān. In his reign Palgrave visited the country in 1862-3, and Pelly in 1865. He died of cholera on 13th Rādjab 1282 (2nd Dec. 1865).

XII. 'Abd Allāh b. Faiṣal b. Turkī, first reign 1282—7 (beg. Dec. 1865—beg. 1871). He was dethroned by his brothers in 1287.

XIII. Sa'ūd b. Faiṣal b. Turkī, 1287—1291 (1871—4); at the beginning of his reign the Turks, summoned by the banished 'Abd Allāh, occupied Laḥsā as well as Kaṭīf and held them in spite of Sa'ūd's repeated attempts to regain them.

XIV. 'Abd Allāh b. Faiṣal b. Turkī, second reign, 1291—1301 (1874—1884). After Sa'ūd's death he regained his throne and held it against his brother Muḥammad and Sa'ūd's sons, who disputed it with him. In 1883 he was involved in war with Muḥammad b. Rashīd of Ḥā'il and was banished by his nephews, the sons of Sa'ūd, in the beginning of 1884. As a result,

XV. Muḥammad b. Sa'ūd came to the throne; his rule was of short duration: he was succeeded by his uncle

XVI. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Faiṣal, ?—1886?; he was dethroned by Muḥammad b. Rashīd, who placed on the throne

XVII. 'Abd Allāh b. Faiṣal (for the third time, 1887?—1888?). The latter died probably in 1888 and Riyāḍ then became a dependency of Ḥā'il in spite of 'Abd al-Raḥmān's repeated attempts to regain the vacant throne. In 1881 Muḥammad b. Rashīd conquered Riyāḍ and in 1892 appointed XVIII. Muḥammad, the third son of Faiṣal, Amīr of Riyāḍ. After the death of Muḥammad (date unknown) Riyāḍ seems to have been governed by Ibn Rashīd's officials.

XIX. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Faiṣal, since the beginning of 1902. With the help of Shaikh Mubārak of Kuwait, with whom his father had found a refuge, he regained Riyāḍ in March 1902 by a coup d'état and successfully held it against the Ibn Rashīd of Ḥā'il, who finally called in the Turks to help them. Nevertheless, he succeeded owing to the anarchy prevailing in Ḥā'il and with the help of the people, who were attached to the house of Sa'ūd, in restoring the supremacy of the kingdom of Riyāḍ.

IBN SHADDĀD, BAHĀ' AL-DIN ABU 'L-MAHĀSIN YŪSUF B. RĀFĪ', an Arab biographer, born at Mōsul in 539 (1145), studied there and in Baghdād and became a professor in his native town in 569 (1173). In 583 (1188) he made the pilgrimage and on his return journey went to Damascus, where he entered the service of Ṣalāh al-Dīn who made him Kāḍī 'l-Askar of Jerusalem. After Ṣalāh al-Dīn's death he went to Ḥalab in 591 (1195) and was made a kāḍī. He had a very influential and lucrative position at Ḥalab under al-Zāhir and al-'Azīz and he used it to found and amply endow madrasas. He spent the last years of his life as a private individual till his death in 632 (1174). His chief work is the biography of Ṣalāḍīn ed. by A. Schultens 1732—1755; oriental ed. Cairo 1317. IBN SHĀKIR. [See AL-KUTUBĪ.]

IBN SIDA, ABU 'L-HASAN 'ALĪ B. ISMĀ'IL (or AḤMAD or MUḤAMMAD) B. SIDA, philologist, man of letters, and logician, born at Murcia in Spain and died in Denia aged about 60 on Sunday, 4 days before the end of Rabi' II 458 = 25th March 1066.

Ibn Sida was blind and studied with his father, also blind, who was a not unimportant philologist, Abu 'l-'Alā' Ṣā'id al-Baghdādī, Abū 'Omar Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Ṭalamankī, Ṣāliḥ b. al-Ḥasan al-Baghdādī and others. He attached himself to the court of the Emir Abu 'l-Djaish Mudjahid b. 'Abd Allāh al-'Āmirī and on his death to his successor, the Emir al-Muwaffaq. As he had previously avoided the latter on account of a certain disdain he now sent him a long poem of apology.

We possess only three works by him 1. Kitāb al-Mukhaṣṣaṣ, a large dictionary, in which the words are arranged in groups according to definite classes, printed in 17 vols. Būlak 1316—1321. 2. Kit. al-Mukham wa 'l-Muḥit al-A'zam, likewise a large and excellent dictionary in which the words are alphabetically arrayed in the order of the first radical, but in this order: ʿain, hā, hā, khā, ghāin, kāf, kāf, dīm, shīn, dāl, sād, sin, zāy, ṭā, dāl, tā, zā, dhāl, thā, rā, lām, nūn, fā, bā, mim, hamsa, yā, wāw, Brit. IBN AL-SIKKĪT, ABŪ YŪSUF YAKŪB B. IṢḤĀḤ, known by the name of IBN AL-SIKKĪT, a celebrated philologist and grammarian, belonged to Dawraq, a village in al-Ahwāz (Khūzistān), but was apparently born in Baghdād. After studying with his father who was an excellent lexicologist, Abū ʿAmr Iṣḥāk b. Murār al-Shaibānī, al-Farrāʾ, al-Aṣmaʿī, Abū ʿUbaida, and others, he went to the Beduins of whom it was then thought that they had best preserved the Arabic language. Returning to Baghdād he settled as a teacher in the Bridge quarter. He then became a tutor in the family of Ibn Ṭāhir in Sāmarrā, till the Caliph al-Mutawwakil entrusted him with the education of his sons al-Muʿtazz and al-Muʿaiyad. His adherence to the cause of the ʿAlids, which he did not conceal from the Caliph, led him to a cruel death. According to some, he was trampled to death by Turkish soldiers, according to others, his tongue was torn out. He died on Radjah 5 244 = Oct. 17, 858 aged 58; others say he died in 243, 245 or 246.

We possess the following works by him: 1. Kitāb Iṣṭāḥ al-Mantiq, a philological work publ. in Cairo n. d. 2. Kitāb al-Alfāz, ed. (MOH. BEN CHENEB.)

IBN SĪNĀ, ABŪ ʿALĪ AL-ḤUṢAIN IBN ʿABD ALLĀH (Lat. AVICENNA from Hebr. AVEN SĪNĀ), was for centuries and still is in parts of the Muslim east considered the prince of all learning al-Shaikh, al-Raʾis. His biography, given by Ibn Abi ʿUsaibʿa (ed. A. Muller, ii. 2 sqq.) was compiled by his pupil Abū ʿUbaid al-Djūdžjānī from his own notes. According to it he was born in 370 = 980 at Afshana near Bukhārā. His father had moved from Balkh to Bukhārā, was appointed governor of the citadel of Kharmaitā, and had married in Afshana. After the birth of two sons he resumed his residence in Bukhārā, where the latter received their education. Up to his tenth year Ibn Sīnā had a tutor in Kūrān and Adab. He was introduced to secular learning by Ismāʿīlite propagandists who had been received in his father's house, but their speculations on the soul and the intelligence made no great impression on him at first. After studying fikḥ he was taught logic, geometry, and astronomy by Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Nātilī. The student who developed early both physically and mentally soon overtook his teacher and studied by himself physics, metaphysics and medicine. His practice of medicine soon enabled him to understand it better but metaphysics only became clear to him after studying one of al-Fārābī's works. This decided his philosophical development, al-Fārābī's metaphysical and logical speculations which originated in the Neo-Platonic commentaries and paraphrases of Aristotelian works, determined the direction of his thought. He was then 16 or 17 years of age.

At the same time the marvellous boy had the good fortune to cure the sultan of Bukhārā, Nūḥ b. Maṣṣūr, and as a result received admission to his library. Endowed with a marvellous memory and rapid power of assimilating knowledge, in a short time he gained here all the knowledge that enabled him to systematise all the learning of his time. He began to write at the age of 21; his style as a rule is clear and comprehensive.

After the death of his father — he was now 22 — Ibn Sīnā lead an unsettled life, full of work and enjoyment but also of disappointments. When at rest at the courts of Djurdžān, Raiy, Hamadḥān and Isfahān, he wrote his great works, of which we may especially mention the philosophical encyclopaedia, Kitāb al-Shifāʾ (Teheran, 1313), and his chief book on medicine, al-Kānūn fi ʿl-Ṭibb (Teherān 1284, Bulāḳ 1294); on his travels he wrote synopses of his larger works and treatises of various kinds. Sometimes his activities were scientific, sometimes political, the latter with slight success. He is important as the universal encyclopaedist, who fixed the system of learning for centuries following.

Our philosopher spent the last years of his life under the protection of ʿAlāʾ al-Dawla in Isfahān. On the latter's campaign against Hamadḥān in 428 = 1037, Ibn Sīnā fell ill on the way and died in Hamadḥān where his grave is still shown. His works were much read, annotated and translated into western languages. He lives in the popular tradition of the east as a magician, a kind of ʿPied Piperʼ.

Ibn Sīnā's doctrines which still possess great authority in theological, philosophical, and medical circles of the east in spite of their partial refutation by al-Ghazālī, cannot be fully expounded here but only briefly indicated and characterized.

In logic and epistemology he closely follows al-Fārābī. This is true also of the question of universalia which is in a way of metaphysical importance. The universal is said to exist in the mind of God and the angels (spirits of the spheres) independent of the existence of the many particulars. It emanates from the divine spirit communicated by multiple intermediation on the one side to the particular things and on the other to human intelligence in which plurality is raised to a concept of unity and universality. More Neo-Platonic than Aristotelian is the view that the concept is primarily a gift of the super-human spirit rather than a product of the abstractive faculty of the human reason.

Although he expounds it fully, Ibn Sīnā only considers logic an introductory science. Philosophy proper is either theoretical or practical: the former is divided into physics, mathematics, and metaphysics, with their applications, the latter into ethics, economics and politics. Ibn Sīnā paid little attention to the practical parts of philosophical science. The series, physics, mathematics, metaphysics, marks a gradual advance from the material to the abstract. It is true that metaphysics is generally defined as the science of all being, so that immaterial being is the problem and not the direct object of this science, but this problematic becomes the main point in philosophical expositions.

Ibn Sīnā's physics on the whole is based on Aristotelian tradition, although there are also Neo-Platonic influences here: particularly for example in the doctrine that earthly happenings are influenced by the stars, not through their warmth but through the intermediary of light. Neo-Platonic also are the speculations on the intelligence, in which results his otherwise finely developed psychology.

Ibn Sīnā had most influence through his medicine, in the west down to the XVIIth century, in the east still now. He is the Arab Galen. How far he incorporated observations of his own into this science, has still to be investigated. In theory at least he gives experience a large place and discusses the conditions, under which the healing effect of a medicine shows itself.

Ibn Sīnā's paraphrase of Aristotelian metaphysics (leaving aside his little known mathematics) besides neo-Platonic elements contains an attempt at reconciliation with Muslim theology. The dualism mind and matter (actuality and potentially), God and world, is more marked in him than in al-Fārābī, and the doctrine of the immortality of the individual souls is more clearly laid down. Matter is defined by him as possible being or merely passive possibility and creation is said to consist in granting actual existence to this possible being. Only in the Deity are being and existence one, but in all that is not the Deity, existence is an attribute of being. In theological terminology, the granting of real existence is called creation, but it is an eternal creation. God, the absolutely necessary and uniform being, is also a necessary cause, which must work from all eternity, whose effect, the world, is therefore eternal. In itself this is possible (contingent), from the point of view of its divine cause it is necessary. Ibn Sīnā distinguishes the contingency of this at once possible and necessary being from the contingency of all earthly happenings, that exist for a time, the sub-lunar world is the world of the merely possible.

The metaphysical doctrine of the soul in particular induced our philosopher to mystic reflections, some in poetical form. Great danger forced him once to escape his enemies in Sūfī guise. It may therefore have been in hours of depression, that there was a necessity for him to use the language of mysticism. It is therefore an occasional mysticism which crowns the building of his system but does not carry or support it.

IBN SĪRĪN, MUḤAMMAD, was a contemporary of Ḥasan al-Baṣrī [q. v.]. His father is said to have been a tinker of Djardjarāyā, who was carried off as a slave by Khālīd b. al-Walīd from 'Ain al-Tamr. His mother Ṣafīya was a client of Abū Bakr. Muḥammad belonged to the second generation of transmitters of tradition; his authorities were Abū Huraira [q. v.], 'Abd Allāh b. 'Omar [q. v.], Anas b. Malik [q. v.], etc. He settled in Baṣra, was noted for his ascetic piety like his sister Ḥafṣa (cf. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, viii. 355 sqq.), and was considered an authority on the interpretation of dreams. Treatises on the latter subject were therefore frequently written by later authors under his name, for example the Muntakhab al-Kalām fi Taf-sir al-Ahlām, Cairo 1868, and on the margin of Ta'thir of 'Abd al-Ghanī al-Nābulusī [q. v.], Vol. i.; the Kitāb Ta'thir al-Rū'yā, mentioned as early as Fihrist, p. 316, Cairo 1281, Lakhnau 1874, Bombay 1879, and the Kitāb al-Djawāmi', Cairo 1892. Gesells.*, xvii. 243 sqq.; Fischer, ib., lxviii. 304, Note 2, and the reference there given. Ibn Sīrīn died 110 (728).

IBN SURAIḌI, ABU 'L-'ABBĀS AḤMAD B. 'UMAR B. SURAIḌI, was, according to the Arab biographers, one of the greatest Shāfi'ī teachers of the third century. Many celebrated Shāfi'īs were his pupils, and he attained such repute that he was considered by many to be superior to all other Shāfi'ī students, even al-Muzanī. He was kādī in Shirāz and wrote treatises refuting the Zāhirīs, etc. The number of his works is placed at 400, but none of them now exists. Only a few of the titles of his works are known. He died at the age of 57 in Baghdād in 306 = 918.

IBN SURAIḌI, 'UBAID ALLĀH ABU YAḤYĀ, a Meccan singer and composer of the older Umayyad period, was the son of a Turkish slave in Mecca and a client of the Banū Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf, or of the Banu 'l-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. He began his career as a musician in the caliphate of Othmān. He is said to have been the first to introduce the Persian lute into Mecca and to have learned its use from the Persian workmen imported by Ibn al-Zubair to rebuild the Ka'ba. When at the height of his fame he was on intimate terms with 'Omar b. Abī Rab'ā [q. v.] whose love poems he set to music; but he also enjoyed a great reputation as a composer of elegies. But as his art could only be transmitted orally, it was soon forgotten after his death; in the time of the singer Djahḥa his tunes were only known to a few old people. He died in the reign of Hishām (105—125 = 724—743).

IBN AL-TĀ'ĀWĪDHĪ. [See AL-TĀ'ĀWĪDHĪ.]

IBN TAGHRIBERDĪ. [See ABU 'L-MAḤĀSĪN.]

IBN TAIMĪYA, TAKĪ AL-DĪN ABU 'L-'ABBĀS AḤMAD B. 'ABD AL-ḤALĪM B. 'ABD AL-SALĀM B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. MUḤAMMAD B. TAIMĪYA AL-ḤARĀNĪ AL-ḤANBALĪ, Arab theologian and jurist, was born on Monday 10th Rabī' I 661 = 22 January 1263 at Harrān, near Damascus. Fleeing from the exactions of the Mongols, his father had taken refuge at Damascus with all his family, in the middle of the year 667 = 1268. In the capital of Syria, the young Aḥmad devoted himself to the study of Muslim sciences and followed his father's lectures and those of Zain al-

Ḥamad b. 'Abd al-Dā'im al-Mukaddasī, Naḍīm al-Dīn b. 'Asākir, Zainab bint Makkī, etc.

He was not yet 20 when he completed his studies, and at the death of his father in 681 = 1282, he succeeded him as professor of Ḥanbali law. Each Friday he expounded the Qur'ān ex cathedra. Well versed in the Qur'ānic sciences, Ḥadīth, law, theology etc., he defended the sound tradition of the earlier Muslims by arguments which, although taken from the Qur'ān and Ḥadīth, had hitherto been unknown; but the freedom of his polemics made him many enemies among the scholars of the other orthodox schools. In 691 = 1292 he made the pilgrimage to Mecca. In Rabī' I 699 (1299) or 698 at Cairo he gave to a question sent from Ḥamā on the attributes of God, a "response" which displeased the Shāfi'ī doctors, aroused public opinion against him, and cost him his post of professor. Nevertheless he was appointed the same year to preach the Holy War against the Mongols and for this purpose went next year to Cairo. He was present in this capacity at the victory of Shaḥab, near Damascus, won over the Mongols. After having in 704 = 1305 fought against the people of Ḍjabal Kasrawān in Syria, including Ismā'īlīs, Nuṣairī's, Ḥākīmīs, who believed in the infallibility of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭalīb and considered the Companions unbelievers, neither prayed nor fasted, ate pork etc. (Marī, Kawākih, p. 165). He went in 705 = 1306-7 to Cairo along with the Shāfi'ī kādī, where, after five sittings of the council of judges and notables in the Sulṭān's audience-hall who had accused him of anthropomorphism he was condemned to be interned with his two brothers in the dungeon (djubb) of the mountain citadel; he remained there a year and a half. In Shawwāl 707 (1308), he was examined regarding a work which he had written against the Itihādīya [v. ITIHĀD] but the evidence he gave disarmed his enemies at once. Sent with the post back to Damascus, he was forced to return after one stage of the journey and for political reasons was imprisoned in the kādī's prison for a year and a half, which he spent in teaching the principles of Islām to those under confinement. But after a few days of liberty he was shut up in the fortress (burj) of Alexandria for eight months. He then returned to Cairo where, although he refused Sulṭān al-Nāṣir a fatwā allowing him to revenge himself on his enemies, he obtained the post of professor in the school founded by this prince.

In Dhū 'l-Ka'da 712 = Febr. 1312, he was authorised to accompany the army departing for Syria, and after going through Jerusalem, he re-entered Damascus after an absence of seven years and seven weeks. He then resumed his duties as professor, but in Ḍjumādā II 718 = August 1318, he was forbidden by royal edict to give *fatwā*s on the oath of repudiation (to swear to repudiate a wife for example if something is done or not done), a question on which he had allowed himself several concessions not admitted by the jurists of the other three orthodox schools (Ibn al-Wardī, Tarīkh, ii. 267) who hold that he who takes such an oath, although he is bound to fulfil his contract, is liable to an arbitrary punishment.

Refusing to obey this order he was condemned to imprisonment in the citadel of Damascus in Raddjab 720 = August 1320. After 5 months and 18 days he was set at liberty by order of the sulṭān. He resumed his old habits till his enemies learned of his fatwā regarding the visitation of tombs of saints and prophets, which he had issued in 710 = 1310, and in Shāḥān 726 = July 1326 he was by the Sultān's order interned in the citadel of Damascus. He was allotted a room, in which attended by his brother he devoted himself to writing a commentary on the Kur'ān, pamphlets against his detractors and entire volumes on the questions which had resulted in his imprisonment. But when these works came to the knowledge of his enemies, he was deprived of his books, paper and ink. This was a terrible blow to him, and although he sought relief in prayer and the recitation of the Kur'ān, he fell ill and died in twenty days in the night of Sunday—Monday 20th Dhū 'l-Ka'da 728 = 26-27 Sept. 1328. The people of Damascus who held him in great honour, gave him a splendid funeral and it was estimated that 200,000 men and 15,000 women attended his obsequies at the Ṣūfī cemetery. Ibn al-Wardī composed his funeral elegy.

Although belonging to the Ḥanbalī school, Ibn Taimiyya did not follow all its opinions blindly but considered himself a muḍṭahid fi 'l-maḍḥhab [s. MUḌṬAHID]. His biographer Marī in Kawākib (p. 184 sqq.) gives a certain number of points on which Ibn Taimiyya rejected the taḥlīd [q. v.] and even the idjma' (consensus) [q. v.]. In the majority of his works he claims to follow the letter of the Kur'ān and the Ḥadīth but he does not think it wrong to employ kiyās, reasoning by analogy (notably Maḍmū'at al-Rasā'il al-kubrā, i. 207) in his polemics; indeed he devoted a whole risāla (op. cit., ii. 217) to this method of reasoning.

A bitter enemy of innovations (bida'), he attacked the cult of saints and pilgrimages to tombs: did not the Prophet say: "One should only journey to three mosques: the sacred mosque of Mecca, that of Jerusalem, and mine" (op. cit., ii. 93). Even a journey solely undertaken to visit the tomb of the Prophet is an act of disobedience (ma'siya) (Ibn Ḥajjar al-Haitamī, Fatāwī, p. 87). On the other hand he considered a visit paid to the tomb of a Muslim, an illicit act, following the opinion of al-Shāḥibī and Ibrāhīm al-Nakha'ī, only if it necessitated a journey and if it had to take place on a fixed day. With these restrictions he considered it a traditional duty (ṣaḥf al-Dīn al-Hanafī, al-Ḥawl al-djālī, p. 119 sqq.).

An inveterate anthropomorphist Ibn Taimiyya interpreted literally all the passages in the Kur'ān and tradition referring to the Deity. He was so imbued with this belief that, according to Ibn Baṭṭūta, he said one day from the pulpit in the mosque of Damascus: "God comes down from heaven to earth, just as I am coming down now", and he came down one of the steps of the pulpit staircase. (cf. especially Maḍmū. al-Ras. al-kubrā, i. 387 sq.).

Both by word and pen he combatted all the Muslim sects, Khāridjī, Murḍjī, Rāfiḍī, Kadari, Mu'tazilī, Djahmī, Karrāmī, Ash'arī, etc. (Ris. al-Furqān, passim, in the Maḍmū'a quoted, i. p. 2). al-Ash'arī's dogmatics, he said, is only a fusion of the opinions of the Djahmīs, Nadjdjārīs, Dirārīs, etc. He particularly objected to the explanation given of predestination (qadar), the divine attributes (asmā') and judgments (aḥkām), execution of the threat (infadh al-wa'd), etc. (op. cit., i. 77, 445 sqq.).

In many cases he disagreed with the opinion of the principal jurists. For example: 1. He rejected the practice of taḥlīl by which a woman definitively divorced by triple repudiation (talāq) could be married again by her husband after having contracted a intermediate marriage with a man who had agreed to repudiate her immediately afterwards (muḥallil, he who makes permissible). 2. Repudiation pronounced during a menstrual period is void. 3. The taxes which are not prescribed by divine order are admissible and if one pays them he is freed from zakāt. 4. To hold an opinion contrary to idjma' is neither infidelity nor impiety.

He also attacked the reputation of men whose authority is recognised in Islām: 'Omar b. al-Khaṭṭāb made many mistakes, he said in the pulpit of the mosque of al-Djabal in al-Salihiyya. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib made three hundred mistakes, was another of his statements. He also violently attacked al-Ghazālī, Muḥyī 'l-Dīn Ibn 'Arabī, 'Omar b. al-Fārid and the Ṣūfīs in general. As to the first, he attacked the philosophical views laid down in his Munqidh min al-Dalāl and even in his Iḥyā', which contains a large number of apocryphal ḥadīths. "The Ṣūfīs and the Mutakallimūn are from the same valley" (min wādī' wāhid), he declared. Greek philosophy and its Muslim representatives, notably Ibn Sīnā and Ibn Sahlīn, were attacked in the great vigour by Ibn Taimiyya. "Does not philosophy lead to unbelief? Is it not for a great part the cause of the different schisms which have been produced in the bosom of Islām."

Islām being sent to replace Judaism and Christianity it naturally incited Ibn Taimiyya to attack these both religions. After accusing the Jews and Christians of changing the meaning of a certain number of words in their sacred books (see his works, Nrs 35, 40, 43 and 45 below), he wrote pamphlets against the maintenance or building of synagogues and particularly of churches (cf. N^o. 46).

Muslim scholars are not agreed on the orthodoxy of Ibn Taimiyya. Among those who consider him at the very least an heretic we may mention: Ibn Baṭṭūta, Ibn Ḥajjar al-Haitamī, Taḥī al-Dīn al-Subkī and his son 'Abd al-Wahhāb, 'Izz al-Dīn Ibn Djama'a, Abū 'Iḥiyyān al-Zāhiri al-Andalusī, etc. However, those who praise are perhaps more numerous than his detractors: his disciple Ibn Kaṭīm al-Djawziyya, al-Djāhabī, Ibn Qudāma, al-Ṣarṣarī al-Ṣūfī, Ibn al-Wardī, Ibrāhīm al-Kurānī, 'Alī al-Kāri al-Harawī, Maḥmūd al-Ālūsī, etc. This divergence of opinion on Ibn Taimiyya exists to this day: Yūsuf al-Nabhānī does not spare him in his Shawāhid al-Iḥāḳ fi 'l-Istighātha bi-Saiyid al-Aḥāḳ (Cairo 1323), which was refuted by Abū 'l-Ma'ālī al-Shāfi' al-Salāmī in his Ghāyat al-Amānī fi 'l-Radd 'ala 'l-Nabhānī (Cairo 1325?).

We know that the founder of the Wahhābīs was connected with the Ḥanbalī scholars of Damascus and it is natural he made use of their works and particularly of Ibn Taimiyya's teaching and that of his pupil Ibn Kaṭīm al-Djawziyya [q. v.]. The principles of the new doctrine are those for which the great Ḥanbalī theologian struggled all his life. [Cf. WAHHĀBIS.]

IBN AL-ṬIQTAKĀ, DJALĀL AL-DĪN (and ṢAFĪ AL-DĪN) ABŪ DJĀFAR MUḡAMMAD b. TĀJ AL-DĪN ABU 'L-ḤASAN 'ALĪ, was the descendant, in the twentieth generation, from the Caliph 'Alī, through al-Ḥasan and Ibrāḡim Ṭabāṭabā, of the family of Ramaḡān, settled at al-'Hilla. His father, representative of the 'Alids at Kūfa and at Bagh-dād, was assassinated in 680 = 1281 at the in-stigation of 'Aṭā' Malik al-Djuwainī, minister of Abāḡa. Born about 660 (1262), Ibn al-Ṭiqtakā succeeded his father in the office of representative of the 'Alids in al-'Hilla and the sacred towns of the Shi'is (Nadjaḡ and Kerbelā), married a Per-sian woman from Khorāsān, visited Marāḡha in 696 (1297) and in 701 (1301) made a journey to Mōṣul which was interrupted by the bad weather and gave him the opportunity to write the Kitāb al-Fakhrī. The date of his death is not known. His work is dedicated to the governor of Mōṣul, for the Mongol Sultān Ghāzān, Fakhr al-Dīn 'Isā, hence the title al-Fakhrī. It is divided into two parts, of which the first is a political treatise, the second a résumé of the history of Muslim dynasties, which has the special feature that each notice of a sovereign is followed by an account of his ministers. This second part is generally taken literally from Ibn al-Aṭhīr's Kāmil al-Tawārikh but also contains fragments of lost works such as the medium history and the Annals of al-Mas'ūdī; the history of the ministers comes from al-Sūlī and from Hilāl al-Ṣābi'. Although clearly Shi'ī in tendency, this book is not biased (E. Amar). The first edition of the text from the MS. of the Bibl. Nat. Paris, n^o. 2441, then the only one known, has been published by W. Ahlwardt (Gotha 1860); some fragments of it had been given by Jourdain, Fundgruben des Orients, v. 28—40; de Sacy, Chrestomathie 2, i. 1—f4; 1—92; Henzius, Fragmenta arabica, Petropoli, 1828, p. 1—104, and Freytag, Chrestomathia arabica, Bonn 1834, p. 84—96 (the dates given p. iv. are inexact) and with a French translation by Cherbonneau, Journ. As., 1846, i. 297—359, ii. 316—338; 1847, i. 134—147; the second edition which makes use of a second copy discovered in the same collection (n^o. 2442), is due to Hartwig Derenbourg (Bibliothèque de l'École des Hautes-Études, sciences philologiques et historiques, 1895). This work has been translated into French by M. Émile Amar (Archives Marocaines, t. xvi., 1910). The word ṭiḥṭā seems to be onomatopoeic (tictac) applied to fluent and verbose speech (Tādī al-ʿArūs, vi. 424, quoted by H. Derenbourg, p. 4). (CL. HUART.)

IBN ṬUFĀIL, a celebrated philosopher of the Maghrib, whose full name was ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. ʿABD AL-MALIK B. MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. ṬUFĀIL AL-ḲAISĪ. He belonged to the prominent Arab tribe of Ḳais; he was also called al-Andalūsī (the Spanian), al-Ḳurṭubī (the Cordovan or al-Ishbīlī (the Sevillan). The Christian scholastics call him Abubacer, a corruption of Abu Bakr.

Ibn Ṭufail was probably born in the first decade of xiith century A. D. in Wādī Aṣḥ, the modern Guadix, 40 miles n. w. of Granada. We know nothing of his family or his education. That he was a pupil of Ibn Bādīdja [q. v.] as is frequently stated, is incorrect, for in the introduction to his romance he says that he was not acquainted with this philosopher. He first of all practised as a physician in Granada and then became secretary to the governor of the province. In 549 (1154) he became secretary to the governor of Ceuta and Tangier, a son of ʿAbd al-Muʿmin, the founder of the Almohad dynasty. Finally he received the appointment of court physician to the Almohad Sultān Abū Yaʿqūb Yūsuf (558—558 = 1163—1184). It has also been thought that he was the latter's vizier; but it is doubtful if he really held this title, as only one text gives him it, as L. Gauthier points out. Al-Biṭrūdī [q. v.], who was his pupil, simply calls him ḳāḍī (L. Gauthier, Ibn Ṭufail, p. 6). In any case Ibn Ṭufail always had great influence with this prince, which he used to attract scholars to the court. For example he introduced the young Averroes to the Sultān. The historian ʿAbd al-Wāhid al-Marrākushī (al-Muʿdīb, ed. Dozy, p. 174 sq.; transl. by Fagnan, p. 201—210) gives a description of this meeting from Averroes' own account. On this occasion the commander of the faithful showed a remarkable intimacy in philosophical matters. It was also Ibn Ṭufail who, at the instigation of the prince, advised Averroes to annotate the works of Aristotle. This is stated by Abū Bakr Bundūd, a pupil of Ibn Ṭufail, who says further: "The commander of the faithful was exceedingly attached to him (Ibn Ṭufail). I am told that he remained whole days and nights in the palace with him without coming out".

In 578 our philosopher on account of his advanced age was succeeded by Ibn Rushd as court physician to the Caliph. But he continued to retain Abū Yaʿqūb's favour and, after the latter's death in 580, retained the friendship of his son, Abū Yūsuf Yaʿqūb. He died in 581 (1185—6) the Caliph himself attending his obsequies.

Ibn Ṭufail is the author of the celebrated philosophical novel Ḥaiy b. Yaʿqān, one of the most remarkable books of the middle ages, of which we shall have more to say below. Little else from his pen is known. He also wrote two treatises on medicine and corresponded with Averroes about the latter's medical work al-Kulliyāt. According to the astronomer al-Biṭrūdī and Ibn Rushd in his medium commentary on Aristotle's Metaphysics (Bk. xii), he is said to have had original astronomical ideas. Al-Biṭrūdī attempted to refute Ptolemy's theory of epicycles and eccentric circles and says in his preface that he is following the ideas of Ibn Ṭufail.

The philosophical romance Ḥaiy b. Yaʿqān, which was published by Pococke under the title Philosophus autodidactus, has also the sub-title Asrār al-Ḥikma al-ishrāʿiyya "the secrets of illuminative philosophy". This philosophy is really that of the Neo-Platonic scholasticism in its most mystic form. Ibn Ṭufail expounds it in a progressive fashion with great skill by taking the case of a well endowed man with an inclination for speculation who is placed alone on an island from childhood and here discovers philosophy from his sheer force of reason and step by step constructs the whole Muslim Neo-Platonic system for himself. This man as the symbol of reason bears the name Ḥaiy "the living", Ibn Yaʿqān "son of the wakeful one" i. e. God; at the end of the story Salāmān and Asāl appear who also have symbolic meaning.

The names Ḥaiy, Salāmān and Absāl or Asāl were not new in philosophic literature. Avicenna had already written a mystic allegory entitled Ḥaiy b. Yaʿqān and this work, which was well-known in the middle ages, was also imitated by Ibn Ezra; al-Djurdjānī, who has given us a list of Avicenna's writings, also ascribes to him a little work on the story of Salāmān and Absāl. We possess a version of this story by Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī, and the celebrated Persian poet Djāmī took it as the subject of one of his best known works. In these Salāmān and Absāl play different rolls but they are always symbolical and represent the human reason struggling with the world of objects. In Djāmī's poem, Salāmān is a young prince and Absāl his nurse who becomes his lover. In Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī's form of the myth Absāl is again a woman, and in another version Salāmān and Absāl are brothers. In Ibn Ṭufail's work they are a king and his vizier. One of the versions is said to have been translated from the Greek by Hunain b. Ishāḳ [q. v.] and it is in fact very probable that this whole cycle of stories has a Alexandrine origin.

The following is a synopsis of Ibn Ṭufail's romance. The book begins with an introduction which gives an interesting survey of the history of Muslim philosophy. In it Ibn Tufail praises his predecessors, notably Ibn Sīnā (Avicenna), Ibn Bādjja, and al-Ghazālī and gives as the purpose of philosophy, according to the interpretation of the mystic scholastics, the acquisition of union with God, i. e. reaching a state of happiness and clear vision where truth is no longer obtained by a process of deduction, but is recognised intuitively. Now follows the story of the novel: a boy is born without a father on a lonely island or put on the sea by a princess in a neighbouring island and carried by the current to it. The possibility of spontaneous generation by the fermentation of the earth with moderate heat is fully discussed. A gazelle feeds the boy and becomes his first teacher. When the latter grows up a little he notices that he is naked and unarmed unlike the animals he meets. He covers himself with leaves and arms himself with a stick and thus recognises the importance of his hands. He now becomes a hunter and his arts make further progress, for example he replaces the scanty covering of leaves by an eagle's skin. In the meanwhile the gazelle which had brought him up becomes old and ill; this troubles him and he seeks the cause of the evil. For this purpose he studies himself and thus becomes conscious of his senses. Thinking that the evil is in the breast, he has the idea of making an opening in the side of the animal with a sharp stone. By this experiment he becomes acquainted with the heart and lungs; but also he gets his first notion of an invisible thing that has escaped and constitutes individuality more than body. When the body of the gazelle begins to decay Haiy learns from the ravens how to bury it.

By chance he discovers fire by dead trees catching fire through the rubbing of the branches: he brings the fire to his dwelling and keeps it going. This discovery induces him to reflect on this visible fire and the animal warmth which he has noticed in living creatures; as a result he dissects other animals. His skill makes further progress; he clothes himself in skins, learns to spin wool and flax and make needles; swallows show him how to build a house, and he teaches birds of prey to hunt for him and learns to use eggs of birds and the horns of cattle etc. This part of the novel forms a very interesting and ingeniously arranged encyclopaedia.

His knowledge develops more and more and becomes philosophy. After Haiy has studied all plants and minerals and their properties and the use of limbs in animals he classifies them into kinds and species. He divides the bodies into light and heavy. He comes back again to the spirit of life, the seat of which he has traced in the heart and conceives the idea of an animal and vegetative soul. Bodies seem to him to be forms out of which come qualities. He now seeks for the elementary substances and recognises the four elements. While examining earth he grasps the idea of matter and conceives of bodies as matter of different extent. Observing that water becomes steam, he discovers the transition of one form from another and recognises that every new creation must have a cause which produces it. He thus gets the idea of a producer of forms in general. This he seeks first in nature but as all elements are subject to change and destruction, he directs his attention to the heavenly bodies.

Haiy has now reached the age of 28, that is the end of the fourth septenary. Henceforth he begins to reflect on heaven: he asks if it is infinite, which he thinks absurd; he imagines it as spherical, observes the necessity of special spheres for the moon and the planets and imagines the celestial world as a kind of vast animal. He understands the necessity for the producer of everything not being a body, the motive power of the world not being included in it, if it is eternal: continuing to develop the conception of God, he deduces his qualities from the consideration of the beings of nature. God seems to him to have free will, to be wise, knowing, merciful, etc. Coming then to his own soul he decides that it is incorruptible, from which he concludes that he ought to find his happiness in the contemplation of the perfect being. This happiness will be attained by imitating the celestial qualities, that is to say by practising ascetic morals. Haiy then devotes himself to a life of contemplation, which he leads till the end of his seventh septenary.

Then Asāl a devout follower of the revealed religion arrives from a neighbouring island; after the two men have begun to understand one another revealed religion proves to be at bottom the same as the philosophical belief attained by Haiy. Asāl recognises in the doctrine which the hermit teaches him a transcendent interpretation of his religion and of revealed religions in general. He persuades Haiy to follow him to a neighbouring island, where a king named Salāmān reigns whose friend and vizier Asāl is, in order to expound to him his philosophy. But it is not understood and, after several vain efforts, Asāl and Haiy return together to the desert island to devote themselves to pure contemplation while people continue to live by images and symbols.

This curious myth thus lays down very clearly the position of mystical philosophy with regard to religion (cf. also the article IBN RUSHD on this question). The novel of Ibn Tufail was much enjoyed by Muslims and translated into various languages. In 1349 the Jew Moses of Narbonne translated it into Hebrew with a commentary. Leibniz praised it knowing it in Pococke's edition.

IBN WAHSHĪYĀ ABU BAKR AHMAD (or MUHAMMAD), ABU AL-KATHĀNĪ or AL-NABĀHĪ is known from his numerous writings on alchemy and other secret sciences detailed in the Ikhtisāṭ. His life is not given in the Ikhtisāṭ, but lies in the second half of the second century A. H. (about the year 800). As a Nabataean he hated the Arabs and sought by his writings to show that the ancestors of the Nabataeans had possessed a high culture. Many of his writings, notably the celebrated "Nabataean agriculture" were alleged to be translations from ancient Babylonian sources. The correctness of this assertion defended by Chwolson (see Die ant. Literature der altbabylonischen Zeit aus arab. Uebersetzungen in Mémoires publ. par l'Acad. Impériale, p. viii.) was convincingly refuted by von Gutschmid and Noldeke in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesells. xv, 1 sgg., and xxix, 445 sgg. A similar forgery is his work on old alphabets, which was first made known by v. Hammer, see: Ancient alphabets and hieroglyphic characters explained, with an account of the Egyptian priests, their classes, initiation and sacrifices in the Arabic language by A. K. Abu Bakr K. Wahshīsh, London 1810. cf. de Sacy in his edition of 'Abd al Jarīf's [q. v.] work, p. 536 sgg.

I IBN AL-WARDĪ, ZAIN AL-DĪN ABŪ HAFS
OMAR B. AL-MUẒAFFAR B. 'OMAR B. ABŪ 'L-FAR-WARS MUHAMMAD AL-WARDĪ AL-ḲURASHĪ AL-BAKKĪ, AL-SHAFĪ, philologist, juriscounsult, litterateur, and poet, born at Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān in 689 = 1290 and died of the plague at Aleppo on Dhu 'l-Hijja 27, 749 = March 19,

He studied in his native town, at Ḥamā, Damascus, and Aleppo and while still young acted for a short time as deputy for the kādī Muḥammad b. al-Naḥīb (d. 745 = 1343). It seems that as a result of a dream he abandoned this office to devote himself to scientific work.

He left the following works: 1^o. Dirwān, contains poetry, maḳāmāt, epistles, discourses, poems, a letter on the plague, etc., publ. at Constantinople in 1300 (in Maḳmūlāt al-Ḍjwāʾih); 2^o. Lamiyyat or Waṣīyat or Naṣīhat al-Ikkhāwān wa-Murḥidat al-Ḳhullān, moral poem in 77 ramal verses, pr. at Cairo 1301 (with comm. of Maṣūd b. Ḥasan al-Ḳunāwī), in C. J. David, Tanzih al-ʿAlbāb etc., Mōsul 1863, and al-Shirwānī, Nafhat al-Yaman; French translations: a. Lamiyat El Quardi, poème arabe par Amor (sic) b. II. IBN AL-WARDĪ, SIRĀḌ AL-DĪN ABŪ ḤAFṢ ʿOMAR, Shāfiʿi savant died in Dhū ʿl-Ḳaʿda 861 (sept.-oct. 1457). He was author of Ḳharīdat al-ʿAdjāʾib wa-Farīdat al-Ḡharāʾib, a kind of geography and natural history of no scientific value. It seems that, in spite of the authorities quoted in the preface (al-Masʿūdī, al-Ṭūsī, Ibn al-Aṡḡir, al-Marrākushī), the Ḳharīda is only a plagiarism from Djāmī al-Funūn wa-Salwat al-Muḡtūn of Naḡm al-Dīn Aḡmad b. Ḥamdān b. Shabīb al-Ḥarrānī al-Ḥanbalī who lived in Egypt about 732 (1332). Several orientalists have translated fragments or given extracts with translation: De Guignes, Hylander, Tornberg, Mehren, etc. The Ḳharīda was publ. at Cairo in 1276, 1280, 1289, 1292, 1300, 1302, 1303, 1309.

IBN WĀSIL, DJAMĀL AL-DĪN ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. SĀLIM, an Arab historian, born in 604 (1207), was at first a teacher in Ḥamāt, was summoned to Cairo in 659 (1261) and sent to Sicily by Baibars on a mission to King Manfred. He spent a considerable time there and composed outlines of logic called al-Emperūriya which is however known in the east as Nukḡbat al-Fikar fi ʿl-Manḡik. On his return he became chief kāḡdī and professor at Ḥamāt where he died in 697 (1298). He is the author of a history of Aiyūbids called Mufarriḡdī al-Kurūb fi Akhbār Banī Aiyūb and a history of the world entitled al-Taʾrīkh (Vol. i, from the creation to the death of Ḥasan, in the British Mus., see a *Descr. IBN YA ʿISH, whose full name was MUWAFFAQ AL-DĪN ABU ʿl-BAḲĀ ʿYA ʿISH B. ALĪ B. ʿYA ʿISH AL-ḤALABĪ, also known as IBN AL-SĀNĪ, an Arab grammarian, born at Ḥalab on the 3^d Ramaḡān 553 (28 sept. 1158). After studying grammar and Ḥadīṡ in his native town and in Damascus, he intended to go to Bagḡdād to study under the grammarian Abu ʿl-Barakāt Ibn al-Anbārī [see AL-ANBĀRĪ, n^o. 1]. When in al-Mawṣil he heard of the death of this scholar, he remained some time there to study Ḥadīṡ. He then returned to Ḥalab where he devoted himself to teaching. According to Ibn Khallikān [q. v.], who heard him in 626-7, he was considered an authority in the field of Adab. Besides a Ḥaḡhiya on Ibn Djinnī's commentary on the Tuṣṡif of al-Māzinī he wrote a very full commentary on al-Zamakhsharī's al-Mufaṣṣal to whom he often opposed his own views; the latter work was edited by G. Jahn (Leipzig 1882—1886).

Ibn Ya ʿish died on 25th Djumādā I 643 (18th Oct. 1245) at Ḥalab and was buried there in the Maḡām Ibrāhīm.

IBN YAMĪN, AMĪR FAḲH AL-DĪN MAḡMŪD B. AMĪR YAMĪN AL-DĪN MUḤAMMAD, a Persian poet, was born in Faryūmad, Ḳhurāsān. His father, an eminent scholar of his time, came to Ḳhurāsān during the reign of Sulṡān Muḡammad Ḳhudā Banda (703—716 = 1304—1316) and was fortunate enough to secure the high opinion of the famous wazīr Ḳhwāḡja ʿAlā ʿal-Dīn Muḡammad. Ibn Yamīn was a disciple of Shaikh Ḥasan. He spent his life as a panegyrist to the Sarbadārs of Ḳhurāsān (737—783 = 1337—1381) and died in 745 (1344).

Among his compositions his Ḳiṡāt are well-known. They have been printed in Calcutta and also translated into German by Schlecht-Wschehd under the title of ʿIbn Yemīn Bruchstücke, Vienna, 1852 Stuttgart 1879.

IBN YŪNUS, whose full name was ABU ʿl-ḤASAN ʿALĪ B. ʿABD AL-RAḡMĀN B. AḡMAD B. YŪNUS AL-SADAFĪ AL-MISRĪ, was according to al-Battānī and Abu ʿl-Wafā, probably the greatest Arab astronomer. His father, Abū Saʿīd ʿAbd al-Raḡmān b. Aḡmad also called Ibn Yūnus, was a notable historian and traditionist, and died in Cairo in 347 (958-9). The year of our astronomer's birth is not known but he died in Cairo on the 3^d Shawwāl 399 (May 31, 1009); he is said to have been skilled in other branches of learning than astronomy and astrology and to have also been a good poet. Ibn Khallikān quotes several stories from contemporary authors of his peculiarities which were chiefly manifested in his dress. His principal work is the Ḥākīmī Tables (al-Zīḡ al-kabīr al-Ḥākīmī) begun about 380 (990) by order of the Fāḡimīd al-ʿAzīz and completed under his son al-Ḥākīm shortly before the authors' death. They are unfortunately no longer completely preserved. There are portions in Leiden, Oxford, Paris, the Escorial, Berlin and Cairo. Caussin has published and translated a few chapters from these tables in the Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque nationale, Vol. vii. p. 16—240, which contain observations of eclipses and conjunctions of planets by older astronomers and by Ibn Yūnus himself. The latter's principal object was to test and improve the observations of his predecessors and their statements on astronomical constants, in which the excellently equipped observatory on the Muḳaṭṭam rendered him valuable service. In spherical trigonometry he was the first to propound the prosthapherical formula which before the invention of logarithms was of great value to astronomers as it transformed the complicated multiplication of trigonometrical functions expressed in sexagesimal fractions into an addition. He also showed great skill in the solution of several difficult exercises in spherical astronomy with the help of orthogonal projection of the celestial sphere on the horizon and the plane of the meridian.

IBN ZAFAR, ḤUDUDJAT AL-DĪN ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ABĪ MUḤAMMAD AL-ṢAKĀLĪ, an Arab scholar, born in Sicily but brought up in Mecca (according to Suyūṭī also born there), later returned to Sicily and died in 565 (1169) at Ḥamāt. On the model of Kalīla wa-Dimna he composed the collection of tales called Sulwān al-Muḳāṭ fī 'Uḍwān al-Atbā' and dedicated to the ruler of Sicily, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad b. Abī 'l-Kāsim (pr. Cairo 1278, Tunis 1279, Beirut 1300); Turk. transl. by Kara Khallīzāde in Berlin (Pertsch, n^o. 445) and Vienna (Flügel, n^o. 382), pr. Constantinople 1285; Italian by Amari, Florence 1851, 1882; English from the Italian, London 1852. The author prepared two versions of the book, most mss., editions and translations contain the second of the year 554 (1159). Another less known work Inbā' Nudjaba' al-Abnā' deals with celebrated children (pr. Cairo 1322) and also exists in a second abbreviated edition.

For his further literary activity, see the authorities mentioned below.

IBN ZAIDŪN, ABU 'L-WALĪD AḤMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. AḤMAD B. ḠĤĀLIB B. ZAIDŪN, one of the most celebrated poets of Muslim Spain and minister to the Arab Emirs of Seville. He belonged to a famous family of the Arab tribe of Makhzūm and was born at Cordova in 394 = 1003. Left early an orphan, he was given the best teachers by his guardians and soon distinguished himself among his fellow pupils. At the age of twenty he already composed poems which made him famous.

Our poet became involved in the politics of his country through the civil wars of the Omayyad pretenders and the attempts of the Cordovans to expel from their city its Berber rulers. His origin, the position of his family, and particularly his ambition induced him to take a part. After the retreat of the Berbers he was therefore to be found in the retinue of Abū 'l-Ḥazm Ibn Dījahwar, the chief of the Cordovan oligarchy.

A violent love for the poetess Wallāda, of a princely family, brought him into conflict with a powerful rival, Ibn 'Abdūs, the minister of Abū 'l-Ḥazm Ibn Dījahwar. Ibn Zaidūn wrote threatening poems against his rival and held him up to ridicule in a letter that has become famous. The latter denounced him as having secretly worked for a restoration of the Omayyads and he was thrown into prison. From here he wrote tender poems to Wallāda and pressing appeals, in which he defended himself, to his friends. One of the latter, Abū 'l-Walīd, the son of Abū 'l-Ḥazm, succeeded in getting him out of prison. But Wallāda had finally abandoned him for Ibn 'Abdūs.

After an involuntary exile in which he unceasingly poured reproaches upon his lady friend, Ibn Zaidūn returned to Cordova on the death of Abū 'l-Ḥazm Ibn Dījahwar and threw in his lot with the latter's son and successor Abū 'l-Walīd. He served him as ambassador at several Muslim courts in the neighbourhood of Cordova. But his ambition was his downfall. For some unknown reason he was disgraced a second time, had to flee from Cordova, and lived in Denia, Badajoz, and Seville successively.

His fame as a poet, his literary abilities, and his knowledge of Muslim conditions in Spain, which he had acquired during his work as an ambassador, gained him a reception at the court of the Emir of Seville, al-Muṭaṭṭid. At first he was only secretary to this ruler but later became his first minister. After the death of al-Muṭaṭṭid, his son and successor, al-Muṭamid, retained the poet in the same office and made use of him for the conquest of Cordova which now became the capital.

But Ibn Zaidūn's popularity aroused the envy of several people at the court, particularly the poet Ibn 'Ammār [q. v.], al-Muṭamid's favourite. A riot directed against the Jews in Seville gave the plotters an opportunity of getting Ibn Zaidūn sent there, to restore order. The poet set off to the great disappointment of the Cordovans who were very proud of their fellow-citizen: his family followed him soon after. But the aged Ibn Zaidūn was seized by a fever and quickly carried off. He died on Raddjāb 15 463 (April 17-18 1071) and was interred in Seville. The news of his death caused great grief in Cordova and the whole town went into mourning.

Ibn Zaidūn was not only an excellent poet, but he was also a distinguished letter-writer and it is as such that he is particularly famous in the history of Arabic literature. His letters are not all published. The best known are:

1. The letter to Ibn 'Abdūs. It is valuable for Arabic philology in as much as it contains many allusions to facts, which are only known through it and through the commentary, which Ibn Nubāta (d. 768 = 1364) wrote on it under the title Ṣarḥ al-ʿUyūn fī Ṣarḥ Riṣālat Ibn Zaidūn (Bulāq 1278, Alexandria 1290, Cairo 1305). This letter was published by Reiske with a Latin translation (Leipzig 1755). 2. The about equally important letter to Ibn Dījāwar was published also with a Latin translation by Besthorn (Copenhagen 1889).

Extracts from Ibn Zaidūn's poems were given by Weijers (Leiden 1831), de Sacy (Fourn. As., XII, 508 sqq.), al-Maḳḳārī, Analectes; manuscript extracts and the biography of Ibn Zaidūn by Ibn Bassām (Ms. Bibl. Nat. Paris, n^o. 3322) and Imād al-Dīn al-Isfahānī (ibid. n^o. 3330).

IBN ZUHR, the patronymic of a family of Muslim scholars who flourished in Spain from the beginning of the xth to the beginning of the xiiith century A. D. They had migrated from Arabia and traced their descent from ʿAdnān [q. v.]. Their descendants gradually became scattered over the whole of the Iberian peninsula from Xatīva (Djāfn Ṣāṭība) in southeastern Spain where they first settled.

1. The ancestor of the Spanish line was called Zuh̄r. His biographer, Ibn al-Abbār, gives him the name al-Iyādī, because he traced his descent from Iyād, son of Maʿadd, son of ʿAdnān, who was regarded as one of the founders of the Arab race. According to Ibn Khallikān, Zuh̄r al-Iyādī had a son named Marwān, the father of Abū Bakr Muḥammad, who was the first to take a prominent place among his contemporaries. He was a jurist, celebrated for his learning and piety, eloquence and liberality, and died at the age of 86 at Talavera (Talbira) in 422 = 1030-1031.

2. ABŪ MARWĀN ʿABD AL-MALIK B. MUḤAMMAD B. MARWĀN B. ZUHR, son of the preceding, was a celebrated physician, who practised in Kairawān and later for a long time in Cairo. Returning to Spain he settled in Denia (Dāniya) where the ruler Muḍjahid heaped honours upon him and took him to his court. From there his reputation spread through all Spain and he is said not only to have been a clever physician but also a learned jurist. Ibn Abī Uṣaibʿa reports that he moved from Denia to Seville, where he died leaving a considerable fortune. On the other hand Ibn Khallikān assures us on reliable authority, that he died in Denia which he had never left.

3. ABU ʿL-ʿALĀʾ ZUHR B. ABĪ MARWĀN ʿABD AL-MALIK B. MUḤAMMAD B. MARWĀN, son of the preceding, is usually called Abu ʿL-ʿAlāʾ, which since the middle ages has been corrupted into the variants Aboali, Abuleli and Ebilule, and in combination with Zuh̄r the forms Abulelizor and Albuleizor. Abu ʿL-ʿAlāʾ adopted a medical career and received an excellent technical training from his father and Abu ʿL-ʿAināʾ al-Misrī. The accuracy of his diagnosis was marvellous. Among his pupils we may note the poet Abū ʿĀmir b. Yannak. The study of belles lettres and Tradition took him to Cordova where he enjoyed the instruction of the most celebrated teachers and soon won a considerable reputation, which attracted for him the attention of al-Muʿtamid, the last ʿAbbāsid ruler of Seville. The latter took him to his court, overwhelmed him with honours, and restored to him his grandfather's estate which had been confiscated. After al-Muʿtamid had been dethroned by the Almoravid Yūsuf b. Tāshfin in 484 = 1091 Abu ʿL-ʿAlāʾ found an opportunity to show his gratitude to his former patron. But he soon went over to Yūsuf b. Tāshfin, who gave him the rank of vizier, so that in Latin translations of the middle ages his name is often prefixed by the Spanish form Alguazir. According to Ibn al-Abbār, Abu ʿL-ʿAlāʾ died in Cordova. His body was taken to Seville and interred there in 525 = 1130-1131. Wüstenfeld maintains, on the authority of Ibn Abī Uṣaibʿa, that he died in Seville.

4. ABŪ MARWĀN ʿABD AL-MALIK B. ABĪ ʿL-ʿALĀʾ ZUHR, son of the preceding, usually called Abū Marwān b. Zuh̄r, corrupted by mediaeval copyists to Abhomeron Avenzoar or simply AVENZOAR, was born in Seville. The date of his birth is not given by the biographers, but a few equations place it approximately between 484 = 1091 and 487 = 1094. After receiving an excellent education in literature, law and theology, his father taught him medicine. He soon became equal in knowledge to his teacher and distinguished himself by his original experiments in therapeutics. Like his father he was at first in the service of the Almoravids and later of the Almohads. Averroes [v. IBN RUṢHD] was on intimate terms with him and considered him the greatest physician since Galen, but was not his pupil as many insist. On a journey through North Africa Avenzoar suffered many indignities from ʿAlī b. Yūsuf, the governor of Marrākush, for some unknown reason. The latter even had the doctor imprisoned and he makes some bitter allusions to the event in his works. On the death of ʿAlī b. Yūsuf b. Tāshfin and the overthrow of the Almoravids by the Almohads, Avenzoar went over to ʿAbd al-Muʿmin and had no cause to repent of his action. He was given rich presents and like his father before him received the rank of vizier. Among his works may be mentioned the Kitāb al-Ikṭisād fī Ḥikmah al-Anfus wa ʿL-Adḥiṣād, which he composed by order of and on lines laid down by the Emīr Ibrāhīm b. Yūsuf, and especially his chief work, the Kitāb al-Taisir fī ʿL-Mudāwāt wa ʿL-Tadbir, which he wrote at the instigation of Averroes. Avenzoar exercised a considerable influence on European medicine, which lasted till the end of the xviith century, owing to the translations of his books into Hebrew and Latin. From the theoretical point of view, like Galen, he championed the theory of humours, but in practice considered experience the most reliable guide. In him we find not only original views on established facts, but new contributions to knowledge also such as the description of the mediastinal tumours and the abscess on the pericardium, diseases which had not been previously mentioned. He was the first Arab physician to recommend tracheotomy. Artificial feeding either through the gullet or through the rectum was not unknown to him and he explains its working with much skill. The erroneous view taken by several writers that Avenzoar was a Jew has been challenged by Steinschneider (Arch. für pathol. Anatomie (Berlin 1873, p. 115) and Wüstenfeld (Gesch. der arab. Aerzte etc., p. 89) and finally clearly refuted by G. Colin (Avenzoar, sa vie et ses œuvres, p. 34 sqq.). After a meritorious career devoted to work and good deeds, Avenzoar died, like his father, of a malignant tumour at Seville in 557 = 1161-2. He left a son and a daughter and was buried outside the Victory Gate.

5. ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABD AL-MALIK B. ZUHR, son of the preceding, known as al-Ḥafīd, the "grandson", born in 504 = 1110-11, died in 595 = 1198-9, was likewise a distinguished physician but more of a practical man than a writer of medical works, although a treatise on diseases of the eye is attributed to him. Almost unknown in Christian Europe, he had a very high reputation among the Muslims of Spain and Africa, although this was due less to his activity as a doctor than to his deep learning in all branches of Arab literature and to his poems of great delicacy of sentiment. The Almohad Caliph Ya'qub b. Yūsuf al-Manṣūr summoned him to Africa to his court, appointed him his physician, gave him rich gifts and showed him great honour but thus aroused the jealousy of the vizier Abū Zaid 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Yūdjan. The latter had the physician and his niece who was very skilled in gynaecology and midwifery treacherously poisoned during their stay in Morocco. The Caliph preached his funeral sermon and he was buried in the garden of the Emīrs. He left a son and a daughter.

6. ABŪ MUḤAMMAD 'ABD ALLĀH B. AL-ḤAFĪD, son of the preceding, born in 577 = 1181-2 at Seville, was an excellent physician, trained in the school of his father. The Almohad caliphs al-Manṣūr and al-Nāṣir successively took him to their court and heaped honours upon him. Like his father he was also murdered by poisoning and died in 602 = 1205-6, being only 25, on a journey to Marrākush at Ribāṭ al-Faṭḥ (Rabat). His body which was buried there was later exhumed, taken to Seville and buried there outside the Victory Gate along with the remains of his ancestors. He left two sons Abū Marwān 'Abd al-Malik and Abū 'l-ʿAlā Muḥammad, both of whom lived in Seville; the younger was also a physician and had a sound knowledge of the works of Galen.

IBRĀHĪM, the Biblical Abraham, was, according to the Qur'ān (Sūra vi. 74), the son of Āzar, which name is apparently to be derived from Elazar, the name of his servant (cf. S. Fraenkel in Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgent. Gesellsch., lvi. 72). The Biblical names of Abraham's ancestors: Tārikh b. Nāḥūr b. Sārūgh b. Arghū b. Fāligh b. 'Ābir b. Shālīkh b. Kainān b. Arfakhshad b. Sām b. Nūḥ are found in al-Tha'labi, p. 44, and Ibn al-Athir, i. 67, and this genealogy agrees perfectly with Genesis xi. 10-21 and Chronicles, i. 12-27. Kainān alone seems to have been inserted from Genesis v. 12. Born in 1263 after the Deluge or 3337 after the creation (al-Tha'labi, l. c.) — a combination of the dates given in Genesis v. 3-10 and xi. 10-25 however gives the birth of Abraham 291 years after Noah or 1918 after the creation — he at once undertook his mission of preaching a holy war against King Namrūd. His mother 'Uṣhā had to take refuge in a cave at Kūthā where he first saw the light of the world (al-Tha'labi, l. c.; Tabari, i. 256; Zamakhsharī, i. 172; Baidāwī, i. 133; Ibn al-Athir, i. 96; Yāqūt, s. v. Kūthā; al-Bakrī, p. 485; al-Mukaddasī, p. 86; Bābā bāthirā, 91; Maimonides, Dalālat al-Ḥā'irīn, chap. 29). For bad dreams had induced Namrūd to have pregnant women watched and their newborn sons killed. The slayers visited Ibrāhīm's mother to examine her before the pains of childbirth had come upon her. They examined her body on the right and the child hid on the left; they sought it on the left and it fled to the right so that they had to depart after doing nothing (al-Kisā'i, p. 115-120). The story in the Sefer Hayyūshār (section Noah) that Terach was ordered to hand over Abraham to be executed and in his place delivered up the son of a handmaid has its origin in Muslim tradition. While still quite a child (Talmud Nedārim, 32) an experience gave him the knowledge of Allāh which is mentioned in the Qur'ān vi. 75-79. When he had left the cave and was coming to his father's house, night fell upon him and he saw a star. He said: "That is my Lord!" But when it set, he said: "I do not love those that set!" He saw the moon rise and said: "That is my Lord!" As it also disappeared, he said: "Verily, if my Lord does not guide me, I shall become one of those that go astray!" When he saw the sun rise, he said: "That is my Lord, he is the greatest!" When it also set, he said: "O my people, I am free from your idolatry. See, I turn my face to the creator of Heaven and Earth!" etc. We also find these stories in the Hebrew book, Shebeṭ Mūsar (Smyrna 1729), p. 109-111, and Sefer Hayyūshār (Noah). Of the various legends (in al-Tha'labi, p. 45-47, and al-Kisā'i, p. 125-140) which describe Ibrāhīm's wars with Namrūd and which also found a way into later Rabbinical literature (Jellinek, Bēth Hammidr., i. 25-34; Sefer Hayyūshār [Noah]; Sefer Eliyāhū zōfā, ch. 25, and Pirḳe de R. El., ch. 32) the following may find a place here, which are based on Qur'ān xxi. 59-67, as well as on Genesis Rabbā, section 38. One day his fellow tribesmen left the town to offer sacrifices to their Gods. Ibrāhīm pretended to be unwell and remained in the town. Armed with an axe he went to the temple of the gods where tables were laid with food. He said: "Why do ye not eat?" and struck off the hand of one, the foot of another and the head of a third. He put the axe into the hand of the biggest and placed various dishes before him. When the people of the town saw this on their return, they accused Ibrāhīm of the deed. He answered: "Verily, the biggest of them has done this; ask them, if they can speak". They said: "You surely know that they cannot speak". He said: "Do you, disregarding Allāh, worship what can neither help nor harm you? Fie upon you and your worship of idols!" Thrown into a limekiln as a punishment he left it unharmed after being three or seven days in it (al-Tha'labī and al-Kisā'i, l. c.). Namrud was completely defeated and Ibrāhīm with his followers set out for Palestine being now called Khalīl Allāh, "the friend of God" (al-Kisā'i and al-Tha'labī following Jesaias, xli. 8, Shabbāth 137, Menāḥōth 53). In Egypt his beautiful wife Sāra was taken before Fir'awn (Genesis, xii. 10—20, al-Tha'labī, p. 44, Ṭabarī, i. 225, Ibn al-Athīr, i. 72). She said he was her brother so that he might not be slain on her account. She was not telling a lie, as he was her brother in the faith. When Fir'awn tried to touch her, his hand was paralyzed and restored again when he had sent her back. In Sabā' in Palestine he dug a well of fresh clear water. Being molested by the inhabitants he had to go away whereupon the water dried up (Genesis, xxi. 25—30, al-Tha'labī and Ibn al-Athīr, l. c.). The people hurried after him to beg him to return. But he refused and gave them seven goats (Genesis xvi. 30) with instruction to place them at the well; the water would flow then again. When a menstruating woman had drunk from the well, the water entirely disappeared. In his 120th year he circumcised himself (al-Tha'labī, p. 59). He died at the age of 175 and was buried in the family tomb at Khābrūn [cf. the article AL-KHALIL]. On the day of the Resurrection, he will take his place at the left hand of Allāh and guide the pious into Paradise (al-Tha'labī, p. 60; cf. Genesis R., Par. 48).

Sprenger (Leben und Lehre des Moḥammad, ii. 276 sqq.) was the first to point out that the figure of Ibrāhīm in the Qur'ān has a history before he finally develops into the founder of the Ka'ba. This thesis was further expounded by Snouck Hurgronje as follows (Het Mekkaansche Feest, p. 20 sqq.). In the older revelations (Sūra li. 24 sqq.; xv. 5 sqq., xxxvii. 81 sqq., vi. 74 sqq., xix. 42 sqq., xxi. 52 sqq., xxix. 15 sqq.) he is an apostle of God, who has to admonish his people, like other prophets. Ismā'il is not yet connected with him. At the same time it is emphasised that Allāh had not yet sent an admonisher to the Arabs (xxxii. 2; xxxiv. 43; xxxvi. 5); Ibrāhīm never appears as the founder of the Ka'ba and the first Muslim.

In the Medina Sūras on the other hand, Ibrāhīm is called Ḥanīf [q. v.] Muslim, the founder of the "religion of Ibrāhīm", whose palladium, the Ka'ba, he founded along with Ismā'il (ii. 118 sqq., iii. 60, 84 etc.). This alteration is explained as follows. Muḥammad had appealed to the Jews in Mecca; in Medina it was soon shown that they seceded from him. Muḥammad was therefore forced to find other support; he therefore ingeniously created the new role of the patriarch; he could now be independent of contemporary Judaism by appealing to the Judaism of Ibrāhīm, which was also the precursor of Islām. When Mecca again became prominent in his ideas, Ibrāhīm at the same time became the founder of the sanctuary there.

(A. J. WENSINCK.)

IBRĀHĪM B. 'ABD ALLĀH, son of the great-grandson of 'Alī, 'Abd Allāh b. al-Ḥasan [q. v.] was brought up with his brother Muḥammad [q. v.] in the expectation of one day becoming Caliph. They therefore considered the 'Abbāsids as usurpers and with all the more justice as before the fall of the Omayyads, Abū Dja'far is said to have paid homage to Muḥammad as Caliph. The brothers were therefore no little danger to him and as Caliph he sent officers to search for them, so that they were forced to wander from place to place with many dangerous adventures in order to remain concealed. Muḥammad finally went to Medina and Ibrāhīm to Baṣra to advertise their cause. Although the project was by no means ripe, Muḥammad found himself forced to appear openly as a rebel in Ramaḍān 145 (Nov. 762), which, in spite of his misgivings forced his brother to do the same in Baṣra. His situation was at first not unfavourable. Sentiment in the 'Irāk was strongly 'Alid and Abū Dja'far, who was staying in the unruly town of Kūfa, had sent the most of his troops to Medina or elsewhere. Ibrāhīm seized the state treasury and equipped armies, which captured al-Ahwāz, Fāris and Wāsiṭ for him. But soon there arrived the depressing news that his brother in Medina had fallen on Ramaḍān 14 = 6 Dec. 762, which resulted in the Caliph now being able to send his general 'Isā b. Mūsā from Medina to the 'Irāk. Ibrāhīm, who had left Baṣra to attack Kūfa, met 'Isā at Bākhāmra south of Kūfa on the 15th Dhu 'l-Ka'da (14 Febr. 763). Ibrāhīm's troops were at first victorious, but then the battle turned and he himself fell, struck by an arrow. His head was cut off and sent to the Caliph. Ibrāhīm, who was 48 years old, was better fitted for the dangers of an adventurous wandering life than for the task of conducting a revolution. Like many of his family he was personally brave, but his character was weak, he had a dreamy and somewhat sensual nature and above all had inherited the fatal faculty of the 'Alids for rejecting good advice and following an unreflecting and ruinous course.

IBRĀHĪM B. ADHĀM B. MANŠÜR B. YAZĪD B. DJĀBIR (ABŪ IŠHĀQ) AL-TAMĪMĪ AL-IDJILĪ, the famous ascetic, was a native of Balkh. The dates given for his death, which is said to have occurred while he was taking part in a naval expedition against the Greeks (Ḥilyat al-Awliyā', Leiden MS., i. 188), range between 160 and 166 (776—783). Some verses composed on this occasion by the poet Muḥammad b. Kunāsa of Kūfa (died 207 = 822), whose mother was the sister of Ibrāhīm b. Adham, praise his asceticism, the nobility of his character, and his personal courage and refer to "the Western tomb", al-djadath al-gharbi, in which he was buried (Aghāni, xii. 113, 7 sqq.). According to one account, he was buried at Sūkīn, a fortress in Rūm (Yāqūt, edited by Wüstenfeld, iii. 196, 1.). The fact that after his conversion to Šūfism he migrated to Syria, where he worked and lived by his labour until his death, is established by many anecdotes related in the Hilyat al-Awliyā. He is reported to have said to 'Abd Allāh b. Mubārak, who asked him why he had left Khurāsān: "I find no joy in life except in Syria, where I flee with my religion from peak to peak and from hill to hill, and those who see me think I am a madman or a camel-driver".

The Šūfī legend of Ibrāhīm b. Adham is evidently modelled upon the story of Buddha (see Goldziher, A Buddhismus hatāva az Iszlama, summarised by T. Duka in Journ. Roy. Asiat. Soc., 1904, p. 132 sqq.). Here Ibrāhīm appears as a prince of Balkh who, while hunting, was warned by an unseen voice that he was not created for the purpose of chasing hares or foxes: whereupon he dismounted, clad himself in the woollen garment of one of his father's shepherds, to whom he gave his horse and all that he had with him, and "abandoned the path of worldly pomp for the path of asceticism and piety" (for other accounts of his conversion, see Goldziher, loc. cit., and Fawā'id al-Wafayāt, Bulāḳ, 1283 A. H., i. 3, 19 sqq.). The anecdotes and sayings of Ibrāhīm, as recorded by his earliest biographers, show that he was essentially an ascetic and quietist of a practical type; we look in vain for any traces of the speculative mysticism which developed in the following century. Like many of the ancient Šūfīs, he took every precaution that his food should be 'lawful' in the religious sense of the word. He did not carry the doctrine of taawakkul to the point of refusing to earn his livelihood; on the contrary, he supported himself by gardening, reaping, grinding wheat, etc. While he approved of begging, in so far as it incites men to give alms and thereby increases their chance of salvation, he condemned it as a means of livelihood. He said: "There are two kinds of begging. A man may beg at people's doors, or he may say, 'I frequent the mosque and pray and fast and worship God and accept whatever is given me'. This is the worse of the two kinds. Such a person is an importunate beggar". A trait far more characteristic of Indian and Syrian than of Moslem asceticism appears in the story that one of the three occasions on which Ibrāhīm felt joy was when he looked at the fur garment that he was wearing, and could not distinguish the fur from the lice, because there were so many of the latter (al-Kušairī, Risāla, Cairo, 1318 A. H., p. 83, l. 25 sqq.). As examples of his mystical sayings the following may be quoted: "Poverty is a treasure which God keeps in heaven and does not bestow except on those whom He loves"; "this is the sign of him that knows God, that his chief care is goodness and devotion, and his words are mostly words of praise and glorification". In answer to Abū Yazīd al-Djūdhamī, who declared that Paradise is the utmost that devotees hope to obtain from God hereafter, Ibrāhīm said: "By God, I deem that the greatest matter, as they consider it, is that God should not withdraw from them His gracious countenance". Although such ideas mark the transition from asceticism to mysticism, we cannot regard Ibrāhīm b. Adham as one who had crossed the border-line. The keynotes of his religion are renunciation of the world and self-mortification, and in these he finds the fullest peace and joy, not in the ecstasy of contemplation or the enthusiasm of self-abandonment. [An Arabic romance of Ibrāhīm b. Adham, translated from the Turkish of Darwish Ḥasan al-Rūmī and abridged by Aḥmad b. Yūsuf Sinān al-Ḳarāmānī al-Dimašqī (d. 1019 = 1611) is preserved in Berlin (cf. Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., ii. 301; survey of contents in Ahlwardt's Verz.), and a manuscript having the title Siya al-Sulṭān Ibrāhīm b. Adham ta'rif al-Darwish Ḥasan al-Rūmī, is mentioned by Ḥabīb al-Zaiyāt, Ḥazā'in al-Kutub fī Dimashḳ wa-Dawāhihā, p. 39, N^o. 130, 2. A versified Kiṣṣa Walī Allāh Adham is contained in Ms. Gotha. Pertsch, Die arab. Hss., n^o. 2752. A romance of Ibrāhīm has been versified in Hindūstānī by Abū 'l-Ḥasan (Husain) Muḥammad, under the title Gulzār-i Ibrāhīm (Mirat 1865, lith. Lucknow 1869, Cawnpore 1877; cf. J. F. Blumhardt, Cat. of Hindustani printed Books Brit. Mus., p. 216; Garcin de Tassy, *Hist. de la Litt. hindoue et hindoustanie*², i. 101) There exists also a Malay romance of which the following summary is given by Dr. J. J. de Hollander, Handledning by de Boetsening der Maleische Taal- en Letterkunde, 6th ed. Breda, 1893, p. 348: "After a prosperous reign of some years. Sulṭān Ibrāhīm, prince of 'Irāḳ, decides to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca and charges the most trustworthy of his viziers with the government in his absence. Having arrived in Kūfa, Ibrāhīm becomes acquainted with Sittī Šālīḥa, the daughter of Šarīf Ḥasan. He marries her, but soon leaves her in order to continue his journey to Mecca. Twenty years later, his son Muḥammad Ṭāhir, who was born from this marriage, betakes himself to Mecca to visit his father, who had been uninterruptedly engaged in devotion in the holy mosque. Sulṭān Ibrāhīm, being determined to renounce the world for ever, gives his son his seal-ring, by which he may vindicate his right to the throne of 'Irāḳ, and bids him go to that country. The son obeys and is acknowledged by the vizier as the legitimate ruler. He does not desire, however, to take the reins of government and abdicates in favour of the vizier, on whom he bestows all the treasures left by his father." The Malay romance exists in two recensions, a shorter (ed. with Dutch transl. by P. P. Roorda van Eysinga, Levensschets van Sulthan Ibrahiem, vorst van Eirakh, Batavia 1822; ed. of text with notes by D. IBRĀHĪM B. AL-AḠHLAB (184—196 = 800—812), founder of the semi-independent dynasty of the Aghlabids, was the son of al-Aḡhlab b. Sālim b. 'Ikāl al-Tamīmī, a native of Marw al-Rūdh who had governed Ifrīkiya after the departure of Ibn al-Ash'ath in 148 A. H. and had been killed two years later in the revolt of al-Ḥasan b. Ḥarb. In 179 (795) Ibrāhīm received the governorship of the Zāb. When the mistakes of the governor Ibn Muḳātil had roused the people against him, who finally (183 = 799) expelled him, Ibrāhīm came to his assistance, and after the restoration of order, cleverly made himself so indispensable to Hārūn al-Rashīd, that the Caliph, on Harthama's advice, left him in possession of Ifrīkiya on payment of a tribute of 40,000 dinars while Egypt was freed from the subvention of 100,000 dinars which she paid annually to Ifrīkiya. This change took place on the 12th Djumādā II 184 (July 9, 800). Following Spain and the Maghrib, Ifrīkiya in turn separated from the 'Abbāsīd empire. Egypt was soon to follow. The new prince began by building a new capital to replace Kairawān: this was al-'Abbāsiya [q. v.]. A year later he received ambassadors from Charlemagne (801), who brought from Africa a number of relics: this was presumably not the only object of their journey and it may be supposed that Charlemagne was seeking an ally against the Omayyads in Spain. In 186 (802) Ibrāhīm suppressed a rising of Ḥamdīs al-Kaisr in Tūnis; in 189 (805) another broke out in Tripoli, the inhabitants of which drove out the Aghlahī governor Sufyān b. al-Maḍā'. Hardly had this been terminated by an amnesty 194 (809) when a more serious rising took place in the very centre of Ifrīkiya. 'Imrān b. Mudjālid al-Rabī' (Dhahabī has Makhliḍ instead of Mudjālid, v. Fagnan. Ibn al-Aṭhīr, Annales, p. 158, note 1. p. 173) and Kuraish b. al-Tūmāsi were at its head. Ibrāhīm was besieged for a whole year in al-'Abbāsiya. Money sent by the Caliph bought off the rebels and 'Imrān retired to the Zāb, where he lived till the death of Ibrāhīm without being disturbed. Tiipoli was again the scene of a revolt in 196 (811) in the course of which it was pillaged by the Khālidī Hwāra. The ruler sent his son 'Abd Allāh at the head of an army and after an initial success the latter was forced to fight against the Khālidīs from Tāhert (Tagdelt) led by their Rustamī imām 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. 'Abd al-Rahmān [q. v.]. The town was besieged by them, and the assault had begun when the news came that Ibrāhīm had died on the 21st Shawwāl 196 (5th July 812) at al-Kairawān. 'Abd Allāh, eager to seize his heritage, made peace with 'Abd al-Wahhāb by abandoning to him the whole of Tripolitania, except Tripoli, as well as the districts of Kāstiliya and Djerba.

IBRĀHĪM, ABŪ IŠHĀK B. AḤMAD, ninth ruler of the Aghlabid dynasty. Although he had solemnly sworn to his dying brother Muḥammad Abu 'l-Ḥarānik to recognise his nephew Abū 'Ikāl, he seized the throne on the death of his brother on the 6th Djumādā I 261 (= 16th February 875) with the acquiescence of the people of al-Kairawān. He was famous for two very different reasons: his taste for building and his ferocious cruelty. He built the Kaṣr al-Bahr at al-Raḳḳāda and placed along the coast a number of towers (maḥāris) to signal nocturnal attacks, which has led other buildings to be wrongly attributed to him. He waged wars notably against al-'Abbās, who rebelling against his father Aḥmad, the first Tūlūnid of Egypt, marched against Ifrīkiya in 266 = 879-880. After defeating the Aghlabid troops under Muḥammad b. Qurhub at the Wādī Wardasā, he was held up at first by the siege of Labda and later by that of Tiipoli. The Abādis [q. v.] of the Djebel Nefūsa, led by their chief Ilyās b. Manṣūr came to the help of the town and destroyed the army of al-'Abbās who fled to Egypt (267 = 880-1). A rising of the Berbers of Ifrīkiya cost the life of Muhammad b. Qurhub (Dhu 'l-Iḥdijja 268 = June-July 882) and was only suppressed by Ibrāhīm's son Abu 'l-'Abbās. The latter having completely defeated the Nefūsa was sent to Sicily where Syracuse had been taken in 878. Ibrāhīm followed later and in Radjab 289 = July—August 902 by order of the 'Abbāsīd Caliph, seized Taormina, then crossing the strait began to besiege Cosenza. He died of dysentery during the siege on the 19th Dhu 'l-Ḳa'da 289 = 26th October 902. His body was taken to Kairawān where he was buried on the 1st Muḥarram 290 = 5th December 902. All the historians unanimously accuse him of cruelty and quote numerous examples e. g. the massacre of the mawlas, the inhabitants of al-Raḡḡāda and of Tūnis, the murder of his physicians, ministers, pages, his son Abu 'l-Aghlab, and his eight brothers, on account of imaginary fears. He created a bodyguard of negroes whom alone he trusted and who were the instruments of his cruelties.

IBRĀHĪM B. AḤMAD, the youngest son of Aḥmad I, was born on the 12th Shawwāl 1024 (4th November 1615) and succeeded his brother Murād IV (died 16th Shawwāl 1049 = 8th Febr. 1640) on the throne as 19th Ottoman sultān. His brothers, 'Osmān II and Murād IV reigning before him, had kept him in strict seclusion, and he grew up in awe of their machinations and in continual fear of a violent death, being on the whole of a delicate constitution; all this contrived to render him absolutely incapable of governing a great empire. During the first years of his reign he therefore left the government in the hands of the able vizier Kara Muṣṭafā. By the treaty of Szon (15th March 1642) the latter renewed the peace with Austria; he reconquered the fortress of Azow, and among some minor disturbances he suppressed the dangerous insurrection of Nasūḥ-pashazāde (1642). At the same time he kept a watchful eye on the financial system of the country, and he greatly improved it by reforming the currency, by limitation of the expenses of the State, and by a strict collection of the taxes. After four years he fell a victim to court intrigue, and was beheaded on 21st Dhu 'l-Ḳa'da 1053 (31st January 1644). The Sultān, who indulged in the delights of harem-life as none of his predecessors or successors ever did, was now absolutely under the sway of his odalisks and favourites, particularly the notorious Djinnidji Khōdja Husain, an ignorant softa from Zafrañborlu, who cured Ibrāhīm from his fits of faintness by his magic charms and thereby won unlimited control over him. The State revenues were dissipated to humour the foolish whims of Ibrāhīm and his court; offices and ranks were given by favour and for gifts i. e. in proportion to the bribes given. The result was an uninterrupted series of changes of grand viziers and ministers.

Such was the wretched state of affairs when on the 28th Sept. 1644 Maltese corsairs seized a convoy of pilgrims near Karpathos; among them was the Sultān's Kyslar Aghāsī Sumbul with his riches and his retinue, bound for Cairo whither he had been banished. The Sultān resolved to be revenged, and as his favourite, the silḥdār Yūsuf, had already been inciting him against Venice, the Sultān undertook an expedition against the Republic. Without a declaration of war a strong Turkish army was landed in Crete in June 1645 and took Canea. In the following year Rethymno fell, while the siege of the strong fortress of Candia continued to drag on. In the meanwhile the Turks were repeatedly defeated in Dalmatia. All this roused the Sultān's wrath to such an extent, that he resolved to massacre all Christians, at least all Franks residing in his empire. This plan failed on account of the opposition of the Shāikh al-Islām. This war, which was to last for 25 years, weakened the country to utter exhaustion, nevertheless it did not allow the Sultān to interfere with his dissolute conduct. The immense sums spent for the foolish luxury of the Serai rose disproportionately; in order to provide the necessary money, new heavy taxes were imposed on the people. At last the public rage broke forth openly; at the head of the insurrection were the Janissaries assisted by the 'ulamā and the Shāikh al-Islām. The Grand Vizier Hezārpāre Aḥmad Pasha fell the first victim of the infuriated mob. Next came the Sultān Ibrāhīm who was dethroned on the 18th Radjab 1058 (8th August 1648) and confined in the Çinlikoshk, where he was strangled a few days later by the executioner. When Ibrāhīm ascended the throne, he was the only living male offspring of the house of 'Osmān; on his death he left four sons and thus became the founder of the dynasty again, the only thing history places to his credit.

IBRĀHĪM B. AL-MAHḌĪ, an 'Abbāsīd, born at the end of 162 = July 779. His father was the Caliph Muḥammad al-Mahḍī, his mother a negress named Shikla. When the Caliph al-Ma'mūn, who was then in Marw, appointed the 'Alid 'Alī al-Riḍā successor on the end of Ramaḍān = 24th March 817, disturbances broke out among the followers of the 'Abbāsids. At the end of Dhu 'l-Hijjā = July 817 they proclaimed al-Ma'mūn's uncle, Ibrāhīm, Caliph under the name al-Mubārak ("the blessed") and on the 5th Muḥarram 202 = 24th July 817 he publicly appeared in the mosque as ruler. His reign did not last long however. The troops soon rebelled because he could not pay them. After order had been restored in the army, Hira and Kūfa fell into his hands, but on the 26th Raddj = 7th February 818 his generals Sa'īd b. Sādjūr and 'Isā b. Muḥammad were defeated at Wāsiṭ by the governor Ḥasan b. Sahl and had to retire to Baghdād. 'Isā soon went over openly to the enemy and the other generals began secretly to work for al-Ma'mūn. When the latter came back from Khorāsān, Ibrāhīm could no longer hold out, but had to abandon his claims in the middle of Dhu 'l-Hijjā 203 = June 819 and on the 15th Šafar 204 = 11th August 819 al-Ma'mūn entered Baghdād. Ibrāhīm henceforth lived in retirement. He was arrested in 210 = 825-826 but pardoned in a few days. He died in Ramaḍān 224 = July 839 at Surr-man-ra'a. He had not the gifts of a ruler; but he was a man of refined tastes who was especially interested in music and singing.

IBRĀHĪM B. MUḤAMMAD B. 'ALĪ B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. AL-'ABBĀS, brother of the two first 'Abbāsid Sultāns, al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, born in 82 = 701-702. His father who, according to the usual statement, died in Dhu 'l-Kāda 125 = August 743, was the founder of the secret 'Abbāsid propaganda and shortly before his death made over to his son Ibrāhīm his right to the 'Abbāsid imāmate. In the following year the latter sent Bukair b. Māhān [q. v.] to Marw where he informed the Khorāsānians of Muḥammad's death and proclaimed Ibrāhīm his successor. After Bukair's death in 127 = 744-745 Abū Salama al-Khallāl [q. v.] was appointed plenipotentiary of the 'Abbāsids. Like his father, Ibrāhīm himself lived in al-Ḥumaima, a place south of the Dead Sea, while Kūfa was the centre from which the invisible threads of the energetic propaganda ran. Khorāsān was a particularly fertile soil for the activities of the 'Abbāsid emissaries, and in 128 = 745-746 Abū Muslim was appointed leader of the secret agitation there. In the following summer the long prepared rebellion broke out and on the 1st Shawwāl 129 = 15th June 747 the first 'Abbāsid service was held in Sīkadhāndj. In the same year the Caliph Marwān II had Ibrāhīm captured and brought to Harrān, his then residence, and the latter soon afterwards died there. According to some, Ibrāhīm was put to death by order of Marwān.

IBRĀHĪM BEY, one of the most prominent of the last Mamlūk amirs of Egypt. He was brought to Egypt as a Circassian slave and passed into the possession of Muḥammad Abu 'l-Dhahab, the favourite Mamlūk of 'Alī Bey [q. v.]. He manumitted him and married him to his sister (cf. al-Djabartī's statement under the 4th Rabi' II 1216). In 1182 (1767-8) he was appointed one of the 24 Beys, in 1186 as Amīr al-Ḥadjdj he led the Egyptian pilgrim caravan to Mecca. On his return the dispute between Muḥammad Abu 'l-Dhahab and 'Alī Bey had already been decided in favour of the latter. During the few years of his brother-in-law's rule his prestige must have increased considerably. In 1187 he was Defterdār, in 1189 he remained in Cairo as Shaikh al-Bilād while Muḥammad undertook his expedition to Syria and when the latter died at 'Akkā, Ibrāhīm as his nearest relative inherited his great wealth and influence. With Murād Bey, another Amīr of Muḥammad's house, whom the troops had chosen as their leader, he shared the rule over Egypt so that he took over the civil rule as Shaikh al-Balad i. e. Lord Mayor of Cairo, while Murād took control of the army. The predominating position of these two is clear from the number of their Mamlūks. According to Volney, who was in Egypt in 1783, Ibrāhīm Bey had 600 Mamlūks, Murād Bey 400, the other Beys between 50 and 200. That this division of power lasted was mainly due to Ibrāhīm Bey's complaisance and love of peace. He probably dealt warily with the impulsive Murād Bey so that serious differences only arose between them in 1198-9. Their joint rule lasted till the French expedition to Egypt in 1213 (1798), although it was twice interrupted when Ismā'īl Bey, the most influential amīr of the house of 'Alī Bey, came into power. In 1191 he was only able to hold out for six months; in 1201 (1786) he was again made Shaikh al-Bilād by the Turkish Kapudan (Kapitan) Paṣha (Admiral) Ḥasan. The object of the latter's expedition to Egypt was to strengthen the power of the Porte, the influence of which had sunk to a minimum since the days of Ibrāhīm Katkhūda and particularly under 'Alī Bey. Although Ibrāhīm and Murād in whom Ḥasan Paṣha saw the chief culprits, had to leave Cairo they did not dare openly to challenge the authority of the Porte's envoy, the latter however had to leave the rule of Egypt in the hands of the Mamlūks. Even after the departure of Ḥasan Bey, which was hastened by political complications with Russia, Ismā'īl was able to retain his post of Shaikh al-Bilād. Not till a pestilence had carried him and other amirs off in 1206, could Ibrāhīm and Murād return to Cairo. They received an amnesty from the Porte and henceforth again shared the government of the country.

During the French advance of 1213 (1798) Ibrāhīm awaited the result of the fighting at the Pyramid on the east bank of the Nile at Shubra and Bulāk. He ordered the ships at Bulāk to be burned to make it difficult for the French to cross the Nile. After the battles of Khānkā and Šalīhiya he succeeded in escaping with his train to Syria. He stayed at Ghazza and retired to the north-east when Bonaparte sent an expedition to Palestine.

Ibrāhīm returned to Egypt with the army of the Grand Vizier Yūsuf Pasha. When during the battle of Heliopolis Naṣṣīh Pasha, whom the Porte had designated governor of Egypt, entered Cairo in Febr. 1800, Ibrāhīm Bey was with him. He left the town with the Turkish troops when the French were able to hold it. He declined any rapprochement with the French, while Muṣāḍ Bey made peace with them and received the governorship of Upper Egypt. He died soon afterwards of the plague in April 1801.

After the final evacuation of the town by the French in June 1801, Ibrāhīm Bey was again appointed Shaikh al-Bilād by the Grand Vizier but soon afterwards on the 20th Oct. 1801 he was thrown into prison with the rest of the Mamlūk amirs by order of the Porte, who thought it a favourable opportunity to dispose of the Mamlūks. The English forced the imprisoned Mamlūks to be handed over to them. Ibrāhīm Bey thus succeeded in reaching Upper Egypt. From there in the next few years he repeatedly negotiated with the Turkish governor of Egypt, Khusrū Pasha. When the latter was driven from Egypt and the Albanian chief Tāhīr, who had been appointed kā'immaḳām, was murdered, Muḥammad 'Alī summoned Ibrāhīm Bey to Cairo in April 1801 and gave him the office of Shaikh al-Bilād to prevent Aḥmad Pasha, the governor designate of Djidda, who was passing through Egypt at the time, establishing himself there. The influence of the aged Ibrāhīm Bey was certainly not very great and he must have seen that he was only a tool in the hands of Muḥammad 'Alī. In any case, he developed a great distrust of Muḥammad 'Alī: he probably saw through the latter's policy of making use of the Mamlūks when it suited himself, while he took care not to allow them to become too powerful and continually sowed feuds among them. The coup de main which Muḥammad 'Alī attempted on 13th March 1804 against Ibrāhīm and 'Oḥmān al-Bardīst, Muṣāḍ's successor, failed in as much as both escaped imprisonment by flight. Ibrāhīm never again returned to Cairo. During the massacre of the Mamlūks on the 18-19th August 1805 he was at Turā with his son Marzūk and inflicted heavy losses on Muḥammad 'Alī's troops there. His attempt to unite the Mamlūks in a common struggle with Muḥammad 'Alī failed owing to the dissensions among them and Muḥammad's skill in always winning to his side several of the most influential Mamlūks by flattery and gifts of honorary offices. Ibrāhīm declined an attempt at reconciliation made by Muḥammad 'Alī in 1809, saying that too much blood had flowed between them. Owing to Ibrāhīm's efforts the Mamlūks in 1810 were a power against which Muḥammad 'Alī did not dare to take open action. But by stratagem he succeeded in bringing most of the Mamlūks to Cairo. Here honours were heaped upon them and thus they were secured. They thus fell into the trap prepared by Muḥammad 'Alī and were massacred in the citadel on March 1st 1811. Ibrāhīm Bey with a few others had not trusted Muḥammad 'Alī's assurances. He remained on the southern frontier of Egypt and thus was saved. He spent the last years of his life at Dongola with the remnants of the Mamlūks "in the land of slaves where they sowed millet and lived on it and clothed themselves in robes such as slave dealers wore there, till finally in Rabi' I 1231 the news of his death reached 'airo" (Djibarti). His widow who in 1811 had been allowed to seek and bury her son Marzūk's body, received permission from Muḥammad 'Alī to bring Ibrāhīm's body to Cairo. It arrived there in Ramaḍān 1232.

IBRĀHĪM ḤAKKĪ PASHA is the grandson of a Georgian who adopted Islām and the son of Mehmed Remzi, who at the time of his death was president of the Constantinople city council (Şehir Emāneti Meḍlisi). Ibrāhīm Ḥakkī Pasha was born on the 22nd Shawwāl 1279 = 12th April 1863 in the Beshik-Tash quarter of Constantinople. From 1877 to 1882 he attended the school of administration (Milkiye Mektebi) in Constantinople and took particular advantage of the lectures of Mehmed Muṣāḍ Bey (History), Pörtükal Mikā'il Efendi (Finance) and Oḥannes Efendi (economics). Passing out of the school with brilliant success he became a translator in the Yıldız palace of Sulṭān 'Abd al-Ḥamīd from 1883 to 1894. Through his literary and scholarly activities he obtained the professorship of history at the age of 23 in the Constantinople school of Law (Ḥukūk Mektebi) to which soon afterwards in 1888 the chair of constitutional law (ḥukūk-i siyāsiye) was added. Ibrāhīm Ḥakkī's professorship of history lapsed in 1891. In place of it he was given in 1892 the chair of administrative law in addition to that of constitutional law, and in 1893 that of international law in the school of Law also. Being a brilliant orator and a comparatively bold critic he was able to attract students to himself — and what was more important — also to interest even non-Turks and non-Muslims in the welfare of the Ottoman empire. On Sept. 12 1894, Ibrāhīm Ḥakkī was appointed legal adviser (ḥukūk mushāwiry) to the Sublime Porte. The Grand Vizier Mehmed Sa'īd Pasha in 1901 or 1902 wished to appoint him undersecretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, but the Sulṭān did not approve. Ḥakkī Bey distinguished himself in the office of legal adviser which he held till 1908, and acted as member or president of over 30 commissions which discussed the conclusion of treaties or disputed questions of law. Being a linguist he was twice sent on mission to Europe by 'Abd al-Ḥamīd and twice to America. When the Turkish constitution was re-established in 1908 Ibrāhīm Ḥakkī at once plunged into the political arena, championed extremely modern views, and took the bold step, during the short time he held the portfolio of Minister of Education in 1908, of confining in office only a hundred of the five hundred officials in the central offices. Soon afterwards he held the Ministry of the Interior for a short time. His great zeal horrified the backward officials so that he soon had to retire from these offices. He still continued to hold his legal chairs till in 1909 he was appointed ambassador to Rome. Having already for a long time been the candidate of the Committee of Union and Progress on Jan. 12 (Schulthess, Jan. 10) 1910 he was given the rank of vizier and then promoted Grand Vizier. Ibrāhīm HaḲḲī proved himself in the field of politics a distinguished orator, a man of striking, well-marked convictions which, however, lacked the elasticity usual and perhaps necessary in the east. In alliance with the Young Turks he held the office of Grand Vizier for 21 months and was a rigorous opponent of the Albanian and other separatist claims. As a result of Italy's declaration of war against the Porte, Ibrāhīm HaḲḲī's cabinet resigned on Sept. 29 1911.

The greatest political success of his vizirate was the successful operations of the Ottoman Chief of Staff, Ahmed 'Izzet Paşa, against the rebels in the Yemen and in the conclusion of a peace with the leader of the Yemeni Zaidis, Imām Yahyā, which was based on religious, legal, and in part financial independence. This treaty was also Ahmed 'Izzet Paşa's work.

Ibrāhīm HaḲḲī Paşa's literary works deal mainly with jurisprudence and to a secondary degree with history. His first book was an "Introduction to International Law" (Medkhat-i Huḳūḳ-i Dūvel) and was soon followed by an "History of International Law" (Tārīkh-i Huḳūḳ-i beine 'd-Dūvel, Istanbul, 1303 = 1885-6). Both are concise, unexceptionable and reliable compendiums for university teaching. In conjunction with Mehmed 'Azmi he published about the same time a "Brief History of Islām" (Mukhtesar Islām Tārīkhī) which was intended for the lower classes of intermediate schools (Rüşdiyye); (6th edition Istanbul 1321 = 1903-4). Likewise with Mehmed 'Azmi he prepared a "Brief Ottoman History" and then from his own pen a "Small Ottoman History" for elementary schools (Istanbul 1301 = 1890). Soon afterwards he published his most important historical work a "General History" in three volumes from the earliest times to the xvth century (Tārīkh-i 'umūmī, Istanbul, 1305 and 1306 = 1887-8 and 1888-9). There is nothing original in any of these works.

Ibrāhīm HaḲḲī's most valuable work is his Administrative Law (Huḳūḳ-i İdāre, 1st ed. Istanbul 1308 = 1890-91; 2nd 1312 = 1894-95) in two volumes octavo. The work deals for the first time with a many branched and complicated subject in a masterly fashion. It still far surpasses all similar compilations. He has also prepared a number of unpublished works, which his activities devoted for twenty years to education and politics have not yet allowed him to publish.

IBRĀHİM KHĀN the ancestor of the Ibrāhīm Khānzāde family, was the son of the Princess İsmīkhan, a daughter of Selim II, by her first marriage with the famous Grand Vizier Mehmed Şokolli Paşa who was murdered on the 19 Şa'bān 987 (11th Oct. 1579). Tradition relates that he was concealed by his father at his birth, so that he was the first who broke the laws of the house of 'Osman, according to which all sons of the Princesses, were to be put to death at birth (Hadīqat al-Djewāmi', ii. 38; cp. article DAMĀD), likewise contrary to the rule Ahmad I appointed him to the post of governor general in different provinces, as a reward, it is said, for the fact that he had presented the Sulṭān with the property on which the palace of his father Mehmed Şokolli Paşa stood, for the building of the great Mosque on the Atmeidan (Barozzi-Berchet, Relazione etc., p. 181). Ibrāhīm died some time after 1031 (1621-1622) and his descendants, the Ibrāhīm Khānzāde, formed like the Ewrenösāde and the TürkKhānzāde, one of the historic families of the Empire, although they never filled important positions in the State 'Alī Beg, a grandson of Ibrāhīm Khān, is one of the few mentioned repeatedly by the chronicists (Rāshid, Tārīkh, ii. 220 vs.; Knolles-Rycaut, The Turkish History, p. 263; v. Hammer, Geschichte d. Osm. Reiches, ix. 563, N^o. 2696; de la Motraye, Voyages, i. 326). About the decline of the 17th century, the legend arose that the Ibrāhīm Khānzāde would succeed to the throne, in case the Osman dynasty should die out, and that for this reason the Sulṭāns were bound to respect the life of all members of this family (de la Motraye, o. c., i. 261 sq.; von den Driesch, Historische Nachricht, etc., p. 137; Kantemir, Ottoman History, p. 107; Lüdeke, *Beschreibung des Turk. They had their residence in the suburb of Eiyūb on the Golden Horn, and are still the mutewellī (administrators) of the Ewḳāf of their ancestor Mehmed Şokolli Paşa (Djewdet, Tārīkh, vi. 198).

IBRĀHİM LODĪ. The last king of India of the house of Lodī [s. SIKANDAR LODĪ], came to the throne in 1510, and reigned at Agra for about 16 years when he was overthrown and slain by Bābur at Pānīpat in April 1526. He was violent and tyrannical, and alienated his nobles who called in Bābur to help them. He fell, however, fighting bravely, along with thousands of his Afghāns. Like Harold, he had trouble with his own family, before being called upon to encounter a foreign foe. His father's brother, 'Alā' al-Dīn, attempted to dispossess him, first from Guḍjarāt, and afterwards from Kābul where he got help from Bābur. But Ibrāhīm defeated his uncle who gained nothing by joining the Moghals.

IBRĀHĪM AL-MAWṢILĪ, IBRĀHĪM E. MĀHĀN E. BAHMĀN, also known as al-Nadīm al-Mawṣilī, one of the most celebrated musicians of Arab history, a man of Persian origin, was born at Kūfa in 125 (742) and died at Baghād in 188 (804). He studied music under Persian masters, and attained an extraordinary degree of skill both in singing and in the use of the lute. He stood in high favour at the 'Abbāsīd court, under al-Mahdī, al-Hādī, and (especially) al-Rashīd. His son Ishāk, a very learned and accomplished man, followed in his footsteps, being a musician and composer of fully equal ability, and a prominent figure in Baghād under al-Rashīd, al-Ma'mūn, and al-Mu'taṣim. Marvellous tales were told of Ibrāhīm's proficiency, e. g. Aghānī V, 41, 1—15. Two anecdotes concerning him which became very widely popular are the story of the singing-girls whose house he entered in a basket (Aghānī v. 41 sq.; al-Ghuzūlī, Maṣāliḥ al-budūr, i. 243 sq.; Ibn Badīn, ed. Dozy, p. 272 sq.; and the 1001 Nights [in the two latter cases, told of Ishāk]), and the story of his visit from the Devil, who taught him a wonderful melody (Aghānī, v. 36 sq.; al-Ghuzūlī, i. 241 sq.; and the 1001 Nights [told of Ishāk]).

IBRĀHĪM MUTEFERRIKA (i. e. court-steward), the first Turkish printer, was born about 1674 in Kolozsvár (Hungary) of Calvinistic parents and, at the age of 18, was taken prisoner by Turkish troops, making a raid into Hungary. He was brought to Constantinople and sold as a slave. He then turned Musalman and occupied himself with theological studies. In 1715

Muhammed, in 1721 on his embassy to the court of Louis XV, Ibrāhīm established the first printing office in Constantinople, after having received the authorisation for this by an imperial ferman in the middle of Dhū'l-Ḥiǧ̃da 1139 (beginning of July 1727). The maiden work of this printing office was the dictionary of Wānkūlī published in two folio volumes on the 1st Redjeb 1141 (31st January 1729). In October 1734 the work in the office was dropped, but resumed after an interval of six years, and then stopped altogether in 1155 (1742), the office having in all printed 17 books, the incunabula of Islamic typography, (see exact list in v. Hammer, op. cit., vii. 583 sq.).

IBRĀHĪM PASHA, the eldest son of Muḥammad 'Alī, a great general and viceroy of Egypt. He is often described as Muḥammad 'Alī's adopted son. Amina, a relative of his foster-father, the governor (Ḥorbadji) of Kavalla in Macedonia, was certainly a divorced woman when Muḥammad 'Alī married her in 1787 and it cannot be denied that Muḥammad 'Alī had a certain preference for his son Tūsūn, who died on the 28th September 1816. There was certainly also a rivalry between Ibrāhīm and Tūsūn (cf. Mengin, ii. 81 sq.). The year of his birth is decisive, however, and this is usually given as 1789, but occasionally also as 1786. In the older authorities like Djabartī and Mengin we find no hint that he was not Muḥammad 'Alī's real son. Djabartī in 1228 (1813) describes him as a young man of not yet twenty, which certitle of Pasha by the Porte in recognition of the services of his father (Mengin, ii. 48).

In 1816 his father sent him to Arabia to make a final reckoning with the Wahhābis, against whom his brother Tūsūn had been fighting successfully from 1811 to 1813 and, from 1813 to 1815, Muḥammad 'Alī himself also. After three years of heavy fighting the goal was achieved, Darīya [q. v.], the capital of the Wahhābis, was destroyed and 'Abd Allāh b. al Sa'ūd with his relatives sent as prisoners to Egypt (cf. above p. 416). In December 1819 Ibrāhīm made his triumphal entry into Cairo. Soon afterwards the Sultān appointed him governor of Djidda. In the meanwhile, Muḥammad 'Alī had entrusted his third son Ismā'il with the conquest of the Sudān. The discovery of the ancient goldfields and the capture of slaves, who were to form the basis of Muḥammad 'Alī's new army, were the two objects of this expedition. Ibrāhīm Pasha was sent thither with reinforcements to support his brother. He seems to have gone there with very adventurous plans (Vaulabelle, ii. 231), but a severe attack of dysentery forced him to return hurriedly to Cairo in the beginning of 1822.

In the years following Ibrāhīm Pasha took part in training the new troops (niḡām djedid), who were entrusted to the French Colonel Sèves. Ibrāhīm was an industrious pupil of the European instructor and the latter under the name of Sulaimān Pasha became his main support in his later campaigns.

When Muḥammad 'Alī was appointed to conquer the Morea by a firman of the Sultān, dated 16th January 1824, he sent his son Ibrāhīm Pasha there with an excellent army trained on the European model and ample supplies of war material at the end of July 1824. The capture of Navarino and his entry into Tripolitsa practically brought the Peninsula under his sway. February to April 1826 were devoted to the siege and capture of Missolonghi. After the intervention of the Great Powers had been declined by the Porte and Muḥammad 'Alī, the naval battle of Navarino took place in October 1827, in which the greater part of the Egyptian-Turkish fleet was destroyed by the allied fleets of England, France, and Russia and finally Muḥammad 'Alī was forced by the English Admiral Codrington, who appeared before Alexandria, to recall his son and the Egyptian troops. He arrived in Alexandria on the 10th October 1828.

In 1831 Ibrāhīm Pasha was entrusted by this father with the conduct of the Syrian campaign. On Nov. 1 he arrived with his troops in Palestine. After a six months' siege he obtained the surrender of 'Akkā on the 27th May 1832, after previously gaining victories over the Pasha of Tripolis and Aleppo on the plain of Zerā south of Homs. Ibrāhīm's march, that followed, through Syria and Asia Minor was made possible by his victories over the advance guard of the Turkish army under Muḥammad Pasha of Aleppo at Homs on the 8/9th July, over the main Turkish army under Ḥusain Pasha in the pass of Beilān at Alexandretta (29th July), and over the Turkish army under Rashīd Pasha at Ḳonia (21st December). These victories showed the superiority of the Egyptian army, Ibrāhīm's skill as a leader, and the cleverness of his policy of uniting the various groups in Syria under one banner by the cry of "liberation from the Turkish yoke" and in winning to his side the influential Amīr Bāshā of the Libanon. Ibrāhīm Pasha advanced as far as Kutahiya. There on May 1833, not without pressure from the European powers, a treaty was signed between the Porte and Muḥammad 'Alī by which Syria and Adana were ceded to the latter. Ibrāhīm received from the Sultān the title of m. ḥ. ḥ. of Adana. His father appointed him to administer the new territory: a difficult task in view of the varied nature of the population of the country. Although the latter were agreed in their disinclination for Turkish rule, the strict régime introduced by Ibrāhīm did not suit them either. Risings everywhere were the result and Ibrāhīm was partially successful in suppressing them by the general confiscation of arms. The recruiting of the population for military service resulted in the emigration of great numbers to Asia Minor and Mesopotamia, and the commandeering of beasts of burden for military purposes resulted in the decline of agriculture and trade. Although there was quiet generally in the land, the discontent was very great.

When the war was begun again by Turkey in 1839, Ibrāhīm on the 24th June won a decisive victory over the Turkish army under Iḥāfīz Pasha at Nizib west of Biredjik and the Turkish fleet under Fewzī Pasha went over to Muḥammad 'Alī. The intervention of the powers, whose negotiations led to the Treaty of London on the 15th July 1840 (the so-called Quadruple Alliance), altered the situation of things. Hoping for support from the French, Muḥammad 'Alī declined the demand that he should evacuate Syria as far as 'Akkā and confine himself to the hereditary pashalik of Egypt. No support was given him and the coasts of Syria and Egypt were blockaded by the allied fleets. Ibrāhīm was in a difficult position between their landing army and the hostile people of the Libanon who were stirred up against him. After the capture of 'Akkā by the English Admiral Napier and the latter's negotiations with Muḥammad 'Alī in Alexandria, the latter was forced to agree to the evacuation of Syria on 22nd Nov. 1840. On the 29th Dec. Ibrāhīm left Damascus with his troops and returned to Egypt via Ghazza, sending a portion of the army home via Aḳaba under Sulaimān Pasha.

In the years that followed Ibrāhīm Pasha was mainly concerned with the administration of Egypt. His interest in and knowledge of agriculture is praised. He was several times in Europe, sometimes visiting watering places to improve his health. He was well received in Europe. At the beginning of 1848 he was in Malta when his father's condition made it necessary for him to return. In June 1848 he became practically ruler of the country. In September he was formally granted the pashalik of the country by the Sultān in Constantinople and on the 19th Nov. 1848 he died in his sixtieth year. He was buried in the family mausoleum near the Imām al-Shāfi'. Of his sons he was survived by Aḥmad (born 1825), Ismā'il (afterwards Khedive born 1827), and Muṣṭafā (born 1832).

A portrait of Ibrāhīm Pasha is given in Cadavène and Barraut, Histoire, etc.; descriptions of his personality in Clot Bey, i. p. xxxiii sqq.; Paton, ii. 55.

IBRĀHĪM PASHA, the celebrated Grand Vizier and favourite of Solīmān the Magnificent, was born towards the end of the xvth century of Christian parents in Parga in Epirus. Kidnapped in his early youth and brought as a slave to the Imperial Serai during Selīm I's reign, he was afterwards attached to the retinue of the heir apparent Solīmān as long as this latter resided as Governor General of Şārūkhān in Magnesia. His social and musical abilities soon won him the young Crown Prince's special favour, and on his accession to the throne in September 1520 Solīmān make him his khāṣṣ oda başı (master of the inner chamber) and ic shāhīndjilar aghası (high court falconer). On the 13th Sha'bān 929 (27th June 1523) the Sultān made him Grand Vizier, at the same time granting him the governorship of Roumelia. During the thirteen years that Ibrāhīm filled these high offices he enjoyed more than any other ever did before or after him the Sultān's entire confidence. The Sultān actually shared his monarchical powers with him and gave him the insignia of the sultanate. He granted him the ṭabl-khāne (military music) and the half of the Imperial bodyguard, as well as the title serasker sultān (sultān commander-in-chief). Ibrāhīm's wedding (18th Raddjāb 930 = 23th May 1524), which the Sultān himself attended, was celebrated with such pomp and splendour that it has become famous in the annals of Ottoman history. Shortly afterwards, owing to the troubles caused by the insurrection of Khā'in Aḥmad Pasha, Ibrāhīm went to Egypt (October 1524—September 1525) to re-establish order and to re-organise the administration of the country. In 1526 he conducted Solīmān's first campaign against the Magyars, (Battle of Mohacs 28th August, capitulation of Ofen-Pest 10th Sept. 1526). Three years later, he undertook a second expedition against Hungary together with the Sultān. Ibrāhīm captured Ofen which had been reoccupied by king Ferdinand, and led his army up to Vienna. (Siege of Vienna 27th Sept. till 15th October 1529). In 1532, Ibrāhīm invaded Hungary for the third time, but he did not advance further than Gunz, and had to be content with pillaging the country. The armistice concluded with Ferdinand in the spring of the following year was chiefly due to Ibrāhīm's influence. The decision of the dispute between the king and John Zappolya regarding the Hungarian possessions was placed in the hands of the Sultān, who again entrusted the Venetian Luigi Gritti, Ibrāhīm's favourite, with the delimitation of the frontiers. In his Persian expedition 1533-1534 Ibrāhīm was not less successful. After occupying the most important frontier fortresses he entered Tabriz on the 13th July 1534 and took Baghdād on the 31st December of the same year. He returned to Constantinople in January 1536 and there contracted in February the first French capitulation with the ambassador of Francis I. Ibrāhīm had now reached the zenith of his power and splendour when he was suddenly executed, without apparent reason, by the Sultān's orders in the Imperial Serai, where he was spending the evening (22th Ramaḍān 942 = 15th March 1536). His body was disposed off with equal secrecy and buried in the vicinity of the Okmeidān near the Arsenal, where his alleged grave was in later days shown in the Derwish monastery Djawf. It was said that Ibrāhīm in his ambition coveted the throne for himself and that decisive proofs were in the hands of the Sultān; the fact is that the Sultān had done everything to nourish and encourage such thoughts in his confidant; and it seems that Ibrāhīm's attitude fully justified current rumours. A series of legends and sayings soon gathered around the figure of the makbūl wa-makṭūl Ibrāhīm Pasha, some of which are still current among the common people. A number of mosques, 'imāreṭ's [q. v.], bridges, and aqueducts in the capital and in the provinces, chiefly in Roumelia, likewise perpetuate his name and preserve his fame to the present day. His splendid Serai near the Atmeidān was later occupied by the Imperial pages, and his gardens along the Golden Horn remained for centuries famous among the sights of the town.

IBRĀHİM PASHA (DAMAD), the favourite of Murâd III and three times Grand Vizier under his successor Muḥammad III. He was of Slavonic origin, born in the neighbourhood of Ragusa; brought up in the Serai he was appointed silh-dâr (armour-bearer of the Sultân) in 982 (1574-1575); from Dhu 'l-Ka'da 987—Djûmâdâ II 989 (End of Dec. 1579—July 1587) he was Aghâ of the Janissaries and then Beylerbey of Roumelia; he was sent to Egypt in 990, where he remained for a year and a half as Governor General. In the beginning of 1585 he conducted the campaign against the Druzes of the Lebanon, and thence he returned to Constantinople in September of the same year. His wedding with the Princess 'Ā'isha, daughter of Murâd III, was celebrated there in Djûmâdâ II 994 (end of May 1586). At the end of Radjab 995 (end of June 1587) he was made Kapudan Pasha, and held this office for about a year. Shortly after the accession of Muḥammad III he was appointed kā'immaḥām (deputy) of the Grand Vizier on the 17th Sha'bân 1003 (16th April 1595) and a year later on the 5th Sha'bân 1004 (4th April 1596) Grand Vizier. He accompanied the Sultân on his march against Eger (Erlau, Turk. Egri), was dismissed on the day after the battle of Keresztes, on the 27th October, but restored to office for a second time after six weeks, at the end of Rabi' II 1005 (middle of Dec. 1596). The whims of the Sultân prevented him completing a year in office; he was dismissed on the 23rd Rabi' I 1006 (3rd Nov. 1597), but recalled to his functions for a third time on the 9th Djûmâdâ II 1007 (7th Jan. 1599) and entrusted with the continuation of the war against Hungary. In two expeditions 1008-1009 (1599-1600) he succeeded in stopping the advance of the Austrian army. In Rabi' II 1009 (end of October 1600) he captured the stronghold of Nagy Kanizsa, and as a reward the Sultân granted him the grand vizierate for life. Ibrâhîm then returned to Belgrade, where he died on the 9th Muḥarram 1010 (10th July 1601).

IBRĀHİM PASHA (KARA), Grand Vizier under Muḥammad IV, born in 1030 (1620-21) at Khandawerk near Bâibûrd, began his career as a lewend, then became k' agha (page) of the outlawed Finârî Muḥṣafâ Pasha (v. Hammer, Osm. Gesch., vi. 26), and afterwards served several Pashas including Kara Muḥṣafâ as kara (steward or agent), till on the 2nd Rabi' II 1081 (8th August 1671) he received the office of kazuk mirâ and a few weeks later that of kazuk mirâ 2nd rank, and chief marshal. From the 17th Ramiḥân 1088 till the 12th Rabi' I 1090 (13th Nov. 1677—23rd April 1679) he was kapudan paşa, and at the same time administered for a period the grand vizierate as kā'immaḥām and again after Muḥṣafâ II 1094 (June 1683) during Kara Muḥṣafâ's campaign against Vienna. After the execution of the latter on the 6th Muḥarram 1095 (25th Dec. 1683) he was appointed Grand Vizier, deposed on the 22nd Muḥarram 1097 (19th Dec. 1685), banished to Rhodes on the 18th March 1686, and was strangled there a few months later in Sha'bân 1097 (June-July 1686).

IBRAHİM PASHA. [See CENDERELLI.]

IBRĀHİM PASHA (DAMAD), favourite of Aḥmad III, and his Grand Vizier for many years. He was the son of a certain 'Alî Aghâ and was born about 1678 in Mûshkara near Ürgüb, in the district of Nigde. At the age of 20 he came to the capital, where he obtained a position as ha'wâdjî (confectioner) in the Ancient Serai. His remarkable intelligence and his ability in writing must have attracted notice, for soon afterwards he was appointed clerk of the imperial harem, and it was in this office that he had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with Prince Aḥmad, afterwards Sultân. After Aḥmad's accession to the throne in 1115 (1703) Ibrâhîm occupied for six years the post of secretary of the chief eunuch and, although the Sultân was willing to grant him the rank of a vizier, Ibrâhîm contented himself with very modest offices as muhâsibedjî (accountant) and defterdâr (treasurer) in the provinces. In 1128 (1715) he accompanied Damad 'Alî Pasha on his campaign against Hungary, and after the defeat at Peterwardein (15th August 1715) he was entrusted with the difficult task of informing the Sultân of the fatal course of the war. As a result of this mission he again came into personal contact with the Sultân who appointed him Master of the Horse and the following year, on the 16th Shawwâl 1128 (3rd October 1716) deputy Grand Vizier. After his marriage with the 13 year old Princess Fâtma, daughter of the Sultân (6th Rabi' I 1129 = 18th February 1717), he was definitively appointed Grand Vizier (8th Djûmâdâ II 1130 = 9th May 1718). The next 12 years during which Ibrâhîm held this post, form one of the most brilliant periods in the history of Turkey. Both Aḥmad III and his prime minister were men of high culture and refined taste and emulated one another in the patronage of art and learning. Numerous kiosks were built on the Bosphorus and in the Valley of the Sweet Waters (K'âd-Khâne), which was transformed into a sort of Versailles. Religious and secular ceremonies were celebrated with extraordinary pomp and were increased in number. At the same time public institutions, libraries, e. g. the Serai library and the library of Ibrāhīm Pasha, were founded. The art of painting was also introduced in this era by Ibrāhīm Muteferrika [q. v.]. In his foreign policy, the Grand Vizier's object was to maintain friendly relations with the European Powers. After entering upon office he put an end to the conflicts with Austria by the treaty of Passarowitz (1718). A treaty with Peter the Great (1724) regulated the question of the boundary provinces of Persia: by virtue of this the Turkish forces occupied in the following years all the most important cities: Hamadhān, Gendje, Erivān, Tebriz, etc., definitive possession of which was assured to Turkey by the treaty of Hamadhān (3rd Oct. 1727). In 1730 however Lahmāskūh Khān invaded the newly acquired province, which resulted in a declaration of war by the Porte, though the Sulṭān agreed to this much against his will. This was the cause of a serious insurrection (September 1730), as the people were discontented with Ibrāhīm Pasha's government, and resulted in the fall of both Sulṭān Aḥmad and his favourite vizier. Aḥmad would not deliver Ibrāhīm alive into the hands of the infuriated mob and had him strangled in the Serai on the 30th Sept. 1730; on the following day he himself was forced to abdicate.

IBTIDĀ' (inf. viliṭh form of BD' "to begin"), "beginning", "inchoative". Technical term of Arabic grammar denoting the use of a word as subject (muḫtada') of a nominal sentence. "The muḫtada' is any noun (or its equivalent) with which a beginning is made in order that a statement may be built upon it; the muḫtada' and what is built upon it are both in the nominative case; and there can be no ibtidā' unless something built upon it follows" (Sibawaihi, i. 239 3-4). Thus e. g. in Muḥammad ^{raṣūlu} l-lāhi, a beginning is made with Muḥammad, which is nominative by ibtidā', and raṣūlu l-lāhi is "built upon it" to complete the sense. The distinctive feature of the nominal sentence is that the relation of its subject and predicate is one of logical necessity, and is unexpressed by any finite verb. In general the subject precedes the predicate, and hence any sentence in which the subject comes first is regarded as nominal; cf. Zaid ^{māta}, where Zaid is muḫtada', while in the sentence māta Zaid ^{Zaid} is fa'il or agent (see esp. Wright, o. c., ii. 251 A. B.). The precedence of the subject is however not universal, and cases are quoted in which inversion (taḫḍim) occurs, usually for emphasis or other special reason.

In Prosody, ibtidā' is a name for the first foot of the second hemistich of a line. [Cf. MUBTADA', MUSNAD.]

İÇ-İL (r.) "interior" the name of a province in Asia Minor, which at present forms an independent sanjak of the wilāyet of 'Adana [q. v.] with Selefke as its chief town; 17 villages belong directly to it and also the nāhiya of Ayāsh with 13 villages and Bulādjalu with 6 villages. This sanjak comprises four qaḍā, viz. Ermenek [q. v.] Mūt, Gulnār (Kilindria, Celendaris) and Anamūr (q. v., capital Çoraḳ). The population consists of 45,000 Turks, 15,500 Kurds, 14,000 Greeks, 12,000 gypsies, and 8780 of various origins. The hills are covered with woods (221,818 hectares). The products are wood for building purposes and cereals. The Kurd nomads in the hills prepare butter and cheese, which they sell in the villages. Industry is carpet weaving. The district is covered with Roman remains. It is the ancient Tracheotis (Cilicia Petraea). The principal rivers are the Lamas-şu (Lamus) and the Gok-şu [q. v.]. The source of the Tatlı-şu near the sea is probably identical with the Nöç of the Greeks.

The origin of the name İÇ-il may be traced to the Saldjuks for considered from their capital Konia this district really seems to be in the interior of the mountains. It has also been suggested that the name is a corruption of Cilicia.

İÇ-OĞHLAN (T.), "servant of the interior" (i. e. of the palace) was the name given in Turkey to the pages in the Sulṭān's service. They were Christian children who had either been taken in war or given as tribute in Europe; Asia was free from this levy. The most beautiful and best developed were chosen and those who seemed to be best endowed and to possess the best character. Their names, ages, and country of origin were noted and then they were converted to Islām and circumcised. They received a strict training for fourteen years under the supervision of eunuchs. They were divided into four chambers. The first comprised 400 pages, who received a daily pay of four to five aspers, learned to read and write and were instructed in religion and good behaviour. After six years they entered the second chamber, where the same education was continued and they also received a military training, which included riding and fencing. The third chamber contained 200 pages, who learned to sew, embroider, and make arrows, also to play musical instruments, and perform the duties of a chamberlain. The fourth chamber consisted of only forty picked pupils who received a daily pay of nine to ten aspers; they were dressed in satin, brocade, and cloth of gold and acted as chamberlains, as keepers of the wardrobes, major-domos, first barber, first manicurist, secretaries, and inspectors. The highest offices in the empire were open to the latter class and their occupants were chosen from them. From the end of the xviith century therefore the tribute of boys was abolished, as the Turks were ready to pay to get their own children into the corps, so that they might attain the highest offices in the state. The Galata Serai (cf. i. 875^a), in which the Lycée Impérial now is, was formerly the training house of the İç-Oghlan; there was another in the Imperial Palace at Adrianople but it was abolished by Sulṭān İbrāhīm (1049—1058 = 1639—1648).

İD, festival. The word is derived by the Arab lexicographers from the root $\sqrt{\text{WD}}$ and explained as "the (periodically) returning". But it is really one of those Aramaic loanwords, which are particularly numerous in the domain of religion: cf. for example the Syriac idā "festival, holiday".

The Muslim year has two canonical festivals, the id al-adhā [q. v.] or "sacrificial festival" on the 10th Dhu 'l-Hijjā and the id al-ḥiṭ "festival of breaking the fast" on the 1st Shawwāl. The special legal regulations for these are dealt with in the following articles. Common to both festivals is the ṣalāt al-ʿid(ain) festival of public prayer of the whole community, which is considered sunna. In many ways it has preserved older forms of the ṣalāt than the daily or even the Friday ṣalāt (although in other points it has come to resemble the latter) and in its general style much resembles the ṣalāt for drought and eclipses. It consists only of two rakā [q. v.] and contains several takbīr [q. v.] more than the ordinary ṣalāt. After it a khuṭba [q. v.] in two parts is held. It has no adhān [q. v.] and no iḡām [q. v.]; as in the oldest times the only summons to it is the words *al-ṣalāt djamrat*¹. It should be celebrated in the open air on the mayallā [q. v.], which is still often done, though mosques are frequently now preferred. The time for its performance is between sunset and the moment when the sun has reached its zenith.

At both festivals, which last three or four days in practice, the Muslim puts on new or at least his best clothes; people visit, congratulate, and bestow presents on one another. The cemeteries are visited, and people stay in them for hours, sometimes the whole night in tents. These more popular practices are more usual at the id al-ḥiṭ than at the id al-adhā; the festival of breaking the fast is much more joyfully celebrated because the hardships of Ramaḍān are over, so that at the present day the "minor festival" has in practice become of much greater importance than the "major festival".

İD AL-ADHĀ (also called id al-kurbān or id al-naḥr) "sacrificial feast" or id al-kabīr, "the major festival", in India baḥar id (baḥra id) in Turkey büyük-bairam or kurbān-bairam (cf. BAI-RAM). It is celebrated on the 10th Dhu 'l-Hijjā, the day on which the pilgrims sacrifice in the valley of Minā (cf. HADJIDJ), the ayyām al-tashrīk. The old Arab custom of sacrificing on this day in Minā was adopted by Islam not only for pilgrims but also for all Muslims as sunna. (It is only a necessary duty [wādīb] by reason of a vow [naḥr].

This sunna (mu‘akkada ‘ala ‘l-kiḡāyū) is obligatory on every free Muslim who can afford to buy a sacrificial victim. Sheep (one for each person) or camels or cattle (one for one to ten persons) are sacrificed. The animals must be of a fixed age and be free from certain physical defects (one eyed, lameness etc.). The period of the sacrifice begins with the ṣalāt al-‘id and ends with sunset on the 3rd of the three ayām al-‘ashīk. The following practices are recommended to the sacrificers: 1. the tasmīya i. e. the saying of the Basmala [q. v.]; 2. the ṣalāt ‘ala ‘l-nabī, the blessing on the Prophet; 3. the turning towards the qibla; 4. the three-fold takbīr before and after the tasmīya; 5. a request for the kindly acceptance of the sacrifice. If the latter is offered on account of a vow, the sacrificer must eat none of it but must give it all for pious purposes. If the sacrifice, as is usually the case, is made voluntarily, the sacrificer enjoys a portion (a third) of the animal and gives the rest away.

‘ID AL-FITR, “festival of the breaking the fast” or al-‘id ul-ṣaghīr the minor festival”. Turkish kuçuk-bairam or şeker-bairam [cf. BAIRAM], is the festival celebrated on the 1st Shawwāl and the following days. If the Muslim has not paid the zakāt al-ḡīr [cf. ZAKĀT] before the end of the period of fasting, he is legally bound to do this on the 1st Shawwāl at latest and is recommended to do it before the public prayer Ṣalāt which is celebrated on this day [cf. ‘ID].

As this festival marks the end of the difficulties of the period of fasting, although called the “minor”, it is celebrated with much more festivity and rejoicing than the “major festival”; cf. ‘ID.

AL-‘IDĀDA (A.) is the line of vision (dioptr) marked on the reverse of the astrolabe, turning round the axis or pivot, with the aid of which various observations can be made, particularly the taking of the altitude of a star (see above i. p. 501^a). (H. SUTER.)

IDĀFA (A.) (infin. iv.th form of yaf “to draw near”); the adjoining of one thing to another; annexation. Technical term of Arabic grammar commonly named the “genitive relation”, or the “construct state”; the relation of two words of which the former is determined or particularised by the latter. The former (al-muḍāf, “the annexed”) is said to be in the construct state, and the latter (al-muḍāf ilaihi, “that to which the annexation is made”) is in the genitive case. Their relation expresses the genitive of possession, quality, material, cause or effect, part or whole, or object or agent, and its distinctive features are: 1) that its two members together form one idea, and cannot be separated in writing; hence any adjective or its equivalent qualifying the muḍāf must follow the muḍāf ilaihi, as bintu ‘l-maliki al-ḡasana‘a, “the beautiful daughter of the king”; 2) that both the muḍāf and the muḍāf ilaihi are definite in sense, or both are indefinite; in either case the former is regarded as sufficiently defined by the latter, and is regularly written without the article and without tanwīn (cf. with above example bintu malik, “a king’s daughter”). An exception to this is seen when the muḍāf is an adjective which qualifies a definite noun, and which must therefore have the article: this is idāfa ḡhairu ‘l-ḡaḡḡa or “improper annexation”. In the strict Arabic interpretation the fact that the muḍāf ilaihi is in the genitive is due to the government of a preposition expressed or implied e. g. baitu Zaid (Zaid’s house) = al-baitu ‘l-ladhi li Zaid (“the house which belongs to Zaid”).

(ROBERT STEVENSON.)

‘IDDA (A.) is the prescribed period of waiting, during which widows and divorced women cannot contract a new marriage after the dissolution of the previous one. The ‘idda prescribed for widows is legally 4 months and 10 days (cf. Kur‘ān ii. 234). Among the ancient Arabs a longer period of mourning was prescribed. Then it was the custom for a widow after the death of her husband to withdraw to a small tent, where she spent a whole year during which she was not allowed to cleanse herself. See J. Wellhausen, Die Ehe bei den Arabern (Nachrichten von der Kgl. Gesellsch. der Wissensch. zu Göttingen 1893, p. 454 sqq.). ‘Idda after divorce was unknown to the ancient Arabs. Whoever married a divorced woman who was pregnant, was considered the father of the child born after the marriage even though the previous husband was really the father. In Islām, however, the actual father was considered the father of the child and no woman was allowed to remarry within a definite period (‘idda) after the dissolution of the first marriage. If she bore a child during this period only the previous husband could be considered its father. This ‘idda after divorce lasts, according to Muslim law, for three menstrual periods (ḡurū‘) or for non-menstruating women three months; if a divorced woman is pregnant she must not contract a new marriage in any circumstance for 40 days after the birth of the child (cf. Kur‘ān ii. 228; lxx., 4). An ‘idda is also prescribed for slave women, but in place of an ‘idda of four months and 10 days, it only lasts two months and 5 days, and in place of an ‘idda of three ḡurū‘, one of two ḡurū‘ and in place of an ‘idda of three months, one of one and a half months. IDDIGHĀM (according to the Baṣra school of grammarians) or IDGHĀM (according to the Kūfa school), technical term used in Arabic grammar to denote the close association in pronunciation of two consecutive homogeneous consonants. This may take place without complete assimilation, but in most cases the one consonant “enters into” and is assimilated to the other, which is then written and spoken as if doubled. The following is a summary of the rules as given by al-Zamakhsharī.

1. In general Iddighām may occur when both

p. 246, 4 from below). Even in the 10th century the poetic form was used (cf. examples in the works given below). The traveller Ibn Džubair gave a petitioner the idjāz in both prose and verse (nathr ^{wa-naẓm}, ed. Wright—de Goeje, p. 201. 15). See idjāza poems also in Šafi al-Dīn al-Hillī (Dirwān, p. 481—483, for his own poems): Taḍj al-ʿArūs, s. v. Zk, v. 369; Idāḥat al-Afrāḥ, p. 76.

In the modern language Idjāzat-nāmah is used to denote "diplomas of authorisation".

AL-IDJĪ, ʿADUD AL-DĪN ʿABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. AḤMAD, theologian and philosopher, author of various handbooks which were often annotated by later authors. His principal work is al-Mawāḥif fi ʿIlm al-Kalām, a philosophical and theological treatise which has become known in Europe also; Th. Soerensen has published the last two chapters of it and the appendix with al-Djurdžānī's commentary under the title *Statio I^a et II^a et Appendix libri Mawāḥif auctore ʿAdhād-ed-Din el-Iḡl cum Comm. He also wrote a brief catechism known as al-Aḡāʾid al-ʿAḡdiya, which has several times been annotated and has been printed at Constantinople 1827, St. Petersburg 1313. Other works are given by Brockelmann, Geschichte etc., ii. 208 sqq. Very little is known of al-IDJĪ's life. We only know that he was a native of IDJ, a fortress in Fārs, held the office of ḳāḍi and mudarris at Šīrāz (see Ḥāfiẓ, Dirwān, ed. Rosenschweig, iii. 242) and died in the year 756 = 1355.

IDJL, a North Arabian tribe, an important branch of the Bakr b. Wāʾil [q. v.]. Their ancestor ʿIdjl b. Luḡjaim was notorious for his stupidity and the expression "more stupid than ʿIdjl" was proverbial (cf. Goldziher, Muh. Stud., i. 48, n. 3). During the heathen period they formed a portion of the so-called Lahāzimgroup, which included the Dhuhl and Yaḥkur. Some of them professed Christianity. Abū Naḍjm, the radjaz poet, belonged to the ʿIdjl.

They lived in al-Yamāma (al-Khidrima, al-Khaḍārim, also called Djaww al-Khidrima) and in the country between Kūfa and Baṣra. The following villages belonged to them: Djawḥā, Dhu ʿl-Arāka (in Yamāma), waters: al-Buḳāʾ, al-Ruwaiṭha, Sāḳ (between Kūfa and Baṣra), Šhubrum (in the Bādiya of Kūfa), Zabya (in Yamāma, jointly with the B. Suḥaim), Zumm and ʿAin al-Ḳaiyāra (two days journey from Wāsiṭ). A section of the ʿIdjl is said to have allied themselves closely in Bahrain with Persian immigrants from Iṣṭakhr and to have been later incorporated in them.

Historical. In the battles between the Bakr b. Wāʾil and the Tamīm at Nibāḍj and Taital the ʿIdjl with other tribes of the Lahāzim group were on the side of the Bakr. In another battle they fought with the Lahāzim, all under the leadership of an ʿIdjlī, against the Tamīm (cf. ḤANZALA B. MALIK, p. 262^a). At al-Ḳharba the ʿIdjl were attacked by their relatives, the Dhuhl, because they had given shelter to Ḥārith b. Zālim, who slew Ḳhālīd b. Djaʿfar; Ḥārith b. Zālim who did not wish to be the cause of hostilities left the ʿIdjl and went to the Taghlib. Together with the Dhuhl (under Ḥārith b. Wāʾla) they fought under the leadership of Mukashshir b. Ḥanzala against Kais b. Maṣʿūd, chief of the Šhaibān, by whom they had been insulted on a visit. Of other battles of the ʿIdjl we may mention that of Musallīḥa (Musallāḥa) against the ʿKais b. ʿAṣim and Tamīm, who together made a raid on the ʿIdjl, that of Irāb and one with the Minkār. At the battle of Dhū Ḳār, the ʿIdjl under Ḥanzala b. Thaʿlāba took a prominent part (see BAKR B. WĀʾIL, i. 605^b); they formed the advanced guard of the Bakr and bravely resisted the Persian attacks. Ḥanzala slew the Persian leader Djalābāzin, and another of their group the leader of a Persian body of cavalry named Ḥāmarz. In the battle of Ullais (12 = 634) between Ḳhālīd b. al-Walīd and the Persians, along with other Christian Arabs on the side of the latter there were also ʿIdjl under Abu ʿl-Aswad al-IDJL. When in 22 = 644 Ḳalʿat Numair near Nahāwand was taken by the Muslims, in addition to Ḥanīfa, there were many ʿIdjl among the latter. In Mesopotamia we still find ʿIdjl in the third century 250, e. g. during the rising of the ʿAlid Yahyā b. ʿOmar at Kūfa, in whose following were ʿIdjlī cavalry under the leadership of al-Ḥaidam b. al-ʿAlāʾ.

AL-IDJLĪ, ABŪ MANŠŪR, called AL-KISF (the piece) and AL-KHANNĀḲ (the strangler) lived at the beginning of the 10th = viiith century and was executed by Yūsuf b. ʿOmar, governor of al-ʿIrāḳ in 120—126 = 738—744. His nickname al-Kisf owes its origin to the fact that he applied to himself the words of Ḳurʾān, lii. 44 "if they (the unbelievers) saw a piece fall down from heaven, they would say it was a thick cloud", because he alleged he had been in heaven, God had touched him with his hand and let him down to earth with a divine mission. According to some statements he is said at first to have recognised the ʿAlid Abū Djaʿfar al-Bakir Muḥammad b. ʿAlī as imām. His mission was to proclaim the abrogation of Muḥammadan law and to interpret Muḥammadan beliefs allegorically; to spread this doctrine it was thought permissible to slay their opponents and take their wives and property. This explains the nickname al-KhannāḲ, for he and his followers, who were called Maṣṣūriya after him, used to strangle their victims. Friedländer has aptly compared them to the Indian Thugs. On these and similar aberrations in Islām see Djāhiz, Kitāb al-Hayawān, ed. Cairo, ii. 96 sqq., and the discussion of this passage in Van Vloten, Worger in Irāq in the Festbundel Veth, p. 57 sqq.

IDJMA' (literally "agreeing upon") is one of the four uṣūl from which the Muslim faith is derived and is defined as the agreement of the mudjtahid's of the people (i. e. those who have a right, in virtue of knowledge, to form a judgment of their own: see idjtihād), after the death of Muḥammad, in any age, on any matter of the faith. As this agreement is not fixed by council or synod but is reached instinctively and automatically, its existence on any point is perceived only on looking back and seeing that such an agreement has actually been attained; it is then consciously accepted and called an idjmā'. Thus the agreement gradually fixed points which had been in dispute; and each point, when thus fixed, became an essential part of the faith, and disbelief in it an act of unbelief (kuf'r); cf., however, Goldziher, Über igmā' in Nachr. K. Ges. d. Wiss. Göttingen, Phil.-hist. Kl., 1916, p. 81 sqq. Each agreement, that is, became a ḥudūd for its own and all succeeding periods. It could be expressed in speech (idjmā' al-ḥawl) or in action (idjmā' al-fi'l) or by silence regarded as assent (idjmā' al-sukūt or al-takrīr); cf. the similar classification as to the sunna of the Prophet. It is especially excluded that it means the agreement of the masses (al-awāmm), and in al-Shāfi'i's earlier view, before he went to Egypt, a statement by a single Companion was binding on the following generations. But later he gave up this opinion and it has now been generally abandoned.

A general principle of agreement was held in different forms from an early period. The legal system of Mālik b. Anas was built largely on the agreement of al-Medina, the city of the Prophet; this agreement was local. The agreement of the two camp-cities (amṣār) of Kūfa and al-Baṣra, with their masses of veterans of the early wars, had great weight. For later generations the agreement of the Companions was naturally decisive. But it was al-Shāfi'i who developed this general principle into a definite aṣl, and ranged it with the other three. Further, from deciding points left uncertain by the other uṣūl it has come to be regarded as stamping with assurance points decided by another aṣl. This is in virtue of a divine protection against error (iṣma) which inheres in the Muslim people. In Shāfi'ite books of fiqh the statement is normal: — "such and such a passage (Qur'ān or Sunna), before the Agreement (ḥabl al-idjmā'), is the basis for such and such a rule." At present the Wahhābites (following the vanished Zāhirites) reject the universality of this principle and limit agreement to that of the Companions. And such specific sects as the Shī'a and the Ibādites are, of course, quite outside of the idjmā' of the Sunnites.

The statement of the principle, which is given formally by the canonists, is as above. But the real working has been even wider. The basal tradition from Muḥammad runs: "My people will never agree in an error"; — and there are also Qur'anic texts, iv. 115, denouncing those who follow other than the way of the believers (ghaira sabili'l-mu'minin), and ii. 137: "We have made you a normal people" (ummatun wasa'atun, cf. Baiḍāwī). In consequence there is in the thought and working of the people as a whole a power to create doctrine and law, and not simply to stamp with approval that which has otherwise been reached. By means of idjmā' what was at first an innovation (bida', the opposite of sunna), and as such heretical, has been accepted and has overridden the earlier sunna. Thus the cult of saints has become practically part of the sunna of Islām and, strangest of all, in the doctrine of the infallibility and sinlessness (iṣma) of Muḥammad, the idjmā' has overcome clear statements of the Qur'ān. In this, idjmā' has not simply fixed unsettled points, but has changed settled doctrines, of the greatest importance. It is thus regarded by many, at present, both within and without Islām, as a powerful instrument of reform; the Muslim people, they assert, can make Islām whatever they, as a whole, please. Yet as to this there is grave divergence of opinion. Goldziher, Vorlesungen, p. 56, viewing the matter historically, sees great possibilities in the future; Snouck Hurgronje (Politique musulmane de la Hollande, p. 42, 60), looking at fiqh as a crystallized system, sees in idjmā' no hope.

IDJTIHĀD means the exerting of one's self to the utmost degree to attain an object and is used technically for so exerting one's self to form an opinion (zann) in a case (ḥādīya) or as to a rule (ḥukm) of law (Dict. of techn. terms, p. 198; Lisān, iv. 109, ll. 19 sqq.). This is done by applying analogy (ḥiyās) to the Qur'ān and the sunna. Thus in the earliest usage idjtihād was formally equated with ḥiyās, as by al-Shāfi'i in his Risāla (ed. Cairo, 1312, p. 127, 7 sqq., Bāb al-idjmā'). In his section on idjtihād he quotes first as a proof, Qur. ii. 145, and demonstrates that it involves that each must follow his own judgment as to the direction of the ḫibla. It was therefore for Shāfi'i practically the same as ra'y, "opinion" and the mudjtahid was one who by his own exertions formed his own opinion, being thus exactly opposed to the muḥallid, "imitator", who, as Subkī in his Djān' al-djāwāmi' says, "takes the saying of another without knowledge of its basis (dalīl)". For thus applying himself he would, according to a tradition from the Prophet, receive a reward even though his decision were wrong; while, if it was right, he received a double reward (Goldziher in Zeitschr. d. deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., liii. 649). The duty and right of idjtihād thus did not involve inerrancy. Its result was always zann, fallible opinion. Only the combined idjtiḥād of the whole Muslim people led to idjīmā', Agreement, and was inerrant. On the controversy as to the possibility of error in mudjtahids see Taftazānī on the ʿAkā'id of Nasafī, ed. Cairo, 1321, p. 145 sqq. But this broad idjtiḥād soon passed into the special idjtiḥād of those who had a peculiar right to form judgments and whose judgments should be followed by others. At this point, and from the nature of the case, a difference entered between theology (kalām) and law (fiqh). Even to the present day many theologians assert that taḥlīd does not furnish a saving faith; see, for example, the Kifāyat al-ʿawāmm of Faḍāl, passim, and the translation in D. B. Macdonald's Development of Muslim Theology, pp. 315—351. But all canon lawyers for centuries have admittedly been muḥallids of one degree or another. When later Islām looked back to the founding of the four legal schools (madhāhib), it assigned to the founders and to some of their contemporaries an idjtiḥād of the first rank. These had possessed a right to work out all questions from the very foundation, using Qurʾān, sunna, ḥiyās, istiḥsān, istiṭāḥ, istiḥāb etc., and were mudjtahids absolutely (muṭlaq). Later came those who played the same part within the school (fi'l-madhhab), determining the furūʿ as the masters had settled the broad principles (ʿuṣūl) of fiqh and had laid down fundamental texts (naṣūṣ). If the view so stated was found implicitly in a naṣṣ of the founder of the madhhab, it was called a waḍḥ. Still later and inferior were those who had a right only by their knowledge of previous decisions to answer specific questions submitted to them; these were called mudjtahidūn bil-fatwā, "by legal opinion." All mudjtahids had been in a sense muṣṭafis, givers of fatwā's; but these were muṣṭafis only. Such was the formal and generally accepted position. But from time to time individuals appeared who, moved either by ambition or by objection to fixed positions, returned to the earliest meaning of idjtiḥād and claimed for themselves the right to form their own opinion from first principles. One of these was Ibn Taimīya (d. 728), a Hanbalite (Goldziher, Die Zāhiriten, p. 188 sqq.). Another was Snytiṭ (d. 911), in whom the claim to idjtiḥād nites with one to be the mudjaddid, or renewer of religion, in his century. At every time there must exist at least one mudjtahid, was his contention (Goldziher, Charakteristik... us-Sufūti's, p. 19 sqq.), just as in every century there must come a mudjaddid. Another, but a very heretical one, was the Emperor Akbar (Goldziher, Vorlesungen, p. 311). In Shiʿite Islām there are still absolute mudjtahids. This is because they are regarded as the spokesmen of the Hidden Imām. Their position is thus quite different from that of the 'ulamā' among Sunnites. They freely criticize and even control the actions of the Shāh, who is merely a locum tenens and reserver of order during the absence of the Hidden Imām, the ruler de iure divino. But the Sunnite 'ulamā' are regarded universally as the subordinate creatures of the government (Goldziher, Vorlesungen, p. 215—218, 233, 285).

IDJTIMĀ' [See ISTIKBĀL.]

IDMĀR, infinitive of the 4th form of the root dmr, to conceal; technical term of Arabic grammar denoting the use of a ḍamir [see the art. DAMĪR]. Idmār (ellipsis or suppression) of a verb or phrase is not uncommon: cf. the frequent omission of the verb of 'Saying' before quotations of speech (e.g. Qurʾān II, 119, 121, 127 etc.), and such expressions as saḥyūn waraʿyan, meaning in full saḥāka 'lāhu saḥyūn waraʿaka 'lāhu waraʿyan, "God give you abundant water and pasture!"

In Prosody idmār means the quiescence of the second syllable of a foot; it applies to the Kāmil metre, in which the foot mutafā'ilun may be shortened to mutfā'ilun.

IDRĪS, the name of a man, who is twice mentioned in the Qurʾān. Sūra xix. 57 sq.: "Mention Idrīs in the book. Verily he was an upright man, a prophet and we raised him to a high place". And Sūra xxi. 85, mentions him along with Ismāʿīl and Dhū'l-Kifl as one of the patient (ṣābirūn) ones. These passages are not calculated to give any explanation of this character. Even the name was for long a puzzle to orientalists till Noldeke pointed out that it probably concealed the name Andreas (Zeitschr. für Assyriol., xvii. 84 sq.). That this Andreas who was raised to a high place, is Alexander's cook who obtained immortality has been suggested probably rightly by R. Hartmann (ibid. xxiv. 314). The post-Qurʾānic Muslim writers unanimously insist that Idrīs is the Biblical Enoch who also obtained immortality or, as Jewish literature says, was taken alive into Paradise.

The information given by those Arab writers regarding Idrīs is mainly derived from Apocryphal and later Jewish sources. The Biblical Enoch has three striking features which are repeated in the Muslim legends from Jewish models (Genesis v. 23 sq.): 1. he is a pious man; 2. he lives 365 years on earth which suggests a solar hero; 3. God takes him to himself. The name Enoch, the consonants of which suggest the meaning "initiated" has probably also affected the formation of this legend.

As to the last point, Idrīs appears also in Muslim literature as 'initiated' in sciences and arts. He was the first to use pens (kalām), to sew garments and wear them; previously people had been content with skins. He is therefore the patron saint of tailors, one of the seven patrons in the guj system. He was also the first astronomer and chronologist and was skilled in medicine (ṭibb).

As a pious man he was the first to mount horse to fight "on the way of God" against the wicked descendants of Cain. As a prophet he received revelations through Gabriel. Thirty books (ṣaḥīfa) were revealed to him in this way. On his activity as a prophet and king see particularly Ibn al-Kiṣṭī (ed. Lippert), p. 1 sqq. He received the name Idris because he was thoroughly versed in former revelations as the result of industrious study. Baidāwī's philological conscience, however, does not allow of such an etymology from the Arabic; it might perhaps be possible in the cognate languages. His ascetic piety aroused the admiration of the angels. The angel of death asked Allāh for permission to visit him. He came to him in mortal form and invited him to sup with him. But Idris declined; the same thing happened on the two following nights. On the third day Idris asked him who he was. When he heard his answer, Idris asked him to receive his spirit. He therefore remained an hour without his nūḥ; he then received it back. He next asked to be allowed to be taken into heaven to see it and Paradise. When he reached Paradise he would not come out again. He held fast to a tree and appealed to two texts of the Qur'ān: "Every soul shall taste death", for he had already tasted death; and "no one shall drive them out". He therefore would not leave. God then allowed him to remain. He is to return from thence. He and Jesus live in heaven; al-Khaḍir and Elias are immortal on earth.

In this version the character of Idris as solar hero is seen from the fact that his soul is taken from him at sunset. In another version there are also several traits which point to a solar myth. When one day on a journey he found the heat of the sun unpleasant, he asked God to alleviate it in favour of "him who has every day to travel five hundred years in this heat" (i. e. the sun angel). He begged the latter to postpone his death. The angel took him with him to the place where the sun rises and transmitted Idris' request to the angel of death. The latter could not grant his request. The angel of the sun however was allowed to tell him the day of his death. The angel of death opened his diwān but could not find the date in it. He explained this to mean that Idris must die at sunrise. The angel of the sun actually found him dead then.

Nevertheless Idris is immortal; expressed in the language of myth this means: the sun dies every day and is revived every day, and is thus immortal. Another recollection of the solar character of Idris is preserved in the explanation of the high place of Sūra xix. 57 as the heart of the spheres i. e. the sphere of the sun.

Idris is also identified with Ilyās and al-Khaḍir. The Greeks are said to know him under the name Hurmuz, or as Bar Hebraeus says (Hist. Dynast., ed. Pocock, p. 9) Hermes Trismegistes. For further information see Ibn al-Kiṣṭī, l. c. In agreement with passages of the apocalypse of Enoch Muslim legends also tell that he went through Hell.

IDRIS I. B. 'ABD ALLĀH, son of 'Abd Allāh h. al-Hasan [q. v.], an 'Alid, founder of the Idrisid dynasty in the Maghrib, took part in the 'Alid rising against the 'Abbāsīd Mūsā al-Hādī [q. v.] and after defeat and death of his nephew al-Ḥusain h. 'Alī b. al-Hasan at Fakhkh [q. v.] near Mecca on the 3rd Dhu 'l-Hijja 169 = 11th June 786, where he had himself fought, remained some time concealed, but later succeeded in reaching Egypt accompanied by a faithful freedman al-Rāshid, and with the assistance of the postmaster there, al-Wāḍih, in secret a Shi'ī, escaped to the Maghrib, where he was received by Ishāk b. Muḥammad, chief of the Berber tribe of the Awraja. At the instigation of this chief, Idris was on the 4th Ramaḍān 172 recognised as suzerain by the Awraja and later by the Zenāta, Zuwāgha, Lemāya, Luwāta, Ghomāra and Saddarāta, who inhabited the north of the modern Morocco, but this recognition of a 'Alid by the Berbers, who only shortly before had been Khāridjīs was based more on political than religious motives. Idris, who only took the title of imām, is even said by al-Bakrī to have adopted the Mu'tazilī teachings of Ishāk b. Muḥammad. In the district of Tāmesnā he attacked Jewish, Christian, and heathen tribes, whom he seems to have defeated rather easily, and in a campaign eastwards (about 173 or 174 = 789-790) also brought under his sway the town of Tlemcen (Agadīr) and its practically independent prince, Muḥammad b. Khāyer b. Sulat, who recognised Idris as the rightful imām. In Tlemcen where he spent some time, he founded a mosque (Ṣafar 174), the pulpit of which, with his name inscribed on it, still existed in Ibn Khaldūn's time. Soon after his return to the capital Ulilī (the ancient Volubilis) he was poisoned at the instigation of the Caliph Harūn al-Rāshid, apparently by a certain Sulaimān al-Shammākh (1st Rabī' ii. 177 = 16th July 793). The details given by some historians of this murder and the means used (a piece of watermelon, a grape, a toothpick, or tooth-powder) as well as of the prosecution of the murderer by al-Rāshid are only romantic additions.

IDRIS II, son and successor of Idris I [q.v.]. The latter at his death left no children but one of his concubines named Kanza was pregnant by him. His freedman al-Rāshid persuaded the Berbers to wait till the child was born and in case it should be a son, to proclaim him imām and successor to his father. This expectation was fulfilled. Kanza gave birth to a son on the 1st Djumādā II 177 (793), who was recognised as Idris I's successor and entrusted to al-Rāshid's care. The attachment of this man to the family of Idris brought upon him the persecution of Ibrāhīm b. al-Aghlab, the almost independent governor of Ifrikiya. He was murdered in the same way as his master, but replaced by a Berber named Bahlūl. When the latter was won over by Ibrāhīm, he had to entrust the regency to Abū Khālid Yazīd b. Ilyās. To prevent further intrigues the Berbers summoned the eleven year old Idris to the throne and took the oath of fealty to him in the mosque of Ullīl. But Ibrāhīm continued his intrigues while Idris alienated the Berbers by his too openly displayed preference for Arabs and by choosing an Arab vizier. When fifteen years of age he had Ishāk b. Muḥammad put to death in spite of the great services he had rendered his father, under the pretext that he was negotiating with Ibrāhīm b. al-Aghlab, and by this stern, not to say unjust, measure thwarted any attempt at a rising. About the same time 192 (808) he built his new capital Fās [q. v., p. 766 sq.] and at the age of eighteen again had the oath of fealty sworn to him, while Ibrāhīm b. al-Aghlab, being busy putting down risings, was unable to interfere with him. At the same time Idris changed his policy and became more friendly, to the Berbers. After a campaign against the Maṣmūda, whose towns he captured, he marched against Tlemcen (Agadir) which had made itself independent, and put the government of the town in the hands of his cousin, Muḥammad b. Sulaimān b. 'Abd Allāh. After several engagements with the Khārījī Berbers, the details of which are not known, he died at Fās in Rabi' I 213 (May 20—June 18, 828) at the age of 36, according to Ibn Khaldūn of poisoning; according to al-Bakrī, he was choked by a grape seed. He owes his fame mainly to the foundation of Fās, which has kept his memory so green to the present day in Morocco that the beggars there still seek alms in his name. However little we may know of the details of the careers of him and his father, it is clear that he was the less important of the two.

AL-IDRISĪ (formerly usually written EDRIŚI) ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. 'ABD ALLĀH B. IDRIS AL-ḤAMMŪDĪ (see above ḤAMMŪDIDS) AL-ḤASANĪ, usually AL-SHARĪF AL-IDRISĪ (as a descendant of the Prophet), was born at Ceuta in 493 (1100), died in 560 (1166) (cf. especially Khed. Libr., Fihrist al-Kutub al-'Arabiya, v. 166), studied in Cordova, thence called al-Kūṭubī (Biblioteca Arabo-Sicula, p. 610 and the Italian version, ii. 487), while the kunya and nisba, Ibn al-Tha(y)rī given by Ibn Baṣhrūn in the Khārīda of 'Imād al-Dīn is still unexplained, after various travels spent a long time at the court of Roger II, the Norman king of Sicily in Palermo (and is therefore also called al-Ṣakālī, the "Sicilian"), where shortly before Roger's death (548 = 1154) he completed the description of the great silver plate map of the world, the celebrated "book of Roger", the Kitāb Rudjār or al-Kitāb al-Rudjārī, or Nuḥṣat al-Muḥṣṭāḥ fi 'khtirāk al-Afāk, the text of which (and 71 maps) is only partly published, but the whole was translated (very incorrectly) into French by Amédée Jaubert (1836—40). For William I (1154—66) he wrote a still larger geographical work, Rawḍ al-Uns wa-Nuḥṣat al-Nafs or Kitāb al-Mamālik (wal-Masālik), which however is only available in the extract preserved in the Ḥakīm Oghlū 'Alī Pasha Library in Stambul (No. 688) (first noticed a decade ago by J. Horovitz in searching the Stambul libraries for historical manuscripts), while the superficial synopsis of the Book of Roger, entitled Nuḥṣat al-Muḥṣṭāḥ fi Dhikr al-Anṣār wal-Aḳḳār wal-Buldān wal-Diyār wal-Madā'in wal-Afāk was printed in Rome as early as 1592 and translated by the Maronites Gabriel Sionita and Joannes Hesronita inaccurately into Latin in 1619 as Geographia Nubiensis (from the false reading in Clime 8, part 4, at the beginning, dealing with the sources of the Nile: arḡnū "our land" for arḡhā "their land"). An edition and annotated translation of this the most important geographical work of the Middle Ages with the important maps from the manuscripts at present known, Paris (2), Oxford (2), Stambul (only Aya Sofya, as the other all too summary statements of catalogues only refer to the Roman edition of 1592 or to Jaubert!), Petrograd, and Cairo is one of the most urgent tasks for Arabic scholarship. I am already meditating an edition of the smaller unique in Stambul, as I have photographs of it.

IDRISIDS. We have dealt above with the reigns of Idris I and Idris II. The decadence of the dynasty began with the death of the latter. He left eleven sons of whom the eldest, Muḥammad, succeeded him. But at the instigation of his grandmother Kanza, he divided his heritage into fiefs, which he allotted to eight of his brothers, some of whom must have been still children. He doubtless reserved a kind of suzerainty for himself but this did not prevent the rivalries and quarrels which broke up the empire. The statements of the historians on this division do not agree perfectly. This is the most probable table: al-Kāsim obtained Tangier, Ceuta, Ḥaḍjar al-Nasr, Tetuan; 'Omar: Tīkīsās and Targha; Dā'ūd; the land of the Huwāra, Tasūl, and Tāzā and the land of the Ḥayyā; Yaḥyā: Baṣra, Aṣila and al-'Arā'ish (Larache); 'Abd Allāh: Aghmāt and the land of the Nafīs and Sūs; 'Isa: Shālā (Chella), Salā (Salé), Azemmūr and the land of the Tāmesnā; Aḥmad: Miknāsa (Mequines) and Tādla; Ḥamza: Ulili and its dependencies. At the same time, Tlemcen (Agadir) remained in the hands of Muḥammad b. Sulaimān, cousin of Idris II. Civil wars began at once, the possessions of 'Isa and al-Kāsim, who had revolted against their brother Muḥammad, passed to 'Omar. The imām of Fās died in Rabī' II 221 (836); he was succeeded by his son 'Alī, who was replaced in Rajab 234 (848) by his brother Yaḥyā. The latter founded the celebrated mosque of al-Karawīyin in 245 (859) [cf. Fās, p. 73^b, 77^a]. His son Yaḥyā II succeeded him, but his great debauchery cost him his power and his life. His father-in-law and cousin, 'Alī b. 'Omar, took advantage of the disturbances that broke out on the death of Yaḥyā to seize Fās and reconstitute in part the empire of Idris II. But he was overthrown in a rebellion of Berber Sufrits and the power passed to one of his cousins, Yaḥyā III b. al-Kāsim, called al-Mikdām. A revolution replaced him by Yaḥyā IV b. Idris b. 'Omar in 292 (905). Civil war was complicated by dangers abroad. In Ifrikiya and the central Maghrib the impotent Aghlabid dynasty had been driven out by the Fātimids. Spain, flourishing under the Omayyads, threatened the Maghrib, and in the country itself, the chief of the Miknāsa, Mūsā b. Abi 'l-'Āfiya, a mortal enemy of the Idrisids, established his independence in the valley of the Molūya. The power of the latter at Fās was destroyed by the Fātimid general Maṣāla [cf. FĀTIMIDS, p. 89^a], cousin of Mūsā b. Abi 'l-'Āfiya in 310 (922). The princes of this family had to seek refuge in the Rif and among the Ghomāra [q. v.]. Their fortunes seemed to revive under al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. al-Kāsim, called al-Ḥaḍjdām, the "bloodletter" from the wounds he caused. He recaptured Fās, defeated Mūsā b. Abi 'l-'Āfiya in 314 (926) and regained a part of the territories of his ancestor. But the Omayyads gained a footing in the Maghrib by the occupation of Melila. Al-Ḥasan was treacherously handed over to Mūsā by the governor of the Kairāwānī quarter in Fās, then died while attempting to escape. The last Idrisids only held two small states comprising a part of the Rif and the land of the Ghomāra, from Tangier to Ceuta [q. v.], where they were pursued by the hatred of Mūsā b. Abi 'l-'Āfiya. In establishing themselves at Ceuta the Spanish Omayyads dealt a terrible blow at the greatly reduced dominion of the Idrisids in 319 (931). The latter reappeared a little later, but it was as governors for the Caliph of Cordova. A semblance of power was left them around Ḥaḍjar al-Nasr [q. v.]. But the final ruin of the Idrisids, tossed between the Fātimids and Omayyads, was consummated in 363 (974). On Muḥarram 1, 364 (Sept 21, 974) [cf. AL-ḤAKAM II], the Omayyad general, Ḥālīb, made a triumphal entry into Cordova, bringing in his train the last Idrisids. Their rule had lasted two centuries. At a later date a branch of this family succeeded in forming a state at Malaga which lasted a little over twenty years (cf. ḤAMMŪDIDS). In Morocco itself, a certain number of families of Sharifs claim descent from the Idrisids. It is not impossible that some of them are, but as a rule these claims are dubious.

IFLAK, the Turkish name for Wallachia. In 1391, the Voivod Mircea became tributary to the Turks, but the land remained independent.

The Boyars retained the right to choose their ruler, who was thereupon confirmed by the Porte. This state of affairs remained practically unchanged till the treaty of Adrianople in 1829, although alterations were made more than once in the terms, when a voivod refused tribute or Austria or Russia interfered in the affairs of the principalities. For example, as early as the xvth century, the notorious Wlad Drakul, whom the Turks always call Kazyklu (the impaler) Voivoda, rebelled against the Turks, had the Turkish ambassador, Hamza Pasha, impaled according to his custom, and ravaged Bulgaria. This provoked a campaign by Sultān Muḥammad II, through which Drakul was forced to flee to Hungary and Radul was installed as voivod (1462). After his death in 1477 the cruel tyrant returned, but he was very soon murdered in 1479. Towards the end of the xvth century the Voivod Michael succeeded for a brief period — he was murdered in 1601 — in bringing Transylvania and Moldavia under his sway. In the period following, the custom came into operation whereby the Voivods in order to obtain confirmation had to pay large sums to the Porte, to raise which the unfortunate inhabitants had of course to be bled. This was especially the case, when, from 1716 onwards, Greek Fanariot families (see FANĀR) supplied the princes of Wallachia as well as of Moldavia. It is true that from time to time the Porte issued orders fixing the tribute and the obligatory presents at a definite sum and abolishing the payments in kind, corn, sheep and wood, but the abuses continued to exist, nor were they improved when at the beginning of the xixth century at Russia's instigation an arrangement was made that the princes should be appointed for seven years and only be deposed with the approval of the Russian ambassador. At the peace of Adrianople this arrangement was abolished: the rulers were henceforth to be appointed for life and in addition to their annual tribute had to pay a lump sum in commutation of the tribute in kind. The Turks had also to evacuate the towns on the left bank of the Danube (Brăila, Giurgiu and Turnu Magurele) and Muhammadans were forbidden to reside permanently in the principalities. When in 1858 Cuza was elected prince of both Wallachia and Moldavia and the union of the two was proclaimed and confirmed by the Porte, the bond between Turkey and Wallachia was broken, although it was not till the treaty of Berlin in 1878 that Rumania was recognised as an entirely independent kingdom.

IFREN, a Berber tribe, which played an important part in Northern Africa during the first three centuries of the Hijra. The Ifren whom the Berber genealogists trace back to Ifri b. Iṣliten b. Masrā b. Zākīyā b. Ursik b. Adīdat b. Džānā were the most powerful of the Zenāta tribes at the time of the Arab conquest. Their various sections were scattered through the south of Ifrikiya (Banū Wārgū, Marandjisa) and on the edge of the high Algerian plateaus in the regions of Tahart and Tlemcen. After having adopted Islam, the Ifren eagerly embraced Abādī [q. v.] doctrines and played a great part in the Berber risings of the ixth century A. D. One of their chiefs, Abū Qurra, founded a Berber kingdom around Tlemcen. Defeated at first by the Arab generals, he resumed the offensive in 767. At the head of 40,000 men in 771 he joined the Khāridjī forces who were blockading 'Omar b. Ḥaṣṣ, governor of Ifrikiya, in Tobna. He consented to depart for 40,000 dinars but nevertheless took part with his troops in the siege and capture of al-Qairawān in 772.

In the century following the Banū Ifren returned to orthodoxy. Some of them, however, continued to be Khāridjīs, for example the Banū Wārgū from whom arose in the time of the Fātimids Abū Yazīd [q. v.] "the man with the ass". This rising resulted in the ruin of the Banū Wārgū who, severely punished by the Fātimids, henceforth led a seminomadic life.

The Ifren of the central Maghrib remained masters of Tlemcen and the adjoining plains but had to recognise the supremacy of the Idrisids in the ixth century A. D. In the century following they sided with the Omayyads of Spain against the Fātimids and took advantage of this struggle to extend their own dominion. Their chief, Ya'la b. Muḥammad, received from the Caliph al-Nāsir the government of the whole of the western part of the central Maghrib and made his authority felt as far as Oran, which he took and utterly destroyed in 343 (954-955). In 338 (949-950) he had built himself a capital, Iḡān (Fekkān) in the southeast of Mascara and peopled it with natives of the surrounding country. But Ya'la's power was of short duration. He fell in 347 (958) in a battle with Fātimid troops, whose general Djawhar [q. v.] sacked Iḡān.

The confederation of the Ifren was then broken up. Some sections went to Spain where one of their chiefs, Abū Nūr, succeeded in 405 (1014-1015) in seizing the town of Ronda. The others after first taking refuge on the edge of the Sahara, tried to reinstate themselves in the central Maghrib by combining with the Maghrāwa against the Ṣanhādja. Defeated and scattered once again by Bulukkīn b. Zīrī in 970, they then tried their fortune in the extreme Maghrib. Yaddū b. Ya'la after first of all showing a vigorous attachment to the Omayyad cause tried to form a principality for himself at their expense. He twice took Fās from Zīrī b. Aṭiya the governor of the Maghrib, but could not hold it. One of his relatives, Hammāma, revived the fortunes of the Ifren. He conquered the land of Tādla and maintained himself there in spite of the attacks of the Maghrāwa of Fās. His brother and successor, Abū 'l-Kamāl Tamīm, led the Ifren in a holy war against the Berghwāta. He destroyed the power of these heretics and installed himself in Shālā. He also took Fās from the Maghrāwa but was driven out again in 429 (1037-1038). He died at Shālā in 466 (1054-1055). The kingdom, which he had founded, did not long survive him. It was destroyed by the Almoravids, who massacred the Ifren in all the conquered localities. The remnants of the tribe having sought refuge in Tlemcen were exterminated after the capture of the town by Yūsuf b. Tāshfin.

IFRIKIYA (according to Fleischer, Kleinere Schriften, i. 239, more exact than the spelling Ifrikiya used hitherto), the name given by the Arabs to the eastern part of Barbary, the name Maghrib being reserved for the western part. Ifrikiya is simply a corruption of the Latin Africa, which name the Romans gave first of all to the province organised by them after the destruction of Carthage and which was then extended to Barbary and finally to the whole continent of Africa. Nevertheless the name has been given various fanciful etymologies. "Some", writes al-Bakrī, "say that the name means the "queen of heaven"; others derive it from Ifriḳos b. Ahraba al-Rā'ish, who led an army into the Berber country and built the town of Ifriḳiya (cf. al-Mas'ūdī, ed. Paris, iii. 224). According to others, the country took the name from Afriḳ, son of Ibrāhīm and Ḳaṭūrā, the second wife of the patriarch, or from Fariḳ b. Miṣraim. According to Ibn Khaldūn, Ifriḳiya is derived from Ifriḳos b. Ḳais b. Saifi, one of the kings of Yemen. According to al-Makrizī (in Ibn Abī Dīnār) Afriḳush h. Ahraba h. Dhī 'l-Ḳarnain, having conquered the west built a town there which he called Afrika. Ibn al-Shabbāḥ (quoted by Ibn Abī Dīnār) connects Ifriḳiya with bariḳ "clear" because "in Africa there are no clouds in the sky". Leo Africanus and Ibn Abī Dīnār derive Ifriḳiya from faraḳa "to divide" because it is separated from Europe by the Mediterranean and from Asia by the Nile, or also because it lies between east and west.

The boundaries of Ifriḳiya, according to al-Bakrī, were Barḳa on the east and Tangier on the west. From north to south it extended from the shores of the Mediterranean to the "sands which mark the beginning of the country of the negroes". Ifriḳiya would thus have comprised, in addition to the Africa proper of the Romans, Tripolitania, Numidia and even Mauretania. Earlier and later geographers give narrower limits. Al-Iṣṭakhri, for example (ivth century A. H.) places Ifriḳiya between Barḳa and Tāhart (Bibl. Geogr. Arab., ed. de Goeje, i. 36 and 45). For Abu 'l-Fidā', Ifriḳiya begins at the eastern extremity of the land of Bougie [q. v.] which, according to him, forms part of al-Maghrib al-Awsaṭ and terminates at Barḳa. [In a general way, however, one may regard the western border of Ifriḳiya as corresponding to the meridian of Bougie. In the south, al-Idrīsī and later, Leo Africanus, clearly distinguish al-Ifriḳiya from Bilād al-Djārid (the Numidia of Leo). In the Sahara, according to Ibn Khaldūn, the Mzāb separates the desert of al-Ifriḳiya from that of the Maghrib. It appears moreover that besides this general sense, the term Ifriḳiya was often used in a narrower sense. Ibn Khaldūn often applies it to the central and northern part of Tunisia and opposes Ifriḳiya to Tripolitania, al-Djārid and the province of Constantine. (Cf. especially the passages in this author referring to the Hilālī invasion). Abu 'l-Fidā' places Bougie, Bōne and Gafsa outside al-Ifriḳiya. The limits of the country would thus be those assigned by Marmol to the province of Tunis "which is called Africa", that is to say, on the west the province of Constantine, on the east that of Tripoli, on the south the mountains of the Atlas with the province of the Zāb and a part of Numidia and of eastern Libya, on the north the Mediterranean from the mouth of the Megerade (Medjerda) towards Bizerta to Capès (Gabis). Finally, in the xviith century, Ibn Abī Dīnār tells us that "scholars understand by al-Ifriḳiya the land of al-Ḳairāwān".

At the beginning of the Hijra, al-Ifriḳiya was still in the power of the Byzantines (Rūm). It was peopled by Berber tribes (Huwāra, Luwāṭa, Awriḡha, Nefūsa, Ifren, Nefzāwa, etc.) and descendants, of foreign immigrants into Africa, who were called Afriḳ by the Arab writers. It included a large number of towns and villages and was covered with flourishing fields. The weakness of the Byzantine authorities and the richness of the country attracted the attention of the Arabs, whose incursions began immediately after the conquest of Egypt. The first Muslim expeditions, of which however we only possess incomplete and contradictory accounts, were simply raids. The invaders evacuated the country after having pillaged it and did not try to capture the strongholds held by the Byzantines. The conquest proper did not begin till after the foundation of al-Ḳairāwān by 'Oḳba b. Nāfi' in 50 (670). Arab dominion in the country however remained very precarious to the end of the viiith century. The Greeks held the most important towns; on the other hand, the revolts of the Berbers forced Zuhair b. Ḳais, the successor to 'Oḳba, to evacuate al-Ifriḳiya on two different occasions. It was only under the governorship of Ḥassān b. al-Nu'mān that the Berbers were forced to submit and the Byzantines lost Carthage and the principal towns in the country.

Placed at first under the governor of Egypt, al-Ifriḳiya was next made an independent governorship under Mūsā h. Nuṣair, who was directly under the Caliph in Damascus in 86 (705). The conquests of this general extended the boundaries of the province to the Straits of Gibraltar. But from the middle of the viiith century the Khārījī revolts considerably diminished the Arab territory. Al-Ifriḳiya properly so called was ravaged by the Abādī Berbers of the east (Huwāra, Wafardjuma) and by Zenāta of the central Maghrib. It even was lost by the 'Abbāsīd caliphs for a time. Al-Manṣūr however succeeded in establishing 'Abhāsīd rule in Ifriḳiya again from 144 (761) onwards, while independent Berber principalities were set up in the Maghrib. However, the Aghlabīd [q. v.] dynasty (ixth century A. D.) only nominally recognised the suzerainty of the Caliph. The overthrow of the Aghlabīds by the Fātimīds caused al-Ifriḳiya to pass into the power of the Shī'īs, who gave it a new capital, al-Mahdiyya, and when they established themselves in Egypt made it a vice-royalty under the Zīrids. The foundation of the Ḥammādīd kingdom was however not long in depriving the Zīrids of the western part of al-Ifriḳiya. On the other hand the Hilālī invasion, a result of the repudiation of Fātimīd authority by the Zīrid al-Mu'izz in 440 (1048-9) [cf. FĀTIMIDS, p. 90^a], exposed the country to the most terrible disasters. Al-Ifriḳiya, previously very flourishing and covered with vineyards and farms, was ravaged by nomads and almost entirely ruined. Some Arab tribes, notably the Riyāḥ and the Djuṣham, installed themselves in the country and perpetuated there their habits of disorder and brigandage. Finally, at the beginning of next century, the Normans of Sicily occupied the principal points on the coast. As a result of the Almohad conquest, al-Ifriḳiya became one of the provinces in the vast empire founded by 'Ahd al-Mu'min [q. v.], but she soon recovered her independence under the Ḥafṣīd [q. v.] dynasty. The rule of these princes was at first extended over Tunisia, Tripolitania, the province of Constantine, Bougie and the Zāb, but from the end of the xvth century it was reduced to Tunisia in the strict sense of the word. Henceforth the history of al-Ifriḳiya is merged in that of this country.

(G. YVER.)

'IFRĪT, according to the usual explanations, is one who overcomes his antagonist and rolls him in the dust (ʿafar); who successfully carries matters through (mubāligħ); who is, therefore, powerful in a hostile sense, evil, crafty (Zamakhsharī and Baidāwī on Kur. xxvii. 39; Lisān, vi. 263, l. 1 sqq., l. 14 sqq.; De Sacy, *Hariri*², p. 355). The classical and only Kurānic occurrence is in Kurān xxvii. 39, "an ʿifrit of the djinn." Hence it has come to be used peculiarly of the djinn; but in the first instance it was plainly a general epithet, and thus the Kurānic passage might be translated, "a powerful djinn". So, too, "an ʿifrit of the djinn" occurs in two traditions from Muḥammad in Damiri's Ḥayawān (ed. Cairo, 1313, i. 179, l. 15 sqq., ii. 104, l. 22 sqq., under djinn and ʿifrit). But soon the word became identified with the djinn and especially with the more satanic and malignant element among them. So Rāghib, in his Mufradāt (p. 393) speaks of its application to human beings as metaphorical, and even Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, xix. 93, seems to limit the word to the djinn. But it was not understood as meaning a specific class of these as e. g. ghūl (q. v.); contrast the classification (aṣnāf) in Ākām al-Marājān, p. 17 sq.; and in the Fihrist (p. 309, l. 21) ʿafarit is used as a general name for both djinn and shaiṭān's. Even the distinctive meaning of hostility seems often to have been lost. In The 1001 Nights (Galland MS. of xivth cent. A. D.; Story of Second Shaiḫ, Night vii.) it is said of a benevolent Muslima, ṣārat ʿifrita djinniyya, "she turned into an ʿifrita, a djinniyya". In Egypt the word has come to mean also the ghost of a murdered man, or of one who has died a violent death. (Lane, Modern Egyptians, chap. x.; Willmore, *Spoken Arabic of Egypt*², p. 371 sqq.; "Niya Salima", Harems et Musulmanes d'Égypte, chap. xiv.; St. John, Two years residence in a Levantine family, chap. xx). It also survives in the original sense of a strong man of violence, e. g. the ḥarāt al-ʿifrit in Cairo which is explained as the one-time abode of a ḥarāmī. But the most normal modern usage is of a powerful, evil, clever djinni.

IGHARGHAR, the valley of a river of the Quaternian epoch in the Sahara, which has now disappeared and is reduced to a subterranean sheet of water. The Igharghar, according to Duveyrier, rises near Azakān-n-Akūr, in the massif of the Hagggar at a height of about 6000 feet. It ends near the oasis of Gūg, in the south of Tuggūrt, after a course of about 800 miles (900, if one includes the Wād Ghir, which is its continuation). Its basin extends from the crests of Tademayt in the west to the oasis of Ghāt in the east and from the Hagggar to the Shott Melghir, i. e. from the 23rd to the 34th degree of North Latitude.

The Igharghar flows at first from S. to N., passing near Ideles, sometimes in a fairly narrow valley, where springs burst up in the middle of its bed, sometimes also broadening out into a plain with banks indefinitely marked 5 to 8 miles broad. After running along the massif of the Muydir to the west and the Tassili plateau in the east, it describes a curve to the east and reaches the foot of the Hammāda of Tinghert. In this part of its course it receives a certain number of wādis, the valleys of which present the same characteristics. The principal are those of the Ighargharen, the Wādī Assad-Kīfāf which drains all the southern part of the Tassili of the Azdjer, the Wādī Issawan, of which the confluence however is still to be found, and lastly the Wādī Ahanat, which comes from the sands of Edeyen.

The Igharghar then traverses the plateau of Tinghert where it cuts for itself "a well marked channel" (Foureau) and receives lower down a large number of streams from the eastern side of this plateau, which rejoin it after having disappeared in the sands of the Erg. In the region of sand-hills the bed of the Igharghar becomes quite invisible. It probably passes in the vicinity of the Kasi Twil (see 'AREG) without however mixing with it. Foureau's observations permit us to suppose that it formerly ran much farther east. On leaving the Erg, it can hardly be more easily recognised, except at certain points, for example at the ravine of Shegga near Tuggūrt. However the continuity of the subterranean sheet of water is attested in this region by the existence of a number of wells.

IHRĀM (A.), infinitive ivth from the root h-r-m, which has the meaning of "warding off" (man'), as the Lisān, xv. 9 says: "to declare a thing ḥaram" or "to make ḥaram". (The opposite is iḥlāl "to declare permitted"). The word ihrām has however become a technical term for "sacred state"; one who is in this state is called muhrim. For example, a person fasting may be called muhrim. The word ihrām, however, is only used for two states: the sacred state in which one performs the 'umra and ḥajjī, and the state of consecration during the ṣalāt. Thirdly the word can be used of the dress in which the ḥajjī and 'umra are made.

1. The iḥrām in the major or minor pilgrimage. The law declares it meritorious for the pilgrim to assume the iḥrām at the very beginning of his journey to Mecca. But as this is very inconvenient, it is usually only done when the pilgrim approaches the sacred territory (ḥaram, q. v.). Pilgrims who make the journey by steamer often however assume the iḥrām as soon as they arrive in Djidda. The law has prescribed several stations (mawāḳit, plur. of mīḳāt) where this is usually done namely: Dhu 'l-Hulaifa for the pilgrims from al-Medina; al-Djuhfa for those from Syria and Egypt; Karn al-Manāzil for those from Najd, Yalamlam for those from Yemen; Dhāt 'Irāq for those from 'Irāq. Any one who assumes the iḥrām too late has later to sacrifice an animal in atonement. These mawāḳit are also called maḥall i. e. the place where the iḥlāl begins. The latter means "loud calling" i. e. the calling of labbaikā [q. v.]. Iḥlāl is thus used in the same sense as iḥrām and one says for example, ahalla bi 'l-ḥajjī in the sense of aḥrama bi 'l-ḥajjī i. e., to assume the iḥrām for the ḥajjī. The law further ordains that people who live within the area bounded by these villages shall assume the iḥrām in their dwellings (Tanbīh, ed. A. W. T. Juynboll, p. 72), when it is a question of performing the ḥajjī. For an 'umra they must go to one of the boundary places of the ḥill [q. v.]; usually Tanīm is chosen for this purpose, and is thus erroneously also called al-'Umra by modern travellers.

As one can only enter a state of consecration after casting off all that is ritually impure, one must first of all perform the ceremonies necessary for this. The ghusl is usually performed; the pilgrim dyes his nails and perfumes himself, all of them ceremonies which were connected with exorcism. Frequently also the pilgrim has himself shaved, his beard trimmed and his nails cut (Burton, A Pilgrimage (London 1857), ii. 133, 377; al-Batanūnī, *al-Riḥla al-Ḥidjāsiya*², p. 172). On the significance of shaving, see below.

A particular dress has to be worn in which no seams are allowed. This dress consists of two pieces: a sheet that reaches from the navel to the knees (izār) and another thrown round the body, which partly covers the left shoulder, back, and breast and is knotted on the right side. This latter is called ridā' and from the manner in which it is knotted wishāḥ. Both garments are ordained by law to be white, but red stripes are also found (see the illustration in Burton, ii. facing p. 58). On this dress we may remark that it is probably the old Semitic sacred dress. The upper garment of the High Priest in the Old Testament was according to Josephus (Antiq., iii. 7, 4) also made without a seam. The Jewish priests wear the ephod around the hips and the Me'il around the shoulders. In Islām itself there are analogies at the ṣalāt and the burial service. The old Arabs also, when consulting an oracle, as well as the later ascetics wore two garments (Goldziher in Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, xvi. 138, 328; Wellhausen, *Reste*², p. 122). White is also the sacred colour in many religions: at first the mourning colour (cf. Wilken, Ver- spreide Geschriften, ed. van Ossenbruggen, iii. 416—422) it was next adopted as a sign of a consecrated state: the ephod of the priests as well as the robes of ascetics are white.

The iḥrām dress is thus very old and does not owe its origin to Islām. The wearing of shoes is also forbidden. The most that may be allowed is sandals. This custom is also an old Semitic one. Among the Jews mourners as well as the officiating priests went barefooted. In the consecrated state also it is forbidden to cover the head; perhaps this is also an old mourning custom (cf. Ezekiel, xxiv. 17).

Women need not wear any particular dress. But they usually wrap themselves in a long robe which reaches from the head to the feet, while the face, which really ought to be uncovered, is concealed by a kind of mask (cf. the picture in Burton, o. c., ii. 58).

A ṣalāt of two rak'a's is offered and the niya [q. v.] is pronounced. The latter can be done in three ways. The iḥrām can be assumed:

a. either for the ḥajjī or for the 'umra. This method is called ifrād (separation).

b. for the 'umra, although the ḥajjī is to be made at the same time. This is called tamattu' (bi 'l-'umra ila 'l-ḥajjī), i. e. the utilisation of the 'umra for the ḥajjī.

c. for both 'umra and ḥajjī. This is called ḥirān i. e. combination. On the origin and estimation of these three kinds of niya a good deal has been written in Muslim literature. The four schools of law (madhāhib, q. v.) have different views on the order of importance of the various niya's, as regards the merit acquired by them. The kind called tamattu' owes its name to an expression in the Kur'ān (Sūra ii. 192^b), which later became a technical term. According to Snouck Hurgronje's suggestion (Het Mekkaansche Feest, p. 86 sqq.), the restrictions which were imposed by the iḥrām became too severe for Muḥammad, so that during his stay in Mecca before the ḥajjī he conducted himself in a secular fashion. As his followers looked askance at him for this, the revelation in Sūra ii. 192^b is said to have been given: "Any one who avails himself of the 'umra until the ḥajjī (shall offer) as many animals as is convenient for him; any one who is not in a position to do this shall fast for three days during the ḥajjī and seven days after his return". What therefore appeared to the Prophet and his contemporaries as an omission which could be atoned for by a punishment, was considered by later generations as a thing permitted. Pilgrims who arrive in Mecca long before the ḥajjī secure themselves by the tamattu' from a painful abstinence. As soon as they have performed the 'umra, they put off the iḥrām and only assume it again when the time of the ḥajjī approaches. But the tamattu' is forbidden to those who have sacrificial animals with them (Sūra ii. 192). Originally the 'umra took place in the month of Rajab and, according to some traditions, an 'umra during the ḥajjī period was an unheard of thing in pre-Islamic times.

When one has formulated the niya, the labbaikā calling begins, which is to be repeated as often as possible and only ceases after the shaving on the 10th Dhu 'l-Ḥidjja.

The state of consecration imposes certain pledges of abstinence: sexual intercourse, care for one's toilet, the shedding of blood, hunting and the uprooting of plants are forbidden. With regard to this the following remark may be made. In other cases in other Semitic religions a state of consecration excludes sexual intercourse, at least in the monotheistic ones. The neglect of the body is a well known feature of a sanctified condition among the Semitic peoples. The old Arab mourning women who were in a sanctified state of mourning are described as being dirty and having dishevelled hair (shu'th, al-Khansā', Dīwān, ed. Cheikho, Beirut 1896, p. 28, v. 4).

During mourning the Jews are forbidden to bathe or clip their nails. It is reported of the pre-Islamic pilgrims and of Muḥammad that when in the state of ihrām they smeared something on their hair to make its filthy condition more endurable (Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, Kit. al-Ḥaǧǧ, Bāb 126; Muslim, with Nawawī's comm., Cairo 1283, iii. 205; cf. Lisān, iv. 391). In a tradition given by Ibn Māǧja (Bāb mā yūǧib al-Ḥaǧǧ) Muḥammad in answer to the question: "What is the ḥaǧǧ (pilgrim)?" said: "He whose hair is dishevelled and whose mouth smells (al-ash'ath al-tafil)". The idea underlying all these customs, including the shaving at the beginning of the period of consecration is perhaps that everything that grows on the body during the period of consecration is devoted to the object of the sanctified condition. At the end of the period in most cases an offering of hair may have been made. The endeavour to make oneself unrecognisable may also have played a part.

The muḥrim is not ordered to fast. But there are numerous traditions which answer this question, some in the negative and some in the affirmative. It may be that in ancient times this ascetic custom was associated with the others.

When one arrives in Mecca from his miqāt, he performs the ṭawāf and sa'y [q. v.], sometimes also drinks water from Zemzem and has his hair cut, if the ihrām was only assumed for an umra. But if it was assumed for a ḥaǧǧ, the shaving and hair cutting is not performed till the 9th Dhu 'l-Hiǧǧja in Minā, after the ceremonies of the ḥaǧǧ proper are over. The pilgrim can now assume his ordinary dress again. But it is usual to put on new clothes (Burckhardt, Travels, London 1829, ii. 60). The law however prescribes another ṭawāf in Mecca and many pilgrims only put on their ordinary dress after this ceremony. Finally on leaving the holy city a farewell umra has to be performed. For this purpose the pilgrim goes to Tan'im, performs a ṣalāt of two rak'as, returns to Mecca to perform the ṭawāf and sa'y there. He then definitely puts off the ihrām.

2. The consecrated state during the ṣalāt. This state also can only be entered when one is ritually pure and dressed in a prescribed fashion and has taken one's stand behind a sutra [q. v.]. This state is announced by the takbīr [q. v.] which is also called takbīr al-ihrām. The ceremonies of the ṣalāt proper begin then and can only take place during this consecrated state. One has to avoid everything which might destroy the latter, that is: every superfluous act and every superfluous word. The jurists specially mention greeting, sneezing, coughing, laughing, all that is connected with sexual life or the process of digestion. These are all actions which were originally ascribed to demoniac or animistic influences. We frequently find the idea that angels are present during the ihrām (cf. the commentaries on Sūra xvii. 80).

The consecrated state is ended by the two taslima's, that is the formulas of greeting pronounced while turning the head first to right and then to left. According to some jurists, the object of the first is to leave the consecrated state as well as to greet those present; the latter is only a greeting for those present. Who those are is a question which is answered in various ways: according to some, it is the angels who are summoned by the takbīrat al-ihrām and are now dismissed by the taslimat al-iḥṭāl (the formula by which one returns to the secular state).

The transition from the sanctified to the secular state is dreaded for demoniacal influences. These are averted by the so-called kuṇūt (cf. Goldziher in Orient. Studien Theod. Noldeke gewidmet, i. 323 sq.).

IIHYĀ' (A.) "bringing waste land into cultivation". The Muslim Fikh-books in the section on legal transactions have a chapter on iḥyā' al-mawāt, literally, making the dead (soil) alive. Land which is not being used is called mawāt. Every Muslim who cultivates neglected land for himself becomes the proprietor if it does not belong to another Muslim. According to most faḥih's express permission from the authorities is not necessary. The imām Abū Ḥanifa however considers it illegal to cultivate a mawāt without permission from the authorities.

IKĀB (A.), punishment, retaliation; especially the punishment from God which will fall upon the sinner after death (often used in the Kurān in this sense). Cf. ADHĀB and: Sprenger, A Dictionary of the Technical Terms, p. 947.

(TH. W. JUYNBOLL.)

IKĀMA (A.) is the second call to the ṣalāt which is pronounced by the mu'adhdhin in the mosque before each of the five prescribed daily ṣalāt's as well as before the ṣalāt at the Friday service. This second call gives the moment at which the ṣalāt begins. The formulae of the ikāma are the same as those of the adhān [q. v.]. According to the Hanafis, they are repeated as often as in the adhān; according to the other Fikh schools, they are pronounced only once with the exception of the words "God is great", which are repeated twice at the beginning as well as at the end of the ikāma. Moreover after the formula "come unto blessedness", twice in succession there are repeated the words "qad kāmāt al-ṣalāt" (now begins the ṣalāt). In the lawbooks the calling of the ikāma is recommended as sunna also to every believer who is performing the ṣalāt alone.

According to E. Mittwoch (Zur Entstehungsgeschichte des islamischen Gebets und Kultus, Abh. d. kgl. preuss. Akad. d. Wissensch., 1913, phil.-hist. Kl., N. 2, p. 24) the calling of the ikāma was borrowed by the Muslims originally from the benedictions in Jewish prayer. According to C. H. Becker (Zur Geschichte des islamischen Kultus, Der Islam, iii. 389) on the other hand, this Muslim custom developed out of the original adhān in the mosque, which was modelled on the Christian mass (see however al-Makrizī, Khitaṭ, ii. 271, l. 14—15).

Ikāma denotes the action of the mu'adhḥin (the calling of the prescribed formulae) by which he causes the ṣalāt to begin. On this linguistic usage see C. Brockelmann, Ikāmat aṣ-Ṣalāt (Festschr. E. Sachau, 1915, p. 314—320) and J. Weiss in Der Islam, vii. (1916), 131—136; cf. the expressions: aḳāma l-ṣalāt and uḳīmat al-ṣalāt (Gloss. to Shirāzī, Tanbih, ed. A. W. T. Juynboll, s. v.; Bukhārī, ṣaḥīḥ, Adhān, No. 23-24). In the Fikh-books however Ikāma is also explained as the call which is intended to summon the believers to rise for the ṣalāt. See Bādjūrī (Bulāḳ 1307), i. 167, l. 12.

(TH. W. JUYNBOLL.)

IKHLĀṢ (A.), to keep (or make) clear and pellucid, to keep free from admixture. In connection with the Kur'ānic use of the expression ikhhlāṣ al-dīn lil-lāh (cf. iv. 145, vii. 28, x. 23, xxxix. 14, 16, etc.), i. e. to honour and serve Allāh exclusively, ikhhlāṣ by itself received the meaning (cf. Kur'ān, ii. 133) of "absolute devotion to Allāh", and became used in opposition to ishrūk, shirk, "associating divine beings with Allāh". Sūra cxii. which emphasises the unity and uniqueness of God and denies that he has any associates was called Sūrat al-Ikhhlāṣ (also Sūrat al-Tawḥīd); this Sūra is frequently recited in the ṣalāt.

With the development of the conception of shirk, which covers "every kind of worship of God which is not an aim in itself" and also the cherishing of interested motives in religious practice (cf. Goldziher, Vorlesungen, p. 46), the development of ikhhlāṣ is somewhat parallel. According to al-Ghazālī, Ikhhlāṣ, apart from the above technical sense, properly means only that one's action should be dictated by a single motive, so that for example it can be ascribed to one who gives alms only with the intention of being seen to do so. In the language of religious ethics as developed especially by the Sūfis, ikhhlāṣ particularly refers to the effort to come nearer to God and means the keeping free of this ideal from all subsidiary thoughts. In this sense it is often opposed to riyā', the wish to be seen. Ikhhlāṣ demands unselfishness with regard to one's own religious practice and the abolition of the selfish element which mars devotion to God. At the highest stage of ikhhlāṣ even the consciousness of ikhhlāṣ itself must disappear and all thought of divine reward in this world or the next be put aside. IKHMĪM. [See AKHMĪM.]

IKHSHĪDIDS, an Egyptian dynasty. On the general place in history of the dynasty see above ii. p. 8^b. The name of the dynasty is derived from the old Persian princely title Ikhshid which the Caliph al-Rāḍī was induced to grant to the founder Muḥammad b. Tughdj in 326 = 937. It was the title of the old rulers of Farghāna (see ii. p. 62^b) from which the dynasty claimed descent. Ikhshid is said to mean "king of kings", although others interpret it as "servant" (cf. Ibn Sa'īd, ed. Tallqvist, Arab. text, p. 23 sq.; transl. p. 41), presumably in the same sense as 'Abd Allāh was used as an honorific of the Caliphs. Al-Ikhshid's father and grandfather were already in the service of the Caliph; he himself worked his way slowly upwards and seems to have had a supporter in the vizier al-Faḍl b. Dja'far of the celebrated family of the Banu 'l-Furāt [s. IBN AL-FURĀT, 3]. After he had arranged the disorganised affairs of Egypt (323 = 935), he had to defend his new position against the powerful Amīr Muḥammad b. Rā'ik [s. IBN RĀ'IK] who penetrated up to the gates of Egypt but then granted the Ikhshid the country as far as Ramla on payment of tribute. Five years later new difficulties arose, and the undecisive battle of al-Ladjdjūn was fought, after which the contesting Amīrs made an alliance by marriage. The Ikhshid paid a yearly tribute of 140,000 dinārs. After the death of Ibn Rā'ik a new enemy to the Ikhshid arose in the Ḥamdānids, and being now at the height of his power he took part in the contest for the position of Amīr al-Umarā'. In Muḥarram 333 (Sept. 944) he met the Caliph al-Muttaḳī at al-Raḳka, but on this side of the Euphrates, and thought for a time of sharing the fortune of the Caliph in the struggle against the Turk Ṭūzūn, who was ruling in Baghdad. But he ultimately returned to Egypt and began the struggle with the Ḥamdānid Saif al-Dawla, which ended in a treaty by the terms of which Damascus remained in possession of the Ikhshid on payment of tribute. He died at the end of 334 (July 946). Two sons nominally succeeded him but they were only rois faibles. The real power lay in the hands of an Abyssinian eunuch named Kāfūr, who on the death of the second son was formally granted the government of Egypt and successfully defended Egypt and Syria henceforth from the attacks of the Ḥamdānids. On Kāfūr's death a grandson of the Ikhshid was appointed governor, but the dynasty had completely lost its hold on the country and Egypt with Syria fell into the hands of the Fātimids who were advancing from North Africa.

The following table gives the names and order of the Ikhshidids:

- 323 Muḥammad b. Ṭughdj al-Ikḥshīd. 935
 335 Abu 'l-Kāsim Ūnūdjūr b. al-Ikḥshīd. 946
 349 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī b. al-Ikḥshīd. . 960
 355 Kāfūr, ruler in name also, . . . 966
 357-8 Abu 'l-Fawāris Aḥmad b. 'Alī . . 968-9.

The name Ūnūdjūr is transmitted in various forms. The Ikḥshīd and Kāfūr were certainly important personalities. The Ikḥshīd is described as strong physically, but as cowardly and particularly avaricious and greedy. No man's property was secure in his reign. More pleasing human traits are also credited to him however. Kāfūr was probably the more important. In spite of his repulsive features, by his intellectual endowments he carved a career for himself, unique even in those days, from black slave to wielder of the dynastic power. At the height of his power he never forgot his humble origin. More features of his character that are pleasing than those that are displeasing have been handed down to us. Both princes cultivated the literary taste of their times. Al-Mutanabbī sung both their praises, but afterwards lampooned them. Under the Ikḥshīd began the struggle between the two dynasties of Caliphs ('Abbāsids and Fātimids) for the nominal suzerainty over the various governors who had set up dynasties. These soldiers of fortune played them off one against the other. The Ikḥshīd seems to have seriously considered recognising the Fātimids, but he remained faithful to the 'Abbāsids as their prestige was still too great.

IKHTILĀDĪ (A.), trembling of the limbs: whence 'ilm al-ikḥtilāḍī, the alleged science of prophesying from the involuntary twitchings of the limbs, also called palmology. The oldest work on the subject is probably Μελάμπους ἱερογραμματεὺς περὶ παλμῶν μαντικῇ πρὸς Πτολεμαῖον βασιλέα (J. S. F. Franzius, Scriptores physiognomonicae veteres, Altenburgi 1780, p. 451 sqq.). The Arabs however usually ascribe the origin of this science to the Indian Ṭomṭom. Who he was has not yet been explained. A suggestion is given by Hauber, Tomṭom (Ṭimṭim) = Δανδαμῖς = Dindymus, in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesells., lxiii. 457 sqq.

IKHTILĀF (A.), difference of opinion; in contrast to Iḍmā' [q.v.], the difference of views among the authorities on Muslim law and dogmatics on details of legal practice and doctrine which do not affect great principles, particularly among the former, as it appears in the diversities between the Madḥāhib [q.v.] and also in those within each one of them. In opposition to contrary views urging unity of practice, and in face of the reality of the existence of this difference of opinions, the conviction has arisen in Muslim orthodoxy that they are of equal value and this view finds expression in an authoritative form in the saying attributed originally to various Caliphs and latterly to the Prophet himself "difference of opinion in the Muslim community is a sign of (divine) favour". The registering of these differences has produced a great literature in Islām since the foundation of the study of Fikḥ and this has been most comprehensively recorded by Fr. Kern.

IKHWĀN AL-ŞAFĀ'. We have evidence in the second half of the iv.th (x.th) century (373 = 983) of the existence of a religious and political association with ultra-Šūfī, perhaps to be more accurately described as Ismā'īlī views and tendencies. The members of the association, the head quarters of which were at Baṣra, called themselves the "Pure and Faithful", as their chief aim was to further the salvation of their immortal souls by mutual assistance and by every means, especially purifying knowledge (γνώσις). Nothing is known of their political activities, but a collection of treatises arranged in encyclopaedic fashion dealing with the objects of their society, survives as the outcome of their attempts to work out theories of edification. The period of the collection and editing of their Rasā'il (52 in number: the Bombay edition as stated in the table of contents at the beginning and the concluding note in the first Risāla consists of 52 treatises, but in the last treatises in part iv. only 51 are mentioned) is usually given as the middle of the iv.th (x.th) century and among the collaborators are mentioned Abū Sulaimān Muḥammad b. Muḥṣir al-Bustī, called al-Muḳaddasī, Abn 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī b. Ḥārūn al-Zandjānī, Muḥammad b. Nahradjūrī, al-'Awfī and Zaid b. Rifā'a. Further details cannot be ascertained, mainly because the Pure loved to express themselves in very confusing language. Quotations in the Rasā'il, as far as they have been identified, are mainly taken from the literature of the viii.th and ix.th centuries A.D. The philosophical position is that of the older eclectic translators and collectors of Greek, Persian, and Indian wisdom. Hermes and Pythagoras, Socrates, and Plato are often quoted and thought more highly of than Aristotle. The latter appears as the "logician" and also as the author of the Plotine "Theology" and the "Book of the Apple". Of the knowledge of a relatively purer and more complete Aristotelianism, which begins with al-Kindī, the treatises of the "pure ones" show no trace. It is characteristic of their mental attitude that al-Kindī is not quoted, at least not by name, although his renegade pupil, the fantastic astrologer Abū Ma'shar (died 272 = 885), is. It is not impossible, however, that they had literary connections with al-Kindī and his school. According to the mediæval Latin translation of the 13th Risāla, this treatise was composed by a "Mahomet discipulus Al-quindi". Cf. T. J. de Boer, Zu Kindī und seiner Schule in Archiv f. Gesch. d. Philos., xiii. (1899), p. 177 sq.

The contents of the Rasā'il are of a pronouncedly eclectic nature. The central point is the doctrine of the heavenly origin and the return of the soul to God. The world is derived from God by the way of emanation, like the word from the speaker or the light from the sun. In successive stages there comes forth from the divine unity a second, the intelligence, from this a third, the soul, and then a fourth, primitive matter, a fifth, nature, a sixth, bodies or spatial matter, a seventh, the world of the spheres, an eighth, the elements of the sublunar world, a ninth, the products of the world: minerals, plants, and animals. In this cosmic process the corporeal first appears as the basis of individuation, and all evil and imperfection. The individual souls are only part of the world soul, to which they return purified after the death of the body, just as the universal soul will return to God on the Last Day. By the 'pure ones' death is called the minor and the return of the world-soul to the creator the major resurrection.

The religions of all times and peoples agree with this wisdom according to the 'pure ones'. The object of all philosophy as well as of every religion is to make the soul become like God as far as is humanly possible. To carry out this spiritualistic interpretation of religious doctrine the Kur'ān is interpreted allegorically. The same allegorical interpretation is applied to tales of western origin, such as the book of Kalila wa-Dimna. As Goldziher has shown, the story of the ring-dove, in which it is told how the animals by being faithful friends to one another (Ikhwān al-Şafā) escape the snares of the hunter, determined the choice of the name for the association.

The whole of the 52 treatises, written in a paraenetic tone, prolix and with many repetitions, superficially at least looks like an encyclopaedia of the sciences. The first part comprises in 14 treatises mathematics and logic as propaedeutics, the second in 17 treatises natural sciences including psychology, the 10 Rasā'il of the third part deal with metaphysics, and lastly the 11 Rasā'il of the last part discuss mysticism, astrology and magic. In an essay in the fourth part (No. 45 of the whole series) the nature and organisation of the association is also discussed.

AL-İKLİL (A.), the crown, the name of several constellations, namely:

1. al-Ikil, is the name given to the stars β , δ , π , forming a blunt wedge close together on the brow of the Scorpion. These stars mark the seventeenth station of the moon.

2. al-Ikil al-şamālī, Greek στέφανος, Latin Corona, the northern crown, a constellation of eight stars which follows the staff of Bootes and is also called al-Fakka, the "breach", and Kaṣ'at al-Masākīn, the "alms bowl", Pers. Kāsa-i Darwīshān, the "beggar's bowl" and Kāsa shikasta, the "broken bowl", because the ring of stars is broken at one spot. Al-Fakka is also the name of the principal star α of the Crown.

3. al-Ikil al-djānūbī, Gr. στέφανος νότιος, the southern Crown, a constellation of 13 small stars near α β on the ankle-joint of Sagittarius. It is also called al-Kubba the "Cupola" or Uḍḥiy al-Na'ām, the "ostrich's nest", because it is south of the two ostriches, the twentieth station of the moon.

İKLİM, the Greek word klima, inclination. Eratosthenes (d. 195 B. C.) divided the orbis venteris notus into seven longitudinal zones, of which the limits were arbitrarily fixed. Hipparchus (c. 150 B. C.) made the zones equal in latitude. The division into seven climates of equal width was taken over by the Arabs, though sometimes the countries to the S. of the Equator were reckoned an eighth, and those in the extreme N. a ninth. Al-Idrisī [q. v.] has arranged his book

CLIMATE	I	II	III	IV	V	VI	VII
S. Limit	12° 40'	20° 27'	27° 30'	33° 37½'	38° 54'	43° 22½'	47° 12'
N. Limit	20° 27'	27° 30'	33° 37½'	38° 54'	43° 22½'	47° 12'	50° 20'
Longest Day	12¾	13¼	13¾	14¼	14¾	15¼	15¾
Breadth	7° 47'	7° 3'	6° 7½'	5° 17'	4° 28½'	3° 49½'	3° 8'
Length	172° 27'	164° 20'	154° 50'	144° 17'	135° 22'	126° 27'	119° 23'

The length of the longest day at the N. limit of the seventh climate, that is, at 50° 20' N., is 16¼ hours. Inhabited lands, however, lie both to the N. and S. of these climates. The climates also diminish in length as they ascend northwards. Thus, according to al-Birūnī [q. v.], the length of the first climate from E. to W. is 172° 27', or, taking 1° = 18⅞ parasangs nearly, about 3252 on geography according to climates. The determining factor in defining the limits of the climate is the length of the longest day within it. In Abu 'l-Fidā the inhabited world lies practically between 10° and 50° N. Latitude, and the length of the longest day increases by half-an-hour in each climate from the S. to the N. The following table shows the S. and N. limits of the seven climates, the length in hours of the longest day at the S. limit of each and the breadth and length of each in degrees.

parasangs. On the older basis of 22⅔ parasangs to a degree it would be 3832 parasangs. The length of the seventh zone is 119° 23' or about 2255 parasangs (on the older computation 2651 parasangs). These measurements are adopted by Abu 'l-Fidā.

The term climate (keshwar) was also used by the Persians to denote one of the seven parts or kingdoms into which they divided the world, and which had no dependence on latitude. Persia was placed in the centre and Arabia, Africa, the Romans, the Turks, China and India grouped round it. A similar seven fold partition of the earth is found in al-Mas'ūdī (chapter viii.). Climate then came to be used locally for "country", e. g. "Syria, 'Irāk, etc. Abu 'l-Fidā calls this the popular climate as contrasted with the "real" or astronomical climate, which depends on the latitude.

İklīm al-Ru'yā is another name for the Falak al-Burūdī.

İKRĀR (A.), Confession. If the accused in the case before the kādi confesses that the prosecutor is right, no further proof is needed according to Muslim law. The judge can at once give his verdict. An ikrār however can only be considered valid when it is made by a person of age in full possession of his faculties and without any pressure before the kādi. Measures to extort a confession are absolutely forbidden. Even an ikrār made by some one perhaps from fear of a flogging is invalid. If the case concerns the law of property, the one who acknowledges the demand must be capable of independent action (rashīd). If the justice of an accusation is once recognised in a case, a later repudiation of the ikrār is invalid, except when the accused has confessed a crime which is liable to be punished as a ḥakk Allāh (see 'ADHĀB, i. p. 132).

Recognition of children who are not born in wedlock is of no value according to Muslim law. If, however, the paternity of a legitimate child is uncertain and the husband expressly acknowledges his paternity, then no further proof is required. The paternity of the child is then established by the ikrār. The declaration however must be neither contrary to the actual circumstances nor the law.

In other cases also a person's genealogy can be established beyond all doubt by ikrār without further proof in certain circumstances, for example, if a male Muslim who has attained his majority declares that any one is his father, brother or uncle. If however relationship is claimed with some one still living, the latter must confirm the ikrār, if he is not incapable of doing so on account of youth or mental deficiency. If the ikrār refers to more distant degrees of relationship, (e. g. brother or uncle), the men through whom the alleged relationship has arisen (e. g. father grandfather) must be already dead.

AL-İKSİR [s. ELIXIR.]

İKTÂ' (A.) in Muslim countries means: 1. the act of bestowing land which is not private property in return for taxes or tithes; 2. the act of giving the produce of land in place of or as a guarantee of payment on the part of the state treasury. İktā' may consist of: 1. the granting of a whole province as a fief to a governor (e. g. the granting of Egypt to Ibn Tūlūn by the Caliph on payment of tribute), as well as the granting of a few fields in return for tithe ('uṣhr) or taxes (kharāj) or rent (kharāj-udjira) or a poll tax afterwards converted into kharāj (kharāj-djizya); 2. the allotment of the revenue from a piece of ground as salary or pension. The conception of iktā' was then extended and used to mean the farming of taxes and customs duties and tolls on rivers and canals. İktā' later came to be used to designate especially a military fief. Al-Māwardī has given a theoretical account of the prescriptions of the iktā' in Ch. xvii. of his "Constitutional Law" (al-Aḥkām al-ṣultāniya, ed. Enger, Bonn 1853, p. 330—343). He distinguishes at the outset between the granting of the property and the yield from it and investigates under what conditions land may be capable of iktā'.

I. There are three kinds of land.

A. Mawāt (uncultivated land). a. Waste land without trace of cultivation or an owner. The muḳṭa' (the person to whom the land is granted under certain conditions) promises to cultivate it. (cf. the Roman emphyteusis) and for three years he pays nothing. (He then pays a rent which is fixed by public auction [taṣṭayud]; but lands were probably often allotted at a definite rent which was not considered capable of being increased, cf. Becker, Die Entstehung von 'Uṣr- und Harāg-Land, s. Bibliography). If he does not cultivate it, it may be taken from him at the close of three years unless he can give satisfactory reasons for his neglect. Otherwise he is granted the land on a long lease with the right to dispose of it, so that it is in a way his property, in return for a pledge to pay a certain sum. b. If the land was previously cultivated, the same regulations hold, if it was cultivated in the Djāhiliya (i. e. the period before Muḥammad). If it was cultivated within the Muslim period, the practice varies.

B. If it is a case of cultivated land in private possession, it can only be given to some one if it is in an enemy country but has already been promised as iktā', before it is conquered. The muḳṭa' receives by iktā' a preferential claim, after the conquest of it, if it is granted at all, if for example the owners migrate. Conquered land that is not private property, for example the private domains of the former ruler or lands belonging to inhabitants who have left the country, is in part reserved for the bait al-māl (treasury) and can only be leased for rent (kharāj udjira) but never become private property. The unreserved parts become kharāj lands (i. e. liable to land tax); they either belong to the fa' (booty) [q. v.] and are immobilised, in which case they can only be rented and not become the private property of the muḳṭa' or they remain in the private ownership (of an unbeliever); then it is not possible to grant them and the kharāj due from them takes the place of the poll tax djizya [q. v. i. 1051 sq.]. Lands which fall to the state, because the owner has no heirs are administered like foundations. Many legal authorities hold the opinion that the government is free to dispose of them: in this case they may be assigned, according to some, only on rent, according to others, as private property.

II). Ikṭā' of the produce only takes place as a substitute and guarantee for the payments which the treasury has to make to subjects; the sum which the government has to pay to the persons concerned must therefore be fixed if instead of money a grant of produce is to be made. There is a distinction between:

a. Ikṭā' of the tithe ('ushr). The revenues from tithes ('ushr) are intended for the zakāt (alms for the poor). They therefore cannot be bestowed because the claims on the zakāt in the individual cases are only defined when payment is made and the 'ushr is only paid at the end of the year so that the two dates do not coincide.

b. Ikṭā' of the ḵharāj. The yield of the ḵharāj for the reasons just mentioned cannot be granted to any one in substitution for the claim to zakāt. For the same reason, officials holding special offices but receiving no fixed salary or appointed for an indefinite period cannot receive the yield of the ḵharāj as ikṭā'. On the other hand the ikṭā' of the ḵharāj is readily given to members of the army in place of their definite pay because the settlement is easy in this case.

On the kinds of ḵharāj (ḵharāj dīziya and ḵharāj udjra) see the articles DIZYA and KHARAJ. The ḵharāj udjra can be granted for a number of years in compensation for a definite payment.

If the muḵṭā' remains in active service till the end of the period he naturally retains the revenue: if he dies it goes back to the state. His heirs receive a pension from other funds: if he breaks down in health his usufruct of the revenue is settled by local practice, according as his pay is continued or a pension is given from other sources on account of ill health. There is no ikṭā' with rights for life and the right of transmitting to heirs, as the financial sovereignty of the state would thus be injured by losing the right of disposal. An ikṭā' for life without the right of bequest is only possible when, according to local practice, in cases of retiring on account of ill health, it continues to be paid undiminished. These are in the main al-Māwardī's theories. On the special regulations for the granting of mines etc., see al-Māwardī at the end of the chapter quoted. He does not discuss the ikṭā' of land to Muslims as 'ushr land. We know that this kind of ikṭā' was usual in Muslim countries. Becker in particular has explained the practice, (Steuerpacht, etc., p. 81 sqq., see Bibliography); in this book the eastern and western systems of granting fiefs are compared). Al-Māwardī points out that ikṭā' of ḵharāj was especially suitable for members of the army: and in reality the military fiefs did develop out of it. Soldiers and amirs were given the rents either as a guarantee of their pay or as part of it. When the rent came in with increasing irregularity, they were gradually given the estates themselves. This state of affairs lasted about 130 years from the time of the Būyids [q. v.] to the reign of Sulṭān Malik Shāh (465—485 = 1072—1092) under the administration of his vizier Nizām al-Mulk (see Becker, Steuerpacht, p. 89). The latter distributed the estates as fiefs to the troops and allotted them as revenue and income. The Saldjūks introduced an innovation inasmuch as they made the fiefs hereditary in return for military service.

This is best explained by the fact that as an intruding tribe of nomads it was their interest at first to have as many of their own people as possible in their army. They thought that in this way they could secure for themselves a particularly true and devoted army (al-Makrīzī, Khitaṭ, ii. 216 quotes a statement on this point by a djundī (mercenary) of the army of the Saldjūk Atābeg, the almost independent prince Nūr al-Dīn of Aleppo 541—569 = 1146—1173): "The fief belongs to us, it is our property, we pass it on to our children from father to son and in return for it we are willing to run the risk or death". The system of hereditary fiefs in return for military service is also found among the Mongols. It was different in the Mamlūk period (see Becker, art. EGYPT, ii. p. 14^b sq.); the whole country under his rule, apart from private property, endowments, fallow or desert land, is the feudal property of the Sulṭān. It was divided into 24 parts from the time of Sulṭān Qalā'ūn (678—689 = 1279—1290) (ḵirāṭ). Four parts were for the Sulṭān, out of which he granted fiefs to his guards, officers and soldiers, 10 parts were for the amirs, 10 for the mercenaries (djundī) but the amirs also held a part of the fiefs for the mercenaries. The land was redistributed from time to time after a survey (at least once in 30 years) but frequently more often, if abuses prevailed, so that for example the highest amirs got hold of very large estates and introduced a latifundies system or the smaller amirs did not pass on the fiefs to the mercenaries. New surveys were also ordered by sulṭāns to give fiefs to their mamlūks. Sulṭān Lādjin (696—698 = 1296 = 1298) for example took 14 ḵirāṭ of the land for fiefs reserved for his guards. In the survey of Sulṭān al-Nāṣir Muḥammad of the year 715 (1315) 10 ḵirāṭ were for the Sulṭān, 14 for the amirs and their mercenaries. Another abuse first appeared in the first Mamlūk dynasty in the reign of the extravagant Sulṭān al-Kāmil Shāḥbān: the mercenaries exchanged or sold their estates to private individuals and in return paid considerable sums to the treasury. This practice was even sanctioned by the institution of a special office (Diwān al-Badl). (See for further details, Sobernheim, Matériaux pour un Corpus Inscr. Arab, ii. n^o. 44). This abuse was however of short duration only; it is described by the chroniclers as a wicked, illegal, and arbitrary act. When Sulṭān Selim I in 922 (1516) conquered Syria and Egypt, he had these lands resurveyed and divided as crown estates and fiefs according to the Ottoman principles. As elsewhere throughout the Ottoman empire the principle of inheritance was gradually introduced. Muḥammad 'Alī was the first gradually to deprive the Mamlūks and the small vassals of their fiefs and to introduce a system of direct payment into the army. The Turkish Sulṭāns (see the article TURKEY) claimed a part of the conquered territory as their property and granted the yield of the taxes of whole districts (liwā's) to their grantees for life (malikāne-i miriye, q. v.). The governor who was granted a fief in this way, received the ground tax and other dues, while he in return placed a certain number of soldiers at the Sulṭān's disposal according to the size of his estate; later he only paid a definite tribute to the Porte. It thus came about that the great pashas were often almost independent of the Sublime Porte. There arose for example small dynasties in Syria at Hims, Ba'albek, in Lebanon and Nablūs. The smaller fiefs were called, according to their size, zī'amet (from zā'im, the leader of an army) and fiṣmār; the number of soldiers to be provided varied with the size of their booty. They were hereditary and were divided according to certain principles among the sons or heirs of the holder of the fief in return for military service. It may be said that almost the whole empire consisted of military fiefs. This circumstance which in course of time by its decentralising tendency brought about a weakening of the empire was gradually abolished by the reforms (tanẓīmāt) of Sultān 'Abd al-Madīd, which Sultān Maḥmūd II had gradually prepared the way for (1223—1255 = 1808—1839). The situation was definitely settled by the land legislation of 1856. General military service for Muslims had already been introduced in 1839. Certain hereditary fiefs granted to grandees of the empire, which every new Sultān has to confirm, still exist.

IKTIBĀS means to take a ḳabas, a live coal or a light, from another's fire (ḳur. xx. 10; xvii. 7; lvii. 13); hence to seek knowledge ('ilm) and, as a technical term in rhetoric, to quote specific words from the Ḳur'an or the traditions but without indicating these as quoted. If the source is indicated and the quotation is put into verse the figure is called 'aḳd, "binding", and if it is verse, not Ḳur'an or tradition, that is quoted, and in verse, the figure is taḳmīn, "inserting". In iktibās the original application of the words may be preserved or may be changed. As to the lawfulness of this there has been much dispute. The Mālikites generally pronounced it unlawful; but others allowed it under conditions, e. g. in preaching and prayer and praise (following the usage of Muḥammad), but not in verse, where it was disliked (makrūh). Yet others permitted such quotation, even in verse, if done in a right spirit. But it is altogether abominable to twist words referring to Allāh so as to make them refer to a creature; or to use any Ḳur'ānic words in light jesting. But, as a matter of fact, such quoting and alluding has been quite common, even in the most unseemly contexts as in ḳutub al-bāḥ, just as the doubt whether the basmala should be prefixed to poetry (Ibn Rashīḳ, 'Umda, ed. Cairo, 1325, ii. 250) has had no practical consequences. The Fihrist (p. 104, 12) notes a Kitāb al-Muḳtabas by Madā'inī (d. A. H. 215 or 225) and another by Marzubānī (p. 133, 25) but it is uncertain whether their iktibās was this technicality. In the Asās al-Iktibās of Iḳhtiyār al-Dīn (d. A. H. 928; Brockelmann, ii. p. 103) it is extended to cover proverbs, verses and even short ḥikāyāt.

AL-IKWĀ' (A.), a technical term in metre, meaning an error in prosody, which consists in the vowel of the vocalised, rhyme-forming, terminal consonant (rawī) being a ḍamma in one verse of a poem and a kasra in another, irrespective of whether the majority of the verses of the poem end in one or other of these vowels or not. According to al-Khalīl b. Aḥmad, al-ikwā' means the presence of an unusual vowel with the rhyme-forming consonant, so that the verses end partly in ī and partly in ā or ū. Other prosodists on the other hand call the insertion of verses with the terminal vowels ū or ī in a poem rhyming in ā, iṣraf or isrāf.

ILĀH is undoubtedly the same as ʾĪlāh and has the same problem of ultimate derivation (Encyclopaedia Biblica, iii. coll. 3323 sqq.; Brown-Driver-Briggs, Hebrew Lexicon, p. 42 sqq.; Fleischer, Kleinere Schr., i. 154 sqq.). Here only the Arabic side is considered. The pre-Muslim Meccans regarded Allāh as a proper name (ism ʿalam) and this view is practically universal in Islām; for the arguments of the few who held that it was a descriptive noun (sifa) see Rāzī, Mafātīḥ, ed. Cairo, 1307, i. 83, 24 sqq. But, according to Rāzī (loc. cit.), al-Khalīl, Sibawaihi and the most of the formulators of the Muslim fundamentals (al-ʿuṣūliyyūn) held also that it had no derivation, was murtadjal. This Rāzī supports with various a priori arguments. Others, according to Rāzī, held that Allāh was of Syriac or Hebrew origin; others, of the school of al-Kūfa, that it was from al-ilāh; and others, of the school of al-Baṣra, that it was from al-lāh, the infinitive of LYH, "to be high", or "to be veiled". Of course, as to al-ilāh, "the Deity", Rāzī had no doubt that it had a derivation, although its usage had come to be practically as a proper name and equal to Allāh. Later Islām has decided that, while Allāh is a proper name, it is also derived (mushṭakḥ, manḥūl) and most probably from al-ilāh, in some one or other of its meanings. Al-ilāh, then, would mean i. "the god already mentioned", the article being lil-ʾahd, ii. "the Deity", iii. it was softened to Allāh by frequency of usage and in that form came to be a proper name. But ilāh, "a god", still survived in the construct and undefined, as also ʾilāhatun, "gods", in the plural. Apparently al-ilāh does not occur in the Kurʾān as a form; but there are cases where Allāh has the same meaning. So in Kur. vi. 3, wa-huwa ʾl-lāhu fi ʾl-samawāti, "and he is the deity in the heavens" (cf. Zamakhsharī, Kashshāf, ed. Lees, p. 394), and in Kur. xxviii. 70, huwa ʾllāhu ʾlladhī lā ilāha illā huwa, "he is the deity than whom there is no deity" (cf. Kashshāf, p. 1064). Then later al-ilāh came back in the two senses noted above and was used and is still used by theological writers much as is our "the Deity". Eight derivations have been suggested for ilāh (Rāzī, i. 84—86; Baiḍāwī, ed. Fleischer, i. 4) but they practically reduce to the following: 1. Alaha, "worship", but, as Zamakhsharī points out (Kashshāf, p. 8), this with the *v*th and *x*th stems are derived from the noun. 2. Aliha, "be perplexed, confounded" — for the mind is confounded in the experience of knowing Allāh; waliha has the same meaning. 3. Aliha ilā, "turn to for protection, or to seek peace, or in longing", again waliha has the same meaning. For Allāh the school of al-Baṣra preferred the derivation from lāha in either of its two meanings, "to be veiled" or "to be lofty". Zamakhsharī mentions only 1 and 2, the latter being his choice; in 2 and 3 waliha may easily be more original; for the interchange cf. Mufaṣṣal, ed. Broch. p. 172, l. 20.

ILĀT, Arabic plural of the Turkish word il "people" (cf. Thomsen, Inscriptions d'Orkhon, p. 15 and 135, N. 2) is the name given in the Persian administration to the tribes that have remained nomadic in the empire (syn. ulūs); they are for the most part of Turcoman origin; liable to military service in case of war, they form the only cavalry in Irān (Muḥammad Ḥasan Khān, Maṭlaʾ al-Shams, p. 29 sqq.), except for the regiment of Cossacks. They are also called ḥaraẓdar (black tents) from the colour of their hair tents. Their hereditary chief is called ilkhāni "chief of the people"; he enjoys absolute authority and rules his clan in a way absolutely independent of the royal authority. They have teachers of the Kurʾān and of Persian poetry; this is all the education the nomads receive. When the course of the seasons requires the movement of the tribe, they strike their tents, their chief holds a review (sān); while the men on foot stand with a large stick in their hands and surrounded by their hunting dogs, the women and children sit on asses, mules, and horses, their domestic chattels being loaded on camels. The nomads pay various revenues to the state; a tax for pasturage (ḥakḥ-i ʿerā), a certain number of camels and asses to be sent annually to the court, in addition to the usual presents; each tribe furnishes a regiment of infantry (jawāḥ) and a reserve squadron of irregular cavalry (suwār-i radif).

The reforms at present planned by the Persian government aim at increasing gradually the number of tribes who have adopted a settled life, and forcing those who remain nomadic to make their migrations without damaging the interests of the settled tribes on their route. For Fārs, a council of the tribes is to be created on which the ilkhāni's will be present in person or represented by delegates, in addition to representations of the great families and prominent personages of the region. This organisation will be later extended to the whole of Persia.

ILĀI (T.) properly elli, from the Uigur el, peace, alliance, and the suffix of nouns indication profession, -i, = peace-maker, ambassador, plenipotentiary. The word el "peace", which is found in Mongol and Manchu, also occurs in Ruhghūzī, 5, 10 and Kutadghu Bilig, 154, 10 (Radloff, Wörterbuch, i. 826). In Turkey a distinction was formerly made between büyük elli, ambassador, elli muraḥḥakḥ, minister plenipotentiary and orta elli, resident minister. At the present day the diplomatic titles, the employment of which was fixed at the treaty of Vienna, are officially the following: for the first, safir-i kabir; for the second safir; the Ottoman Empire has no resident ministers. It maintains embassies at Paris, London, Petrograd, Berlin, Rome, Vienna, and Teheran. The title büyük ilci was nevertheless retained for ambassadors accredited to the Sublime Porte and that of orta ilci for ministers plenipotentiary (Sālnāme, 1325, p. 1072, 1078). The reception of these agents by the Sultān was formerly the occasion of extraordinary ceremony. Now they are content to follow the ordinary European usages. When Ferdinand of Austria sent Nicolas Jurischitz and Joseph von Lamberg (in 1530) on a mission, fifty çavuş came to meet them half a league from Constantinople and conducted them to the ambassadors' caravanserai (ilci-khan), the ruins of which still exist in Stamboul. They shut them in there by the Sultān's orders, but took care that they lacked nothing. Three weeks after their arrival they were ceremonially received in audience. The şolak, the court valets wearing golden headdresses, and 3000 Janissaries stood before the chamber of the dīvān, where the Grand Vizier, two other viziers, the Beylerbey of Rumelia, the two kādi-asker, the three defterdār, and the secretary of State (ra'is efendi) awaited them; then the Chief Marshall and the High Chancellor introduced them to Sulaimān. The first envoy from the Porte to Vienna was a çavuş, messenger of state or courier (1533), and the practice was continued of appointing ambassadors to foreign countries from this lower category of officials. In 1616 the judge of Galata, who was a negro, forced the ambassadors to pay capitation (il caragio, the word kharādj being then popularly used as a synonym of dizya, cf. Meninski, Lexicon, s. v.); it was necessary to produce the text of the capitulations to have this judgment of the kādi annulled by the Grand Vizier. In 1076 (1665) the first account of a mission was inserted in the annals of the empire, on the occasion of an embassy sent by Sultān Muḥammad IV, which included Ewliyā Efendi and Meninski. Von Hammer at the end of his Histoire de l'Empire Ottoman, xvii. 134 sqq., has given a list of embassies sent by the Porte or received by it down to the peace of Kainardja.

Persia only has an ambassador in Constantinople (safir-i kabir). It was represented elsewhere by ministers plenipotentiary, envoys extraordinary (wa'air-i mukhtār wa-ilci-i mahkūṣ) one for England, Germany, and Holland, one for Russia, and one for France and Austria.

ILDEGİZ, SHAMS AL-DĪN, Atabeg of Adharbaidjān, was originally a slave of the Saldjūk vizier al-Sumairimi, murdered in 515 or 516 (1121 or 1122) and afterward of Sultān Ma'sūd. The latter appointed him governor of Arrān, whereby he became one of the first amirs in the kingdom. In this remote province he soon took up a more or less independent position and troubled himself little about his Saldjūk overlord. His marriage with the widow of Sultān Toghrul I gave him a favourable opportunity to champion the cause of his stepson Arslānshāh and raise him to the Saldjūk throne in 556 (1161) while he himself came forward as his Atabeg. Some amirs, namely Ināndj in Rayy and Zangī in Fārs attempted to put up Muḥammad, a brother of Arslānshāh, against him; but their troops were not a match for those of Ildegiz and the plan soon failed miserably. Ildegiz finally got rid of his troublesome rival Ināndj by assassinating him with the help of the vizier Sa'd al-Dīn Asa'd al-Ashall, who as a reward was made vizier to Pahlavān, son of Ildegiz. Ildegiz, who had several times to wage difficult wars with the Georgians (cf. the additions to Ibn al-Kalānisi, ed. Amedroz, p. 361 sq.), thus became the virtual ruler of the Saldjūk empire, and firmly established the rule of his family in Adharbaidjān. According to Ibn al-Athir, he died in 568 (1172) at Hamadhān in the same month as his wife, Toghrul's widow. If the tomb at Nakhdjuwān described by M. Hartmann (Deutsche Bauzeitung, 1899, off-print, p. 21) is that of this princess, her name was Mu'mina Khātūn, but the writer's view that Ildegiz had the tomb erected is contradicted by the date 582. The laḡab Shams al-Dīn's proves nothing, because Ildegiz's son Pahlavān [q. v.] also bore it. Cf. Awfi, Lubāb al-Albāb, ed. Browne, I, 356 sqq. Dawlatshāh, ed. Browne, p. 117, however, says that both Ildegiz and his wife were interred in Hamadhān.

ILEK-KHĀNS, a Turkish dynasty in Central Asia, iv.th—vii.th (x.th—xii.th) centuries. From this house which ruled the lands north and south of the Thian-Shan came the first Turkish conquerors of Mā warā' al-Nahr in the Muslim period; the first monument of Muslim literature in Turkish, the Kutadghu-Bilik or Kutadghu Bilik, was written about 462 = 1069-1070 for a prince of this dynasty. In Persian histories the dynasty is usually called "family (āl) of Afrāsiyāb (q. v., i. 175^b) sometimes also "Khāns of Turkistān", the name "İlek princes" or "İlek-Khāns" was introduced by European numismatists (Tornberg and especially Dorn) from a title peculiar to this dynasty, which, however, is not by any means borne by all its rulers, and which it seems cannot be traced in Muslim literature at an earlier or later period. In the pre-Islamic period the word appears as a princely title among the Eastern Turks; cf. the expression "ilig khān mshikha" in the Christian text publ. by F. W. K. Müller (Uigurica, Berlin, 1908, p. 6). The pronunciation and etymology of the title is uncertain; the historians and the coins have ilek, sometimes also ilik and elik, the Uigur ms. of the Kutadghu-Bilik, alik or ilik, the Arabic (both the Cairo ms. and the newly discovered ms. of Namangan in Farghāna) ilik; cf. W. Radloff, Wörterbuch, i. 816, "if this word were pronounced ilik, it could be connected with ilk, 'the first'. Naṣr b. 'Alī (d. 403 = 1012-1013), the conqueror of Mā warā' al-Nahr was the "ilek" or "ilek-khān" kar' i'zoxhān; the title was used later also mainly by the kings of Mā warā' al-Nahr (cf. Baihaḳī, ed. Morley, p. 631 infra) but only so long as there were nominally at least the relations of vassal and overlord between them and the Khāns of Kāshghar. The expression "the khān (or the khāns) and the ilek" is frequently used (e. g. Baihaḳī, p. 844 sq.); the "ilek" is thus not the "khān", but a prince subordinate to him, just as the ilik introduced in the Kutadghu-Bilik as the personification of justice is not called "khān" but "beg". After the rulers of Samarkand had definitely assumed the title of Khān and founded an independent kingdom, the title ilek disappears from their coins. The word ilek is mentioned for the last time about 1130 A. D. as the name or title of the ruler of Balasāghūn (q. v. i. 615^a).

The historical references to the "family of Afrāsiyāb" are very scanty; the limits of the kingdom as well as of the individual principalities, of which it consisted, are difficult to determine; the dates also are mostly uncertain; even the coins leave much to be settled here. The kingdom was never actually ruled by one man; feuds between individual members of the dynasty were usually settled by force of arms, frequently with foreign assistance. This state of affairs was first taken advantage of by the Ghaznavids (q. v., ii. 154 sqq.) and later by the Saldjūk sultāns for their own purposes; of the latter, Malik Shāh and his son Sandjar exercised a kind of suzerainty over the princes of Samarkand as well as over those of Kāshghar; after the battle in the year 536 (1141) this suzerainty passed to the heathen Kara Khitāi [q. v.]. The downfall of the dynasty in Mā warā' al-Nahr (c. 609 = 1212—1213) as well as in Kāshghar (about the same time) was brought about by the rebellion of the Muslim population against the Kara Khitāi and the resultant fighting.

ILGHĀZĪ (i. e. champion of the people) is the name of two Saldjūk semi-independent rulers of the Ortokid dynasty who attained power in northern Mesopotamia.

1. NADJIM AL-DIN ILGHĀZĪ I B. ORTOK. He was first of all a supporter of his brother-in-law Tutush in his struggle for the throne of the Saldjūk empire of Persia. After Tutush's defeat and death (488 = 1095) he withdrew to Jerusalem which he had received as a fief from Tutush jointly with his brother Sukmān. The two brothers had however after a 40 days' siege to surrender Jerusalem to the Egyptians (Shāhān 489 = July-August 1096). At a later date (from 493 = 1100). Ilghāzī joined the new pretender Sultān Muḥammad, who appointed him governor of Baghdād in 494 (1100-1101). He held this important office for four years, ultimately in the service of Sultān Barkiyārūk and his son Sultān Malikshāh.

When Sultān Muḥammad dismissed him from the governorship of Baghdād in 498 (1105), he fell out with this ruler. Between 498 and 501 (1105 and 1107-1108) Ilghāzī captured the hitherto impregnable fortress of Mārdin, one of the most important in the whole of the nearer east, and in 501 we find him also lord of Naṣibin. In 504, 505, 506-7 and 508 (1111, 1112, 1113 and 1115) he refused to perform military service in the war, which the Muslim amirs of the west were conducting against the Crusaders in Mesopotamia and Syria by Sultān Muḥammad's orders. During the last of these campaigns he with two of his nephews even attacked the commander-in-chief of the Muslim armies Aksonkor al-Bursukī (q. v., i. 226^b sq.) and defeated him (May 1115), but then fled to Syria and together with Tughtegin concluded a truce injurious to the Muslim cause and even agreed to join arms with the Franks. Tughtegin and Ilghāzī brought 10 000 Muslims to the 2 000 Franks. The Frank-Muslim allies encamped together till August at Apamea and Shaizar in face of the new commander-in-chief, Bursuk b. Bursuk, sent by Sultān Muḥammad to fight the Crusaders, without however it coming to a battle between Bursuk and the allies. Shortly after (August or September 1115) Ilghāzī, while on his way back to Mesopotamia, was captured at al-Rastan (between Emesa and Hamā; Yāqūt, ii. 778) by Khir-khān, one of Sultān Muḥammad's generals, but released after some time for fear of Tughtegin. Ilghāzī managed to get on very well with the Saldjūk government after the death of Sultān Muḥammad and the accession of his son, Maḥmūd.

Lu'lu', the governor of Aleppo, was murdered towards the end of 510 (1117). Owing to internal disputes the town and district of Aleppo were exposed to the inroads and depredations of the Franks. After Ilghāzī had temporarily occupied Aleppo in 511 (1117), he was appealed to in the following year by its inhabitants as their last hope and recognised as prince of Aleppo (Ibn al-'Adim Kamāl al-Din). Ilghāzī in the second half of 512 (1118) succeeded in definitively gaining possession of Aleppo and thus became a neighbour of the Franks, against whom he at once made energetic preparations. The numerically weaker Franks were outflanked on June 28 1119 by his army of 20 000 men in the valley of Tell 'Afrin, taken by surprise and for the most part cut to pieces or taken prisoner. Among those who fell was Roger, Prince of Antioch. It was one of the greatest battles which the Muslims had so far won against the Crusaders (the village of Balāt, after which the battle is often called, appears in Ibn al-'Adim as Roger's camp on the night of June 20 1119, eight days before the decisive battle). Antioch now lay defenceless at Ilghāzī's feet; but he neglected to take the city.

The reputation of Ilghāzī's military ability now penetrated far and wide and he received the chief command over the Muslims in the war which Sultān Maḥmūd was waging in person against the Christian Georgians. Ilghāzī suffered a very severe reverse (Kamāl al-Din, Tārīkh Ḥalab, 512 = 1121; Ibn al-Athīr al-Kāmil, 514 = 1120) which resulted in the loss of Tiflis to the Georgians. In 516 (1122) he was granted Maiyāfārikin by the Sultān in addition to his other lands.

Soon afterwards on Ramaḍān 516 = November 3 1122 (Ibn al-Kalānisi: Ramaḍān 6, al-Fāriki: Ramaḍān 17) Ilghāzī died at the age probably of barely 60 at Maiyāfārikin (Ibn al-Athīr and Abū 'l-Faraj; 'Adjūlain on the road from Mārdin to Maiyāfārikin, according to Ibn al-'Adim, Recueil des Historiens des Croisades, iii. 634; al-Fuḥūl, according to Ibn al-Kalānisi; on the way from Aleppo to Maiyāfārikin, according to Michael the Syrian). At his death he was in possession of Maiyāfārikin, Mārdin, Aleppo and apparently also of Naṣibin. He was buried at Maiyāfārikin (for further details see the historian of this town, quoted in Amedroz's foot-notes to al-Kalānisi). Ilghāzī possessed an influence unequalled at that time over the Turkomans of Mesopotamia. He was a bold and ambitious personality, who claimed a leading position wherever he appeared. He was not a general of great genius; it is said that his drinking habits affected his military decisions. He struck no coins so far as is known (I. Ghālib Edhem, Catalogue des Monnaies turcomanes, Constantinople. 1894, p. 82). He married a daughter of Tughtegin, Il-Khātūn, and later during his rule over Aleppo also Farkhūndā Khātūn, a daughter of the former Salḡūḡ ruler there, Ridwān. We know the names of several of his children: the daughters Gūhar, (al-Fāriḡi: Kumār) Khātūn, who married the Arab chief Dubais b. Sadaḡa in 513 = 1119-1120; Yumnā Khātūn, the wife of the Inālīd Il-Aldī, lord of Āmid, who died in 536 = 1141-2; Āyāz, died 508 = 1114-1115, Sulaimān, Timūrtash and Shihāb al-Dīn Maḡmūd (?); an other daughter Ilghāzī whose name is not known married in 495 = 1101-1102 an unnamed son of Tekish, a brother of the great Sultān Malikshāh. Ilghāzī was one of those Muḡammadan amīrs who were the first to check the advance of Crusaders to north and east before the time of Zangī and Saladin. Ilghāzī I was the founder of the Ortokid dynasty of Mārdīn which survived till 811 = 1408.

2. KUTB AL-DIN ILGHĀZĪ II, the son of Nadjm al-Dīn Alpī (probably another form of Alp-Bey) and a sister of the Turkish ruler of Armenia, Suḡmān II, succeeded his father in 572 = 1176-1177; Michael the Syrian: July 20 1176) in the rule over Mārdīn, Maiyāfāriḡīn, and Ra's al-Ain (in Ibn al-Athīr, xi. 268, however, he appears as early as 569 in possession of Ra's al-Ain). We have only scanty information about his reign. He first of all oppressed his two paternal (according to another tradition, maternal) uncles, the rulers of Hānī (also written Hana, the modern Hene, north of Āmid) and Darā, till they recognised his suzerainty as they had done that of his father: the two uncles appeared at Mārdīn and paid homage to Ilghāzī II. Soon afterwards the latter fell ill. On his recovery he subdued the Arabs who had become turbulent and is said — according to a statement which is probably exaggerated — to have killed several thousands of them and to have taken 12 000 camels from them. He proceeded to extend his sway towards the Euphrates in the district of Bīra (the modern Bīredjik). His uncle Suḡmān II seems to have had great influence over him. Ilghāzī for example joined the alliance which was concluded towards the end of 578 (beginning of spring 1183) by Suḡmān II and 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd I of al-Mawṡil (a cousin of Kutb al-Dīn Ilghāzī) with the intention of checking Saladin's advance into Mesopotamia. The allies, however, found themselves helpless in face of Saladin's successes and, after the death of Suḡmān II, we find Ilghāzī's troops in the army of Saladin in Syria (Safar 580 = May-June 1184). Ilghāzī II died soon after at the beginning of Djumāda II 580 = Sept. 9 1184. His principality in addition to the areas mentioned also included Dunaisir. His name is mentioned in an inscription on the minaret of a mosque at Mārdīn dated in the year of his accession, but the credit of building it however is given to his father Alpī. On the coins struck by Ilghāzī (bronze only, which are called dirhams, are known) he calls himself "King of the Amīrs" (Malīk al-Umarā) and, like other Ortokid rulers of Mārdīn before and after him, Shāh Diyār Bakr, although he did not rule in Āmid, the metropolis of this district. Ilghāzī II left two sons Ḥusām al-Dīn Volūḡ Arslān, and al-Malik al-Manṡūr Nāṡir al-Dīn Ortoḡ Arslān, who succeeded their father in turn. Nizām al-Dīn Alp-kush, one of Ilghāzī's slaves, married his widow, while one of his daughters was married to Saladin's son, al-Malik al-Mu'izz, about the end of Djumāda I 578 (Sept.—Oct. 1182) or a little later.

ILHĀM means literally "to cause to swallow or gulp down" (Lisān, xvi. 29, especially last two lines). In the Qur'ān it occurs only in xci. 8 — a celebrated but difficult passage — fa'al-hamahā fudjūrahā wa-taḡwāhā, "then he (Allāh) made her (a nafs) swallow down her sins and her godly fear". The oldest exegetical tradition (Ṣabari, Tafsīr, xxx. 115 sq.) gives two explanations: i. Allāh explained these to the nafs; ii. Allāh created these in the nafs. The Mu'tazilites chose the first (Zamakhshari, Kashshaf, ed. Lees, p. 1612) but orthodox Islām generally chose the second, the almost certainly correct view. Thus Rāzī (Mafātīḡ, ed. Cairo, 1308, viii. 438) and Naisabūri (margin of Ṣabari, p. 100) But Baiḡāwī (ed. Fleischer, ii. 405) follows Zamakh-sharī and Abu 'l-Su'ūd (margin of Rāzī, p. 273) follows Baidāwī; cf. Brockelmann, Geschichte, ii. 439. But by far the most important use of ilhām is in connection with the doctrine of saints. Allāh reveals himself in two ways; to men individually by knowledge cast into their minds, and to men generally by messages sent through the prophets. The first, individual, revelation is ilhām; the second, and general, is wahy. Saints, especially, are the recipients of this ilhām, because their hearts are purified and prepared for it. It differs from intellectual knowledge (ilm 'aqli) in that it cannot be gained by meditation and deduction; but is suddenly communicated while the recipient cannot tell how, whence or why. It is a pure gift from the generosity (faid) of Allāh. It differs from wahy only in that the angel messenger who brings wahy may be seen by the prophet and that wahy brings a message to be communicated to mankind, while ilhām is for the instruction of the recipient. From waswās, or satanic whispering in the heart, it differs in respect of the causer — an angel as opposed to a devil; and in the things to which it incites — good as opposed to evil (Ghazālī, Ihyā', ed. with comm. of Sayyid Murtaḍā, vii. 244 sqq., 264 sqq.; D. B. Macdonald, Religious Attitude and Life in Islam, p. 252 sqq., 275 sqq.). But while the fact of ilhām was universally admitted, even Ṣūfīs raised the question of the certainty of the knowledge given by it. So Hudjwiri (Kashf al-mahjūb, transl. Nicholson, p. 271) contends that ilhām cannot give assured knowledge (ma'rifa) of Allāh; but Ghazālī would probably have said that Hudjwiri was using ilhām in the sense of an idea which one found in his mind, and not of the flashing out of the divine light on the soul which, once experienced, can never be mistaken. Others taught that, while it was sufficient for the recipient, it could not be used to convince others or reckoned as a source of knowledge for men in general. This appears to have been Nasafī's position; see his Ak'aid with commentaries of Taf-tāzānī and others, ed. Cairo 1321, p. 40 sq. A very curious use is by Ibn Khaldūn in the sense of "instinct" (Muqaddima, ed. Quatremère, ii. 331, transl. de Slane, ii. 384) but this, though a natural development, does not seem to have been taken up by others. Yet Ibn Ḥazm speaks of ilhām as a ḥabī'a and refers as an illustration to Kur. xvi. 70 on the instinct of bees (Milal, v. 17).

ILI, a large river in Central Asia. Both the rivers Tekes and the Tunes which join to form it, rise in the northern slopes of the Thian-Shan; after their junction the river is called the Ili and then has a course of about 600 miles till it runs into Lake Balkash (q. v., i. 624). At some places it is over half a mile broad. The upper course of the Tekes and the lower course of the Ili belong to the Russian empire, the Kunges, the lower course of the Tekes, and the upper course of the Ili to the Chinese empire. The river has several tributaries, of which the most important are the Kash in Chinese territory and the Čarin and Cilik on Russian territory. As usual in Central Asia, the tributaries are of greater importance for irrigation than the main stream. As soon as the river leaves the mountains and flows into the broad plain and no longer receives tributaries, it practically loses all importance for agriculture. The number of canals led from the Ili on Russian territory is extremely small, but there is one called Ak-Čughan as far down as the lower course of the river, about 15 miles from its mouth; agriculture is there pursued by the Kirgiz.

The Ili is first mentioned in the history of the Chinese T'ang dynasty (vii.—ix. century A. D.). One of the main roads from China to Turkestan led even in those days through the Ili valley (E. Chavannes, Documents sur les Toukioue (Turcs) Occidentaux, St. Petersburg, 1903, p. 11 sq.). The oldest Muhammadan source to mention the river is the Hudūd al-'Ālam (372 = 982-3); in it and in most later works the name is written Ilā. How and when Islām reached here is not known. In the vii.th (xiii.th) century the Ili valley is described as the boundary of the Muslim world. The lands to the east of it were only won for Islām in the Mongol period. On the Muhammadan principality which then existed there, the civilisation of the upper Ili valley in the vii.th—viii.th (= xiii.th—xiv.th) centuries, on the decline of this civilisation and its restoration more recently under the rule of the Calmucks and Chinese, on the last Muhammadan movement and its consequences, and the partition of the country between Russia and China see the article KULĎJA.

Still more scanty are the historical notices of the other parts of the river valley. The name Kunges first appears in the history of Timūr's campaigns (Zafar-Nāma, Ind. ed., i. 481, where it is written Kūngez); the Tekes is mentioned about the same time under the name Teke (in mss. also Yaka). The valleys of the two rivers have always been highly esteemed by nomads as pasture ground. The post route which now crosses the Ili at the village of Ilijskij viselok (the only bridge over the river is here) seems roughly to correspond to the road described by Rubruk in 1253. North of the Ili and south of the mountains (obviously south of the pass of Altin-Imel) there was, according to Rubruk, a town inhabited by Persian speaking Saracens, which he calls Equius (Recueil des Voyages, etc., iv. 280 sq.; F. Schmidt, Über Rubruks Reise, Berlin, 1885, p. 42). From its situation it is the same town which is called at the same time by the Armenian king Hethum IIanbalekh and is called by the Chinese I-la-ba-li or I-li-ba-li i. e. Ili-Balik "town on the Ili" (E. Bretschneider, Mediaeval Researches, etc. i. 169). The same name is used by the Chinese in the xv.th century as that of a district, and it is expressly stated that there are no towns there and that the population consists entirely of nomads (ibid., ii. 242). Below the high road the river breaks through a chain of porphyry rocks where there are Buddhist inscriptions and sculptures of the Calmuck period (xvii.—xviii. centuries); the rocks are therefore called Tamgali-Tas (inscribed stones) by the Kirgiz (N. Pantnsow and A. Pozdnejew in Zapiski Vost. Otd. Arkh. Obsht., xi., 273 sq., with two plates). About a hundred miles below Ilijskij viselok a dried river bed, the Bakanas, runs off from the modern river and reaches the Balkhash in three arms. There are said to be traces here of old canals and ruins of ancient buildings (L. Berg, in Izvestiya Imp. Russkago Geogr. Obshch., xl. 590). To what period and people these remains are to be attributed is doubtful, as the literary sources are absolutely silent as far as is known (we may however here add to the article BALKHASH, i. 624^b, that the lake is mentioned in the Zafar-Nāma, Ind. ed., i. 496, under the name Atrāk Kol). So far no inscriptions have been found there either.

The Ili like all Central Asian rivers is little suited for navigation and has so far not attained any importance in this respect, although several attempts have been made: cf. for example the voyage of L. Berg up the river from Ilijskij viselok to Lake Balkhash in 1903 (op. cit., p. 588 sq.) (W. BARTHOLD.)

ILİYĀ' [see AL-KUDS.]

İL-KHĀNS, Mongol dynasty in Persia, vii.th-viii.th (xiii.th-xiv.th) century. On the foundation of the kingdom and the meaning of the title of its rulers see the article HULĀGŪ (ii. 332^b sq.); on the later rulers see the articles ABĀKĀ (i. 4), ARGHŪN (i. 430^a), GAIKHĀTŪ (ii. 128), BĀIDŪ (i. 591), GHĀZĀN (ii. 149^b sq.) and ABŪ SA'ID (i. 103^b sq.). With the death of the latter on Rabi' II 736 (Nov. 30 1335), the main branch became extinct in the male line; till 754 = 1353-1354, several princes, mainly from branch lines and even a princess, Sāti-Beg, sister of Abū Sa'īd 739-740) ascended the throne, but were not generally recognised. Some historians also include the Djalāir (i. 1003^a) among the İlkhāns; in reality these were only connected with their predecessors in the female line (Hasan the founder of the dynasty was through his mother a grandson of Arghūn).

The kingdom of the İlkhān at the time of its foundation included all the lands from the Oxus to the Indian Ocean and from the Indus to the Euphrates, with the addition of a great part of Asia Minor and the Caucasus countries. Later some lands in the east were lost to the Čaghatāi (i. 813 sq.); on the other hand, the local dynasties, which were at first maintained in South Persia and Asia Minor, were gradually swept away and replaced by governors appointed by the İlkhān. The attempts to take Syria from the Egyptian Sultān met with no success. In Persia itself, in spite of the inevitable consequences of the Mongol conquest and misgovernment of most rulers, this period was in many ways one of progress. After the conquerors under Ghāzān-Khān had definitively adopted Islām new cities arose under their rule such as the extended Tabriz and the new foundation Sultāniya, and splendid edifices like the mausoleum of Khān Uldjāitū in Sultāniya were built. The Mongol rulers naturally had little interest in Muslim theology or Persian belles-lettres; on the other hand, under their patronage the writing of history in Persia developed to an extent unknown before, so that we are much better acquainted with this period than with the events of preceding centuries. Among sciences astronomy, medicine, and mathematics were specially favoured.

'ILLIYŪN is mentioned in the Qur. 83, 18, 19, where it may be a place or a book. It is generally supposed to be a name of the seventh heaven, or of the register of the good deeds of the pious. For the various explanations see Lane's Lexicon, p. 2125 and 2147, and the commentaries on the passage. The word is regarded as a regular plural, or as a plural without a singular; but it is no doubt the Hebrew word 'elyōn (Gen. xiv. 18, etc.).

'ILM is the broadest word in Arabic for "knowledge". In the lexicons it is often equated with ma'rifa and shu'ūr (Lane, p. 2138c), but there are marked distinctions in usage. The verb governs one or two accusatives as it indicates knowledge of a thing or of a proposition (German kennen and wissen). But ma'rifa is "coming to know by experience or reflection", and implies preceding ignorance. It thus cannot, unmodified, be used of Allāh's knowledge. Yet some contested this on the basis of actual occurrences of the word used of Allāh (Kifāyat al-'Awāmm, ed. Cairo 1315, p. 11). Shu'ūr is "perception" especially of details, the shā'ir is the "perceiver", "feeler", and thence "poet". Another early distinction has already been pointed out by Goldziher in his article on Fikḥ (vol. ii. 101 above). 'Ilm, in its early usage, was knowledge of definite things (Qur'an, tafsir, ahkām) but fiḥḥ was the independent exercise of the intelligence. So faḥīḥ (fukahā), was one who was thus intelligent, but that word has come now to indicate a minor canon lawyer or casuist, while 'ālim ('ulamā), following a broadening of the meaning of 'ilm to "science" and of al-'ulūm to "the sciences", has come to mean a scholar in a wide sense and especially one using intellectual processes. Against this change of meaning there is a vigorous protest by Ghazālī, in his Iḥyā, Book i., Bāb 3, who denounces especially that the praises which have come down of the 'ālim as to Allāh, should be applied to these dialecticians and canon lawyers. Further, this brought the 'ālim into sharp distinction on another side from the 'arif, who is the mystical knower by immediate experience and vision, almost, but not quite the same as gnostic. For this distinction of 'ilm and ma'rifa in Sūfī theology see Kūshairī's Risāla, ed. Cairo, 1290, with comm. of Zakariyā, iv. 60 sqq. But when 'ilm became philosophical it had to submit itself to the system of the scholastic theologians (mutakallimūn). They gave it a place in the scheme of Aristotelian predicaments (al-maḥūlāt). There it is an 'araḍ ("accident", in the sense of the older logicians), one of those characterized by life (mukhtaṣṣ bil-ḥayāt), coming (along with will, power etc.) in the class of the modalities (kaifiyāt) of the nafs, the lower or appetitive soul (Mawāḥif of Iḍjī with comm. of Dīrdjāni, ed. Bulāḳ, 1266, pp. 272 sqq.; Dict. of Techn. Terms, p. 1061, cf. pp. 1055—1066). It is divided into eternal (ḥadīm) and originated (ḥādīth, muḥdath), according as it exists in God or in a creature, and there is no resemblance (shabāh) between these two. Originated knowledge is of three kinds: intuitional (baaḥī); necessary (darūrī), by the evidence of the senses and by unanimous assertion (khābar mutawātir), deductive (istidlālī). See the Aḥḥād of Naṣafī with the commentary of Taftāzānī and others, ed. Cairo, 1321, pp. 18 sqq., and for a number of short definitions of ilm see the Taʾrīfāt of Djurdjānī, sub voce. Those scholastic theologians who distinguished between ilm and maʾrifa used ilm of compounds and universals and maʾrifa of simple things (basāʾit; see basīṭ in Djurdjānī's Taʾrīfāt) and particulars (Taftāzānī on Naṣafī, p. 40). Another distinction enters in the relation of ilm to ʿamal, "works" in the theological sense. There is ilm naẓarī, such as knowledge of things; when you know them you have done every thing. But opposed to it is ilm ʿamalī, knowledge of religious duties (al-ʿibādāt); your knowledge is not complete until you have acted upon it (Rāghib, Mufradāt, p. 348). This is put rather differently in the Tanḥīḥ of Ḳarāfī (ed. Cairo, 1306, p. 193). It is the duty of every Muslim to seek knowledge; therefore he who knows and acts on his knowledge has two acts of obedience to his credit; if he neither knows nor acts, he has disobeyed twice; if he knows and does not act, he has obeyed once and disobeyed once. This in the end joins the question as to what is saving faith (īmān).

For a descriptive classification of all the arts and sciences which have been reduced to writing (al-ʿulūm al-mudawwana) see Dict. of Techn. Terms, pp. 2—53. Ibn Khaldūn in his Muḥaddima (Faṣl v. vi.) deals with these more historically and philosophically in their development and their relation to the essential facts of life (De Slane's transl., ii. 319 sqq.; Quatremère's text, ii. 272 sqq.). But with regard to all sciences there is a fundamental distinction. They are divided into those praiseworthy and those blameworthy (al-maḥmūda wa ʿl-madhmiṣma), and among the blameworthy are reckoned those which are not useful for this world or for that to come. The basis is the frequently quoted tradition. "It is of the beauty of a man's Islām that he leaves alone what does not concern him" (mā lā yaʿnīhi). The religious Muslim should therefore avoid such sciences as are not demonstrably useful for this life or for his eternal salvation. (Ghazālī, Iḥyāʾ, Book I, Bāb 2; Ibn Khaldūn, Muḥaddima, ed. Quatremère, iii. 136; Goldziher, Muh. Studien, ii. 157, and review in Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., lxvii. 532; Hudjwiri, Kashf al-Maḥjūb, transl. Nicholson, p. 11).

ILTUTMISH, SHAMS AL-DĪN, the slave and afterwards son-in-law of Ḳuṭb al-Dīn Aibeg [q. v.], who made him governor of Badāʾūn [q. v.]. After the death of Ḳuṭb al-Dīn Aibeg in 607 (1210), his adopted son Ārām Shāh succeeded to the throne, but some of the nobles conspired against him and invited İltutmish to come to Dihlī; Ārām Shāh marched from Lāhūr to meet him, but was defeated and apparently put to death. İltutmish had to contend with rival chiefs before he succeeded in firmly establishing his authority; in 618 he resisted the attempt of the unfortunate Djalāl al-Dīn Manguberti [q. v.] to set up a kingdom in India; later on by a series of successful campaigns he extended his dominions so as to include Lakhnawtī (in 622), Sindh (in 625), and Gwalior (in 630), and his expeditions into Mālwa (in 631—2) brought all India north of the Vindhya Mts. under his sway. He was the first of the Muhammadan princes of India to receive recognition from the Caliph of Baghdad (al-Mustanṣir bi'llāh), and on his coins and in his inscriptions after 626, he styles himself Nāṣir Amīr al-Mu'minin. He continued the building of the great Ḳuṭb Minār [q. v.], which his predecessor had begun.

ILYÄS, the Biblical prophet Elias, is twice mentioned in the Ḳurʾān. In Sūra vi. 83 he is mentioned with Zakariyāʾ, Yahyā, and ʾIsā as one of the ṣāliḥīn without further details. In Sūra xxxvii. 123—130 his history is related in the fashion which is stereotyped for all stories of prophets in the Ḳurʾān. That Muḥammad however knew something more of him is clear from the mention of the Baʿl, which is differently interpreted by the commentators, sometimes as lord, sometimes as an idol who has given his name to the town of Baalbek, sometimes as a woman whom the Israelites served. Verse 130 calls him Ilyāsīn which has given rise to much conjecture; it is however clear from the context that this name was only formed by Muḥammad with his usual freedom to get a rhyme in -in. The commentaries on Sūra xxxvii. 123 sqq., as well as the universal historians and the collectors of legends of the prophets give the following about Ilyās. He lived in the reign of king Aḥāb (Lādjāb in al-Thaʿlabī) and his wife Izabal (variously written). Aḥāb used to follow Ilyās, but the Israelites were worshippers of the Baʿl. One day, however, Aḥāb cast him off saying that the kings who served gods had as much success as he had. Astonished at this Ilyās prayed God to give him power over the rain. Thereupon a drought arose which lasted three years; Ilyās concealed himself during this period but was provided with food. He cured Alisāʾ, the son of a widow, who became his disciple. At the end of the three dry years God reproached him with causing the deaths of many innocent persons by his severity. Thereupon Ilyās proposed to the Israelites that they should appeal to their gods for help and, if they did not hear, they should return to God. The gods could not hear their worshippers and at Ilyās' prayer the desired rain fell. The Israelites however were not converted. Enraged at this obduracy, Ilyās begged God to take him up. When he came out with his disciple Alisāʾ, a fiery horse appeared. Then Ilyās ascended amid the cries of Alisāʾ. God transformed him: he became a feathered being of light exalted above all human passions, half angel and half man, of earth and heaven at the same time. This is the version of al-Ṭabarī.

Al-Thaʿlabī is much more detailed. According to him, Queen Arbil (Jezebel), the representative of Lādjāb, is the incarnation of all wickedness. Her chancellor however is a pious man, who conceals his faith. As in the Bible, here also, the story of Naboth (Naboth is called Mazdakī, obviously an echo of Mordechai) is the cause of Ilyās' exhortation and the king's wrath. Ilyās conceals himself for seven years in ravines. Thereupon Lādjāb's most beloved son falls ill. Four hundred priests of Baal set out to slay Ilyās, the alleged cause of his illness. The latter, however, instils them with such respect that they return full of awe. Lādjāb then sends 50 soldiers who call out to Ilyās that they have been converted. The latter prays God to consume them with fire, if they are lying. This happens and a second body of soldiers meets the same fate. Finally, Lādjāb sends the believing chancellor to the queen with a free conduct and with a treacherous troop. At God's advice Ilyās goes with him to save the chancellor. On the arrival in the palace the child dies, so that the king forgets Ilyās and the latter is able to depart unnoticed. As he wearies of his stay in the mountains he enters the house of the mother of the prophet Jonah who, being then a child, was raised from the dead by Ilyās. He then goes back to the mountains and begs God to give him power over the rain for seven years. He is only granted it for three years during which he himself is fed by the birds. The whole of Israel has now to suffer famine, only one widow is supplied in a miraculous fashion by Ilyās with meal and oil. The rest of the story of Ilyās, the healing of Alisā', etc. is practically the same as that of al-Ṭabarī. Here also Ilyās is described as half mortal and half heavenly, appearing to men on earth. Al-Ṭabarī tells of a man who met Ilyās in Palestine; after talking to him he went away on his camel.

There is another Elias story in the Qur'ān, although the name is not mentioned and the person who here takes the place of Elias is not identified by tradition with him, but with al-Khaḍīr. In Sūra xviii. 64 sqq. it is related how Mūsā and his servant while fishing met a servant of God whom Mūsā wished to follow. The unknown one however replied that Mūsā had not the necessary self-control. While travelling together the servant of God performed several apparently ungrateful and cruel deeds. Mūsā reproached him every time, so that the guide finally separated from him after showing him that each of his supposed wicked deeds was justified. Jewish legend relates a journey of Elias with Joshua ben Levi on which Elias did similar things to those of the unnamed servant of God in the Qur'ān. Here also Joshua ben Levi apparently rightly indignant at them is shown by Elias to be wrong in his premature judgment. The similarity between the two stories is so great that it cannot be doubted that the Qur'ānic one goes back to the Jewish. The unnamed servant of God in the Qur'ān is usually identified with al-Khaḍīr. It should be noted, however, that al-Baidāwī for example says on Sūra xviii. 64: "it is also said that he is Alisā' or that he is Ilyās". This confusion of Ilyās and al-Khaḍīr is significant and further cases may be mentioned. The reason is that in view of the Biblical story of Elias's being taken up to heaven, the latter like al-Khaḍīr is numbered among the immortals. Perhaps al-Khaḍīr's name shows this. Al-Khaḍīr "the green" is only an epithet of the man who was called

B-l-y-ā or, according to another reading, Y-l-y-a, i.e. Ilyās. But elsewhere they are twins, not genealogically, but in their work and common activity. They go together to the fountain of life and drink from it, a trait which was originally only in the Alexander legend, but which again guarantees Ilyās's immortality, as his name shows which is interpreted as al-Ās, "the myrtle", the symbol of immortality. Ilyās and al-Khaḍīr having survived to the first revelation to Muḥammad are said to have wished to die. But Muḥammad is said to have replied to them: "O Khaḍīr, it is your duty to aid my community in the desert and you, O Ilyās, must aid them at sea". Usually however al-Khaḍīr-Glaucos is the sea daemon, while Ilyās is the patron on land. The two spend Ramaḍān each year in Jerusalem, observing the fast. They then make the pilgrimage to Mecca, without any one recognising them, unless God grants this favour. Their food is pond-weed (karafs) and truffles (kam'a). After the pilgrimage they clip one another's hair and separate with eulogies. Any one who repeats these formulas three times at morning and evening is immune against theft, fire, and drowning (sark, hark, ghark), as well as against higher powers, Satan, snakes, and scorpions. Al-Khaḍīr and Ilyās meet every night at Alexander's Dam where they fly in the air. In the Jewish legend he also flies about giving help everywhere. (See also the article AL-KHAḌĪR.)

Besides al-Khaḍīr Muslim legend also knows the immortal Enoch-Idris [q. v.]. Ilyās is therefore sometimes also identified with the latter. In various genealogies of Ilyās he is said to be really Idris. Usually however his genealogy is traced to Aaron: Aaron-Eleazar-Pinehas. The latter is described as his grandfather. The name of his father has become, perhaps from Tisbī, N-s-b-y, Y-s-y, and finally Yāsīn.

It may further be noted that Ilyās, like al-Khaḍīr, is often identified with St. George (see DĪRĪJIS) probably because the latter is also a patron saint.

'IMĀD AL-DĪN MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD AL-KĀTĪB AL-ĪṢFAHĀNĪ, a celebrated Arab stylist and historian, born at Ṣfahān in 519 (1125) of a prominent family, to which the celebrated Kātib al-'Azīz, whose biography is given in Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, ed. Wüstenfeld, N^o. 77, also belonged. On him cf. Recueil des textes relatifs à l'hist. des Seldjoud., ii., Préface xix. sqq. He spent his youth in his native city and in Kāshān, but also studied in Baghdād particularly fikh and made a journey to Mōsul and other places. When the Saldjūk Sultān Muḥammad II besieged Baghdād in vain in 551 (1156), he was there and congratulated the Caliph on its deliverance in a ḥasida, which gained him the favour of the vizier Ibn Hubaira [q. v.]. The latter appointed him nā'ib in Wāsīt; after the vizier's death in 560 (1165) however he lost this office and lived through two difficult years. Finally he applied to the Aiyūbids in Syria, who were acquainted with his family, particularly with the above mentioned al-'Azīz, who was an uncle of Imād al-Dīn. He found a friendly welcome there and was appointed kātib by Sultān Nūr al-Dīn and later mudarris at a madrasa built in honour of him. He was also sent on a diplomatic mission to the Caliph and finally appointed mushrif of the Diwān. On Nūr al-Dīn's death in 569 (1173), however, his enemies were able to supplant him so that he had to leave his offices and go to Mōsul. There he fell ill, but recovered and returned to Syria on hearing that Salāh al-Dīn was preparing to conquer Syria. He congratulated him at his capture of Hims in a poem, won great influence with him and accompanied him on all his campaigns. On Salādin's death in 589 (1193) he retired into private life and devoted himself to literary work till his death in 597 (1201). His chief work is undoubtedly the comprehensive anthology of the Arabic poets of the 10th century entitled Khariḍat al-Qaṣr wa-Diḥridat Ahl al-'Asr (still unpublished). His history of the conquest of Syria is better known: al-Faṭḥ al-kussī fi 'l-Faṭḥ al-Kudsi; Conquête de la Syrie et de la Palestine par Salāh ed-dīn, ed. Landberg, Leiden 1888. He also prepared a history of the Saldjūks in al-'Irāk on a basis of the records compiled by the vizier Anusharwān and called it Nuṣrat al-Fatra wa-'Uprat al-Fitra; a synopsis by al-Bondārī [q. v.] has been published by Houtsma. Of his memoirs, al-Barq al-Sha'mī, only one volume and a few excerpts have come down to us. Imād al-Dīn's prose writings are characterised by an exceedingly ornate and bombastic style.

IMĀD SHĀHĪ DYNASTY, of Berār [q. v.], was founded by Fath Allāh Imād al-Mulk, by birth a Brahman of Vidjayanagar, who had been captured as a youth in an expedition of Ahmad Shāh Bahmanī I to Vidjayanagar and educated as a Muslim. He served under 'Abd al-Kādir Khāndjahān, governor of Berār, and in the reign of Muḥammad III Bahmanī succeeded his master. In 1490 Fath Allāh followed the example of Ahmad Nizām al-Mulk of Ahmadnagar and Yūsuf 'Ādil Khān of Bidjāpūr and declared himself independent, not from disaffection towards Maḥmūd Shāh Bahmanī, but from disinclination to serve the minister, Kāsim Barid, the real ruler of the kingdom, who kept the king in confinement and from whose control Fath Allāh subsequently made a fruitless attempt to release him. Though a native Dakhanī, he was an intimate friend of the foreigner Yūsuf 'Ādil Khān, and his great influence was ever exercised in the interest of peace between the quarrelsome sultāns of the Dakhan. Before he declared his independence, Berār had been divided into the two provinces of Gāwīl and Māhūr, of which he retained the former, but before his death he had added Māhūr to his dominions. He died in 1504 and was succeeded by his son 'Alā' al-Dīn, who was far inferior to him in ability and permitted himself to be drawn into quarrels, in which he had no genuine concern, and from which his kingdom suffered severely, with Maḥmūd Shāh Baīkarah of Guḍjarāt and Sultān Kūli Qutb Shāh of Golkonda. He was also engaged in disastrous warfare with Ahmadnagar regarding the possession of Pāthri, on the Godāwari. He died in 1529 and was succeeded by his son Daryā, a feeble ruler, during whose long reign the influence of Berār in the politics of the Dakhan was on the wane. He played a subordinate part in most of the quarrels between the other Muhammadan sultāns and, having joined the unnatural alliance between the sultān of Bidjāpūr and the rājā of Vidjayanagar against Husain Nizām Shāh I of Ahmadnagar, played a part more creditable to his orthodoxy and his political acumen than to his honesty in secretly helping Husain Nizām Shāh and thus preventing the establishment of Hindu predominance in southern India. For some time before his death Daryā Imād Shāh was completely in the hands of his minister, Tufāl Khān, and when he died in 1560, Tufāl Khān placed his young son, Burhān Imād Shāh, on the throne but kept him a prisoner and governed Berār with hardly a pretence of subordination. Tufāl Khān was attacked by the sultāns of Bidjāpūr and Ahmadnagar for having declined to join the confederacy which finally crushed Vidjayanagar at the battle of Tālikota in 1565, but, though defeated and reduced to great straits, succeeded in playing off one of his enemies against the other and in bribing the sultān of Bidjāpūr to retreat. In 1572 Murtaḍā Nizām Shāh of Ahmadnagar again invaded Berār, on the pretext, on this occasion, of liberating Burhān Imād Shāh from his humiliating position. Murtaḍā captured Narnāla and annexed Berār; and carried off Tufāl Khān and his son, and Burhān Imād Shāh and all his family to a fortress in the kingdom of Ahmadnagar, where they all died in one night. The manner of their death is uncertain, but it was not fortuitous.

IMĀLA (= deflection, Inf. iv. of māla, to bend) is a phonetic phenomenon, which, according to al-Zamakhsharī, consist in the alif inclining to kasra, so that the tone becomes homogeneous (liyatadjanaza 'l-sawt),... the cause is that a kasra or yā occurs near the alif; or that it is changed from a letter moved by kasra or from a yā; or that in a certain position it becomes a yā. It is a question of the transition from long a to ē or ā (the imāla may be shadida "strong" or mutawassifa "of medium strength") under the influence of an adjoining i sound, a kind of Umlaut, which was noticed even by the old Arab grammarians and interpreters of the Qur'ān. The inclining of the short a towards i is also mentioned occasionally. As is clear from al-Zamakhsharī's definition the i sound which causes the imāla needs not actually appear, it may merely exist in the root. Among such words are verbal forms like ramā from the root r-m-y, by analogy also ghazā (in spite of the original w), and nouns like al-falā from f-t-y; also forms from stems with medial y and w like khāfa from kḥawifa*, tāba from ṭayaba*, nāḥun, but bāḥun (med. w). Isolated forms are also found which cannot be explained by these rules: one even speaks of an imāla "as a result of frequent usage". The imāla is prevented by seven consonants, the emphatic ṣ, ṭ, ḍ, ẓ, ḫ, gh and k, when they immediately precede or follow; if they are farther removed from the ā, special rules hold. It is remarkable that these consonants, as the example ṭāba shows, do not prevent the imāla in such forms where the i sound is not actually present in form. A special case arises in connection with r: the syllable ra or ru prevents imāla, just like the emphatic sounds, ri on the other hand often produces imāla where the presence of an emphatic sound would otherwise prevent it.

How far the imāla is to be regarded as a phenomenon characteristic of "classical" Arabic cannot be settled. The very divergent statements of the older authorities are probably to be interpreted to mean that it was only a dialectal peculiarity of certain tribes. Chr. Sarauw, relying on Sibawaihi, has recently endeavoured with success to show that the kind of imāla which is due to the presence of an i sound is common among the eastern Arabs and is relatively modern, while the other variety belongs to the Ḥijāz and represents an original Semitic ē sound. In answering the question as to how far the imāla spread in ancient times the Arabic names and words preserved in transcription in foreign sources are naturally of great importance.

The modern dialects also show a kind of imāla. This must, however, be interpreted differently from the literary imāla. In the Syrian dialect of Beirūt, for example, it depends mainly on the surrounding consonants and only exceptionally (for example with r) does an i sound exercise its influence. This is therefore a spontaneous transition from an a to an ā. The sounds which prevent imāla are in this case not only the emphatic and velar but also the laryngeal.

There has been considerable discussion as to whether the imāla was marked in Arabic script by a final yā, a question which cannot be considered to be definitely settled, in spite of Brockelmann's answer in the affirmative in his Grammatik and Grundriss. In Mss. there is no special sign for imāla. In edited texts however it is usual to indicate it by the figure — under the consonant.

IMĀM (from the Arabic amma, "to precede, to lead") originally "leader", particularly "caravan leader, any one who guides a column of camels," a synonym of hādī; whence also a person or thing who serves as a guide or pattern, e. g. to the pupil in the school (Lisān, xiv. 291). In the Qur'an, the word is found in the meaning of example, leader, pattern, model, or prototype (ii. 118; xv. 79; xxv. 74; xxxvi. 11). Since the foundation of the Muslim community, the term has been applied to the person who indicates the ritual movements of each rak'a to the believers assembled in rows for the canonical service (ṣalat), which those who stand behind the imām copy. Originally the imām was the Prophet himself or in his absence some one authorised by him; after him his successors (kḥulafā') or their delegates filled the office. The conduct of public worship became thus one of the chief attributes of the ruler and the transference of power to the governors of the provinces was seen in a form visible to all when the Caliph's deputy placed himself at the head of the community assembled for prayer. The jurists of Islām therefore give the name imām to the chief of the Muslim community, the spiritual and secular head of the nation, usually called ḫalīfa in his quality of successor to the Prophet. The imām leads the divine service and consequently decides the fate of the social body of which he is chief. His office is called al-imāma al-kubrā, the great imāmate, to distinguish it from al-imāma al-ṣuḡhrā, the office of the man who conducts the service. Every Imām must be chosen (this was the rule at least with the first four caliphs and the Khāridjīs). The electors require the following qualifications: 1. unblemished character, 2. knowledge of law, 3. the necessary insight and ability to judge. The electors living in the rulers's capital legally enjoy no privilege, but in practice, according to ancient custom they do, for the other towns of the empire and the provinces have only to confirm the choice. Candidates for the dignity of imām must possess the following qualities: 1. unblemished life and character, 2. the necessary knowledge of law to exercise iḥtihād [q. v.], 3. eloquence, 4. freedom from any defect in hearing or seeing or in the limbs, 5. the necessary judgment to conduct the affairs of state, 6. the necessary courage to conduct a holy war, 7. descent from the tribe of Quraysh. His authority is recognised by the taking of the oath of fealty (ba'ʿa, q. v.).

The Shīʿī's further demand that the imām should belong to the family of the Prophet, and thus the choice is limited to the descendants of 'Alī and Fāṭima. According to Shīʿī doctrine, 'Alī [q. v. i. 283 sqq.] was appointed imām by a divine ordinance (naṣṣ) promulgated at Ghadir Khumm [q. v.]. This rank is hereditary among his descendants so that the only thing to be decided is, which of his descendants is to be recognised as imām, a question which has frequently produced dissensions in the family of the Prophet. Some sects have excluded the descendants of al-Ḥasan [q. v., p. 274] and only recognised the claims of those of al-Ḥusain [q. v., p. 339] to the imāmate, because the latter married a daughter of the last Sāsānid king, Yazdegerd III. They also consider the imām sinless and infallible (maʿṣūm, see ʿISMA). The most complete series of imāms is that of the ithnā ʿashariya [q. v.].

The Zaidis assert that the texts quoted in support of the assignment of the imāmate to 'Alī do not refer to him directly and personally but only according to his distinguishing marks as imām. They therefore say that a mistake could be made in regard to the description of the individual and that the community could legally choose the two shaiḫs (Abū Bakr and 'Omar) but that 'Alī had a greater right to the imāmate. The former were preferred, although the latter had the greater right. The imām has not the right to appoint his successor; among the Imāmīs however the imām must be known by his predecessor and be regularly designated by him. The Ghutāt (extreme school) teach the divinity of the imām (Ibn Khaldūn, al-Muḥaddima, ed. Quatremère, i. 355 sqq., trans. de Slane, i. 400 sqq.; see ZAIDIYA).

Every masjid [q. v.] has an imām, a principal mosque (djāmi') may have several. The imām is sometimes an official of the town as he has also to supervise the morals and order of the quarter in which his mosque is. In the Turkish empire he has also the office of making out certificates ('ilm u khabar) required for the conveyance of property, the determining of civil status etc.

To avoid any confusion in the two meanings of the word imām, the Persians call the acting leader of worship piṣh-namāz, "leader of prayer", a literal translation of the Arabic imām.

The founders of the four great orthodox schools of law are also called imāms and Abū Ḥanifa was even known among his scholars as al-imām al-a'zam "the greatest imām". This name has also been given to a market place near Baghdād, originally called Ruṣāfa, where Abū Ḥanifa is buried (Cl. Huart, Hist. de Bagdad, p. xiv). Finally, imām has become an honorary title of all scholars who have founded schools.

IMĀM-BĀRĀ A. H. ("enclosure of the Imāms"), a building in which the Muḥarram festival in India is celebrated, and the ta'ziyas [q. v.] are kept when they are not being carried in procession; it sometimes serves also as the mausoleum of the founder and his family; the best-known examples are those in Lucknow and Murshidābād.

IMĀM SHĀH, a saint of the Ismā'īlī Shī'ah sect, whose tomb is venerated at Pīrāna, about 10 m. S. E. of Aḥmadābād [q. v.]; he is said to have come from Persia and to have settled here in the middle of the 15th century, and the Mōmnās (properly Mu'min) trace their conversion to him; but the majority of his followers are Hindus, who do not differ from other Hindus, except for their special devotion to Imām Shāh and their practice of burying the bones of their dead, after cremation, near the tomb of the saint at Pīrāna. He wrote a book of religious precepts, entitled Sikṣhā Patri, which is read by all his followers; some of the Muslim Imāmshāhis read it in preference to the Qur'ān. Some Hindus worship him as a god and in their prayers repeat the words "Imām Kēvalah" (the Imām is the One God), but most of his followers do not consider Imām Shāh to have been more than a religious teacher or a saint.

IMĀMA. [See IMĀM.]

IMĀMĪS. [See IMĀM and ITHNĀ 'ASHARĪYA.]

IMĀN. The basal idea in the root 'MN is rest of mind and security from fear (Rāghib, Mufradāt, p. 24; Lisān, xvi, 160, i. 6 sqq.). In consequence the fourth stem can mean both "to render secure" and "to put one's trust in" something or some one. Hence in theology al-imān means 1) the putting of one's trust, the having faith, in Allāh and his prophet and his message, and 2) the content of that message. A consideration of the first of these uses divides roughly into three; cf. the discussion in al-Ghazālī's Ihyā', Book ii. Faṣṭ iv.

1. The Qur'ān sometimes distinguishes and sometimes confuses imān and islām and is ambiguous as to their relationship to good works. Theological controversy followed, which is mirrored in the traditions, and the technical use of imān in fiqh and kalām is, in consequence, very contradictory. A tradition, assertedly from Muḥammad, says that whoever has in his heart the weight of a grain of faith (imān) will come forth from the Fire. But what here is imān? Some taught that it is simply a holding fast in the mind ('aḳd bil-ḳalb), others added a testifying with the tongue (shahāda bil-lisān); others added a third element, works according to the fundamentals of the faith ('amal bil-arkān). The first has been the position of most Ash'arites and Māturīdites; the second of the Ḥanafites and the third of the Khāridjites. The Karrāmites held that faith was simply acceptance with the tongue (taṣdīq bil-lisān), i. e. confession (iḳrār), the narrower sense of Islām; others, such as the Djahmites, a sect of Djabrites, that it was only knowledge (ma'rifa) of Allāh gained by reason ('aḳl) and of the messages of the prophets gained by revelation. Orthodox Islām has come to the conclusion, which it, as usually, states as having been the position of the Fathers (al-salaf), that faith consists of acceptance in the mind of and firm adherence to a belief (taṣḍīq, i'tikād, q. v.), statement with the tongue of this acceptance (iḡrār, ḥawḥ) and good works. The second is Islām in the narrower sense. He who has all three will enter the Garden. But in the case of one who possesses taṣḍīq and islām and dies with a single mortal sin (kaḥira) unrepented of, the Mu'tazilites held that he was neither a believer (mu'min) nor an unbeliever (kāfir) but a fāsiq, a "reprobate", and that he would remain eternally in the Fire. In the last point the Khāridjites agreed; but they held also that all sins were mortal. Orthodox Islām applies the same name to such an one but holds that eventually he will enter the Garden; for sinful believers the Fire is Purgatory and not Hell, and good works are not of the essence of belief but are additions. At the opposite extreme were the Murdji'ites, the "postponers". Historically they arose in early Islām from the difficulty which the pious found in treating as Muslims those who professed to be Muslims but were yet notoriously evil-doers. The Khāridjites said roundly that such were unbelievers; the Murdji'ites preferred to "postpone" decision until Allāh revealed all secrets. In the meantime they treated as a Muslim him who claimed to be a Muslim. In one form or another and to one degree or another Islām has accepted this position. All who worship towards the Kibla are to be accepted as Muslims, with no questions asked. But the later Murdji'ites developed this into antinomian heresy. It is faith that saves, they taught, and evil works do not hinder the effectiveness of faith, even as obedience in good works cannot save one who is an unbeliever (Van Vloten, Irdja, in Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morg. Gesell., xlv. 161 sqq., Goldziher, Vorlesungen, index sub Murdschī'a). Lastly, there is the case of one who professes Islām and acts as a Muslim, that is, goes through the ritual and external observance of Islām, but has no internal faith. He is a hypocrite (munāfiq) and an unbeliever. In this connection it is to be remembered that "obedience" (ṭā'a) and "good works" (amal ṣāliḥ) in Islām primarily and ordinarily mean obedience to the ritual law (al-'ibādāt).

II. Does faith increase and decrease? In the Qur'ān increase of faith is frequently mentioned and the Fathers (al-salaf) held that it increased with acts of obedience and decreased with acts of disobedience. By this, so later Islām taught, they meant that the mental acceptance (taṣḍīq) remained and that the good works were not to be regarded as parts of it or essentially affecting it but as additions to it by which it was increased in amount. Conversely with acts of disobedience its amount diminished but it itself essentially remained. So the Prophet could speak of faith to the amount of a grain, showing that its amount could vary; and al-Ghazālī shows with great psychological truth and beauty how good deeds go to nourish faith. But the question remained as a subject for verbal dialectic. Those who held that faith (imān) meant acceptance (taṣḍīq) and good works (amal) taught that it increased and diminished, and those who held that faith was simply taṣḍīq taught that there could be no question of quantity in it.

III. There appears to have been an early disinclination to say, "I am a believer" (ana mu'min) without the qualification, in shā' Allāh, "if it be the will of Allāh," and still more with the addition ḥaḳḳan, "in verity," or "really, or 'inda 'llāhi", in the sight of Allāh." Examples are quoted in al-Ghazālī's Iḥyā', Book ii., Faṣl iv., Maṣ'ala iii.; cf. the commentary of the Saiyid al-Murtaḍā. Hence the Ash'arites with the mass of Shāfi'ites, Mālikites and Hanbalites insisted on adding in shā' Allāh, while the Māturīdites and Ḥanafites prohibited it and permitted the addition of ḥaḳḳan. They urged that to say "If it be the will of Allāh" implied doubt (shakk) and doubt in such a connection meant unbelief (kufur). In reply the Ash'arites argued that the formula was used not to imply doubt of the reality of the absolute acceptance in the mind, but a) to guard against a making of one's self out to be pure (taṣkiyat al-nafs: cf. Kur. iv., 52, liii. 33); b) out of courtesy (ta'ad-dub) and to gain a blessing (tabarruk) by submitting all things to the will of Allāh; c) to express a doubt as to the perfectness of the faith in question though not as to its reality or, if works are reckoned a part of faith, a doubt as to whether there will be works; and d) to express a doubt as to whether Allāh will permit the believer in question to die in the faith, for all things must be judged by their ends (ḥawātim). For the Ash'arite side see al-Ghazālī, reference above, and for the Māturīdite, al-Taftāzānī's commentary on the Aḳā'id of al-Nasafī, ed. Cairo 1321, p. 127 sqq.

'IMĀRET (A.), "huilding", "edifice", the name given in Turkey to eating-houses or hostels where schoolchildren and theological students receive their meals, which consist of bread and one or two hot dishes of mutton and vegetables. Similarly, such food along with a small present in money of 3—5 aspers a day per person, sometimes even as much or 10 aspers, is given to the poor. These institutions are maintained by pious foundations. The first of the kind was erected by Sultān Orkhān in 1336 in Nicaea (Iznik) and devoted to the good of mankind; at the opening he presided in person, distributed food to the poor and was the first to light the lamps and candles. Murād II did the same thing after a feast which he had given to the 'ulamā' of his court in the 'imāret. At the end of the xviii.th century the imārets of Constantinople fed over 30,000 people every day. There is an imāret beside each of the great imperial mosques Aya Ṣofya (kitchen founded in 1155 = 1742 by Mahmūd I), Bāyazid, Fātiḥ, Selimiye, Sulaimāniye, Ahmediye, Nūr-i Oṯmāniye, etc. In Persia, where the word is 'emāret, it means "palace", e. g. Shems-'emāret, the "Sun-Palace" at Teherān.

'IMRĀN, the Biblical 'Amrām, was the son of Yizhar b. Kāhūth b. Lāwī, and married Yūkhābid, who bore him Mūsā in his seventieth year. He lived 137 years (Ibn al-Athīr, i. 119, al-Tha'labī, p. 99; al-Kisā'i, p. 201, and Tabarī, i. 443). This account differs from the Biblical in so far as, according to Exodus, 6, 20, Amram was son of Kehat and brother of Yizhar, and reached the age of 137. 'Imrān was appointed grandvizier of Egypt and had to keep watch every night by Fir'awn's bed (al-Kisā'i, p. 201). One night he saw a bird in Fir'awn's apartments, carrying his wife upon its wings. He was at once enflamed with love for her and had intercourse with her. The bird then took her back home, without the thousand watchers outside the royal palace noticing. Next morning the astrologers announced to the king that the conception of his future enemy had just taken place and also that his star was in the ascendant and brilliant. Fir'awn ordered the midwives of Egypt to seek out and register the pregnant women from house to house. They did not however dare to examine Fir'awn's wife, as they knew that 'Imrān did not leave Fir'awn's side. Mūsā thus escaped certain death (al-Kisā'i, ibid.). The Talmud likewise describes Amram as the most prominent man in Egypt (Sotā 12; Baba B. 120; Exodus R. i. 13). The 'Imrān mentioned in the Qur'ān (Sūra iii. 31), whose wife dedicated the fruit of her womb to Allāh, is not identical with the Biblical 'Amrām or 'Imrān. Tha'labī (p. 220) expressly mentions this, with the note that there was an interval of 1800 years between the two bearers of this name. The Qur'ān also speaks of 'Imrān b. Māthān or b. Sāhīm, whose wife Ḥanna, daughter of Fākhūdh, was the mother of Maryam and the grandmother of Jesus. Our 'Imrān b. Māthān would thus be identical with the Jakob b. Matan of Matthew xv. (cf. MARYAM).

'IMRĀN b. HIṬṬĀN AL-SADŪSĪ, an Arab poet born in Baṣra, a pious man learned in the Qur'ān and Tradition, who is numbered among the second class of the Baṣra Ṭābi'ūn and transmitted traditions on the authority of 'Ā'isha and of some Companions of the Prophet, but in his old age is said to have been won over by his wife to the Khāridjis. As he was already too infirm to serve them with the sword, he is reckoned among the ka'ada (see Brünnow, Die Charidschiten, p. 29). He worked for the cause of his party as a preacher and particularly as a poet, for example he celebrated 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Mulḍjam, the murderer of 'Alī, in a poem. When al-Ḥadīdjādī became governor in the 'Irāq and began to persecute the Khāridjis, he had to flee to Syria and found a hospitable welcome with Rawḥ b. Zinbā'. When his stay here became known to 'Abd al-Malik, he escaped to the Djaṣīra to Zufar b. al-Ḥārith in Karkisiyā. There he was also soon betrayed and now went to 'Omān, where admirers of Abū Bilāl Mirdās b. Udayia received him. When al-Ḥadīdjādī again discovered his whereabouts, he found a final refuge in Rūdh Maisān not far from Kūfa, where he died.

'IMRĀN b. SHĀHĪN played a great role in the swamps (Baṭā'ih, q. v.) of the lower Euphrates at the beginning of the Būyid rule. A native of al-Djāmida, a village between Wāsiṭ and Baṣra, he had to go into hiding on account of a crime he had committed and henceforth led the life of a robber, for which the neighbourhood offered excellent opportunities. He then entered into an alliance with Abū 'l-Kāsim al-Baridī [see AL-BARIDĪ], who found in him the most suitable man to defend the swamps against his enemies. As his robberies however made the road to Baṣra unsafe, the Būyid Mu'izz al-Dawla was more than once forced to send troops against him, but they could do nothing in view of the nature of the country and were usually enticed to some place from which it was impossible for them to return. From sheer necessity Mu'izz al-Dawla appointed him governor of the district, which did not however prevent 'Imrān and his robbers from occasionally renewing their activity again. Repeated attempts by Mu'izz al-Dawla and his successor Bakhtiyār to put an end to this state of affairs by force met with no better success. Till his death in 369 = 979 'Imrān remained master of the swamps and transmitted his power to his son Ḥusain. 'Aḍud al-Dawla had the same experiences with him as his predecessors with his father. Ḥusain however was slain in 372 = 982-3 by his brother Abū 'l-Faraj, and the latter met the same fate in the following year at the hands of the Ḥādijb al-Muẓaffar b. 'Alī [q. v.] who had been leader of the army during his father's rule and now appointed a minor son of Ḥusain named Abū 'l-Ma'ālī as ruler, but soon afterwards put himself in his place by means of a forged appointment from the Būyid Ṣamṣām al-Dawla. Once again, in 412 = 1022, a son of 'Imrān, Abū 'l-Ḥaidjā' Muḥammad, attempted to gain power but met with no success.

AL-'IMRĀNĪ, MU'IN AL-DĪN AL-HINDĪ, born in Dihli, studied with the 'ulamā' of his native land and became a renowned scholar. He spent a large part of his life in teaching students at Dihli. At first Mu'īn al-Dīn much disliked the saints of the Čishtī order and especially Naṣir al-Dīn Maḥmūd, known as Čirāgh-i-Dihli, "light of Dihli" (d. 757 = 1356), who was his contemporary, but the latter's spiritual power and piety induced him to sit at his feet and at last to become his disciple. He was a great favourite of Muḥammad II b. Taghlaḥ (725-752 = 1324-1351) who sent him to Shirāz to induce al-Kāḍī 'Aḍud al-Dīn al-Idjī (d. 756 = 1355) to come to Dihli and adorn his court. Our author repaired there but instead of persuading the kādī, he was himself persuaded to pass the remainder of his life there.

He is the author of the following works: 1. a commentary on 'Abd Allāh b. Aḥmad al-Nasafī's compendium of Muḥammadan law according to the Ḥanafī school Kanz al-Dakā'ik; 2. a commentary on Sirādj al-Dīn Yūsuf b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī al-Sakkākī's (d. 626 = 1229) Miftāḥ al-

^c*Ulūm*; 3. a commentary on Muḥammad b. Muḥammad al-Akhsikātī's (d. 644 = 1246) al-Muntakhab fi Uṣūl al-Dīn, a work on the principles of Muḥammadan law according to the Ḥanafī school.

IMRU' AL-ḲAIS, an Arab poet of the vith century A.D., whose real name was HUNDUJ b. HUḌJR, belonged to the tribe of Kinda which had migrated from the Yaman. His ancestor, HUḌJR AKIL al-Murār, had founded (about 480) a principality in Naḡd which declined under his successors. On account of his inclination to love affairs, particularly on account of a poem which he dedicated to his beloved Fāṭima bint al-'Ubaid of the tribe of the Banū 'Udhra, Imru' al-Ḳais was banished by his father HUḌJR. The latter is even said to have ordered his freedman Rabī'a to murder his son but Rabī'a instead slew a young antelope (djawdhar) and brought its eyes to HUḌJR (Ibn Ḳutaiba, Kit. al-Shī'r, p. 48, lines 7—11). After HUḌJR had fallen in battle with the rebel Banū 'Asaḍ, his son deprived of his kingdom began to lead a wandering life (whence his nickname al-malik al-dillīl, "the wandering king"). Pursued by his enemies, he fled to Samaw'al, the ruler of Taimā, who lived in the citadel of al-Ablak, and practised a Jewish Christian religion.

About 530 the Emperor Justinian summoned him to Constantinople with the intention of using his services against the Persians on the advice of the Ḡhassānid al-Ḥārith V "the Lame", the phylarch of the Syrian Limes. After a longish stay in the capital he was appointed governor of Palestine and of the border tribes there, with the title of phylarch, but while on his way to take up his office he died at Angora (between 530 and 540; cf. Nöldeke, art. MO'ALLAKĀT in the Encycl. Brit.). According to Arab legend, he was poisoned by order of Justinian whom he had insulted by seducing his daughter, by means of a robe of honour which covered his body with sores (whence the name Dhu 'l-Kurūh, which tradition gives him), although there never was a princess corresponding to this description at the court of Justinian or of his successor Justin II.

He is said to have been the first to submit Arabic verse to fixed rules, and laid down definite laws for the rhymes. He also introduced that kind of qaṣida, in which the poet asks two friends to stop and weep, and thus gave new life to the ancient stock of Arabic poetry, which had so far been limited to the radīaz. The form however in which his verses have come down to us is not original, although Sir Charles Lyall has pointed out that the use of a rare form of the baṣīṭ metre as well as the agreement between the methods followed by Imru' al-Ḳais and 'Abid b. al-Abras guarantee the absolute genuineness of the poem. He was a freethinker: when he saw that fate prevented him from avenging the death of his father, he threw the three arrows with which divinations were made, at the head of the idol Dhu 'l-Khalasa in the town of Tabāla.

His name means "the man of Ḳais", although it is not certain, whether Ḳais is a masculine pseudonym of the goddess Manāt, or the name of her sanctuary (Euting, Nabataische Inschriften aus Arabien, No. 2; Ph. Berger, Histoire de l'écriture,

One of his qaṣida's in preserved in the collection entitled Mu'allakāt (Lat. trans. by L. Warner [ed. by Lette]; Engl. by Sir W. Jones, London 1782; Swedish by B. M. Bolmeier, Lund 1824; French by de Sacy in Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr., Vol. i. 411; German by Noldeke and by Gandz, see Bibliography). In the editions of the text of this collection the Mu'allaka of Imru' al-Ḳais is usually accompanied by the commentary of al-Zawzani (first publ. by Hengstenberg, Bonn 1823); the commentary of al-Nahḥās has been published in extracts by Lette (Leiden 1748) and completely by E. Frenkel (Halle 1876), the commentary of al-Tabrizi by Ch. Lyall in A Commentary on ten ancient Arabic Poems (Calcutta 1894). The Diwān of Imru' al-Ḳais was published by de Slane (Le Divan d'Amro'lkais, Paris 1837), by Ahlwardt (The Diwans of the Six Ancient Arab Poets, London 1870, p. 115 sqq., cf. 196 sqq.), in Bombay 1313, and with the commentary of 'Āṣim b. Aiyūb al-Batal-yūsi in Cairo 1282; a free German translation was given by Rückert (Amrilkais, der Dichter und König, Stuttgart and Tübingen, 1843).

INĀL, AL-MALIK AL-AṢHRAF SAIF AL-DIN AL-'ALĀ'Ī (so called from his first owner) AL-ZĀHIRĪ (after Sulṭān al-Malik al-Zāhir, Barḳūk, q. v.) AL-ADJRUD (the beardless), Sulṭān of Egypt and Syria, reigned from 857—865 = 1453—1460. Purchased as a slave by Sulṭān Barḳūk he entered his Mamlūk corps. His son Sulṭān al-Nāṣir Farāḍī [q. v.] set him free and enrolled him in the corps of the Djāmdār [q. v.]. Under Sulṭān al-Mu'ayyad Shaikh he became khāṣṣiki (a member of the body guard) and on the latter's death, amir of 10 Mamlūks. He rose to higher offices under Sulṭān Barsbey. He first of all became ṭablakhūne (officer accompanied by a band), then second ra' nōba (deputy chief of the watch); in 831 he was appointed governor of Ghazza. Two years later he accompanied Sultān Barsbey in the campaign against Āmid (Diyār Bakr) which met with little success. When the Sultān wished to place this frontier area under reliable administration, he appointed Ināl governor of the almost entirely destroyed town of al-Ruhā (Edessa). Ināl as well as others after him declined to accept this office, but finally the Sultān induced him to do so by granting him the fief of an amir of a 1000 (taqdima, q. v.) together with the salary of a governor. After two years he was summoned to Cairo as amir of a 1000 (without office, at the disposal of the Sultān) and in 840 sent as governor to Šafad. When Sultān Çakmak ascended the throne, he summoned him to Cairo in 843 and appointed him amir of a 1000 without office and in 846 Great Dawādār. In 848 he became Atābek (commander of the army) and as such was chosen Sultān in place of Çakmak's son Othmān, who was unable to hold his position after his father's death, in a rising of the Mamlūks. Although he was now 73, he was able to maintain himself on the throne by meeting the wishes of the Mamlūks as far as possible and often proving a too indulgent master for them. Sultān Ināl's reign was on the whole beneficial. Although he could not curb the arrogance of the Mamlūks, he succeeded in healing another wound in his kingdom. Amid great difficulties he carried through a reform of the currency. The debased silver money which his predecessors had struck was gradually withdrawn from circulation and new and improved coins issued. In foreign politics also he was fortunate. He was on the best terms with the Prince of the White Sheep, with the prince of Albistān [q. v.] (in southern Asia Minor), and particularly with the great conqueror of Constantinople, the Ottoman Sultān Muḥammad, to whom he sent a special embassy to offer congratulations on the conquest of Constantinople. Where necessary he was not afraid to fight. He drove out the prince of Karamān who had taken several fortified places in Cilicia from him and forced him to make peace. He was involved in European politics by the relations which had connected Cyprus with Egypt since the reign of Barsbey. In order to deprive the corsairs who ravaged Syrian ports of a base, Barsbey had taken Cyprus in 830 and forced King Janus to recognise his suzerainty and reinstated him on the payment of tribute. A small Egyptian garrison remained on the island. When one of his successors, John II, died in 862 = 1456, his daughter Charlotte was made queen. His natural son, James, Archbishop of Nicosia, who feared for his safety, fled to Egypt and set up there as a pretender. Both parties endeavoured to gain Ināl's recognition and after wavering a long time (the ambassador of the Grand Master of the Knights of St. John of Rhodes intervening) he decided in favour of Charlotte. But the Mamlūks inclined to James and forced the Sultān to send him to Cyprus with a fleet. With its help James occupied the capital Nicosia without opposition. But when the siege of Cerines dragged on, the Egyptian fleet returned to Egypt, its Admiral apparently having been bribed by the queen, and only left a small garrison in Cyprus with whose help James held out but was unable to deprive Charlotte of her territory (for further developments see KHOSHĀDAM). Ināl was a mild and kindly ruler, and as far as lay in his power, his subjects were ruled justly and lightly. He died in 865 = 1460. His son Aḥmad, whom he had acknowledged on his death-bed, was a far-seeing ruler who aimed at the good of the community, but he was not able to control the indisciplined Mamlūks, so that he was only able to hold the throne for four months.

INĀT, a town in Ḥaḍramūt, south east of Tarim, on the wādī of the same name. The family of Shāikh Abū Bakr, the only Saiyid family in Ḥaḍramūt to bear arms, lives here. It has two munṣib's of whom one is chief of the Banū Thanna [see ḤADRAMAWT]. In the eighties of last century there lived in Ināt the greatest saint of Ḥaḍramūt, Saiyid Muḥsin b. Sālim, of the family of Shāikh Abū Bakr, to whom people made pilgrimages from the whole country and from more distant lands, such as the Indian Archipelago, on account of the miracles performed by him. Ināt is the most important Ḥawṭa [q. v.] in South Arabia. According to a statement in an Arabic newspaper (al-Diawātib of Rabī' al-awwal 18 1299 = Febr. 8 1882), the town had 5000 inhabitants, according to van den Berg, however, only 1000. The forms Inan, Ainan, Ainad in Ritter and, more recently, Ā'ināt in Hirsch for Ināt are due to a false transcription.

INĀYAT ALLĀH KANBŪ, author of the Bahār-i Dānish [q. v.] and of a universal history up to the reign of Shāhjahān, entitled Ta'rikh-i Dilkushā; he held office in Lāhōr under the Mughal government, but in later life retired from the world and devoted himself to prayer and the study of theology; he died in 1080 (= 1669), or, according to others, in 1082, at the age of 65, and his brother, Muḥammad Šālih [q. v.], who died five years after him, was buried by his side. During his life-time, he had erected an imposing octagonal building, with a dome supported by four lofty arches, for his place of burial; the tombs of the two brothers were of red sand-stone, but were destroyed by the Sikhs, who turned the building into a powder magazine; after the conquest of the Panḍjāb by the English, it was used first as a private residence, but is now a church.

INDIA (BRITISH). 1. Ethnology. According to the census of 1911 the total population of British India was 315,156,396, out of which 66,647,299 persons were returned as Muslmāns. To this total the province of Bengal contributed nearly 24 million, the Pandjāb nearly 11 million, the United Provinces over 6½ million, the Province of Bombay 4 million (more than 2⅓ million of whom were in Sind), Madras 2⅓ million (953,381 of whom were found in the single district of Malabar), Kashmir nearly 2⅓ million, and the North-West Frontier Province over 2 million. This Muslim population is unequally distributed among the adherents of other religions in various parts of the country; the largest proportion is found in the North-West Frontier Province where there are 2,039,994 Musulmāns, or 93 per cent, out of a total population of 2,196,933; in the opposite corner of India, in Bengal, 23,989,719, or 53 per cent, are Musulmāns out of a total of 45,483,077, the proportion ranging from 13 per cent in West, to 59 per cent in North, and 68 per cent in East, Bengal; in Kashmir there are 2,398,320 Musulmāns out of a population of 3,158,126, i. e. about 76 per cent of the inhabitants of this state; in the Pandjāb they form more than half the total population. In the United Provinces, one of the chief historic centres of the Mughal empire, there are only 6,658,373 Musulmāns out of a total population of 47,181,044, i. e. about 14 per cent, and in other provinces the proportion is still lower; e. g. in the Mysore state, in spite of the proselytising zeal of Haidar 'Alī [q. v.] and Tipū Sultān [q. v.], there are only 314,494 Musulmāns, or 5 per cent, out of a population of 5,806,193. In the Haidarābād state, embracing territory that has been under Muhammadan rule since the 14th century, there are only 1,380,990 Musulmāns, or 10 per cent, out of a total of 13,374,676, chiefly Hindus; while, on the other hand, it is noticeable that the Muhammadans are relatively more numerous in North Bihār, which has been from ancient times the home of Hinduism and Brahman domination, than in South Bihār, where there are old Muhammadan centres such as Patna and Monghyr. The proportion sinks so low as 2.7 per cent in Orissa, though this province was under the rule of Afghāns for several centuries.

Within this Muhammadan population of over 66 million there is a great ethnological diversity. One broad distinction may be drawn between the descendants of foreign Muslim immigrants on the one hand and of the indigenous converts on the other. Among the latter, the physical types that are most numerous represented are (1) the Indo-Aryan type, occupying the Pandjāb, Rādjputāna and Kashmir, to which belong the Rādjput and Džāt Musulmāns, (2) the Aryo-Dravidian type, found in the United Provinces and Bihār, and (3) the Mongolo-Dravidian type, represented by the majority of the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal. (See Census of India, 1901, Vol. I, Ethnographic Appendices, p. 50 sqq.).

Though by far the larger proportion of the indigenous Muhammadan population owes its origin to the lower Hindu castes or to outcasts, still there are few of the higher castes that have not at one time or another contributed converts to Islām. Brahmins were forcibly converted amid the savageries of conquest, or in periods of intolerance under some settled Muhammadan government; other Brahmins embraced Islam through the persuasion of Muslim missionaries, or to gain some social or financial advantage.

From the warrior castes Islām has received large accessions from the earliest days of its entrance into India. Rādjput Musulmāns are found in large numbers in the Pandjāb and to a less extent in the United Provinces and Rādjputāna; in some cases tradition ascribes the conversion of their ancestors to the influence of Muslim saints, e. g. the Rādjputs of the city of Pānipat assert that their ancestor was converted by a saint named Abū 'Alī Kalandar who died there in 1324 A. D.; in other cases, the change of faith was determined by political or social motives, e. g. in northern India there are several Rādjput families, the ancestor of one branch of which is said to have become a Muhammadan, in order to save the family property from confiscation.

From the lower castes among the Hindus there has been a constant stream of accessions during the whole Muhammadan period (for details, see the publications of the Ethnographic Survey of India), as well as from the aborigines of the country who stood outside the pale of Hinduism. Definite historical evidence of these conversions is for the most part wanting. In the case of the various Mongoloid or Mongolo-Dravidian tribes of Eastern Bengal, there was probably a mass-movement towards Islām on their part; adherence to the new faith raised them out of the despised condition to which the higher Hindu castes consigned them.

The Musulmāns of foreign origin are numerically fewer than the descendants of native converts, but their influence in the history of Muhammadan civilisation in India has been vastly more important; the various conquerors, Arabs, Turks, Pathāns and Mughals, brought into the country large bodies of foreign troops, whose services they rewarded by grants of land; when their power was established, their courts attracted into India military adventurers, poets, scholars and theologians, most of whom remained and settled in the country; this movement of immigration went on during the whole period of Muhammadan ascendancy and has not even ceased under British rule. One example may be taken from the 13th century, when the devastations of the Mongols had spread terror through the Muslim kingdoms of Central and Western Asia; refugees made their way into India from 'Irāk, Khurāsān, Dailam, Turkistān, etc., and in the reign of Sultān Balban [q. v.] as many as 15 wards of the city of Dihli are said to have taken their names from such refugees.

Of these foreign immigrants, the first to enter India were the Arabs who invaded Sind under Muhammad b. Kāsim in 712; the trade in spices, gems, etc., early attracted Arab merchants to the west coast of Southern India, and the Mapillas [q. v.] are descended from the Hindu women they married. Thus from the earliest period of the Muhammadan occupation to modern times there has been an immigration of Arabs into India; their numbers have been small, but their influence has been profound and wide-spread. There was a Saiyid dynasty in Dihli from 1413 to 1451, and one in Bengal from 1493 to 1537; a dynasty of Arab origin ruled over the kingdom of Khāndēsh from the 14th to the 16th century; in the second decade of the 18th century two Saiyids of Bārha for 7 years enjoyed the position of king-makers and set whomsoever they chose on the throne of Dihli. As administrators, generals, men of letters, teachers and saints, the Saiyids in India have played an important part in the history of Mu-hammadan civilisation. Among them there have been several families whose influence has been continuous from generation to generation. The Saiyids of Bārha formed a group of considerable political importance, and various members of it held high and important posts under the Mughal emperors for nearly two centuries, from Akbar's reign onwards; they claimed the privilege of leading the charge in the van of battle. (Blochmann, Āin-i-Akbarī, i. 390 sqq.). The Bukhārī Saiyids, who claim descent from Saiyid Djalāl al-Dīn Surkh-pōsh Bukhārī (who is said to have settled in Ūch [q. v.] in 642 A. H.), and the Gilānī Saiyids, the descendants of Bandagī Muḥammad Ghawth (himself descended from the Kādirī saint Saiyid 'Abd al-Kādir al-Djilī [q. v.]), who also settled in Ūch in 887 A. H., have contributed to the annals of Muslim hagiology a large number of saints who filled an important place in the religious life of their country and whose shrines are still venerated, especially in the north and north-west of India.

Numerically, the Arabs form the smallest group of Indian Muhammadans of foreign origin. Another important group, likewise not numerous, is made up of the descendants of the Turkī invaders, to whom the establishment of Muhammadan rule in India is really due; Maḥmūd of Ghazni was a Turk, as also were the generals of Muḥammad Ghōrī, who founded dynasties in Dihlī and elsewhere, and Bābar, the founder of the so-called Mughal empire; the founders of the 'Ādil Shāhī, Kuṭb Shāhī and Barīd Shāhī dynasties were all Turkish officers. These men achieved greatness out of a large number of soldiers of fortune and mercenaries, whose fate was more obscure. Timūr settled a number of families of Karlugh Turks in what is now the Hazāra District [q. v.] (forming part of the North-West Frontier Province), on his return from his invasion of India in 1399, and their descendants are found there to the present day. A group of Kizilbāsh migrated from Kābul to the Panjāb as recently as 1842 and their descendants have received grants of land and are permanently settled in the country.

Among the smaller groups of immigrants special mention must be made of the Persians, whose influence on Muhammadan culture in India has been considerable. Saints, religious teachers, poets and men of letters, as well as soldiers and statesmen, have brought into India the refinement and subtlety of the Persian genius. Traders from the Persian Gulf settled in the cities of Gujjarāt as early as the 9th century. The Ghōrīs and their Tadjik followers belonged to the Iranian race. Reference has already been made to the refugees who fled into India to escape the savage onslaught of the Mongols; political troubles have driven Persians in other periods also to take refuge in India, e. g. in the 18th century some fled from their country when the Afghāns brought the Ṣafavid dynasty to an end in 1722, and others when Nādir Shāh seized the throne in 1736. Naturally, many Persians were attracted to the Shī'ah kingdoms in India, and Persian mercenaries still come as recruits to the Persian regiment of the Nawwāb of Cambay [q. v.].

A small number of Abyssinians or Somālīs, known as Habashī or Sidī, settled in Western India; mention of them as soldiers and sailors is found as early as the 13th century. The Sidīs were admirals of the Mughal fleet, and a dynasty of Habashī kings ruled over Bengal from 1486 to 1490; the chiefs of Djandjira [q. v.] and Sačin [q. v.] are also of Habashī origin.

The largest group of foreign stock is that of the Afghāns or Pathāns, who are found in greatest number in the north-west, but also as far east as Bengal and as far south as the Dakhan. The terms Afghān and Pathān are used indifferently by the natives of India to designate this large group of the Muhammadan population, but it is a matter of dispute as to whether the original Afghān and Pathān stocks were the same, or whether a purely Indian origin must not be assigned to the Pathāns [cf. AFGHANISTAN, i. 149^b]. There has been a constant stream of immigration from Afghānistān into India, from the end of the 12th century up to modern times. Most of the Muhammadan conquerors of India have entered the country through Afghānistān and have brought in their armies large numbers of Afghān soldiers, who received grants of land as military fiefs and settled in the country. Of the Afghān tribes found in India, the most widely distributed are the Yūsufzai, of whom a body of 1200 accompanied Bābar in his final invasion of India, and settled in the plains of Hindustān and the Panjāb. Migrations on a large scale into the fertile plains of India have also taken place at various times, e. g. during the period of the Lōdī (1451—1526) and Sūr (1540—1555) Sultāns of Dihlī, the Prāngī and Sūr tribes from which these dynasties sprang, and their neighbours, the Niyāzī, appear to have migrated almost bodily from Afghānistān into India. The great bulk of the Balōch has similarly migrated across the border into India; there are about ten times as many of them in India as in the whole of Balōchistān [q. v., i. 636 sq.].

2. POLITICAL HISTORY:

A. under Muhammadan rule.

The introduction of Islām into India dates from the invasion of Sind [q. v.] in 712 by Muḥammad b. al-Kāsim [q. v.]. This led to a permanent occupation of the valley of the Indus as far north as Multān, but the rest of India was unaffected, and it was not until the close of the 10th century that a fresh invasion began with the raids of Maḥmūd of Ghazni [q. v.], which extended as far east as Kālingjar in Eastern Bundelkhand and as far south as Sōmnāth; but the province of Lāhōr was the only part of the country permanently occupied by his troops. The conquest of the rest of India dates from the campaigns of Muḥammad Ghōrī [cf. GHORIDS, p. 162-3] and his generals (1175—1203); on his return to Ghazni he committed the charge of the military operations to Kuṭb al-Dīn Aibeg [q. v.], who became the first of the Sultāns of Dihlī; the conquests of his general, Muḥammad b. Bakhtiyār [q. v.], extended his authority over the greater part of Bengal. When Muḥammad Ghōrī died in 1206, the greater part of India north of the Vindhya had been subjugated by his Turkī officers, some of whom now became practically independent sovereigns. But the Sultāns of Dihlī claimed a suzerainty, which they were sometimes able to enforce, over the other Muslim states. Thirty-four sovereigns reigned in Dihlī from 1206 to 1526; they fall into five dynasties, 1. the Slave kings, 1206—1290; 2. the Khaldjīs, 1290—1320; 3. the Taghlaks, 1320—1413; 4. the Saiyids, 1414—

1451, and 5. the Lōdis, 1451—1526. During this period the Muhammadan conquests were extended further to the east and the south, in spite of frequent internal conflicts and revolutions, and the disasters caused by the inroads of Mongol hordes, at intervals from 1223 to 1305, and by the invasion of Timūr [q. v.] in 1398-1399. Outlying provinces took advantage of the weakness of the suzerain power, and a number of independent kingdoms arose which were ultimately absorbed in the Mughal empire; for an account of these, see the separate articles BENGAL, DĀWNĀPŪR, GUJARĀT, MĀLWĀ, KHANDESH, BĀHMĀNĪ DYNASTY (and the five dynasties that arose on the ruins of the Bāhmānī kingdom, BARĪD SHĀHĪ, ĀDIL SHĀHĪ, NIZĀM SHĀHĪ, KŪTĪB SHĀHĪ and ĪMĀD SHĀHĪ). The invasion of Bābur [v. BABER] and his defeat of Ibrāhīm Lōdī in the battle of Pānīpat [q. v.] in 1526 laid the foundations of the Mughal empire, but his son, Humāyūn [q. v.], was driven from his throne for 15 years, and the Afghān Sher Shāh [q. v.] established the Sūr dynasty, which ruled in Dihli from 1540 to 1555. Humāyūn regained his kingdom in 1555 but died the following year. His successor, Akbar [q. v.], was engaged in warfare during the greater part of his long reign (1556—1605), and brought under his authority the Muhammadan kingdoms of Gujjarāt, Bengal, Kashmīr and part of the Dakhan [q. v.], and after breaking down the opposition of the Rājapūts reconciled them to his rule by the wise policy he followed of conciliating his Hindu subjects. His son, Dīhāngīr [q. v.] (1605—1627), and his grandson, Shāhjahān [q. v.] (1627—1658), kept intact the Indian dominions of Akbar, and Aurangzēb [q. v.] (1658—1707) brought the Mughal empire to its greatest extent by the conquest of the last of the independent kingdoms of the Dakhan, Bidjāpur [q. v.] and subjected the whole of India as far south as Tanjore to his rule; but his intolerant policy towards the Hindus alienated the Rājapūts, and the last twenty years of his life were spent in a vain attempt to crush the rising power of the Marāthās. Under his successors, the Mughal empire rapidly declined; the Marāthās encroached upon one district after another, and during the reign of Muḥammad Shāh (1719—1748) a general revolt of the provinces began, which resulted in the independence of the Dakhan from 1723 under the Nizām of Haidarābād [q. v.], of Awdh (Oudh) under Saʿadat Khān [q. v.] about the same period, of Bengal under Allāhwardī Khān [q. v.] in 1740, and of Rohilkhand under the Rohillas [q. v.]. Further, the invasion of Nādir Shāh [q. v.] struck a blow at the very centre of the empire, from which it never recovered; his successor to the throne of Persia, Aḥmad Shāh Durrānī [q. v.], invaded the Pāndjāb and occupied Dihli in 1756-1757, and though he joined with other Muhammadan forces to overthrow the Marāthās in the third battle of Pānīpat [q. v.] in 1761, the ruin of the Mughal empire was complete. Shāh ʿĀlam [q. v.] (1759—1806), in an endeavour to assert his authority in Bengal came in conflict with the English (1760-1761), and having fallen under the power of Shudjāʿ al-Dawla, Nawwāb Wazīr of Oudh [q. v.], shared his defeat in the battle of Baksār (1764). In the following year he granted to the East India Company the Diwānī or financial administration of Bengal, Bihār and Orissa in consideration of an annual subsidy of 2,600,000 rupees, and under the protection of the British kept his court in Allāhābād until 1771, when he was persuaded to return to Dihli; after a brief period of prosperity he was blinded by one of his officers in 1788 and became a puppet in the hands of the Marāthās, until General Lake's victory over them in 1803 set him free and left him with a nominal sovereignty over the city of Dihli and the surrounding district, and a monthly pension of 90,000 rupees. (For an account of the short-lived Muhammadan kingdom of Maisūr, 1761—1799, which was brought to an end by the capture of Seringapatam and the death of Tipū Sulṭān [q. v.], and of the kingdom of Oudh, which was annexed by the British in 1856, see these articles.) Shāh ʿĀlam's son, Muḥammad Akbar (1806—1837), and his grandson, Bahādur Shāh (1837—1857), retained the empty titles of their ancestors, as pensioners of the East India Company; but Bahādur Shāh's complicity in the Sepoy Mutiny of 1857 led to his banishment to Rangoon, where he died in 1862.

None of the self-governing Native States under Muhammadan rulers joined in the attempt to drive the English out of India, while the more important of these States, e.g. Haidarābād, Bhōpāl and Rāmpūr, rendered substantial and valuable assistance, without which the condition of the English would have been still more precarious than it was. After the government was assumed by the Crown in 1858, the territories of these States were enlarged by grants of land, and other rewards for their loyalty were given to them.

Bibliography: It is not possible to give here a detailed list of the numerous works on the history of the Muhammadans in India; a bibliography of the original sources may be found in H. M. Elliot, The History of India as told by its own historians. The Muhammadan Period. Edited and continued by J. Dowson. (London, 1867—1877); H. M. Elliot, Bibliographical Index to the Historians of Muhammadan India (Calcutta, 1849); H. Ethé, Catalogue of Persian Manuscripts in the Library of the India Office (Oxford, 1903); C. Rieu, Catalogue of the Persian Manuscripts in the British Museum (London, 1879—1895). The works of several of these historians have been published in the Bibliotheca Indica. A full bibliography is given in vol. iv. of N. Manucci, Storia del Mogor, or Mogul India, 1653—1708, translated by William Irvine (London, 1907-1908). For the bibliography of the works of Europeans who visited India during the Muhammadan period, see E. F. Oaten, European Travellers in India during the 15th, 16th and 17th centuries (London, 1909). B. under the British crown.

(i.) Native States. Nearly two-fifths of the total area of British India is administered by native chiefs. Of these Native States (693 in number) a certain number are governed by Muhammadans, under the suzerainty and protection of the British Crown; their rulers and their subjects are free from the control of the laws of British India; the rights of the chiefs as rulers within their own territories are guaranteed by the suzerain power, but they are not permitted to enter into political relations with foreign nations or other States. As a separate article is devoted to each of these States, all that is needed here is to give an enumeration of them, with bare details as to the annual revenue and the population in 1911. The largest of these Muhammadan States is Haidarābād, area 82,698 sqm., pop. 13,374,676, of whom about one-tenth are Musulmāns; the annual revenue is about £1,760,000; this is the only Muhammadan State that is in direct political relations with the Government of India; the others communicate either with an Agent to the Governor-General or with one of the Provincial Governments. In the Balōtistān Agency, Kalāt (area 73,278 sqm.) has a population of 359,086, of whom all but 13,180 are Musulmāns, rev. about £51,000, and Las-Bēla (area 7,132 sqm.), a population of 61,205, of whom all but 1819 are Musulmāns, rev. about £15,000. In the Bombay Presidency, Khairpūr (6,050 sqm.), pop. 223,788, of whom 182,827 are Musulmāns, rev. about £108,000; Džūnāgarh (3,284 sqm.), pop. 434,222, of whom 88,130 are Musulmāns, rev. about £175,000; Palanpūr (1,766 sqm.), pop. 226,250, of whom 25,158 are Musulmāns, rev. about £48,700; Cambay (350 sqm.), pop. 72,656, of whom 9,715 are Musulmāns, rev. about £37,000; Džandjira (324 sqm.), pop. 88,747, of whom 14,769 are Musulmāns, rev. about £40,000; Rādharpūr (1,150 sqm.), pop. 65,567, of whom 8,320 are Musulmāns, rev. about £26,000; Balasinor (189 sqm.), pop. 40,563, of whom 4,578 are Musulmāns, rev. £8,333; Sačin (42 sqm.), pop. 18,903, of whom 2,278 are Musulmāns, rev. about £20,000; Savanūr (70 sqm.), pop. 17,909, of whom 5,448 are Musulmāns, rev. £6,666; three small States pay tribute to the Mahārādja Gaikwār of Baroda, — Dabha (12 sqm., rev. £266), Punadra (11 sqm., rev. £1,000), and Ramas (6 sqm., rev. £200); these three chiefs are descended from a Rādjput, named Harisindhji who was in the service of Mahmūd Bēgara, Sultān of Guđjarāt, and became a Musulmān in 1483. In the Central India Agency, Bhōpal (6,902 sqm.), pop. 730,383, of whom only 81,996 are Musulmāns, rev. about £200,000; Djaora (568 sqm.), pop. 75,951, of whom 13,686 are Musulmāns, rev. £60,000; Baonī (122 sqm.), pop. 20,121, of whom 2,349 are Musulmāns, rev. £6,666; among the 153 minor states connected with this Agency there are a few whose rulers are Muhammadans, e. g. Korwai (111 sqm.), pop. 18,456, of whom 2,309 are Musulmāns, rev. about £2,500; Basoda (40 sqm.), which is nominally subordinate to the Mahārādja of Gwalior, but pays him no tribute, pop. 4,630, of whom 737 are Musulmāns, rev. £1,266; Muhammadgarh (29 sqm.), pop. 2,863, of whom 422 are Musulmāns, rev. £266; Pathari (22 sqm.), pop. 3,866, of whom 390 are Musulmāns, rev. £600, and a few still smaller ones. In the Madras Presidency, Banganapalle (255 sqm.) is the only Native State with a Muhammadan ruler, pop. 39,355, of whom only 8,054 are Musulmāns, rev. £6,400. In the Pandjāb, Bahāwalpūr (15,918 sqm.), pop. 780,641, of whom 654,247 are Musulmāns, rev. £182,000; Malerkōtla (167 sqm.), pop. 71,144, of whom 25,942 are Musulmāns, rev. £24,000; Lohāru (222 sqm.), pop. 18,597, of whom 2,401 are Musulmāns, rev. £4,400; Patawdi (52 sqm.), pop. 19,543, of whom 3,338 are Musulmāns, rev. £5,100. In the Rādjputāna Agency, Tānk (2,600 sqm.), pop. 303,181, of whom 40,432 are Musulmāns, rev. £89,000, is the only State with a Muhammadan ruler. In the United Provinces, the only Muhammadan State is Rāmpūr (892 sqm.), pop. 531,217, of whom 244,604 are Musulmāns, rev. about £240,000.

(ii.) British India. After the suppression of the Sepoy Mutiny, the Musulmāns (especially in Northern India) found themselves exposed to grave suspicions on the part of the British government. Though large numbers of Hindus had taken part in this insurrection, the ostensible aim of it had been the restoration of the Mughal Empire and had consequently enlisted the sympathies of many Muhammadans. The estates of those who were convicted of complicity with mutineers were confiscated, and thus a number of families of the old Muhammadan aristocracy were ruined. The members of these aristocratic families for the most part held aloof from the service of the British government and sullenly watched the Hindus crowd into those numerous administrative and judicial posts which the Muhammadan aristocracy were by tradition and training peculiarly fitted to fill. Saiyid Ahmad Khān [q. v.], himself a member of an old Dihli family, whose maternal grandfather had been wazir to the Mughal emperor, Akbar Shāh II, laid upon himself the task of reconciling his co-religionists to British rule. He first combatted the opinion held by some British officials that the Muhammadans had taken a predominant part in the Mutiny, in his treatise, "Risālah-i-khair-khawān Musulmānān (An Account of the loyal Mahomedans of India)", (Urdu and English, Meerut, 1860), in which he enumerated the various instances of distinguished devotion to the English on the part of Muhammadan soldiers, officials and others. At the same time he sought to reconcile his co-religionists to the rule of a Christian power, by refuting the intolerant opinions of those fanatics who condemned all social intercourse and friendship with non-Muslims; in this connection he published a pamphlet entitled Ahkām-i-ta'ām-i-ahl-i-kitāb (Banāras, 1868), the purpose of which was to prove by means of quotations from the Qur'ān, the Hadīth, and the works of theologians and jurists, that it was lawful for Muhammadans to eat with Christians and to mix in familiar social intercourse with them. Muhammadan opinion at this period was much exercised as to the question whether India under British rule was to be regarded as Dār al-Harb or as Dār al-Islām and whether a djihad against the Christian rulers was obligatory on the Musulmāns. A considerable literature was published on this subject and even the 'Ulamā' of Mecca were asked to deliver a Fatwā. (v. W. W. Hunter, The Indian Muslims (London, 1871); Syed Ahmed Khān, Review on Dr. Hunter's Indian Muslims (Benares, 1872)). The opinion began to prevail that inasmuch as the British Government left the Muhammadans free to practise the observances of the faith and made no attempt to restrict their religious freedom, they might live under its rule as loyal subjects. But their power and wealth had been steadily declining under British rule, largely through their failure to adjust themselves to the changed conditions of administration. Up to the early part of the nineteenth century they had enjoyed the greater part of state patronage, as collectors of revenue, military and police officers, and judges, but as the old order changed, these posts came to be filled by English and Hindu officials; when in 1837 Persian ceased to be the official language, and English or the provincial vernaculars took its place, a considerable number of subordinate offices passed out of the hands of the Muhammadans, and the abolition of the posts of Kādi and Kādi al-Kudāt closed to a large number of learned men what had previously been an honourable means of livelihood. (Act xii. of 1880 gave power to the Provincial Governments to appoint a Kādi in any particular locality if the Muhammadans of the place so desired). Though the more far-sighted members of the community recognised that the altered conditions of the country called for a change in the methods of Muhammadan education and urged their co-religionists to study western sciences and learn English, their efforts for some time remained fruitless and met with much opposition.

In 1877 Saiyid Amīr 'Alī founded in Calcutta the National Muhammadan Association, which was afterwards, when branches had been started in other cities of India, styled the Central National Muhammadan Association; in 1882 this Association endeavoured to establish a national conference of Muhammadans, but the project fell through on account of the strong opposition of Saiyid Ahmad Khān. In 1885 the first meeting of the Indian National Congress was held in Bombay; this is a deliberative assembly, composed of delegates from all parts of India, which meets once a year to discuss questions of politics and administration. While the third meeting was being held in Madras, Saiyid Ahmad Khān delivered in Lucknow on the 28th December, 1887, the first of a series of political lectures with the object of inducing the Muhammadans to hold aloof from the National Congress and similar political movements. He also endeavoured to organise the Muhammadan opposition by the formation of a society entitled "The United Indian Patriotic Association", to which more than fifty *Andjuman*s in various parts of the country became affiliated; but its activity was short-lived, mainly through lack of funds to continue its propaganda. (Pamphlets issued by the United Indian Patriotic Association. No 2. Showing the Seditious Character of the Indian National Congress and the opinions held by eminent natives of India who are opposed to the movement. (Allahabad, 1888)). But though his efforts were successful in persuading the main body of his co-religionists to refuse their support to the National Congress, each yearly gathering continued to be attended by a small number of Muhammadans, especially from the cities of Bombay, Calcutta and Lucknow, and on two occasions the deliberations of the Congress were presided over by a Muhammadan, — the third (Madras, 1887) by the Hon. Mr. Badruddin Taiyibji, (afterwards Judge of the High Court), belonging to a cultivated family of Bōhorās in Bombay, and the twelfth (Calcutta, 1896) by Rahmat Allāh Muhammad Sayāni; the latter in his presidential address enumerated and discussed the objections of the Muhammadans to joining the Indian National Congress; they were mainly that the success of the aims of the Congress would imply that a preponderating share in the administration of the country would pass into the hands of Hindus and that the Muhammadans would be reduced to an inferior position; that the movement was disloyal to the British Government; that western methods of government, and especially of selecting officers for administrative appointments on the basis of educational qualifications, etc., were not suited to India and would be detrimental to the Muhammadans, as owing to their backwardness in education they could not readily adapt themselves to such methods. (Report of the Twelfth Indian National Congress, p. 16 sqq. (Calcutta, 1887); Sir Saiyid Ahmad Khān: The Present State of Indian Politics (Allahabad, 1888)). The main body of the Muhammadans continued to hold aloof from the Indian National Congress, and from 1886 held on the same dates a separate gathering of their own, entitled the Muhammadan Educational Conference (v. § 3). But after the powerful personality of Sir Saiyid Ahmad Khān was withdrawn, some of the younger generation came to the conclusion that Muhammadan interests suffered in consequence of their abstention from political life and they founded an organisation entitled the All-India Muslim League, the first meeting of which was held at Dacca in December 1906. In October of the same year a deputation of influential Muhammadans had presented a memorial to the then Viceroy, Lord Minto, and urged that special consideration should be given to the Muhammadans in the proposed enlargement of the Legislative Councils and in the bestowal of posts in the higher branches of the Public Services. This deputation gave the impulse to the formation of the All-India Muslim League, which rapidly extended its organisation by the establishment of Provincial Leagues affiliated to the central body, and holds a general meeting every year in some city with a large Muhammadan population.

In 1907 Nawwāb Imād al-Mulk Saiyid Husain Bilgrāmī (formerly Director of Public Instruction in the Haidarābād State) was made a member of the Council of the Secretary of State for India, and was the first Indian to become a member of that body. In 1909 Saiyid Amīr 'Alī (formerly a judge of the High Court, Calcutta) was appointed by the King a Privy Councillor, and as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council sits in the final court of appeal for Indian cases. In 1910 Saiyid 'Alī Imām was made Legal Member of the Council of the Governor-General of India, being the second Indian to hold such high office. These appointments were made in pursuance of a policy of associating Indians more closely with the direction of affairs of state, — a policy which led to the passing of the Indian Councils Act in 1909. This Act and the regulations and rules under it increased the size of the legislative councils, and arranged for the inclusion of elected members instead of all the members being nominated as before, and gave to these councils greater liberty of discussion and interrogation than they had before enjoyed. While in the Governor-General's legislative councils an official majority is maintained, in all the other (i.e. the provincial) legislative councils, there must be a non-official majority. The Muhammadans claimed to be represented as a separate community, and special regulations were framed for securing the election of Muhammadan members, in accordance with the relative importance and numerical strength of the Muhammadans in different provinces. Much dissatisfaction however was expressed in regard to the regulations for the Muhammadan electorates, and the Muhammadans felt that due consideration had not been paid to their claim. The declining fortunes of such independent Muhammadan States as Morocco, Persia and Turkey excited much sympathy in India, and this excitement of feeling was intensified by the successive disasters of the Turks in their wars with Italy and the Balkan States. It was believed that the Christian powers of Europe had banded themselves together to destroy Islam, and the British Government was blamed for not intervening to save Turkey from its enemies. This bitterness of feeling was intensified by the refusal of the Government of India in 1912 to grant powers of affiliation to the proposed Muslim University in Aligarh [q. v.], and by the re-adjustment of the boundaries of the province of Bengal, whereby the large Muhammadan population of Eastern Bengal became again a minority in respect to the Hindus of Bengal, and lost that opportunity of self-development which had been opened to them in 1905 by the formation of the separate province of Eastern Bengal and Assam. The most recent tendency in the political life of the Indian Muhammadans is the abandonment by some of the younger generation of the separatist policy of the older school, and co-operation with the Hindus in political activities; and a Muhammadan, — Nawwāb Saiyid Muhammad, — was elected as President of the National Congress in 1913. The outbreak of war between Great Britain and Turkey in 1914 evoked a fervid expression of loyalty towards the British Government, in which the Musulmān princes, the Andjumans and other organised bodies, and the leaders of Muhammadan public opinion, all joined.

3. SOCIAL ORGANISATION.

The official method adopted under Muhammadan rule for establishing a scale of social precedence was the granting of a manṣab (rank, post), which varied according to the number of men the manṣabūtār was supposed to be placed in command of. Though primarily used of the military service, manṣab was not a term confined to this reference; all persons in the employment of the government above the position of a common soldier or messenger, whatever the nature of his duties, civil or military, obtained a manṣab. Some of the manṣab-dārs were paid in cash, but the commonest method of payment was by the assignment of the land revenue of a certain number of villages or a tract of country. In the case of persons, who were not in the active service of the state, a subsistence allowance was made either in the form of a cash payment (wazīfa) or a grant of land (milk or madad-i ma'āsh); such grants were made to students, men distinguished for learning or piety, etc. By theory these appointments and grants were personal or for life only (for 'Alā' al-Dīn Khaldī's arbitrary resumption of all such grants, see Baranī, Tārīkh-i Firūz-Shāhi, p. 283), but there was a tendency for them to become hereditary, and thus the original scheme of a graded scale of payment and official rank, dependent entirely on the good-will of the sovereign, broke down, partly on account of the unworkable character of the institution and partly in consequence of a lack of continuity in the administration. (See Ā'in-i Akbarī (Blochmann, i. 236 sq., 268 sq.); Paul Horn, Das Heer- und Kriegswesen der Grossmoghuls (Leiden, 1894), p. 11 sq.; W. Irvine, The Army of the Indian Moghuls (London, 1903), p. 3 sq.). A more popular classification of the various sections of Muhammadan society would appear to have owed its origin to the influence of the social system of the Hindus. Just as Hindu tradition gives the number of the higher castes as four, so the Ashraf (or, noble) sections of Muslim society fall into four classes, (1) Saiyid, (2) Shaikh, (3) Mughal, (4) Pathān. (1) The Saiyids claim descent from 'Alī, either through Fātima (the Fātimī Saiyids) or through some other of his wives (the 'Ulwī Saiyids). The Fātimī Saiyids have various designations according to the names of the twelve Imāms, e.g. Ḥasanī, Ḥusainī, Dījāfari, Mūsawī, Razawī, etc.; or according to the birth-place of the ancestor who first came into India, e.g. Bukhārī, Gilānī, Kirmānī, Gardīzi, etc. The Saiyids in India tend to arrogate to themselves the position of an aristocracy in the Muhammadan community, but economic conditions compel them to follow all kinds of callings, and many of them are employed in humble occupations or gain a scanty livelihood as agriculturists. The well-to-do and educated Saiyids carefully preserve their genealogical trees and as a rule intermarry only with Saiyids or even with Saiyids of their own group. But many persons arrogate to themselves the appellation Saiyid, who have no rightful claim to this honourable title. Akbar is said to have allowed some converted Brahmans to call themselves Saiyids. A well-known proverb, current throughout northern India, represents a successful man as saying, "Last year I was a weaver; this year I am a Shaiikh; next year, if prices rise, I shall be a Saiyid." According to popular superstition, fire cannot harm a true Saiyid, and Saiyid Maḥmūd of Bārha (one of Akbar's generals) is said to have successfully submitted to this test by standing for an hour unharmed in the middle of a fire (Blochmann, Ā'in-i Akbarī, p. 390). (For a modern example of this test being applied, see J. C. Oman, The Brahmans, Theists and Muslims of India (London, 1907), p. 323 sq.) (2) Shaiikh is an honorific which is considered properly to belong to persons who can trace their descent from some member of the tribe of the Quraysh. The Shaiikhs are further designated Ṣiddīqī, if claiming descent from Abū Bakr, Fārūqī, if from 'Umar, 'Abbāsī, if from 'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, etc. But Shaiikh is an honorific commonly assumed by Hindu converts, especially from among the lower classes, and as many as 28½ millions (i. e. nearly half the total Muhammadan population of India) returned themselves in the Census of 1901 as being Shaiikhs. It is of course quite impossible that more than a very small minority of these persons could have had any rightful claim to be of Arab origin. (3) The so-called Mughals in India claim descent from some ancestor who came into the country with the invading army of Bābur or was attracted thither during the reign of one of his descendants, but in cases where this claim can be made out, the family is generally found to be of Turkī origin. (N. Elias, The Tarikh-i-Rashidi, Introduction, pp. 88—90, 128). These persons add Beg after their names, as an honorific. As the number of persons, who style themselves Mughal, is small compared with either Shaiikhs or Pathāns, the number of Muhammadans descended from Hindu converts who lay claim to Mughal descent is not very large, but there is a tendency (especially in the Pandjāb) for men of low social status to assume Mughal as a caste designation. In the Hazāra District the working of the Pandjāb Land Alienation Act (which was introduced in 1904 in the interests of petty landowners and agriculturists, to arrest the transfer of land to money-lenders) has given a great stimulus to this tendency, as increased prosperity prompts the wish to attain to a more dignified status. (H. D. Watson, Gazetteer of the Hazara District, p. 34, (London, 1908)). (4) Similarly, tribes of undoubted Hindu origin, and even Saiyids and Mughals, will assume the name of Pathān. Tribes dwelling on the border of Afghānistān and exposed to the raids of their turbulent neighbours are said to have invented histories of their Afghān origin, as a protection against ill-treatment; or in cases where this motive was absent but the Pathāns were the dominant race, it is common to find men of quite different stock, adopting Pathān as a caste-name; this is especially noticeable in the case of Hindu converts of Rājput origin, who call themselves Pathān and even assume the title of Khān; thus we find a large and influential clan bearing the mongrel name of Lālkhānī Pathān, which claims descent from Lāl Singh, a favourite of the Emperor Akbar, who was given the title of Lāl Khān; his son was the first member of the family to embrace Islām. In Orissa, Pathān is used as a generic name for all Muhammadans, just as Turk is the synonym for Musulmān in some of the eastern districts of the Pandjāb.

Such Muhammadans as cannot lay claim to belong to the Ashraf are styled Adilaf and include the converts of low social status, especially those whose occupation causes them to be formed into functional groups, e. g. the weavers (Djulahā, a widespread Muhammadan caste), cotton-carders, barbers, tailors, butchers, etc. These castes being descended from converts from Hinduism retain many customs with regard to marriage corresponding to those of the Hindu castes to which they formerly belonged; they also preserve the system of caste government, known as the panāyat, which deals with breaches of the social custom of the caste in respect of trade, religion or morality, and imposes fines and other punishments. (Fuzli Rubbee, The Origin of the Muslims of Bengal, (Calcutta, 1895), chap. iv. v.; Census of India, 1901, vol. vi. 439 et seq., vol. xvi. 244 et seq.).

The spread of western education led to the formation of societies, which introduced into India a form of social organisation previously unknown to the Indian Musulmāns. These societies or *Andjuman*s give to energetic and enterprising men an opportunity of coming forward as leaders of the community, irrespective of their position in the old order of society, and each Andjuman tends to become a centre of social activity, and thus to introduce into the community a new principle of social organisation. The aims of these *Andjuman*s are various, educational, social, political, religious. One of the earliest of them was probably the Muhammadan Literary Society founded in Calcutta by Nawwāb 'Abd al-Latif in 1863. Later in the same year Saiyid Aḥmad Khān founded the Scientific Society of Ghāziṭpūr (transferred in the following year to 'Aligarh), with the object of translating scientific and historical works from English into Urdū; a press was established in 'Aligarh and a series of translations printed there, but the activities of this Society ceased when the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College was founded in 1875. In order to impress upon the Muhammadans the importance of higher education, Saiyid Aḥmad Khān in 1886 originated the Muhammadan Educational Congress (after the second meeting, styled Conference, and finally, the All-India Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental Educational Conference), a yearly gathering held in various cities, chiefly in Northern India; provincial educational conferences were organised later as well as educational associations in several towns. This Conference made its appeal chiefly to such Muhammadans as were interested in the promotion and spread of western learning among their co-religionists, but the Nadwat al-'Ulāmā, established in 1895, was founded with the object of conserving the older learning, in Arabic and Persian, with such modifications and additions as were demanded by modern conditions; it conducts a school in Lucknow, the aim of which is primarily to train religious teachers. The Moslem Institute of Calcutta, started in 1903, is a literary society of the same type as those found in other cities, e. g. the Madras Muhammadan Literary Society etc. Some *Andjuman*s combine educational work with other activities, e. g. the Andjuman Hīmayat-i Islām of Lahōr has among its objects the refutation of objections brought against Islām by its opponents, the spread of religious education, the care of orphans, the sustentation of preachers etc.; it accordingly has founded a number of schools and a college affiliated to the University of the Panjāb, established orphanages, and by preaching and other means promotes the defence and the propagation of Islām. In most of the capital cities of India, there is a central body formed to promote Muhammadan interests generally throughout the province, — in Bombay, Lāhōr, Nāgpur and Patna called Andjuman-i Islāmiya, in Madras Andjuman-i Islām, in Calcutta the Central National Muhammadan Association, in Dacca the Islam Association of Eastern Bengal. In addition to these societies having an extensive sphere of operations, there is hardly a town in India, with any considerable Muhammadan population, that has not got its own local Andjuman, but these Andjumans are too numerous for a list to be given here; many of them are short-lived and depend for their continuance in existence to the zeal of some one individual, and perish with him. In recent years, especially in Northern India, in consequence of the attacks made upon Islām by the Ārya Samāḍj, societies have been formed of an apologetic and propagandist character, e.g. Andjuman Hāmī Islām (Ājīmīr), Andjuman Tabligh-i Islām (Haidarābād), Madrasa Ilāhiyāt (Cawnpore), Andjuman Hidāyat al-Islām (Dihli) etc. The latest type of Muhammadan society to make its appearance is the political, in the form of the All-India Muslim League (v. § 2).

4. LAW AND ADMINISTRATION.

The system of law most widely accepted among the Sunnis of India was that of the Ḥanafī school, but that of the Shāfi'ī school also found adherents and is accepted by a small number of Muhammadans in the provinces of Bombay and Madras and the Panjāb to the present day. The Shī'ahs, wherever possible, have put into force the precepts of their own law-books and the decision of their Muḍjtahids. But even under Muhammadan rule, the extent to which Muslim law was followed, varied from time to time in different parts of the country. In towns and cities where the learned could make their influence felt and could uphold a standard of orthodoxy, the prescriptions of the shar' could be more completely enforced; in country districts, however, among the converts from Hinduism earlier institutions survived, in spite of their being in direct contradiction to the ordinances of the written law. Justice was administered by Qāḍīs, with the assistance of Muftis as exponents of the laws of Islām, which by theory were independent of the state; but the real power remained in the hand of the sovereign and his officials, who did not hesitate to intervene when, and to whatever extent, they thought fit. Baranī [q. v.] gives an account of an interview (about 1300 A. D.) between 'Alā al-Dīn Khaldī and Qāḍī Muḡthī al-Dīn in which the latter points out the many ways in which his sovereign's methods of administration ran counter to the laws of Islām, but the Sultān states that his policy is to consult for the good of the kingdom and the requirements of the situation, without considering whether the orders he gives are in accordance with the shar' or not. (Tārīkh-i Firūzshāhi, p. 296 init.; Elliot-Dowson, iii. 188). Even the orthodox Awrangzēb could interfere with the legal decision of a qāḍī, when it did not fall in with his wishes (Aḥkām-i Ālamgīrī: v. Jadunath Sarkar, Anecdotes of Aurangzēb, pp. 141-2). The qāḍī dealt with all cases of dispute between Hindus and Muhammadans, and the penal ordinances of the Muslim law were applied to all criminal cases and offences against the state. But the Hindus were left to settle their internal disputes in accordance with their own laws or customs. When in 1765 the grant of the diwānī of Bengal, Bihār and Orissa was made to the East India Company, Muhammadan law continued to be administered, as before, by Muhammadan judges, but in 1772 English judges were appointed who administered the same law, with the help of Muftis acting as expert advisers to the courts; similarly Pandits sat as assessors to advise in cases tried according to Hindu law. But from time to time the Muhammadan criminal law was modified by the Company's Regulations and the milder provisions of English law substituted, but the Muhammadan element did not entirely disappear until 1862, when the Penal Code and the first Code of Criminal Procedure came into force; in course of time also the laws relating to revenue, land tenures, procedure and evidence have been replaced by the enactments of the English legislature. But questions relating to family relations and status (e. g. marriage, divorce, maintenance and guardianship of minors, succession and inheritance), religious usages and institutions, and dispositions of property by gift, will and wakf [q. v.], are still governed by the Muhammadan law, provided that the Muhammadans themselves wish it to be applied; for in certain parts of India, it has been superseded in many respects or considerably modified by customs adopted from earlier Hindu times, and sanctioned by the legislature and the courts; thus custom takes precedence of Muhammadan law in the Panjāb, Oudh, the Central Provinces, the Bombay Presidency, and among the Mapillas of Madras. In the Panjāb, for example, in some districts a widow is not entitled to a share in the property of a deceased husband, but merely to maintenance; following the Hindu practice of adoption, a sonless proprietor may appoint a kinsman to succeed him as heir; in contradistinction to the Muhammadan law of gifts (hiba), ancestral immoveable property is ordinarily inalienable, except with the consent of male descendants, or, in the case of a sonless proprietor, of his male collaterals. The Memans [q. v.] of Kac̄, who are descended from Hindu converts chiefly of the Lohāna caste, are still governed by Hindu law in questions of inheritance, though a large section of the community wish in future to follow the Sunni law of the Ḥanafī school to which they belong. Similarly, the Sunni Bōhoras [q. v.] of northern Guḍjarāt follow Hindu law in matters of inheritance and succession. The Khodjas [q. v.] in the Bombay Presidency follow Hindu custom in refusing to females any share in their father's estate, and generally appeal to Hindu law or custom in regard to all questions of inheritance and succession; the right of divorce is limited by the necessity of obtaining the consent of the djamā'at (or, assembly of the community) according to the custom of the sect. The Mappillas [q. v.] in North Malabar follow the Marumakkattāyam (i. e. descent through sister's children) system of inheritance, according to which property descends through the female line and sons have no claim to a share of their father's property or to maintenance therefrom; they ordinarily follow the custom of holding family property undivided, as the joint property of all the descendants of a common ancestress, in the female line only, each member of the joint family being entitled to maintenance from the property so held; but some Mappillas, while following the Marumakkattāyam system in reference to the joint family property, are governed by Muhammadan law in regard to the self-acquisition of individual members of the family.

Administration.

The early Muhammadan conquest of India was more of the nature of a military occupation than an actual appropriation of the soil of the country. The invaders were comparatively few in number, and were constantly engaged in fighting in order to make their position secure; they were content to receive tribute from the Hindu princes who submitted to the new rule, without interfering in the internal government of their dominions; in the parts of the country under the more immediate rule of the conquerors, the native revenue officers were not displaced and collected the revenue much as before. But as Muhammadan power became consolidated and more Muhammadans settled in the country, the internal management of the provinces came to be taken under the direct control of the imperial power, and the Hindu Rājās tended to become revenue officials, and both the Rājās and their former nobles sank to the position of landlords paying revenue to the government. At the same time there was a tendency for the government to enhance the amount of its demand; according to Hindu law the proper share of the king was one-sixth of the produce of the soil, but under Muhammadan rule attempts were made to exact more, and 'Alā' al-Dīn (1206—1316) at one time claimed as much as a half. The chief source of revenue was this share in the produce of the soil, supplemented by the djizya [q. v.], which in India was a poll-tax paid by the Hindus; but the latter tax was irregularly levied, and was abolished by Akbar, while Awrangzēb's attempt to re-impose it brought about a rebellion; a number of petty cesses were also imposed, often of a very oppressive character (Elliot-Dowson, iii. 182, 377). According to the Muhammadan system all land assessed for revenue was divided into the khālīṣa lands paying revenue direct to the royal treasury, and the djāgīr lands, the revenue of which was assigned to individuals, e. g. ministers, courtiers, and especially military commanders, who took the revenues for their own support or that of a military force which they were bound to maintain. The djāgīr was originally only a life-grant and reverted to the State on the death of the grantee, and the djāgīrdār was not allowed to take more than the sum assigned to him, according to the terms of his sanad, and if more came into his hands, he had to account for the surplus to the State treasury. But such djāgīrs tended to become hereditary, especially when the central government was weak, and the granting of a new sanad to the incoming heir became a matter of form, or no fresh sanad was granted at all and the djāgīrdār came to be looked upon as a proprietor of the land and could do much as he pleased. Attempts were made at times to reduce the system of land tenure and assessment to order, the most successful being that connected with the name of Akbar [q. v.], who entrusted his finance minister, Tōdar Mall, with the task of re-organising the revenue system; the object of the new system was to substitute a money-revenue at a fixed rate for a revenue in kind varying with the crop. A fixed standard of mensuration, the biḡha [q. v.], was adopted, the land was surveyed, and the average yield was computed by ascertaining the actual produce for a number of years; the share of the government was fixed as one-third of the average produce, payable in money (unless the cultivator choose to continue to pay in kind). Tōdar Mall commenced the survey in 1571, but the new assessment was never successfully extended to all parts of the empire, and considerable changes were introduced by later rulers; but Akbar's land-revenue system is the basis of that found in India at the present day. Akbar further organised the administration by dividing his empire into 15 ṣūba's or provinces, sub-divided into sarkār's and these again into parganah's; this arrangement secured a centralisation of government and with some slight changes lasted throughout the period of Muhammadan rule.

5. RELIGION.

a. Sects. The majority of the Indian Muslims are Sunnis [q. v.], and owing to the high level of theological learning maintained by the 'ulamā' for centuries and the close relations kept up with centres of religious life and thought in other parts of the Muslim world, there has always been a large body of orthodox opinion and practice among the Indian Sunnis, and these have not differed materially from similar manifestations in other Muslim lands. The Shī'ahs [q. v.] have always been in a numerical minority in India; under the rule of the Shī'ah sultāns of Bidjapur [q. v.] and Golkonda [q. v.], and later under that of the Kings of Oudh [q. v.], the Nawwābs of Murshidābād

[q. v.] and such of the Nawwābs of Rāmpūr as became Shī'ah, they enjoyed the favour of the ruling power; but under Sunnī rule, they were often exposed to persecution and accordingly practised taḥiyya [q. v.], i. e. concealment of their distinctive doctrines. The Shī'ahs in India form less than 10 per cent of the total Muslim population and are mainly of Persian or Turkī descent, with the exception of the converts of Hindu origin, belonging especially to the Ismā'īlī sections of the Bōhorās and Khōdjas [q. v.]. Since 1907, the Shī'ahs have held an annual gathering, called the All-India Shī'ah Conference.

The expectation of the coming of the Imām Mahdī [q. v.] has given rise to various religious movements throughout the whole of the Muslim world; such manifestations as found in India will be found described under the separate articles MAHDAWĪ (GHAIKMAHDAWĪ), NUQTAWĪ, NŪR-BAKHSĪ and RŪSHANĪ.

Of the sects that have arisen through the influence of Hinduism, some account is given in § 5 (e) below. Among the modern sectarian developments, the most important are the Wahhābī [q. v.], the Ahmadiyah [q. v.], and the Ahl-i Qur'ān. The Wahhābī doctrines were introduced into India early in the 19th century by Saiyid Ahmad [q. v.] and Shar'at Allāh [v. art. FARĀ'ID], who initiated entirely independent movements; the Wahhābīs usually denominate themselves either Ahl-i Hadīth (people of the tradition), as accepting the Hadīth [q. v.] but rejecting the glosses of commentators and the four traditionary schools of legal interpretation, or Muwahhīd (Unitarian) as opposing all practices that obscure the recognition of the Unity of God, such as prayers to Muḥammad and the saints, visits to their tombs, etc., or Rāfi-yadain, because of their practice of raising the hands to the ears while praying. The Ahl-i Qur'ān, a small sect founded in 1902 by 'Abd Allāh Cakrālāwī, go still further than the Wahhābīs in their rejection of all traditionary theology and accept the Qur'ān alone as their guide in matters of faith and practice; they have devised a new form of prayer and do not repeat either the Adhān [q. v.] or prayers for the dead. The Nēcarī, the followers of the rationalising theology of Sir Saiyid Ahmad Khān, cannot rightly be described as a sect, nor are their small numbers as shown in Census Reports indicative of the wide-spread influence of this reformer on the theological opinions of his co-religionists; they are rather representative of a current of thought that is profoundly influencing the attitude of mind towards Islam of the younger generation of Indian Musulmāns. The Nēcarī, like the Ghair-mukallid, forms no ecclesiastical organisation, but shares in the revolt against taḥlīd [q. v.], (or, the blind acceptance of religious authority), which has been described as "the one movement in the Sunni Church which contains the greatest promise" (Syed Ameer Ali, The Spirit of Islam, London 1896, p. 521-522).

b. Religious orders. Abu 'l-Faḍl (A'in-i Akbarī, i. 209-210, Trans., iii. 354) enumerates 14 religious orders, — all of the Sunnī sect. Those that have exercised the greatest influence over the religious life of India are the Čishtī, the Suhrawardī, the Kādirī, the Shattārī and the Naqshbandī. The Čishtī order (founded by Khwādja Abū Ahmad Ahdāl Čishtī, ob. 966) was introduced into India by Khwādja

Mu'in al-Dīn Čishtī, who was born in Sistān but came to India and settled in Ādjmīr, where he died in 1236 [s. ČISHTĪ]; his tomb attracts to Ādjmīr thousands of pilgrims every year and is venerated by Hindus and Musulmāns alike (Journal of Indian Art, vol. iii. p. 8). He counts among his successors some of the most famous saints in India: Khwādja Kuṭb al-Dīn Bakhtiyār Kākī, who was born in Farghāna, but after a wandering life spent in visiting various eminent saints, passed his last years in intimate friendship with Mu'in al-Dīn Čishtī and died in the same year as his spiritual teacher and friend; he is buried near the Kuṭb Minār at Dihlī; — Shaikh Farid al-Dīn Shakar-gandj (ob. 1265), whose tomb is at Pakpattan, where an enormous fair is held every year, and the object of every pilgrim, whether Hindu or Muhammadan, is to get through the narrow gate of the shrine on the afternoon or night of the 5th Muḥarram (M. A. Macauliffe, The Sikh Religion, vi. 359 sqq.); — he had two illustrious disciples, one Kuṭb-i Abdāl Shaikh 'Alī b. Aḥmad Šābir (ob. 1291), whose tomb is near Rurkī (his followers are known as Šābir Čishtīs), and the other, more famous, Niẓām al-Dīn Awliyā' (his real name was Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Dāniyāl al-Bukhārī), (born at Badā'un in 1238), who was nominated by Farid al-Dīn as his khalīfa, or successor, when he was only 20 years old, and died in 1325; some of the most distinguished of his contemporaries were numbered among his spiritual pupils, including the poets, Amīr Khusraw and Amīr Ḥasan Dihlawī, the historian, Dīyā' al-Dīn Baranī, and a number of others. (For a list of these, see the biography of the saint, entitled Ma'īz al-Ṭalībīn by Muḥammad Bulāḳ). His tomb in the outskirts of Dihlī is surrounded by the graves of his followers and admirers and is much frequented by pilgrims. His khalīfa was Naṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad (or Mahmūd) Čirāgh [s. ČIRĀGH DIHLĪ], who became his pupil at the age of 40 and died in 1356; his tomb at Dihlī is still a place of pilgrimage. The renown of these saints led to a wide extension of the Čishtī order, but it is not possible to mention more than two of the later saints, e. g. Shaikh Salīm Čishtī (ob. 1572), in whose house the emperor Djahāngīr [q. v.] was born; and Khwādja Nūr Muḥammad (ob. 1791), known as Kibla-i 'Ālam, who brought about a revival of the Čishtī order in the Panḍjāb and Sindh. (For further details see the histories of the Čishtī order, e. g. Sawāfi' al-Anwār by Muḥammad Akram al-Barasawī, and the works quoted therein, and Siyar al-'Arifīn by Ḥamid h. Faḍl Allāh Djamālī). The Suhrawardī order, which takes its name from Shihāb al-Dīn Suhrawardī (ob. 1234), was introduced into India by Bahā' al-Dīn Zakariyā, who was born at Multān but travelled to Baghdād, where he became the spiritual pupil of Shihāb al-Dīn Suhrawardī; he died at Multān in 1266 and his tomb, said to have been huilt by the saint himself, is one of the few examples of the architecture of this period in India. One of his disciples was Saiyid Djalāl al-Dīn Surkh-pōsh, the first of this order to come to India from Bukhārā, where he was born in 1199; after many wanderings he settled in Uch, where he died in 1291; he is the ancestor of generations of saints, some of whom were active and successful propagandists of Islām. His khalīfa was his grandson, Saiyid

Djalāl b. Aḥmad Kabīr, commonly known as Maḥdūm-i Dīhānīyān (ob. 1384), who is said to have made the pilgrimage to Mecca 36 times and to have performed innumerable miracles. One of Maḥdūm-i Dīhānīyān's grandsons, Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh, known as Burhān al-Dīn Ḳuṭb-i 'Ālam (ob. 1453) [q. v.], went to Guḍjarāt, where his tomb is still a place of pilgrimage at Baṭuwā (Archaeological Survey of Western India, vol. vii. p. 60 sqq.); his son, Saiyid Muḥammad Shāh 'Ālam (ob. 1475) became still more famous and played an important part in the political and religious life of his time; his tomb at Rasūlābād, near Ahmadābād, is a beautiful example of the style of architecture characteristic of this district (id., vol. viii. p. 15 sqq.). The Kādirī order derives its name from 'Abd al-Kādir al-Djilī [q. v.], who is revered throughout India as Pīr Dast-gir, Pīrān-i Pīr, etc., his festival being widely celebrated on the 11th of Rabī' al-ākhir. This order was introduced into India by one of his descendants, Saiyid Muḥammad, known as Banaḍgī Muḥammad Ghawṭh, who settled in Uch in 1482 and died there in 1517; he was the progenitor of a number of saints and miracle-workers, and his descendants have remained in Uch to the present day (Gazetteer of the Bahawalpur State, pp. 164—166, 391 (Lahore 1908)). The Kādirī saints are too numerous to enumerate here, but mention must be made of Shaikh Mīr Muḥammad, known as Miyān Mīr, the spiritual preceptor of Dārā Shikōh [q. v.], who wrote a life of the saint, entitled Sakīnat al-Awliyā, he died in Lāhōr in 1635 and his tomb is still venerated there. The Shattārī order gave several great saints to India, e.g. Muḥammad Ghawṭh, who numbered among his spiritual pupils the emperor Humāyūn; he died in 1562 and was buried at Gwāliyar in a magnificent tomb erected by the emperor Akbar (Saiyid Faḍl Allāh, Manāqib Ghawṭhiya). His disciple, Wadīh al-Dīn Guḍjarātī (ob. 1589), a man of great learning, is buried at Ahmadābād (Archaeological Survey of Western India, viii. 53), and another saint of the same order, known as Shāh Pīr (ob. 1632) at Mirāṭh in a tomb built by Nūr Dīhān, wife of the emperor Dīhāngīr. The introduction of the Naqshbandī order into India is usually attributed to Shaikh Aḥmad al-Fārūkī al-Sirhindī (ob. 1625), (for his letters, see Ethé, Cat. Pers. MSS. India Office, n^o. 1891); this order has not enjoyed the same degree of popularity as those above mentioned, but there has recently been a revival of it in the Panjāb and Kashmīr (v. Manāqib al-Nadarāt, Ethé, n^o. 652). To the wide-spread influence of these orders it is largely due that Sūfism has generally been regarded in India as compatible with orthodoxy. Muḥammad b. Faḍl Allāh, of Burhānpūr (ob. 1620), wrote a commentary on al-Tuḥfa al-mursala ila 'l-Nabī, to prove that the doctrines of the Sūfis were in accord with the teaching of the Ḳur'ān and the Sunna.

In addition to the above so-styled bā-sharā' orders, the members of which observe the customary ordinances of Islam as to prayer, fasting, etc., there are certain irregular (or bē-sharā') orders, peculiar to India, which are looked upon with disfavour by the orthodox; their adherents are almost entirely confined to uneducated persons of the lower classes. Among these are the Madāris, who are followers of Zinda Shāh Madār, a legendary personage said by some to have been a converted Jew (born at Aleppo in the 11th cent.), who settled in India and expelled a demon, named Makan Dēo, from the spot (Makanpūr) where his own shrine is now venerated; according to other accounts, he was a disciple of Shaikh Muḥammad Taifūr Shāmi and died in 1436. The fakirs of this sect claim to be immune against fire and the bites of snakes and scorpions. The devotion to Shāh Madār is widespread, and pilgrims resort to his shrine from great distances. The Rasūl Shāhīs are followers of a certain Rasūl Shāh, of the Alwar State, who in the 18th cent. is said to have received miraculous powers from a saint in Egypt. They rub ashes on their bodies and faces, and shave the head, moustaches and eyebrows; they look upon the drinking of spirits as a virtue, and the sect is consequently considered to be a disreputable one by orthodox Muslims. In Guḍjarāt they wander about begging, without wives or settled homes; but in the Panjāb they are not celibate, being as a rule well-to-do citizens who are never seen begging, and some are said to be men of literary taste and are popularly credited with a knowledge of alchemy.

c. Saints. The Muslim saints of India may be counted by hundreds. Several of the more important have already been referred to in the account of the religious orders; these are historical personages of whom some record remains, and there are many more like them. But others are historical persons whose identity has become overlaid with a mass of legend, in which the record of history is almost entirely obscured, e.g. Ghāzī Miyān [q. v.], Sakhi Saiwar [q. v.], etc. Others are purely legendary, as Khwādja Khidr [q. v.], Bābā Ratan (v. Horovitz, Journal of the Panjab Historical Society, ii. n^o. 2), Shaikh Sadu, etc. The process of canonisation still goes on, and new saints are from time to time added to the calendar, e.g. at Mōthāri (in Bengal) a Muhammadan Pīr, named Patukī Sā'in (ob. between 1860 and 1870) is credited with miraculous powers and his aid is invoked especially by litigants. Besides the many miracles ascribed to these saints in their life-time, they are still believed to be able to work wonders for those who invoke their aid; miraculous cures especially are said to be wrought at their tombs, and childless women pray to them for offspring, and litigants for success in the law-courts; the beneficent activity of others has a more restricted reference, e.g. Khwādja Khidr, Mālumiyyar and Pīr Badr are the patron saints of boatmen and sailors, Shēr Shāh (of Multān) of persecuted lovers, Shāh Dawla takes microcephalic children under his protection, etc. Many of these saints are known as Pīrs, a title of honour applied not only to the famous historical saints above-mentioned but also to living spiritual preceptors, who guide their disciples (murīd) in the practices of the devout life, — not only to the saints whose shrines are visited by thousands of pilgrims from distant parts, but also to those obscure individuals whose tombs are to be found by hundreds in the bye-lanes of a town or the outskirts of a village and enjoy only a local reputation. For the religious movement condemnatory of the worship of saints, see the art. KARĀMAT 'ALĪ and WAHHĀBĪ.

d. Festivals. The chief festivals of the Muslim year are 'Id al-Adhā [q. v.], (vulgarly known as 'Id-i zuhā or bakra-'id or even bakrīd ("the cow festival")), celebrated on the tenth day of Dhū 'l-Hijja, and 'Id al-Fiṭr [q. v.], at the end of the fast of Ramaḍān. These are the only festivals recognised by the strictly orthodox, but there are several others that are commonly observed throughout India, e. g. shab-i barāt ("the night of the decree"), the 14th day of Shabān; God is believed to register on this night the deeds and fortunes of men during the coming year; it is celebrated by the vulgar by letting off fireworks, while the pious spend this night or the eve of the festival in prayer for deceased relatives; būrah-wafāt, the 12th day of Rabī' al-awwal, in commemoration of the death of Muḥammad, or in some parts, the day of his birth (mawlid al-nabī) is observed on this date; ākhīr-i ṣāḥar-shamba, the last Wednesday of the month of Ṣafar, the day on which Muḥammad obtained some mitigation of his fatal illness and bathed for the last time. The first ten days of the month of Muḥarram [q. v.] are observed as days of mourning for the death of Husain [q. v.] by Shī'ahs pre-eminently, but the 10th day is observed as a popular festival in most cities with a Muhammadan population, and Hindus also often take an active part in the celebrations; in the Gwāliyar State the Mahārājā provides a ta'ziya [q. v.], and the expenses of the festival are defrayed from the state revenue (v. J. C. Oman, The Brahmans, Theists and Muslims of India (London, 1907), Part iii. chap. i.). In honour of the more famous saints, a celebration, called 'urs [q. v.], is held on the anniversary of his death, when a large concourse of persons visits his tomb; prayers are recited, the Qur'ān is read, offerings are made to the guardians of the tomb, and alms are distributed to the poor.

e. Relations with Hinduism. The Muslim conquerors of India for the most part showed little regard for the Hindu religion, but plundered and destroyed Hindu temples in large numbers without compunction. But the Arabs in Sind spared the temples in the towns that submitted to them, and the fact that Awrangzēb found so many temples left for him to destroy bears testimony to the limits that his predecessors put on their iconoclastic zeal. For the most part the Muslims in India have been either hostile or indifferent to Hinduism, and throughout the whole Muhammadan period it is not possible to find another work showing the same scientific interest in this faith or the same profound knowledge of its literature as the India of al-Birūnī [q. v.], the contemporary of Maḥmūd of Ghazni. More than five centuries elapsed before Akbar's desire to learn the Hindu doctrines caused him to have the Mahābhārata, the Rāmāyana and the other Hindu scriptures translated into Persian, and his friend, Faizi, compiled for his instruction a treatise on the Vedānta philosophy. Akbar allowed his Hindu wives to have the ceremonies of their religion performed in the royal palace, and under their influence and that of the Brahmans whose society he cultivated, he adopted several Hindu practices, e. g. he abstained from the eating of beef, and on certain festivals he wore the Brahmanical cord and had his forehead marked like a Hindu sectary. Djahāngir had none of the religious earnestness of his father, but he kept up the Hindu customs that Akbar had adopted and observed such Hindu festivals as the Diwālī, or feast of lights, and on Śiva-rātri, (or Śiva's night), would invite Hindu yogis to the palace and eat and drink with them. A more earnest and sympathetic student of Hindu thought was Djahāngir's grandson, Dārā Shikōh [q. v.], who diligently cultivated the society of Hindu yogis, and as a result of this intercourse (he tells us) came to the conclusion that the divergence between the doctrines of the Hindu pantheists and those of the Muslim Śūfis was merely verbal; with the object of reconciling the two systems, he wrote his Madjma' al-Baḥrain; he also translated, or had translated for him, into Persian, several works of Hindu metaphysics, including the Upanishads (under the title Sirr-i Akbar). The large number of such translations from Sanskrit and Hindi into Persian, that were made from time to time (see, Ethé, Cat. Pers. MSS. I. O., n^o. 1928 sq.; Grundr. der iran. Philologie, ii. 352—7), bears evidence to the interest which many Muhammadans took in the beliefs of their Hindu fellow-subjects, and in mysticism especially they found a common basis for religious thought. Muslim saints numbered many Hindus among their disciples, and thousands of Hindus still worship at their tombs; on the other hand Hindu ascetics, though less rarely, numbered some Muhammadans among their spiritual pupils. Instances are not unknown of friendship between saints of the rival creeds, e. g. at Girōt (in the Panjāb) the tombs of two ascetics, Djāmālī Sulṭān and Dīāl Bhāvan, who lived in close amity during the early part of the 19th cent., stand close to one another and are revered by Hindus and Mohammadans alike. (Bhawānī Dās, Djivan Čaritra Śribhagat Dīāl Bhāvanāji (Lāhōr, 1900)). Bāwa Fattu (flor. 1700), a Muslim saint whose tomb is at Rānītāl (in the Kāngra District), received the gift of prophecy by the blessing of a Hindu saint, Sōdhī Guru Gulāb Singh. On the other hand Bābā Shāhāna, a Hindu saint whose cult is observed in the Dīhang District, is said to have been the izālā or spiritual disciple of a Muslim fakīr who changed the original name, Mihra, of his Hindu follower into Mīhr Shāh. With a still more remarkable liberality, some Muslim theologians have admitted into their system the gods of the Hindu pantheon, on the ground that the Qur'ān (xiii. 8; xvi. 38) teaches that God has sent a prophet to every nation, to guide it into the truth; thus (to give one instance only, from modern literature,) one of the present guardians of the shrine of Nizām al-Dīn Awliya', — himself a descendant of this saint, — maintains that the life and teachings of Rāma, Kṛishna and Buddha clearly show that they are the prophets referred to in the Qur'ān, though no express mention is made there of India; for it cannot be supposed that God would have made so vast a country an exception to the operation of His general rule. (Hasan Nizāmi, Hindustān kē dō paigambar Rām o Krishan, salām Allāhī 'alaihimā, p. 3 (Lahore, 1325 H.)). The Muhammadan poets of Bengal went still further in their recognition of Hindu theology, e. g. 'Alāol (flor. 17th cent.) sang the praises of Śiva, and Mirzā Husain 'Ali composed hymns in honour of the goddess Kālī. (Dinesh Chandra Sen, History of Bengali Language and Literature, pp. 626, 793 (Calcutta, 1911)).

Owing to the fact that the Muslims in India have lived for centuries in close contact with Hindus and are themselves to a large extent descended from Hindu converts, it is not surprising that Islām in India presents certain characteristics peculiar to this country. The process of conversion was often incomplete, and the converts, ill-instructed in their new faith, carried with them many of their old beliefs and practices. The sacred sites of the earlier faith continued under a changed name to be frequented by pious persons; this has happened in the case of Buddhist shrines in the Gandhāra country, and to an enormous extent in Kashmīr, where a Muhammadan ziyarat frequently marks the site of a Hindu tirtha; it is then often stated to be the tomb of a saint, e. g. the tomb of Bāmadīn Śāhib, a popular place of pilgrimage for Muhammadans in Kashmīr, has been identified with an ancient Hindu temple built by Bhīma Śāhi, the last Hindu king of Kābul (ob. 1026); the saint is now said to have been a Hindu ascetic, and to have borne the name of Bhūma Sādhi, before his conversion to Islām. (Kalhanā's Rājataranginī, translated by M. A. Stein, i. 249 (Westminster, 1900); A. Foucher, Notes sur la géographie ancienne du Gandhāra. Bulletin de l'École Française d'Extrême-Orient, i. 333 sq. (Ifanoi, 1901)). Such survivals from Hinduism are more marked in villages and country districts, remote from the influence of the 'ulamā'; here the Musulmāns still continue to worship the tutelary godlings of the village, join in Hindu festivals and employ Brahmans at their marriage ceremonies. (For details see Transactions of the Third International Congress for the History of Religions, i. 314 sqq.). This close association with Hindus has also led to the formation of some mixed sects, which attempt to bring about a reconciliation between Hindus and Muhammadans; among these are the Pirzādās, a sect founded by Muḥammad Shāh Dullā (about the middle of the 17th cent.), whose tomb is at Bahādurpūr (in the Central Provinces); he compiled a book containing a selection of passages from both the Hindu and Muslim scriptures and adopted as a supreme deity the tenth incarnation of Viṣṇu, which is to come and is known in the sect as Nishkalankī, "the sinless one". The Husaini Brahmans call themselves followers of the Atharva Vēda, but ask for alms in the name of Husain; they adopt such of the doctrines of Islām as are not contrary to Hindu teachings, and observe Muslim customs, even keeping the fast of Ramaḍān, and have a special devotion to the saint, Mu'īn al-Dīn Čishtī of Admir; the men dress like Musalmāns, the women like Hindus. The Kartābhādjās, the members of a sect (founded in Bengal in the 18th cent.), who call their creed the Satya Dharma (true faith), include both Hindus and Musulmāns, and in this sect a Muhammadan may even become the spiritual guide of a Brahman. The Sandjōgis, the Djadupetias and the Lālbēgis are similar sects on the borderland between Hinduism and Islām. A like syncretism shows itself in the teaching of Nānak, the founder of the Sikh religion (see T. P. Hughes, Dictionary of Islam, art. Sikhism), and would seem to have originated the worship of the Pānē Pīr [q. v.]. Such an approximation is sometimes indicative of the incompleteness of the process of conversion, as in the case of the Malkānās in Āgra and the adjoining districts, who are converts to Islām but are reluctant to describe themselves as Musulmāns; their names are Hindu and they use the salutation Rām Rām; they mostly worship in Hindu temples, but sometimes frequent a mosque, practise circumcision and bury their dead. Such imperfect conversion has rendered possible the recent return to Hinduism of the descendants of such converts. In 1880, about 160 families of Mātia Kunbīs, whose ancestors were converted in the 15th cent. by Imām Shāh [q. v.] of Pīrāna, formed themselves into a separate caste, calling themselves Vaiṣṇava Mātias, gave up all Muhammadan customs, employed Brahman priests and refused to eat with their Muhammadan brethren, the Pīrāna Mātias. The Ārya Samādj has been very active in the work of re-conversion, and one of the societies affiliated to it, called the Rādjput Śuddhī Sabhā, having for its chief object the re-conversion of Muhammadan Rādjputs to Hinduism, claims to have converted to the beliefs of the Ārya Samādj as many as 1052 of such Rādjputs in the three years, 1907 to 1910. This change has been facilitated by the fact that intermarriage with Hindus has been common (esp. among the Čawhāns in the Eastern Panjāb) and the tribal bond with Hindu sections of the tribe has always been stronger than any difference of religion.

6. Literature. Muslim India has always preserved a learned tradition and the study of Arabic has been diligently pursued by the 'ulamā', but their literary activity in this language has been largely confined to commentaries, — on the Qur'ān, and Hadīth, on the works of fiqh, grammar, rhetoric, etc., commonly read by students. Among the commentaries on the Qur'ān, mention may be made of Faiẓī's [q. v.] tour de force entitled Sawāṭī' al-ilhām, in which all letters with diacritical points were avoided. 'Abd al-Ḥakīm al-Siyāl-kōtī was an industrious commentator, who enjoyed the patronage of the emperor Shāhjahān. Muḥibb Allāh al-Bihārī (ob. 1707) [q. v.] compiled a treatise on jurisprudence, al-Musallam, and another on logic, Sullam al-'Ulūm, which became favourite text-books, and generations of commentators wrote glosses upon them. Another industrious commentator was Bahr al-'Ulūm (ob. 1810), [q. v.]. An important contribution to legal literature was al-Fatāwā al-'Ālamiyī, a collection of legal opinions by Ḥanafī jurists, compiled by Shāikh Nizām and others in the reign of the emperor Awrangzēb. The greater part of the historical and mystical literature of Muslim India was written in Persian, but among Arabic writings mention may be made of Tuḥfat al-Mudjāhidīn, an account of the Muhammadans of Malabar, by Shāikh Zain al-Dīn, (ed. D. Lopes, Lisboa, 1898), and al-Djauāhir al-khamsiyah by Muḥammad Ghawth [q. v.]. (Bi-biography: Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Literatur, ii. 219 sqq., 415 sqq., 503 sq.; Siddik Hasan, Ithāf al-Nubalā'; Catalogues of Libraries in India, e. g. Nizām's Library [Haidarābād], Rāmpūr Library, Public Library, Bankipur, Asiatic Society of Bengal, Calcutta, etc.). But the chief literary language of the Indian Muhammadans has been Persian [q. v.], which in modern times has been replaced by Urdū [q. v.] as a literary medium. Works written in the above languages have a vogue among educated Muhammadans throughout the whole peninsula, but there is also a considerable literature, consisting mainly of didactic and religious writings, translations, poetry and romances, in many of the provincial vernaculars, e. g. Bengālī, Guḍjarātī, Hindī, Panjābī, Pushtu, Sindhi, Tamil, etc. (v. separate articles).

7. Education. During the Muhammadan period, the condition of learning was apt to vary with the good-will of the sovereign, but from the earliest period of Muhammadan rule scholars received generous patronage from the state. Muhammad Ghōrī founded madrasas in Ājmir immediately after the conquest and his general. Muhammad b. Bakhtiyār did the same in Bengal, and the example thus set by the early conquerors was followed by the majority of their successors, though instances are not unknown of the hostility or indifference of a ruler resulting in a corresponding decay of learning. But private benevolence was not lacking to supplement the generosity of princes; the remains of the vast madrasa built by Mahmūd Gāwān in 1478—1479 are still standing at Bidar, and that founded by Māhum Anagah, the nurse of Akbar, in 1561, in the vicinity of Dihli. From the outset these madrasas were well provided with learned teachers, and the devastations of the Mongols caused many scholars to take refuge in India, where they carried on the traditions that had made Muslim learning so famous in the West. The largest of these madrasas were naturally to be found in the chief centres of government, and the students trained in them became teachers in the maktabs and mosque-schools that existed in most Muhammadan villages up to modern times. The decay of the Muhammadan rule and the consequent loss of patronage led to a decline in Muslim learning. Warren Hastings attempted to arrest this decline by establishing a Madrasa in Calcutta in 1781; but the older type of education no longer fitted persons for employment in government service, with the disappearance of Persian as the official language and the substitution of English in the higher courts, and the vernacular language of the various provinces, in the lower courts. In 1835 Lord William Bentinck, the then Governor-General of India, established the policy of promoting education in the English language; while this policy was warmly supported by the Hindus, the Muhammadans almost entirely held aloof from the English schools and colleges, preferring a system of learning in harmony with their own faith, and thinking that English education induced a spirit of disbelief in religion. From time to time the Government of India proposed measures for dealing with the backward condition of education among the Muhammadans, and laid down the lines of policy to be pursued in Resolutions of 1871, 1885, 1888, 1894, and 1913, and liberal grants-in-aid have been given to colleges, such as that of Aligarh [q. v.], and other educational establishments, and scholarships granted to Muhammadan students. The total number of Muhammadan pupils under instruction in all classes of educational institutions in 1912 was 1 562 000. Of the various religious communities in India, the Muhammadan on the whole exhibits a greater degree of illiteracy than any other, with the exception of the Animistic tribes; only 69 men, and 4 women, per thousand are able to read and write. This backward condition of the Muhammadans generally is largely due to the low level of education in the parts of the country (e. g. the North-West of India and Eastern Bengal), where they are chiefly to be found. In the ancient centres of Muslim civilisation, their level of education is as high or even higher than that of the Hindus, and the number of Muhammadans attending the Universities is yearly on the increase.

8. Art. Space does not admit of any account being given here of the vast artistic activity of the Muhammadans in India, and reference must therefore be made to the literature on the subject. — Architecture: The architectural monuments of Muhammadan India are chiefly mosques and tombs (in large numbers), and some palaces in the chief cities. The early conquerors made use of materials taken from the Hindu and Jain temples etc. which they had destroyed, and employed Hindu workmen to erect buildings suited to the requirements of Muslim worship. In the great mosques at Ājmir and Old Dihli, built at the beginning of the 13th cent., Hindu pillars were re-erected without any alteration, except that dissimilar fragments were sometimes put together; while on the great gateways of the enclosures was lavished a wealth of ornamentation and of stately Arabic inscriptions, which mark out these buildings as among the most richly decorated examples of Muhammadan architecture in India. After this superb beginning followed a rapid development of architectural forms, varying considerably in the several independent kingdoms that arose in the different parts of India occupied by the Muhammadan conquerors. Of these local styles as many as thirteen have been enumerated. They vary from the stern and massive tombs of the early kings of Dihli and the grand simplicity of the towering mosques of Dīawnpūr, to the studied elegance and exquisite detail of ornamentation in the buildings of Aḥmadābād, and the degenerate tawdriness of Lakhnaw. For some account of the architectural monuments in these various localities, the reader is referred to the articles under the name of each, e. g. Bidjāpūr, Dihli, Dīawnpūr etc.; but space has been found for a separate article on MUḠHAL ARCHITECTURE, which was not limited to a single locality. — Bibliography: Reports and other publications of the Archaeological Survey of India; Gustave Le Bon, Les Monuments de l'Inde (Paris, 1893); J. V (with bibliography). — Painting: Few examples of Muhammadan painting in India before the 16th cent. are known, but under the patronage of Akbar and his successors Indian artists produced a vast quantity of pictures, sometimes as separate works of art, but mostly as illustrations of manuscripts; the mathnawī's of Nizāmi, and romances both in poetry and prose, were frequently illustrated; but the Mughal school of painting excelled particularly in portraiture, and a large number of vivid and realistic portraits of the monarchs and courtiers of this dynasty has been preserved. The influences under which these artists worked were partly connected with the school of painters that enjoyed the patronage of the Timūrid princes, — and painters who preserved the tradition of this school were undoubtedly attracted into India, — but to a larger measure with indigenous Hindu art. European paintings and engravings were also sedulously copied and their influence can be traced in many pictures of the Mughal school. The majority of these pictures are unsigned, but some bear the names of the artists, e. g. Mīr Saiyid 'Alī, 'Abd al-Ṣamad and other Musulmāns who painted for Akbar, — Maṣṣūr and Muḥammad Nādir, among the artists patronised by Dījhāngīr, etc. — Bibliography: E. B. The same skill was shown in the copying of manuscripts, both Arabic and Persian, and monarchs and nobles vied with one another in their patronage of expert calligraphists. Some of these were attracted to India from other countries, e. g. 'Abd al-Ṣamad, known as Shirīn Kālam, from Shīrāz, who was patronized by Humāyūn and Akbar; Mīr Khalīl Allāh, who went from Irāk to the court of Ibrāhīm 'Adīl Shāh II of Bidjāpūr (987—1035 A. H.); Saiyid 'Alī Khān, of Tabriz, known as Dīawāhir Raḳam, whom Awrangzib appointed to teach his sons the art of penmanship. Under the influence of these and other masters in the art, a long series of native calligraphists was trained, who only slowly gave way before the introduction of the printing press. — Bibliography: Epigraphia Indo-Moslemica (with bibliography) (Calcutta, 1908 sqq.); Ghulam Muḥammad Dihlavi, Tadhkirat-i Khushnavisān, ed. INDIES (DUTCH EAST) comprise the Malay Archipelago and the western half of New Guinea as far as Long. 141°, except for the north coast of Borneo, which is English, the Philippines, which belong to the United States, and Portuguese East Timor. These Dutch colonies thus include thousands of islands which run from the largest in the world such as New Guinea and Borneo to archipelagoes of the smallest coral islands. From the geographical point of view they are divided into the Great Sunda Islands (Borneo, Sumatra, Celebes, and Java) with the archipelagoes belonging to them; Little Sunda Islands (Bali, Lombok, Sumbawa, Flores, Sumba, Savu, Rotti, and Timor with the surrounding islands), the Moluccas (Hal-maheira with Ternate, Tidore, Makian, and Baj-tjan, Sula Islands, Buru, Seran, Ambon, and Banda) and New-Guinea with the adjoining groups of islands such as Misol, Waigeu, Batanta, and Salawati in the west, and Kei, Timor-Laut, and Aru in the south-west. The area is about 35031 geogr. sq. miles. The whole area of the Dutch East Indies is as large as that of Europe without Central and Northern Russia.

The conditions of life in this island world are very much influenced by its position under the equator, between Asia and Australia, and between the Indian and Pacific Oceans, surrounded by warm seas everywhere. The formation and origin of the land is also of special importance. The form and situation of the larger islands is a result of the fold mountains which arise on the edge of the area of depression in the Indian and Pacific Oceans. One such range on the west and south edge of the Archipelago supports the islands of Sumatra, Java, and the Little Sunda Islands; the chain of mountains which crosses Borneo from west to east runs parallel to it. Celebes and the eastern islands as far as New Guinea show similar systems of folding which cross one another, being dependent on these two areas. The relative wealth of the larger islands in precious metals and other ores, which, like gold and silver, attracted foreign nations in quite early times, and like tin, which is now an important source of revenue to the government and to great mining companies, is due to the predominance of these chains of mountains formed of sedimentary and granitic rocks. Other valuable minerals, such as petroleum and anthracite, which are exploited on Sumatra, Java, and Borneo, come from the tertiary strata, which are common in the East Indies.

Of still greater importance is the volcanic nature of this chain of mountains, which is most marked on the series of islands from Sumatra to Timor and through its weathered eruptive products causes the unusually great fertility of these islands. Besides the very numerous volcanoes, the volcanic plateaus in Sumatra and the alluvial plains of volcanic origin (Sumatra and Java) are among the most highly cultivated and thickly populated regions of the East Indies. The island of Celebes and the Moluccas are also very volcanic.

Next to folding of strata and volcanic effects, coral has the greatest share in the formation of mountains in the Archipelago. From the very earliest period of the earth, countless coral reefs have been formed in these tropical seas in the shallows, where there is sufficient oxygen, light and temperature (about 22° cent.) and the process is still going on. The growth of the coral reefs is caused not only by the coral polypi but also by molluscs, chalk algae, diatomeae, and many other organisms. The Indian calciferous ranges formed by these reefs thus very rarely yield pure marble. In the course of time this part of the earth's surface has been subjected to great upheavals and depressions so that the old coral reefs have either been transformed into vast calciferous mountains of varying age or, although they could only be formed in the upper regions of the water, are now found at a great depth. On all the Great Sunda Islands one now finds those limestone mountains which are marked by infertility as are often also the neighbouring plains. The small islands formed of coral rock are also very numerous, which have recently become very important through the cultivation of the cocoa-nut palm. The caves washed out of the calciferous rocks supply the edible swallows' (of the Salanga kind) nests eaten by the Chinese.

Living coral reefs are found on almost all the rocky coasts of the Archipelago and in shallows in the high seas.

The climate of the Indies is a moist tropical one and besides being fertile produces a very exuberant vegetation. It renders possible the cultivation of the most valuable tropical plants such as sugar cane, tobacco, spices, indigo, etc. The most important factor for agriculture in the tropics is the rainfall. Only at isolated places is this less than 76 inches in the year, the minimum for the growth of tropical forests. The usual fall is 160—180 inches. In the north of Central Java as much as 360 inches a year has been recorded.

The situation between Asia and Australia causes a climate affected by the monsoons, the result of which is that, during our summer, dry winds from the east and southeast prevail and, during our winter, winds from the west and northwest with a rainy season predominate, in our spring and autumn changing winds form a transition.

The dry monsoon is strongest in the south-east. Timor and the adjoining islands have six or more months of drought each year, for which the winds from Australia are responsible. In the north and west this dryness of the wind is more or less alleviated by the greater breadth of the sea crossed and the vapours which the heat raises from it. The Moluccas, Celebes, Borneo, Java, and Sumatra thus feel this drought less and are more suitable for intensive agriculture throughout the year. Central and Northern Sumatra lie outside the monsoon area. The characteristic tropical temperature of about 27° Cent. with only slight variations in a day or year of $\pm 5^\circ$ prevails only in the plains. In western Java at a height of 1800 feet it is much lower (23°) and shows greater variations and thus we have a subtropical climate. The cultivation of tea, coffee, Chinese and European vegetables is possible here. In other countries the transition varies more rapidly, for example on Borneo. These climatic conditions have favoured the growth of tropical forests, which must originally have covered the Greater Sunda Islands entirely, till man destroyed them, almost entirely on Java, in part on Sumatra, and only to a small extent in Borneo. Even at the beginning of our era mention is made of the products of the Sumatra bush, such as camphor and benzoic. In the last 60 years the great demand in Europe for products like rubber, gutta-percha, rotan etc. has resulted in an economic revolution through the increased prosperity of the native population on Sumatra and Borneo.

The flora of the southeast on the other hand is of a prairie and savannah nature. Sandalwood has from ancient times been an important article of export here. The flora and fauna of these islands are predominantly determined by the proximity of Asia in the west and Australia and New Guinea in the east. The connections by land between Asia and the Great Sunda Islands existed for a long time, and Asiatic animals and plants were thus able to spread over them. There were also connections by land with Australia and New Guinea in the east, so that their plants and animals are now found farther west on the Moluccas, etc. These alone have thus become the home of spices like nutmegs and cloves. Of Asiatic animals the tiger is found on Borneo, Java, and Bali, the elephant on Sumatra, the tapir on Sumatra and Java, monkeys on Sumatra, Borneo, and Java, only one kind on Celebes, and none farther east. Wild cattle are found in the woods of Sumatra, Java, and Borneo and Bali. On the other hand, the Moluccas possess no genuine mammals, but only the Australian marsupials, of which two kinds are found as far westwards as Celebes. One also finds the birds of the east even on this island, such as parrots and cockatoos, only the cassowaries and birds of paradise are not found till farther east. Thus these two opposite worlds have penetrated the archipelago somewhat disproportionately.

Population: The population of the Dutch Indies, numbering at present 44 millions belongs, with the exception of the Papuans of New Guinea and the surrounding region and isolated remnants of an earlier Vedda people, like the Toala in Celebes, to the Malay-Polynesian race which spread from Madagascar to Easter Island and from South Japan to Java. The archipelagoes between Celebes and New Guinea with the eastern Little Sunda Islands are inhabited by a cross between Malays and Papuans which is known as the Alfurs. The Malay type is only found in the interior of Sumatra, Borneo, and Celebes, still comparatively pure. South eastern Asia has been indicated as the original home of the Malays. Linguistically they seem still to have left traces in the south of British India. If one remembers that the Polynesians must also have reached their present abodes by crossing the Malay Archipelago and that even Ptolemy mentions the man-eating Bataks of North Sumatra, it is clear that present conditions must be the results of thousands of years of migrations. In addition to the powerful influence of foreign peoples who arrived in later times and the influence of surrounding peoples, this affords an explanation of the complicated conditions in the varied population of these islands. Two groups are distinguished among the Malays of the Archipelago: an older stratum, the Bataks of Sumatra, the Dayaks of Borneo, and the Toradja of Celebes, and a younger stratum, which was more exposed to admixture in the foreign elements. The type of the latter is the Menangkabaw Malays of Central Sumatra and it includes the Atjeh of North Sumatra, the Riaw Malays in the Riaw Archipelago, the Malays of the coasts of Sumatra and Borneo, the Javanese, the Balinese, and the coast peoples of the Moluccas. The Makassars and the Buginese [q. v.] are supposed to be Toradja greatly mixed with foreign elements. The present Minahasas are Toradja who have been educated by Christianity during the last 70 years. The Alfurs include the inland tribes of Halmahera and the neighbourhood, of Buru and Ceram and the adjoining small islands, of Timor, Flores, Sumba, and Sumbawa. The Buginese, who have been seafarers for centuries, have contributed a great deal to the admixture of the coast peoples of the whole Archipelago.

All these peoples are for the most part settled agriculturists; on the great rivers and on the seashore however the Malays prefer to fish and trade (previously they were also pirates). The people of the Archipelago as a rule only work when necessity drives them. They often appear lazy to us on account of their slight wants and the conditions of tropical life. The original Malays, like the Bataks, Dayaks, and Toradja, as well as the Alfurs and Papuans show a state of society broken up into very many small tribes. Each tribe forms a separate social unit, which as a result of war, feuds, or mistrust is only rarely on constant terms of intercourse with its neighbours and thus develops independently. The result is a great variety of languages, manners, and customs.

The patriarchal constitution of these tribes frequently includes a ruling family, freemen, and slaves. In the east among the Papuans and related tribes there appear to be no chiefs. Among the Malays they are chosen from the ruling family, most frequently the eldest son; if necessity arises, a daughter may be chosen. They manage the affairs of the tribe with the elders. The slaves (slavery is now abolished) usually come from prisoners of war or are slaves through debt. They are frequently considered the property of the tribe and then are allotted to the chiefs. They are well treated and often enter the ranks of the freedmen through marriage. They were rarely sold. For human sacrifices prisoners of war were used or men infirm through old age, who were purchased from the coast Malays. Slavery is now the exception even among the most remote tribes.

The density of this older stratum, including the Alfurs and Papuans, is very slight, from 3 to 4 per square mile. As the birth rate is not small, the main causes of the sparsity of population are the terrible devastations wrought by such illnesses as malaria, cholera, smallpox, dysentery and venereal diseases among these tribes, and their low development which makes them unable to take advantage of the not unfavourable conditions for agriculture, making clothes and houses, hunting and fishing, so that they often lead a very mean existence amid the luxurious tropical surroundings. Although each member of the tribe has collected a number of observations from his own experience he has no ability to co-ordinate facts. He has no idea of the nature of diseases and their cure, of the life and growth of man, animals or plants. Although well endowed intellectually, these men only develop (again, as a result of their social isolation) to a certain limited degree. In their little societies each household has to procure everything it requires. There is no division of labour and special ability or achievement gain no important advantages. Their intellectual capacities are not a little affected by their sanitary and economic conditions. Nevertheless, each of these tribes shows great ability in the field of industry or social institutions.

Animism is here also the characteristic religion, which prevails with its disadvantageous accompanying phenomena such as spiritualism, fetish worship, pemali or tabu restrictions, and belief in omens, among these primitive Malays, Alfurs, and Papuans. It of course assumes very varied forms among the numerous peoples but everywhere it strengthens the above mentioned causes of the sparseness of population. As about two thousand years of Hinduism and Muhammadanism have not withdrawn the higher developed peoples of the Archipelago from the influence of animistic beliefs, its disadvantageous influence on their further development can hardly be overestimated.

Among these heathen peoples are still parts of the Bataks, Dayaks, and Toradja, and almost all the Alfurs and Papuans.

The above rather detailed sketch of this old Malay population is important, just because we are probably not wrong in thinking that the whole population of the Archipelago at the beginning of our era was so constituted. But then began the overwhelming influence of Hinduism.

During the reign of the Emperor Augustus, pepper, cloves, and nutmegs were sent to Rome via the Red Sea, as Pliny mentions. The trade routes between southern Asia and the archipelago were thus known. Ptolemy in his Geography gives a whole series of names which refer to this Archipelago. He knows the name of the harbour of Pansur at Baros, from which the Sumatra camphor was exported and he also knows of the man-eating Bataks of North Sumatra.

We can thus conclude that even then the influence of the Hindu trading peoples must have made itself felt in the Archipelago. We also here find an explanation of the stories of the Buddhist monk Fa-Hien, who landed in Java in 412 A. D. on his return voyage from Ceylon to China, remained five months there, and clearly found a Brahman society there but no Chinese and very few Buddhists. Several kingdoms of Sumatra, Java, and Borneo are mentioned at later dates in the Chinese annals. According to an inscription in the modern Kedu, in Central Java, Çivaism prevailed there in the Çaka year 654 = 732 A. D. Soon afterwards we find the Mahayana there and, as ruins of temples and inscriptions prove, both religions continued peacefully beside one another on the island for several centuries till about the end of the Hindu period in the Archipelago, about 1500 A. D. These ruins have been found on Sumatra, Java, the coast of Borneo, Southern Celebes and the Lesser Sunda Islands, although they are by far the most numerous on Java. Besides these proofs of the earlier influence of Hinduism the modern languages, by their scripts and vocabularies give evidence of its spread at an earlier period. The alphabets used by the modern Javanese, Bataks, South Sumatrans, Balinese, Makassars, and Buginese are derived from Hindu alphabets and there are many Indian words in the languages of these peoples. There are many remnants of Hindu culture in manners and customs also.

Java [q. v.] was certainly the centre of Hindu rule and from this island Hindu influence for the longest period made itself felt in the Archipelago. If one remembers how much higher the civilization of the Hindu was than that above described of the Malay peoples, one can understand that, during the period of over a thousand years when Hinduism prevailed, a great change must have taken place in the conditions of life in the Archipelago. This was very marked in the political field also; despotic kingdoms arose out of the disconnected patriarchal tribes, such as the Europeans found in Sumatra, Java, the coasts of Borneo, southern Celebes, and in Bali and Lombok, and among the Malays further east also. At that period also arose the division into castes which is still found on Bali and Lombok and the effects of which can still be traced in Java.

In the economic field, agriculture, shipping, commerce, and industry developed. The introduction of writing must have given a great incentive to progress. What a permanent advance was made by these alterations in the Archipelago is shown by the height of development of these peoples, whose density of population is also much greater (up to 120 per sq. mile).

The influence of Hinduism on religion assumed a very peculiar form. We have discussed above the characteristic features that animism possesses in the Archipelago and what a crippling influence it has had upon the conditions of life of the Malay, Alfur, and Papuan populations. If one remembers how much higher are the ideas and philosophies underlying the Indian religions, one expects that these would have considerably altered the views of the Malays of the Archipelago. But the actual facts are quite different. As already mentioned, their mental attitude is, generally speaking, determined by their animistic ideas and even the most educated peoples, like the Javanese, are still much influenced by the belief in pemali and omens. The peculiar social institutions of the Hindus are probably the main cause of this. What we admire as the highest in the religions of India was and is only the property of the highest castes. The masses of the present Hindu peoples have by no means lost their animistic beliefs. It was presumably not the most educated classes in the Brahman and Buddhist kingdoms that undertook as merchants the dangerous journeys to the Indian Archipelago and settled there. It would hardly be possible for these colonists radically to transform the popular beliefs. In the powerful Hindu kingdoms of Java and the other islands of a later date the great religious problems were no doubt studied as in the mother country, but probably only among the priests, and the masses were little affected thereby.

The people of British India also had too little insight into the relations of the phenomena of nature to be able to destroy animistic beliefs to any considerable extent. They were as little able to do so after the introduction of Islām.

Although the religious beliefs were little influenced, the ceremonial and vocabulary of religion were transformed during the Hindu period. Among the above-mentioned peoples who were most subjected to this influence the animistic gods and spirits are given Hindu names, as will be shown below in reference to Java. The manner of worship of this world of spirits also exhibits many Indian forms. What form spiritual conditions in the Hindu kingdoms of the Archipelago took can best be seen in the islands of Bali [q. v.] and Lombok, which are still Hindu.

Islām. When the natives of British India in part became converts to Islām, its influence also spread in the Archipelago through the merchants who visited these islands and settled on them, at least during a monsoon or longer, and often married a native wife, who had first of all to adopt Islām, and thus a considerable influence over her family and tribe was gained. Among the simple peasants of the country the far travelled, experienced strangers enjoyed a certain prestige, which even now contributes a great deal to the spread of Islām in pagan countries. To become one of these men has a great attraction for the heathen and this makes it easy for him to adopt Islām. This was true in a less degree of the Hindu Malays and they therefore were not so affected by Muhammadan influences as the pagan Malays.

We know little that is certain of the beginning of this movement. Unfortunately the Malay and Javanese historians are little trustworthy and thus the accounts by Marco Polo (end of the xiiith century) and of Ibn Baṭṭūṭa [q. v.] (middle of the xivth century) of the Muslim kingdom of Pasei on the north coast of Sumatra form the first reliable material to go upon. Islām spread rapidly along the east coast of Sumatra, for in the second half of the xivth century Indragiri and Djambi are said to have been vassal states of Malacca. In 1377 Palembang was regained by the Hindu Javanese. The interior remained for long pagan and in parts is so still. It was probably due to the power of the Hindu Menangkabau kingdom on the west coast that Islām here met with more continued resistance, which was first broken from Atjeh. Not till the xviith century did the conversion of the south coast of Sumatra begin and that of the interior only in the xviiith century. The people in the mountains of Palembang are still little affected by Islām.

Native traditions give us no exact data for the spread of Islām in the island of Java. But we know from European sources that the great trading centres of the north coast like Djapara, Tuban, Grèsik, and Surabaya at first formed principalities half or entirely independent of the Hindu kingdom of Majapahit, and that in the first half of the xviith century, in alliance with the prince of Dēmak, they took the capital Majapahit. It was not till then that the considerable kingdom of Dēmak was founded and later that of Pajan and finally that of Mataram. By the conquest of these kingdoms the conversion of the whole island to Islām made rapid progress.

Beside these secular states the princes of Giri at Grèsik long held power which was based on religious prestige.

Soon after the fall of Majapahit a powerful movement in favour of Islām began on western Java of which we have fairly reliable accounts from the Portuguese de Barros, Pinto, and Couto. In the then Hindu kingdom of Padjadjaran Muslim merchants must have been long settled. The first foundation of a Muslim kingdom there was however the result of the efforts of a scholar from Pasei, who is now called Sunan Gunung Djati from his tomb at Tjirèbon. He left his native town of Pasei in 1521 to study for three years in Mecca. He afterwards arrived in Djapara in Central Java and preached here with such success that he was allowed to marry a sister of the king of Dēmak. He then went to Bantën in West Java, converted the governor here and with the help of Demak gained the political power here also and in 1527 took Sunda Kalapa, the modern Batavia, from the king of Padjadjaran. This kingdom of Padjadjaran still existed in the interior, when he migrated to Tjirèbon about 1546 and he must have died there about 1570. His grave on Gunung Djati is still highly venerated. He is also one of the eight or nine wali who, according to native tradition, spread Islām over Java. His son Hasanuddin (Hasan al-Dīn) was the ancestor of the princes of Bantën [q. v.] and lived till about 1570. His son Yusup (Yūsuf) succeeded about 1579 in capturing Pakuwān, the capital of Padjadjaran.

At the present day the native population of Java, numbering 33,000,000, is Muslim. The only exception is formed by Christians (about 10,000) and the two little hill peoples of the Badui in the west and the Tēnggērese in the east who have remained faithful to the pre-Muhammadian tradition. The latter however frequently become converts to Islām.

On the island of Borneo [q. v.] the population of the west coast seems to have been converted from Palembang; on the south coast, on the Barito, probably from Java. The whole Malay population on the coasts and the great rivers is now Muslim and makes many converts among the still pagan Dayak tribes of the interior.

On the island of Celebes [q. v.] there are in the south the Muslim Makassars and the Buginese who were not converted till later. At the beginning of the xviiith century their conversion began in Tello and Goa. They are all enthusiastic Muslims and have done much to spread their religion among the distant coast peoples of the east by their trading journeys and colonies. The Lesser Sunda Islands, Sumbawa and West Flores, which were formerly dependent on Goa, have certainly abandoned paganism through its influence.

The Moluccas in the north east of the Archipelago along with the sultanates of Ternate and Tidore adopted Islām very early, as a result of the spread of Islām by Muhammadan traders. This was the centre of the spice trade which attracted foreign traders so much. Under their influence Zainalabidin (Zain al-‘Ābidīn), prince of Ternate, who ascended the throne in 1486, was converted, and also Prince Tjiliati of Tidore who reigned from 1495. They are called the first sultāns of their kingdoms, the second under the name of Djamaluddin.

The Alfur tribes in the interior of the larger islands like Halmahera, Buru, Ceram, the Kei and Aru Archipelagoes, and Timor have remained heathen. Islām has only made little progress among the coast population of New Guinea.

The number of Muslims in the Archipelago is about 35 millions (in 1905, 35 034 025 of whom 29 605 653 were in Java), but they observe the precepts of their religion in very different ways. As is clear from the dates above given, Islām was introduced here when its system was already fully developed. Its characteristic features among these peoples took shape according to the country, British India, from which merchants or adventurers had contributed most to its spread. In British India Islām had already adapted itself to Hinduism and was thus all the more easily adaptable to the altered Hinduism of Java and Sumatra. The popular legends of the times of the Prophet and his first successors are modelled on those of India. In these tales as in individual customs of the Indonesian Muslims one can observe traces of the influence of the Shī‘īs just as on the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel, where, as in the Indian Archipelago, in other respects the Sunnī, orthodox rite is followed, and in legal interpretation the Shāfi‘ī school. Here as there, there is also a great love of mysticism, which among the more highly developed assumes a pantheistic form and among the lower classes is mixed with the strongest superstition.

The by no means slight influence of the Arabs was the result, not the cause of the conversion of the Malays in the Archipelago. Intercourse with the sacred cities Mecca and Medina increased steadily from the xviith century and a continually increasing number of young men remained there to study. These and the Arabs who migrate to India from the poor district of Hadramawt [q. v.] often protest against the customs and ideas introduced from India.

As in other countries, Islām has here also adapted itself in a high degree to the views of the converts and therefore possesses several curious features. The mosque and its personnel forms even more than in other lands the centre of influence of this religion on the whole life of the people. There are Friday mosques in the more important places in Java, in Atjeh, and Central Sumatra; in the Malay districts of Borneo only in the chief towns, and among the Makassars and Buginese only in the capitals of the many principalities. In the east of the Archipelago they are rare. Smaller mosques in Java, Central Sumatra, and in Atjeh are fairly common. Only a small minority perform the ṣalāt here; on the other hand, a considerable assembly takes place during the two official festivals of Islām (see 'ID AL-ADḤĀ and 'ID AL-FITR]. The structure of the East Indian mosques is characterised by a broken roof which consist of two or four small roofs one above the other, crowned by a separate pinnacle. Only a few of the largest mosques have minarets. The mu'adhdhin (outside Java frequently called bilāl) sings his call to divine worship from this broken roof, but previously it is vigorously announced by the beating of a long wooden drum (bēdug or tabuh).

The personnel of a mosque consists of at least four men: an imām, a khaṭīb (Jav. kētip), a bilāl, and a servant. There may however be as many as forty or even more. In the Dutch Indies these officials are not clergy any more than in other countries. In Java however they often carry out the duties of a kādi (Jav. kali) and perform wedding ceremonies, as they alone have the necessary qualifications. The outer gallery of the mosque (surambi) therefore becomes a court house for the settlement of all quarrels that are decided in these countries by religious law. In Java these include questions of marriage, family law and inheritance; the panghulu or chief of the mosque for this purpose sits with some qualified members of his staff, often on Thursdays. In 1882 the Dutch government regulated by law the panghulu courts and made them courts of justice (Priester-raden) with three to eight members.

These courts have in most cases to deal with complaints by women of insufficient attention or bad treatment from their husbands or to give official sanction to a request of a woman for divorce as a result of a previously pronounced conditional ṭalāḳ (ta'lik) [q. v.]. The Muslims of Indonesia have adopted the principle of a conditional ṭalāḳ as a corrective against the too great dependence of women according to Muslim law. In Java, Madura, and other islands it is a regular custom for the husband immediately after the marriage ceremony to secure for his wife the dissolution of the marriage by ta'lik in case he should not fulfil the obligations of a good husband. Only in the matriarchal people of Menangkabau and among the Achinese is this conditional ṭalāḳ not the custom, as the women there do not leave their family after marriage and remain more independent.

All that is acquired during marriage is in Java considered the joint property of the couple. On divorce therefore disputes as to its division thus frequently come before the Priesterraad. In cases of inheritance law the judges frequently demand 10% of the estate. Wakaf property is administered by these judges and quarrels about it settled by them. They appoint guardians for minors. They also appear as wali's at the weddings of women who have not a wali available among their blood-relations.

The zakāt (Jav. Mal. djakat) to the Muḥammadans of the Indies means principally the handing over of the tithes of the harvest of rice and similar fruits of the fields. Only in the Sunda countries (West-Java), Atjeh, Palembang, and some other districts of Sumatra do we find a kind of official collector. These however exercise no rights of compulsion regarding the collection. In other countries this religious duty is either entirely neglected or its fulfilment depends entirely on the degree of piety in the individual. Under various pretexts the staff of the mosque is able to get a considerable portion of the yield for themselves. Where the zakāt is delivered without an official collection, it is given by the pious to honoured scholars etc. At the time of the Atjeh war a considerable portion of the zakāt was expended on the "holy war".

The payment of zakāt al-fitr, the small poll tax ordered by law to be paid at the conclusion of the fast, is fairly general. It has practically assumed the character of a free-will offering.

The observance of the five daily ṣalāt's varies considerably with place and time. In West-Java and South-east Borneo for example there are districts where almost every one of these services is regularly held. In Central Java and Atjeh they are neglected by the majority and those who observe them faithfully and at the same time refrain from the popular amusements banned by Islām, such as gamēlan, wayang, dancing, sadati performances etc.) are given special names (wong putihan, lebe, santri) and distinguished from the great mass of the people (wong abangan, bangsat).

The fast of Ramaḍān (puasa) is more widely observed. The festivals at the end of it are celebrated as the most important of the year and regarded by Europeans as the Muhammadan New Year.

The ḥadjj is very eagerly performed by the people of the Archipelago; in the last years (about 1913) the number of pilgrims was 20—30 000. These usually leave officially appointed harbours by European steamers for Djidda and return the same way. Of these multitudes, several young men always settle in Mecca for some years to devote themselves to religious studies. They form the Djawa colony there (about 7000 souls in 1914) and at their return home form the link which binds international Muḥammadan culture with that of their native land.

The main characteristics in their religion or their conversion are considered by the Muslim natives to be circumcision and abstinence from pork or alcohol. Of all religious duties these are the ones most punctiliously observed.

Elementary religious instruction (recitation of the Qur'ān and possibly practice in the ṣalāt) is given by the village "priests" or by other teachers. In many districts only a small number of boys and a still smaller number of girls receive this instruction.

In the larger centres of population there are scholars, who introduce pupils to a knowledge of Muslim learning in the mosque, in their own houses, or in a special building. The great reputation of such a guru induces many young people from far and near to settle for a considerable time in his neighbourhood. Characteristic however are the institutes on their own ground, which so to speak form separate villages, where students from various districts live together to devote themselves to study under the direction of one or more guru's. In Java these institutes are called pēsantren (i. e. abodes of santri). They consist of the houses of the guru's with their families, and of pondok's or buildings, which are divided into two parts by a passage down the centre. Each of these consists of a row of cells, which serve as sleeping rooms and also as studies for two or more boys. The whole institute with its buildings and estates is often a foundation (wakf) by pious people; in Central Java there are frequently villages which were freed by former rulers from taxation, etc., and emancipated from all authority of the usual chiefs and dedicated as perdikan-desa's exclusively to places of religious study.

In Atjeh such institutions are called rangkang, in Central Java surau. Their organisation shows some differences from that of the pēsantren. In all these schools the young native Muslims are more or less initiated into the well known mediaeval cycle of Muslim learning: law, religion, and mysticism. The manuals used are the authoritatively accepted texts, which are translated from Arabic into a native language or read in the original itself. Advanced pupils also apply themselves to Qur'ānic exegesis, the sacred traditions, and their explanation, the theory of jurisprudence, etc. The period of study lasts from two to ten or more years, according to the goal aimed at by the santri. Those who study for a long time go from one pēsantren to another to hear various distinguished scholars. In the country itself the more talented among them can make great progress in learning, but the greatest fortune that can befall the seeker after knowledge is to study in Mecca.

The Muslims of the Dutch Indies revere the international saints of Islām known to them. The main objects of their pilgrimages and vows however are their wali's, to whom is ascribed the introduction of their religion in their region. In Java they are the eight or nine wali's of the old trading-towns of the north coast, where the foreign Muslim merchants settled who first converted the native population in their neighbourhood. They also believe in patron saints of certain places and of certain spheres of daily life and, in opposition to the convictions of the educated believers, in trees, stones etc. being tenanted by spirits. There are also individuals who are worshipped as karāmat, wonder-workers. Saiyids and sharifs reap advantages from these beliefs of the credulous multitude. No East Indian Muslim can conduct his affairs without the help of saints. The curing of a dear relative who is ill, the winning of the love of a woman, the blessing of getting children, protection of the harvest against insects, success of a son in a school examination, promotion of a native official to a higher post, appointment of a prince as heir apparent, all these and similar fortunate events are hoped for through the favour of saints and their intervention with Allāh, who is Himself enthroned too high to be directly approached with such requests. These often take the form of a conditional vow (nadar, kaul, niyat, etc.). When a wish is fulfilled, the tomb of the saint is visited and recitations of the Qur'ān held, or a sacrificial animal is killed there, or a feast given or something else done which is known to be specially pleasing to the saints or some particular saint. The simple villager often promises something which he himself esteems very highly but which must be repulsive to the Muslim saint, such as the performance of a wayang. How much saints' graves were venerated in olden times in Java is seen from the fact that former rulers have freed certain villages from other burdens in return for the maintenance of these astana's (pēkuntjen villages).

From the earliest times the East Indian Muslims thought more of mysticism than the law, more of religious contemplation than of the fulfilment of ritual duties. The influence of Hinduism as well as the fact that it was Indians who sowed the first seeds of Islām favoured this tendency. In the tradition, frequently expressed in poetical language, of the eight or nine wali's of Java, pantheistic mystical sayings are attributed to some of them, and in the Malay poems of Hamza of Baros, whose doctrines won many adherents in the xviith century in North Sumatra and formed the subject of lively discussions at the court of Atjeh, the relation of man to God is described in erotic metaphors. In later times under the influence of Mecca and Ḥadramawt there was an increasing reaction on the part of orthodoxy against these heretical doctrines but this could not prevent works like the "Book of the Perfect Man" by 'Abd al-Kāsim al-Djili [see AL-INSĀN AL-KĀMIL] continuing to be zealously read by a wide circle. Religiously inclined Javanese usually enter all kinds of quotations in private notebooks (primbon's in Java) which they consider suitable for the guidance of their daily life. Among these, pantheistic or even nihilistically coloured sayings are particularly common. Such wisdom is particularly in vogue under such names as ilmu haḳikat (doctrine of the highest reality), "doctrine of the seven degrees of being", ilmu salik, "doctrine of the wanderer", i. e. on the path to reality. Half educated people content themselves with learning some formulae by heart or with a kind of mystic catechism. Illiterates carry as amulets mystic figures with such sentences on them (daerah's, from the Arabic dā'ira, circle).

Of the mystical orders (tariḳah's) the Shattāriya gained the most adherents in Indonesia in the xviith—xviiith centuries. It had then prominent representatives in Medina. It has since almost disappeared in the rest of the world of Islām, but still has many followers in the East Indies. Here it has adopted many heretical elements from popular beliefs. In later times the Kādiriya, Naḳshibandiya, Shādhiliya, etc. through Meccan influence attained considerable prestige. The Sammāniya with their noisy dhikr exercises spread among the lower classes and resulted in the rise of popular amusements like the Atjeh sadati performance, which look like a caricature of the dhikr.

Ethical mysticism of the type best represented by al-Ghazali [q. v.] is also zealously studied in the Indies among such circles as lay particular stress on strict observance of religious law and on dogmatic orthodoxy.

The Chinese, Arabs, and Europeans also later found their way to this archipelago with its varied products. The Chinese probably traded with the Archipelago from the viith century. If one may judge from present conditions, in addition to the traders, the poorest young men from South China emigrated to the Indies to make a living by their work and trade and often married native women. From them is descended the mixed Chinese population of the Archipelago, often prosperous and economically very important on account of their industry and thrift. As these half-caste Chinese people retain the manners and customs of their fathers they do not become merged in the Malays. With the more recent immigrants, some 600,000 in number, they are now settled far into the interior of the great islands and in the important places on the coast, following their industry or commerce. On the present immigrant Chinese see SUMATRA. The Arabs also, mainly from Hadramawt, go to the Dutch Indies to earn money. Clever and enterprising they rely, with much success in their relations with the Malay Muslims, on their religion and nationality, especially if they can call themselves sharif or saiyid. Although, like the Chinese, they often become well to do and return home, they leave behind them their families from native wives, which however show a greater inclination in the end to merge in the native population. Prominent Arab scholars from Mecca and Medina also visit the islands occasionally, go to the courts, sometimes remaining a long time, and certainly contribute to strengthen Arab influence, but on account of their slight numbers cannot be considered an important element in the population. The Arabs in the Archipelago are estimated at about 31,000.

Europeans. Of the foreigners the ruling Dutch are economically the most important. With isolated other Europeans they control the wholesale trade, the working of the plantations, and industry. Shortly before conquering Malacca in 1511 the Portuguese had reached this Archipelago and went in the following years to the Spice islands, where they made conquests, carried on trade, and endeavoured to spread their religion. Their enemies, the Spaniards, who had reached the Moluccas from the east, soon retired to the Northern Philippines again.

Towards the end of the xvth century several European nations succeeded in reaching these islands. In 1594 the English, in 1596 the Dutch, and later the French, Danes, and Swedes with their armed ships came to the ports of North and East Sumatra, the north coast of Java, and the Moluccas to obtain spices, precious metals, and other products, which had previously been the monopoly of the Portuguese, Chinese, and Southern Asiatics.

The very many small Dutch societies for trading with the Indies united in 1602 into the "Geotroyeerde Oost-Indische Compagnie" with a capital of 6,000,000 guilders. During the xvith century this trading company extended its political power and influence, besides its trade from Africa to Japan, over the Southern Asiatic coasts and the East Indian Archipelago and maintained its position till the end of the xviii century. The competition of the other European nations, the feuds and quarrels in and between the various native states, and its rigid monopoly system soon forced the company continually to conquer more territory, and the resultant costs of administration and war contributed largely to the fact that they were forced in 1800 to hand over their possessions and their burdens of debt to the Dutch government. Their rule then extended to the coast regions of the larger and entirely over many smaller islands. Their relations to the native population consisted almost entirely simply of contracts and trading agreements with the native chiefs for the monopoly of exports and imports. The European influence on the masses of the people was thus very small. During the Napoleonic wars, when the Dutch lost their independence, the English conquered their Indian possessions, but these were returned at the Congress of Vienna as far as they were situated in the East Indian Archipelago. In the xixth century and at the beginning of the xxth all the islands have been conquered right into the interior and the influence of the Europeans on the natives thus increased. This is best seen on the island of Java which has always been the centre of Dutch authority.

The Queen of the Netherlands possesses executive power with regard to the Dutch Indies and partly independently and partly in combination with the "Staten-Generaal" in the Hague, the legislative authority. The Indian budget of expenditure (366 million guilders in 1916) is fixed by the Queen in combination with the "Staten-Generaal". The Dutch minister of the Colonies takes upon himself the responsibility of the Queen. A Governor-General represents the Queen in the Indies. He also has legislative power in certain circumstances. In the exercise of his great power he is more or less dependent on the cooperation of the "Raad van Indië", a council of five officials of high rank. Under these authorities appointed by the Queen, seven directors, a commander of the army and a chief of the navy with their nine departments carry on the ordinary business of administration. The "Algemeene Rekenkamer", which controls finance, has, like the others, its seat in Batavia. The Dutch Indies are divided into 34 residencies and 3 gouvernements which are under residents and governors. There are 17 of the former in Java. Under these higher civilian officials are assistant residents, controllers, and deputy controllers, all Europeans. The Indian volunteer army consists of about 12,000 Europeans and about 23,000 natives under 1350 Europeans and a few native officers. The Dutch Indies has a navy of its own of small ships and the battle ships of the motherland are detached there.

Besides the area directly governed there are about 300 native principalities which enjoy a certain amount of independence but are otherwise entirely subject to the Dutch government.

This firm government conducted on European lines secures the natives important advantages in contrast to their previous conditions. There are no longer civil or foreign wars, and the exploitation of the masses by the native princes and nobles is very much limited. Among the primitive tribes there is now security of life and property. Trade and commerce have increased everywhere as a result of this security, and necessities of life such as fabrics, crude metals, salt, tobacco, etc. are imported into the interior of the islands much cheaper than formerly. While formerly nothing was done against the terrible tropical diseases, they are now combatted in many ways, although still to an insufficient extent. The Dutch government is as a rule neutral in matters of religion. The often enormous increase in population, for example in Java excluding immigration, from 4 to 5 millions in 1812 to 30 millions in 1905, is to be ascribed to these circumstances as well as to native customs such as early and general marriage.

The economic development which these colonies have undergone in the last 50 years through the cultivation by Europeans of products for the world market is of great importance also for the native population. In 1914 the exports of sugar amounted to 185 million guilders, of tobacco 6 million, copra 48 million, coffee 22 million, tea 27 million, rubber 28 million, pepper 11 million. Certain mining districts also yield important products like petroleum (exports 53 million guilders), tin (30 million), anthracite, gold etc.

INDJIL or Andjil is corrupted from εὐαγγέλιον, gospel. From the Qur'an as well as from numerous authors we see that the Muslims had a certain knowledge of the Gospels. It is easy to show with the help of a few quotations the extent of this knowledge. On the other hand, it is often difficult to define positively and not merely by way of induction how this knowledge was obtained. Some of it was certainly obtained orally in controversies or friendly conversations between Christians and Muslims. But this method of transmission for the most part lacks historical record. There were also reminiscences of Christianity which were brought in by Christians converted to Islām. A similar Christian influence made itself felt on the rise of Sūfism, in the teachings of which traces of Christianity can be clearly seen (cf. the writer's, Gazali, Paris 1902). Finally, one may certainly assume that there were Muslim seekers after knowledge among the Arabs who read Arabic translations of the Gospels made by Christians. We therefore here give a brief survey of what can be known about these translations, followed by some instances of recollections of the New Testament in the Qur'an or the writings of various writers.

The Christian Arabs translated the Gospels from the Greek, Syriac, or Coptic. The translation from the Greek took place very early, as is shown by the great antiquity of the manuscripts (Vatican, Arab. 13, and Museo Borgiano-Progaganda), which date back to the viiith century A. D. According to Barhebraeus, there was a still older translation made between 631 and 640 by the Monophysite patriarch Johannes by order of an Arab prince, 'Amr b. Sa'd.

George, Bishop of the Arab tribes of Mesopotamia, a friend and contemporary of James of Edessa, wrote scholia on the Holy Scriptures; Sprenger (Das Leben des Mohammed, i. 131 sq.) even thought he could recognise in a passage in Muhammad b. Ishāk (ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 149 sq.) a fragment of a pre-Islamic translation. This fragment contains the verses 23—27 of John XV. The word al-m-n-h-mnā, by which παράκλητος is translated, is neither Arabic nor Syriac but Palestinian and rather old. But even if so great an age cannot be given them, in any case the first translations from the Greek are hardly later than the Muslim conquest and the spread of the Arabic language, which followed it.

A likewise very old translation from the Syriac exists in a Leipzig ms.; according to Gildemeister's investigations (De Evangelis, p. 35), it must have been made between 750 and 850 A. D. The Muslims were thus able to become acquainted with the principal books of the New Testament at quite an early date through direct reading of Arabic translations.

Besides the canonical gospels we possess Arabic recensions of the following New Testament apocrypha: the gospel of the Childhood, Protoevangelium of James, Apocalypse of Paul, a sermon by Peter, and one by Simon, a Martyrdom of James, and of Simon, as well as a small number of others, which do not appear to have been known in Muhammadan circles. R. Duval, La Littérature Syriaque, Paris 1899, p. 96, mentions an Apocalypse of Peter which, according to him, is an Arabic compilation of the xiiith century.

Muhammad was less acquainted with the canonical gospels than with the apocryphal. He did not obtain his knowledge from purely Christian sources, but must have obtained it orally from Christian Jews. This is shown by the kind of legend preserved in the Qur'an. They must have taken their form from those whom Muhammad calls hanif's [see HANIF] and who traced their religion to Abraham. This question however is only a particular case of the more general question of the origin and sources of Islām.

Poetry is also one of the ways by which Christian ideas found their way among Muslims. At the time of the rise of Islām poets were fond of visiting Hira [q. v.], where they were on friendly terms with Christian Arabs. They then related in Arabia the legends which they had heard in the wine booths in Hira. Among these poets are mentioned Zaid b. 'Amr b. Nufail and Umayya b. Abi l-Salt, of whom the latter was particularly well versed in Jewish legends also. Poetry thus formed for a fairly long time a link between Muslims and Christians. We know with what favour the Christian poet al-Akhtal [q. v.] was received at the court of the Omayyads. Medicine and administration also led to much intercourse between the two religions. We need only recall the names of Sergius Manšūr, secretary to four caliphs and father of John of Damascus, and the numerous Christian clerks who were employed by the Muslim government, as is evidenced by the order made by al-Walid

b. 'Abd al-Malik forbidding them to keep their hooks in Greek. But let us come back to the Qur'an.

Jesus, Mary, and the Gospel are frequently mentioned in the Qur'an, and Muhammad knows the essential difference between the Gospel and the Qur'an regarding morals, namely compassion and mercy (lvii. 27); he also knows to some extent the parable of the sower (xlviii. 29) and the promise of another messenger of God (vii. 156, cf. xvi. 17). He is also aware that the Gospel is put forward as a confirmation of the Pentateuch (v. 50). Of the miracles of Jesus he mentions the healing of the blind and of the leper as well as the raising from the dead.

The most popular tradition in those circles from which the Prophet obtained his knowledge, seems to have been that of the Annunciation. "He has chosen thee among women" the angel says to Mary in Qur'an, iii. 37 (cf. Luke i. 28). He likewise adopts the virgin birth of Jesus (xxi. 91). When the crucifixion is denied in Qur'an (iv. 156 and iii. 47), he is following the view of the Christian sect of the Docetes. The briefly mentioned ascension brings the life of Jesus to a conclusion at the moment when, according to the Gospels, the Passion should begin (cf. al-Zamakhshari, ed. Lees, i. 169, where a tradition of Ibn 'Abbās is quoted).

The calling of the apostles is distinctly mentioned (iii. 45-46). The institution of monasticism is connected with this as in the work of the Ikhwan al-Safa' [q. v.]. A miracle in the Acts of the Apostles finds mention in the Qur'an: Jesus lets down from heaven a covered table for the apostles (v. 112—115; cf. Acts, x. 9 sqq.). The story that Jesus miraculously gave life to a clay bird (iii. 43; v. 110) is taken from the Gospel of the Childhood. The name "second Adam" given to Christ is approximately found in Sūra iii. 52. The expression "strengthened by the Holy Ghost", which Muhammad uses in ii. 81, was not understood by him. He confuses the Holy Ghost with the Archangel Gabriel.

The commentators still further develop the legends in the Qur'an connected with the New Testament, particularly those of the childhood of Mary. On the whole the figure of the Virgin Mary is a very attractive one in the Qur'an and not very remote from Christian sentiment. On the other hand, the figure of Jesus is much more uncertain and, in comparison with the Gospels, a much lower one (cf. Isa). Jesus is rather only a pious prophet. Muhammad leaves him the name Messiah (iv. 169 sq.), but this name does not seem to have any definite theological meaning with him. Of other New Testament personages, Muhammad only mentions John the Baptist and Zachariah.

The New Testament had an important influence on Tradition (Hadith, q. v.). Various miracles, sayings, and ideas which are attributed to Muhammad or his followers have their origin in the Gospel. The stories that Muhammad increased supplies of food or water go back to the miracle of the loaves and fishes in the Gospel rather than to that of the wedding at Cana, as Goldziher thinks. Numerous traditions regarding the high position of the poor and the difficulty of the rich in entering heaven, again reflect the doctrine of the Gospel and are in contrast to the views of the heathen Arabs. As Goldziher has shown, an Arab traditionist, Abū Dā'ūd [q. v.], even puts a version of the Lord's prayer into the mouth of Muḥammad. H. Lammens also points out to me that the tradition, according to which Abū Bakr is moved to tears on hearing the Prophet preach, is of Christian origin. The "gift of tears", which is known to Christian mysticism, was little fitting to the temperament of the Arab conquerors.

On the legends of the Mahdī and on Muslim eschatology Christian apocalyptic literature had a considerable influence.

In several Muslim historians we find a rather extensive knowledge of the Gospels. Al-Ya'qūbī, one of the fathers of Arab history, gives a synopsis of them. Such an inquiring spirit as al-Ma'sūdī does not conceal his relations with the Christians. In Nazareth, as he tells us, he visited a church highly venerated by Christians and received a large number of Gospel stories from them. He knows of the birth of Jesus in Bethlehem, his childhood in Nazareth, the saying of God in Matthew III, 17: "This is My beloved Son", which he gives with slight alterations. He has also heard the story of the Magi who visited the infant Messiah, according to the Gospel and other sources. He gives the story of the summoning of the Apostles accurately. He also names the Four Evangelists and speaks of the "book of the Gospel", of which he gives a summary, as if he had seen it. On the other hand, he shows a certain distrust of this book, in contrast to the great reverence with which the Qur'ān speaks of it. Al-Ma'sūdī is comparatively well informed about the lives of the Apostles. He twice speaks of the martyrdom of the apostles Peter and Paul, but ascribes to the latter the same kind of martyrdom as, according to tradition, was the fate of Peter only. He knows Thomas as the apostle of India. On the whole, Thomas seems to be the apostle best known to the Muslims next to Peter, and even Paul is less known than Peter.

Al-Bīrūnī is still better informed than al-Ma'sūdī. In order to write his Chronology, he had to consult Nestorian Christians. He knows various parts of the Gospels and also of the commentary of Dād-i-shō' (Jesudad, cf. Duval, Litt. Syriacque, 2nd ed., p. 64) and discusses it with a certain spirit of criticism. The four Evangelists to him are four recensions, which he compares with the four copies of the Bible, the Jewish, Christian, and Samaritan. He notices, however, that these recensions differ considerably from one another. Al-Bīrūnī gives the genealogies of Joseph in full from Matthew and Luke, and tells in a very interesting passage how the Christians explain this difference. He speaks of other gospels which the Marcionites, Bardesanites, and Manichaeans possessed, the two first of which differed, according to him, "in some parts" from the Christian Gospels, while the others were contradictory. In view of all these different recensions he concludes that one cannot rely very much on the prophetic value of the Gospels.

The Persian version of Ṭabarī's Chronicle (French ed. by Zotenberg) contains New Testament legends, which are more detailed than in the Arabic original and correspond with those found in the stories of the Prophets (K'īṣa al-Anbiyā'). Certain details from the Passion for example are given, such as the repudiation by "Simeon", the betrayal by one of the Apostles, who is not mentioned by name, and the story of Mary under the Cross. For the rest the author holds the Muslim view that another person, whom he calls Josua, was substituted for Jesus. As to the history of the Apostles he gives the tradition which makes John come to Edessa.

In the mystic literature, one finds numerous allusions to the Gospel, there are even traces of some knowledge of the exposition of some passages in scripture by the Fathers of the Church. What is given by the Muslim mystics as sayings of Jesus, however, is very far from always agreeing with the Gospel. For example, the sayings ascribed by al-Ḡhazālī to Christ are almost all incorrect. On the other hand we find in al-Suhrawardī an accurate and complete version of the parable of the sower. The Rasā'il Ikhwān al-Ṣafā' contain remarkable passages about the crucifixion of Jesus, the actuality of which they assume, about the Resurrection, the assembling of the Apostles at the last supper and their scattering over the face of the earth. The Acts of the Apostles (Af'āl al-Hawāriya) is expressly quoted there (Dieterici, p. 605).

The philosophic literature also shows a large number of controversies between Christians and Muslims. Among the celebrated polemicists we need only mention here Abū 'Alī 'Isā b. Zur'a, who in 387 composed a reply to Abū 'l-Kāsim 'Abd Al-lāh b. Aḥmad al-Balkhī, and Yahyā b. 'Adī, a Christian scholar and pupil of al-Fārābī. The latter produced an apology for Christianity, which he dedicated to Shaiḫ Abū 'Isā Muḥammad b. al-Warrāk. He also replied to strictures by al-Kindī on the Trinity. [See also the articles 'Isā and al-MAHDĪ].

The Muslims in general respect the Gospels and revere Jesus and Mary. The Turks call it Indjil şerif. Various writers who have lived in Turkey say that many Turks in secret recognise the superiority of the Gospels to the Qur'ān. In particular they mention the case of Kābiḫ [q. v.], who in the reign of Solimān I openly professed his preference for the Gospels and was therefore executed (D'Osson, Tableau general de l'Empire Ottoman, i. 153).

INDJŪ. This name, which is properly a name for the royal estates under the Mongols, is usually given to the dynasty which reigned from about 703—758 = 1303—1357 in Fārs (Shirāz), as its founder, Sharaf al-Dīn Maḥmūdshāh, had been first of all sent there by Uldjaitū to administer the royal estates. According to a statement in the Tārīkh-i Guzida, he was a descendant of 'Abd Allāh Anṣārī [q. v.] Under Uldjaitū's successor Abū Sa'īd he not only retained his office, but was able continually to extend his power so that by about 725 (1325) he was practically independent ruler of Shirāz and almost the whole of Fārs. After the death of Abū Sa'īd he was put to death by order of his successor Arpa Khān in 736 (1335-6). According to the Shirāznāma, he had four sons: Djalāl al-Dīn, Mas'ūdshāh, Ghiyāth al-Dīn Kaikhusrav, Shams al-Dīn Muhammad and Abū Ishāk Djamāl al-Dīn. The first named was already ruling in Shirāz in the lifetime of his father down to about 735, when during his absence his brother Kaikhusrav took his place. On his return however the latter refused to restore him his authority and a war broke out between the brothers, which ended in 739 (1338-9) with the death of Kaikhusrav. Mas'ūd had imprisoned the third brother Muhammad in Kal'at Safid, but he was able to escape and found support from the Čupanid Pir Husain. The latter collected a Mongol army and advanced on Shirāz with Muhammad, so that Mas'ūd had to take to flight and Pir Husain entered Shirāz.

But his rule did not last long, for, when shortly afterwards in 740 (1340) he put Muhammad to death, the population took up such a threatening attitude that he found it advisable to retire, only however to return next year with new forces. But on this occasion also he had no good fortune, as he quarrelled with the Čupanid Ashraf and, when the two sides were drawn up in line of battle, he was left in the lurch by his own men, so that he had to seek refuge with Shaikh Hasan, who had him put to death. In the meanwhile, Mas'ūd Shāh had retired to Luristān and made an alliance there with Yaghibasti, a brother of Ashraf, while Ashraf himself took the side of his brother Abū Ishāk. Mas'ūd, however, succeeded in reaching Shirāz with the help of Yaghibasti, but there met the same fate as his brother: he was treacherously murdered by Yaghibasti in 743 (1343). The latter thereupon quarrelled with Ashraf but made peace again and they jointly attempted to subjugate Fārs, but their troops dispersed when the news of the murder of their brother Hasan Kūčuk [q. v.] reached them.

Abū Ishāk, a younger son of Maḥmūdshāh, who had previously received the town of Ispahān from Pir Hasan, now became lord of Shirāz and of the whole of Fārs. As he endeavoured to extend his rule over Yazd and Kirmān, he came into conflict with the rising power of the Muzaffarids [q. v.] with varying success. The result was that Abū Ishāk was not only driven from Kirmān and Yazd, but was ultimately besieged in Shirāz. The town had to be surrendered to the Muzaffarids in 754 (1353). Abū Ishāk had in the meanwhile fled to Kal'at Safid, received some support from the Ilkhān Shaikh Hasan from Baghdād and went to Ispahān. There also he was besieged and finally captured, handed over to the relatives of a Shaikh who had been put to death by his order, and was killed by them 758 (1357). The Persian poet 'Ubaid Zakānī commemorated his Maecenas in an elegy.

INDO-CHINA. Further India. — Islām in French Indo China. French Indo-China comprises the whole eastern zone, by far the greater part of the double peninsula which lies between British India and China. The western zone belongs to England and the rather small part in the centre to Siam, which serves as a buffer state between the two. French Further India comprises in the south Cochīn China (Annamese Nam k'y) which is a direct possession, in the centre the kingdom of Cambodia (in its dialect Srōk Khmēr, Nokor Kampučē [Sanskrit, Kambuja]), in the north the kingdom of Laos (Laotic: Müng Lao); in the east the empire of Annam (Annamese: Nu'ôc Annam); in the north east the province of Tonking (Annamese Bắc k'y), all of which are protectorates.

This country, one and half times the size of France, is only inhabited by about 12,000,000 Annamese, 1,500,000 Cambodians, 1,200,000 Laotese, and about 200,000 Tjams¹⁾ and Malays, 275,000 Chinese, 1000 Hindus, mainly Tamils, and about 500 000 savages²⁾ or half civilised men.

²⁾ The natives call themselves Moi, Pnong or Kha, which in Annamese, Cambodian and Baotese means "savage".

As regards religion, the Annamese like the Chinese are Buddhists or Confucianists, only a very small number being Christians; the Cambodians and Laotese are Buddhists, the semi-civilised are almost all animists, with a very few Christians; the Tjams, Malays, and a few Tamils are Muslims, except 20 to 25 thousand of the Binh Thuận who have remained faithful to a very ancient Brahmanism. Some Tamils and Bengalese are Hindus.

The Tjams (urang tjam) live partly in Binh Thuận, in modern Annam, the last refuge of their nationality, partly in Cambodia, along the bank of the Mekong, and on the edge of the great lake (Tonlé Sap) partly around the towns of Châu đốc and Tây-ninh in Cochín China, and finally in a few villages in Siam.

The Malays who are almost equal in numbers live entirely near them in Cambodia as well as in Cochín China and are in constant relations with them. They are not found in Annam.

Islām at present plays only a slight part in Further India. It was at one time more important but never predominant, as long as the kingdom of the Tjams dominated the peninsula.

The Tjams, whose physical features and language are obviously connected with those of the Polynesian Malays, at one time founded a powerful kingdom in Further India, which seems to have comprised Cochín China, the modern Annam, with the exception of Tonking, and a part of Cambodia. A memorial of its greatness is the stele of Nhatrang, of the second or third century. In the thirteenth century the kingdom, although already declining, still aroused the astonishment of Marco Polo. In the fourteenth, however, it was broken up when the Cambodians and Annamese attacked it together and in 1471 there were only a few tribes in the valleys of the Binh Thuận who were much oppressed by Annam. At that time many of them fled to Cambodia, where their descendants still live.

The oppressed Tjams greeted the French rule with joy, but the French are not succeeding in elevating them. Physically they are not degenerates. They are taller and better proportioned than the Annamese, the skin is soft and of a light brown colour, the hair soft and often wavy, the face rather broad, the eye well formed, and with an open look, the mouth of medium size. They belong to those Asiatics whose type is nearest to ours, but their fertility is only very moderate. In spite of a certain childish liveliness and a great softness of character they are intellectually extremely apathetic. They practise neither commerce nor industry, live in very miserable villages (in Annam they are built on the ground and in Cambodia on piles), weave a few stuffs, and only do as much agriculture and cattle rearing as is necessary to maintain life without worrying whether they can improve their lot.

When was Islām introduced among the Tjams? This question has not yet been solved. One thing however is certain. It was preceded by Hinduism, the most accepted form of which was Çivaism, which is still practised with the most remarkable variations by some thousands of Tjams who have remained true to this old faith and therefore call themselves Tjan-Djät (Sanskrit jāt), pure-bred Tjams. But by their Muslim fellow countrymen they are called Akaphir or Kaphir (Ar. kāfir) "infidels", without the one side or the other seeing an insult in the appellations.

Two hypotheses may explain the introduction of Islām into Further India. It was either brought in the xth or xivth century by Arab merchants, Indians or Persians, in the great movement of the general spread of Islām, or it came later as a result of a Malay immigration.

It is certain that the Arabs were acquainted with Further India at a very early period. As early as the viith century there were regular relations between Arabia, China, India and the Archipelago. By 458 the Arabs and Persians were so numerous in Canton that they laid the city waste with fire and sword. In the ixth century they raised a rebellion in Khan-fu, in which 120 000 of them perished by the sword. In these circumstances they must have been acquainted with Indo-China and if they knew it, they must also have endeavoured to win it for their religion with the well known missionary enthusiasm of the Muslims.

A passage in the Annals of the Sung dynasty, Chap. 489, which was ingeniously explained by Ed. Huber (Bulletin de l'Ecole française d'Extrême Orient, III, 55, N^o. 1), shows that Islām was first brought to them by the Arabs or Persians. In the Annals it is stated: "There are (among the Tjams) also buffaloes which live in the mountains. They are not used for agriculture but only as sacrificial animals. When one is sacrificed, the men utter this prayer "A-lo-ho-ki-pa" which means "may it soon rise again". According to Huber, this A-lo-ho-ki-pa corresponds to Allāhu akbar and warrants the conclusion that there were already Tjams converted to Islām in the time of the Sung. In the same account of the Tjams it is said: "the customs and dress of the Tjams are similar to those of the population of the kingdom of Ta-che (Tadjik i. e. Arabs)".

The historical statements of the Tjams are not to be taken too seriously. But it must be remarked that their legendary chronicles place at the head of the list of kings who had Śrī-Banōy as their capital, the Pō or lord Ovlaḥ (Allāh) who reigned from 1000 to 1036. In the year of the Rat a man of the nature of Ovlaḥ lived a perfect life in the Tjam kingdom, but the land was not contented. This man recommended his soul and body to the lord of heaven and settled for 37 years in Mökkaḥ (Mecca), then came back to the Tjam kingdom... Did the Muslim Tjams wish to number Allāh among their national rulers out of religious pride or merely give a place among their kings to the Persian or Arab pilgrim who brought them Islām? Both hypotheses are possible.

Another text which comes from the Tjams of Cambodia (see Delaporte, Voyage au Cambodge, Paris 1880, p. 417 sq.), reports that Nao Savan (Nūshirwān), the divine inao (youth), the first king of the Tjams, was the inventor of the alphabet, which is still used in profane books. The inhabitants who were previously worshippers of Buddha, were later converted to Islām by Patentā Ali (cf. the Malay Baginda 'Ali), the father-in-law of Muḥammad. At the latter's birth Nao Savan had gone to Mecca to worship him as all the kings of the earth did, and was installed by him in his residence Bairoch Bali (= Śrī Banōy, the modern Qui-nhō'n, Annam), the capital of Peripanong (the modern Phan-ri and Phan-rang, Annam), to the east of Cambodia, and the Tjams still say that this is their place of origin.

In short, it is quite possible that Islām had already been introduced in the xth century by Arab, Persian, or Indian merchants. But it made only slight progress and but for the Malay immigration in the xvth and xvjth centuries which kept it up and spread it, it would have probably disappeared again. It is moreover due to this immigration that Islām has retained its purity through the relation which the Malays keep up with the Tjams of Cambodia and Cochin-China.

But it is also possible that the law of Muḥammad reached them through the Malays of the Archipelago or of Malacca. The latter, as Prof. Kern has convincingly proved, themselves come from Indo-China and are related to the Tjams and, as inscriptions and legends show, were from the vijth century onwards in uninterrupted close relations with the kingdoms of Champa and Cambodia, partly through intermarriages of the ruling families and partly through invasions. These turbulent Malays, whose Islāmism was not of an intolerant type, thanks to the community of religion, kept in such close touch with the Tjams after their political decline that the two are usually confused in the history of Cambodia and Annam. Their common rebellions and intrigues in the xvth and xvijth centuries disturbed the peace of the two kingdoms, particularly that of Cambodia. The chroniclers and more especially the Spanish theologians, who at the beginning of the xvijth century had hoped to see Indo-China brought under the sway of Philip III, bitterly acknowledge at this period (1603) the influence of the "Moros" i. e. the Muslims whom the tolerance of the kings of Cambodia and of the Tjams allow to build mosques everywhere, who endeavour to proselytise and who hate the Christians to the extent of wishing to drink their blood (cf. Brève et véridique relation des événements du Cambodge par Gabriel Quiroga de S. Antonio.... New Edition of the Spanish text (of 1604) with a translation and notes by Antoine Cabaton, Paris 1904, p. 106, 124, and passim). Matters went so far that about 1624 a prince of Cambodia, Prāḥ Rām, seized the throne supported by them, married a Malay woman, and adopted Islām to the great scandal of the true Cambodians who were faithful followers of Buddha.

The Muslim Malays and Tjams down to the xixth century took an active part in all the internal strife which disturbed the peace of Cambodia in its decline. For a time they played such an important part that one of them, Tuan Sait Ahmit (= Shaikh Ahmad) — according to the chronicles, a Malay of royal descent, but perhaps simply a Tjam with some Malay blood —, in 1820 became regent and right hand man of Ang-Čan, the ruler of Cambodia. He aroused the jealousy of the Cambodians and the distrust of the Annamese, who would have liked the lands of Ang-Čan for themselves, to such an extent that his political enemies succeeded in having him condemned and beheaded without his fellow-Muslims, who would certainly have rescued and saved him, learning anything of it until too late. His sons and followers raised a rebellion in the province of Thbong-Khmun where the Tjams and Malays of Cambodia joined together and united with the Tjams of Chāu-dóc and laid the country waste until Norodom ascended the throne in 1859 and French rule finally put an end in 1863 to the political importance of the Muslim element in Indo-China.

From the religious point of view, these Malay immigrants into Indo-China, who are mainly found in Saigon, Cho'lo'n, Chāu-dóc, Tây-ninh (towns in Cochin-China), Phnom Penh, Kampong-Luong, Kampong Tjam, Lovék, Pursat and in other centres of Cambodia, show no original features. They entirely resemble their brethren in the Peninsula of Malacca, are in constant relations with them, and often receive from their missionaries whose duty it is to maintain the purity of their creed. They are intelligent, active, clever and prudent, but are considered to be treacherous, cruel, cunning and inhospitable. They keep quite apart from the Cambodians among whom they live and only maintain closer relations with their co-religionists among the Tjams. They are mainly traders, farmers, fisherman, boatmen, drivers, growers of vegetables, and are respected if not loved in Cambodia for their intelligence and industry. Although they were well treated by their rulers, their fidelity seems to have been often rightly doubted and their interests do not seem to go beyond that of their community. They are Shi'is and in general are acquainted with the precepts of Islām and they read the Kūr'ān and its commentaries. Among them we find for example the 'Akīda of al-Sanūsī, the Sī Burung Pingai, Fikḥ and Hādīth books, the Sīrāṭu'l-mustakīm, various poetical works or legends such as Sīri Rānia, Sī Miskin Muḥammad Ḥana-fiyāh etc.

These religious ideas and, to a less degree their religious development, the Malays of Cambodia have in common with the Tjams of Cambodia and Indo-China. Both observe the five daily prayers, the ablutions and circumcision, which is performed at the age of 15. They do not eat the flesh of pigs, dogs, crocodiles, tortoises, elephants, peacocks, vultures, eagles, and ravens, and they refrain from intoxicating drinks. If any one worships a strange idol, he is expelled from the community. Some make the pilgrimage to Mecca or pay a certain sum, for which a representative is sent on their behalf. In Cambodia the mosques are almost always built of wood and are placed on slight eminences. The finest are large bare rooms with a platform at the back. The mats which are used as praying carpets are hung up in a sack from the rafters. On the left at the entrance there is usually a large drum painted red (Tjam ganōng = Malay gendang, Javanese kenḍang). Outside is a little basin of masonry for ablutions.

Within these precincts the imāms give the children instruction in reading Arabic and in reciting the Kūr'ān. The assembly or djam'ah cannot take place without a quorum of 40 believers. Ramaḍān is strictly observed by all, pious families are quite abstemious in this period. On Mondays they refrain from sexual intercourse.

The Tjams of Cambodia also observe the bulan ḍak hajī (fasting month of the pilgrims) also called bulan Ovlaḥ (month of Allāh) three months after Ramaḍān. They also observe the molot or melut (= Arab. malat?), when a lock of hair is cut from the children of 3 to 13 and they are given a religious name, which for boys is always 'Abd Allāh or Muḥammad, for girls Phwatimōḥ (Fāṭima). The imāms, at least four in number, are invited to pray in the house in which the ceremony is being performed. This custom of hair cutting seems to be borrowed from the Cambodians.

The tamat (Arab tammā) is a ceremony nearly always confined to the family circle, at which a boy, who has learned the Qur'ān entirely by heart, which however happens very rarely, is led round the village on horseback amid the acclamations of men and women. He is dressed in his best clothes and is greeted with the greatest reverence by men and women.

The surah (pursuit), which is celebrated in the first Tjam month, is accompanied by two days' fasting and commemorates the migration of the Prophet (Hidjra).

By the tapat, which we also find among the Tjams of Annam, who call it tubah = Ar. tawba, old persons are purified from their sins by means of numerous prayers and sprinkling with holy water.

Malays and Tjams have common religious officials in Cambodia who are given the following names according to their office.

Malay	Tjam	Function.
1. mufti	möphati	jurist
2. tuan kadli	tuḥ kalik	judge
3. raya kadli	rajak kalik	"
4. tuan pakih	tuan paké	jurist
5. hakim	hakem	doctor
6. kétip	katip	preacher
7. bilal	bilāl	mu'adhdhin
8. lĕbai	lebĕi ¹⁾	officiant.

All are exempt from taxation. The four first have the following Camhodian names: 1. okñā rācā koley, 2. okñā raya koley, 3. okñā tok koley, 4. okñā paké. They are appointed by the King, belong to his council and are the official superiors of the Muslims. They are regarded by the faithful as representing the four caliphs of the Prophet and enjoy a great spiritual authority.

The religious dignitaries are usually chosen from the most prominent families whose sons can become imāms at the age of 15 and whose daughters are educated with special care to make them worthy wives. The Muslims of Cambodia respect the graves of saints which they call ta-lak; they believe in witches, the werwolf, evil spirits, and in magic and have retained certain agricultural customs which are also found among the neighbouring peoples such as the Cambodians and Annamese. They are relics of an old animism.

The family bonds among the Muslims of Camhodia are very strong; the father has great authority. The wife is well-treated but kept strictly within the house as well as the daughters, who are very early initiated into household duties and, being under strict control, are only allowed to marry Muslims.

1) I translate this word by officiant for lack of a more suitable term. In Indo-China, the lĕbai of the Malays and the lebĕi of the Tjams is a pious man like the Javanese santri, who conducts the Friday service in the villages. According to van Ronkel (T. v. I. Taal-, Land- en Volkenk., 1914, p. 131), lĕbai or labai is of Tamil origin and originally meant "Muslim merchant", which confirms the supposition that Islām came originally from India, not from Arabia, to the Malay Islands and also to Indo-China.

The Muslim Tjams have adopted from the Cambodians the custom of filing and lacquering their daughters' teeth at the age of 15, an operation which is accompanied by prayers from the imāms and sprinkling with holy water.

The marriage customs are in general Muslim. The boys do not as a rule marry before 18 or the girls before 15. The wedding feast is accompanied with great expenditure. Divorce is possible but rare. If it is demanded by the woman, she loses her dowry (Tjam sakavin, Malay mas kavin) which the husband settled on her at the betrothal.

The burial ceremony is very simple. The corpse is washed twice with a decoction of jujube leaves or benzoin water, then in clear water, wrapped in a piece of linen and placed in a grave about ten and a half feet deep, with the head to the north. A mound of earth is then erected over the grave, which is covered with thorny branches to protect it from wild animals. On the third, seventh, tenth, thirtieth, fortieth, and hundredth day the imāms are invited to pray and eat with the family at the grave. The exhumation practised by the Tjams of Annam is not found here.

The husband mourns in white 40 days for his wife, the latter three months and ten days for the husband and she cannot marry again before a hundred days.

The Islām of the Tjams in Annam has quite a different stamp. It appears to have a Shi'ī character, as Aḡān (Ḥasan), Aḡai (Husain) and 'Alī are particularly revered and invoked there: they also play the main part in the few manuscripts or legends still preserved in Annam. It is however considerably penetrated by animistic and Hindu ideas and customs which preceded it and still survive alongside of it. The Muslim Tjams of Annam are Muslims mainly through the naive conviction that they are Muslims. They call their Hindu country men kafir without the slightest derogatory intention and themselves banis = banī, the sons of religion, or Tjams Asalam (= Islām), Tjams of Islām. They say that they worship Ovlaḥ (Allāh), but also Pō Devata Thwor (Çvör) (Sanskrit Devatā Svarga), God, Lord of Heaven, and they offer presents in certain agrarian rites, e. g. two eggs, a cup of rice brandy, and three leaves of betel, to Pō Olwaḥ Tāk Alā, the mysterious king of the underworld; in reality it is the Muslim expression Allāh ta'ālā, out of which they have made a god. They also worship the Brahman goddess Pō Inō Nōgar = "Mother of the Land" (Umā, Bhagavati), and her husband Pō Yang Amō, "the Lord God, the Father [of the land]" (Śiva), whom they identify with Pō Havaḥ (= Hawwā), i. e. Eva and Pō Adam, the ancestors of mankind.

The Tjam Kaphir of Annam with as broad a tolerance have taken into their Pantheon Pō Ovlaḥ (= Allāh), an undefined bodiless god, the creator of Pō Raçullak (= Rasūl Allāh) and of Pō Lātīla (= lā ilāha), who lives in Mōkah (Mecca) and who was created by Pō Ovlaḥuk (= Allāhu) the father of nōbi Mahamat (= Nabi Muḥammad); we thus see that the Kaphir have made three gods out of the misunderstood formula: Lā ilāha illa 'llāhu, Muḥammad rasūlu 'llāh!

The Tjam Bani of Annam have a very high, but vague notion of Nōbi Mahamat i. e. the prophet Muḥammad, and to them the Qur'ān is tapuk (= kitāb) nōbi Mahamat = the book of the Prophet Muḥammad; they call it also tapuk asāṭām (= kitāb al-Islām), the book of Islām, kitāb alamadu = kitāb al-Ḥamad, the book of praise, taḥuk ḡākārāy, the talisman book. They never use his real name. The Qur'ān moreover is hardly to be found among them at all. The few copies which exist are incorrect, and written on Chinese paper with the brush and not with the reed pen. The Bani seem to esteem equally highly a mystical compendium which much resembles the Javanese primbon and is called nurshavan by them. The "priests" copy it only during ramōvan (= Ramaḡān) and they receive the princely remuneration of a buffalo for each copy.

The Tjams of Annam pray only on Fridays and during Ramaḡān the five vaḥ or vaktū (= waḡt „ṣalāt"), the names of which they corrupt as follows: ḡabahik, ḡabahik (= ṣubḡ) "morning prayer", vaḥ ḡarik (= zuhr), "noonday prayer", asarik (= asr) "afternoon prayer", mōgarip = maghrīb, "sunset prayer", ihsā, (= ishā) "evening prayer". They are in the main content with reciting a few sūra's, especially the fāṭiha, without understanding them, and the Arabic form is so corrupted in their pronunciation that it is almost unintelligible, e.g.

1. abiḡ similla hyor raḡ mōnyōr raḡ himik = Ar.: bi 'smi 'llāhi 'rraḡmāni 'rraḡimi;

2. ḡulahu akkabar; lā ilāha illāhūwāḡuk wūwūwāḡuk akkabar = ar.: allāhu akbar; lā ilāha illā 'llāh.

They hardly observe any ablutions but are content with making signs as if they were taking water out of a hole in the ground. Circumcision (katan, kata = Ar. ḡhiṭān) which is performed on boys at the age of 15 and must always precede marriage, is however only symbolical and consists in the imām with a wooden knife masking the circumcision. The boy receives a new name (awal = awwal), usually 'Alī or Muḡammad. The Tjam Bani do not make the pilgrimage to Mecca and, while they do not eat pork, the priests as well as the faithful enjoy brandy made from rice, as well as other intoxicating liquors; the religious dignitaries do not however drink in the mosque. If the number of "40" is not present on Friday in the mosque, those missing are replaced by sacrificial cakes and the usual service, followed by a meal, takes place.

The people only observe Ramaḡān for 3 days. The imāms however must observe it till the end on behalf of the whole community. During this time they shut themselves up in the mosque with their prayer books, their rosary, their tea pot, their sleeping mats, their copper spittoon and their hetel set, which they require to prepare the chewing material indispensable to all Eastern Asiatics. For a whole month they never cross the threshold except to perform complete ablutions in the river. The others are taken in the great cisterns under the penthouse roof of the mosque.

These mosques or sang mōḡik (samōḡik, samḡrik; cf. Atj.: mōṣḡit) which are turned towards Mecca are usually rather poor straw huts with walls of bamboo lattice-work.

Even the names of the religious dignitaries in Annam suggest the strange alteration which Islām has suffered there. At their head is the pō gru or ong guru (Skr. guru), then come the imōm (imām), from whom he is chosen and who are the men who really perform the ceremonies, then the kāṭip (ḡhaṭīb), who have to give the religious readings in the mosque; next come the mōḡin i.e. mu'adhḡin, the ācar (Skr. ācārya = "religious teacher"), a kind of religious instructors who belong to the mosque. In general, the word ācar in Annam is applied to all Muslim "clergy" in contrast to baḡaiḡ, which is the name of the Hindu priests.

All the religious dignitaries in Annam shave their heads and faces. In addition to the simple white fez worn in Cambodia, they also wear a voluminous turban with gold, red or brown fringes. The various ranks are distinguished by the length of the fringes. Like their Hindu brethren they carry a long Spanish reed, the lower part of which is woven into the form of a basket only in that of the ong gru. A white sarong, a long white tunic which is buttoned and cut open at the neck is their sole costume. On high feast days the mimbar and the interior of the mosque are covered with white cloth; on these occasions they exchange the turban for a kind of disc, which is bored through the middle and fastened to the fez by a piece of linen. The whole looks like the hiretta of a judge. These "priests" are almost as ignorant as their simple followers; they can hardly read Arabic, hardly study it at all, and only roughly understand their sūra's which they repeat only "because their fathers also did so". They are free from taxation and forced labour and are held in fairly high esteem by the people; they are the more educated class, however slight the education may be. As they are quite indifferent and tolerant, they do not think ill of the faithful when the latter make offerings to the Pō Yang or various Hindu deities, endeavour to propitiate evil spirits and perform certain agrarian rites or magic ceremonies which have nothing Muslim in them. They live in perfect harmony with the Hindu baḡaiḡ, invite them to their religious and domestic festivities and are invited in turn, — only the food for the imōm must be prepared by a Muslim woman — and give each other places of honour. From mutual tolerance both communities refrain from eating pork or beef.

Only from the Hindu cremations do the Muslim priests carefully absent themselves and this religious horror of corpses was previously, it is said, the reason why they alone could enter the royal palace to pray with women in child-bed and to watch his wives and children during the absence of the king.

Either as a result of ancient customs or of the Malay-Polynesian matriarchal system or through contact with the Hindus of Annam who have priestesses called padjāu, the Muslims of Annam have priestesses for a domestic cult; they are called radja or riḡja. If a sick member of the family has to be healed, for example, or a journey or business enterprise to be undertaken auspiciously, the imōm first of all recites various prayers, then this radja — often the housewife herself — accompanied by the mōḡin who sings and beats the drum, perform certain ritual dances or falls into a state of great excitement in order to influence the 'deities' or 'spirits of the dead', to whom sacrifices are at the same time made. This ceremony is always followed by a great feast. The radja's, who must not eat the flesh of the pig or of the sand lizard, even play the principal part at the great annual festivals, which are celebrated in December—January and are probably of Malay or Indonesian origin — the name Java is repeatedly mentioned in them — and are regarded by the Muslim Tjams as the "New Year's festival of the ancestors".

The festival lasts two days and three nights. A great booth is built in an enclosure, if possible of quite new material, and the interior is hung with white cotton cloth. The altar is a simple large tray, with dishes on which are betel, food and fruits. Wax lights are stuck on the edge of the dishes and they also are bound round with cotton threads of different colours. A swing hung to two pillars is intended for the radja; she is assisted by three imom's and the mōdin, who with his tom-tom conducts an orchestra consisting of a clarionet, a violin, cymbals and an oblong drum (ganōng).

The festival which is interrupted by numerous meals is opened with the bismillah, then follows the invocation of the mountain and forest spirits and of the shades of the "spirits beyond the sea, which may not be mentioned by name"; and finally the invocation of 38 deities or spirits by name; at each of them the three imom recite prayers.

The most characteristic part of the festival takes place on the second day at the rise of the morning star. After the mōdin has invoked the deities and the radja has performed a special dance in their honour, they take a small rowing boat made out of a single piece of wood, which is said to come from Java or China to collect tribute. The master of the house in which the festival is held, pretends not to understand Javanese and the mōdin acts as interpreter. Amid joking all round, eggs, cakes and the figure of an ape with jointed limbs are put in the boat, the participants then break up the walls and roof of the booth and fight for the cakes. On the third day the radja goes, accompanied by the officiants and the orchestra, to the river and solemnly places the boat with the ape on the water. This ends the festival.

While circumcision is only symbolical with the Tjam Bani of Annam, the tubaḥ for the old men is practised as in Cambodia and the karōḥ (literally, "enclosing") marks the declaration of a girl's fitness for marriage. Not till then dare they put up their hair and marry; until then they are tabung i. e. unapproachable, and the seducer would be severely punished. This festival takes place under the presidency of the ong gru and of two imom's for a considerable number of girls on each occasion and lasts two days. It is opened with prayers to Allāh, Muḥammad, the Hindu deities and the shades of their ancestors as well as with a feast at which the priests eat apart. Two booths are erected, the one for the ceremony itself, and the other as a dressing room for the girls, who sleep there under the supervision of four matrons. The imom spend the night praying; at 7 a. m. the girls appear wearing their finest clothes and ornaments, their hair loosened and covered with a triangular mitre. Before them goes an old woman and a man clothed in white, who carries a year-old child dressed exactly like the girls except for the mitre. They throw themselves down before the ong gru and the imom's. The ong gru places a grain of salt in the mouth of the child, cuts off a lock of its hair and gives it some water to drink. The same is done with the girls, who then return in procession to their booth. If a girl has been seduced the lock is cut off at her neck as a mark of shame. A second feast, at which the priests eat before the faithful, concludes the ceremony.

Birth customs in Annam among the Bani are similar to those among the Kaphir except that the Bani do not sacrifice to the gods on such occasions. The seduction of girls is also severely punished. They do not marry till they are 17 or 18. In Panrang, evidently the result of the old Malay matriarchal system — which has left other traces also, like the right of inheritance of women and the tracing of descent through them and their practising the cult of ancestors — the custom prevails that the girls seek the young men in marriage, but everywhere else in Indo-China the reverse is the custom. The wedding (Tjam, likhaḥ = Arab. nikāḥ), which is the occasion of long and costly festivities, is usually replaced by public cohabitation, which causes no scandal; the pair are free to celebrate it later when they can afford it, and they may already have two or three children to take part in it. It is far more elaborate among the Bani than among the Kaphir. The imom's repeat prayers; the ong gru, who represents the "lord Muḥammad", asks the bride, who is considered to be Fātima, whether she accepts the presents of the bridegroom, the lord 'Alī. Rich feasts take place at the weddings. The dowry given to the woman remains her property in case of a divorce. Divorce is fairly easy and leaves nearly two thirds of the joint property in the hands of the woman. Mixed marriages are rare and in them the children follow the religion of the mother. It sometimes happens that a Muslim woman marries a Hindu, very rarely the contrary.

The burial service is as simple among the Bani as it is elaborate among the Kaphir. The corpse is wrapped in white cotton sheets and placed in a small hut, where the ong gru and the imom's repeat prayers. As soon as night falls the dead man is buried, with four imom's present, almost secretly, without a coffin and with the face turned to the north. The relatives beseech his spirit not to come and afflict them. On the 3rd, 7th, 10th, 30th, 40th and 100th day as well as on the anniversary of his death a padhi i. e. a service at the tomb with prayers, a meal and presents for the imom's is observed at his grave. The 7th and the 40th day are the most important. The dead person is almost always exhumed after a certain period on an anniversary of his death. His bones as well as his golden or silver ornaments are placed in a small coffin which is again buried in a particular place and considered sacred.

We thus see that Islām, while it has remained fairly pure in Cambodia, has been overlaid in Annam with a mass of elements and customs, partly animistic and partly Hindu. The Tjams nevertheless desire to be good Muslims, only their ignorance and long usage are the causes of their errors. Malay ḥājjidīs who have come from the Archipelago or Cambodia on a religious mission have repeatedly succeeded in putting an end to sacrifices to heathen deities in various villages, although they have been unable to stop the enjoyment of rice brandy.

If France should succeed in regenerating the Tjams, as she is endeavouring to do by her humane and wise policy, the revival of their nationality could only be to the advantage of Islām and could only come through Islām in close combination with their brethren and the Malays of Cambodia.

AL-INSĀN AL-KĀMIL. This expression, which means literally "The Perfect Man", is used by Muḥammadan mystics to denote the highest type of humanity, i. e., the theosophist who has realised his essential oneness with God. Abū Yazīd al-Bisṭāmī (ob. 261 = 874), quoted in the Risāla of al-Kuṣḥairī (Cairo, 1318, p. 140, l. 12 sqq.; cf. R. Hartmann, Al-Kuṣḥairī's Darstellung des Sūfismus, Türkische Bibliothek, vol. xviii., p. 168 infra sq.), speaks of the mystic who after having been invested with certain divine names, passes away (faniya) from them and becomes "the perfect and complete" (al-kāmil al-tāmm). We may identify the person so described with al-insān al-kāmil, a phrase which occurs, perhaps for the first time, in the writings of Ibn al-ʿArabī (cf. Fuṣūṣ al-Ḥikam, Ch. 1) and forms the title of a well-known work, al-Insān al-Kāmil fī Maʿrifat al-Awākhir wa'l-Awwal, by ʿAbd al-Karīm al-Djīlī, who died about 820 (1417). These authors base their theory of the Perfect Man on a pantheistic monism which regards the Creator (al-Ḥaqq) and the creature (al-Khalq) as complementary aspects of Absolute Being. A similar but by no means identical doctrine had already been set forth by al-Hallājī (see Kitāb al-Ṭawāsīn, ed. by Massignon, p. 129 sqq.) "Man", says Ibn al-ʿArabī, "unites in himself both the form of God and the form of the universe. He alone manifests the divine Essence together with all its names and attributes. He is the mirror by which God is revealed to Himself, and therefore the final cause of creation. We ourselves are the attributes by which we describe God; our existence is merely an objectification of His existence. While God is necessary to us in order that we may exist, we are necessary to Him in order that He may be manifested to Himself."

Al-Djīlī, who differs from Ibn al-ʿArabī in certain details, gives a full and systematic exposition of the theory. His argument runs somewhat as follows:

Essence (dhāt) is that to which names and attributes are attached, although in reality there is no distinction between the Essence and its attributes. It may be either existent or non-existent. The existent is either Pure Being (God) or Being joined to not-being (created things). Absolute or Pure Being is the simple Essence, without manifestation of names, attributes, and relations. The process of manifestation involves a descent from simplicity, which has three stages (1) ahadiya (2) huzviya (3) aniya. At this point appear the names and attributes whereby the Essence is made known. They are communicated by means of mystical illumination (tadjalli). The Perfect Man, who typifies the emanation of Absolute Being from itself and its return into itself, moves upward through a series of illuminations until he ultimately becomes merged in the Essence. In the first degree, called the Illumination of the Names, "he is destroyed under the radiance of the name by which God reveals Himself, so that if you invoke God by that name, the man answers you, because the name has taken possession of him". The second degree is called the Illumination of the Attributes. These are received by the mystic in proportion to his capacity, the abundance of his knowledge, and the strength of his resolution. To some men God reveals Himself by the attribute of life, to others by the attribute of knowledge, to others by the attribute of power, and so on. Moreover, the same attribute is manifested in different ways. For example, some hear the divine speech (kalām) with their whole being, some hear it from human lips but recognise it as the voice of God, some are informed by it concerning future events. The final degree, which is the Illumination of the Essence, sets the seal of deification upon the Perfect Man. He now becomes the Pole (kuṭb) of the universe and the medium through which it is preserved; he is omnipotent, nothing is hidden from him; it is right that mankind should bow down in adoration before him, since he is the vicegerent (khalīfa) of God in the world (cf. Kurʾān 2, 23). Thus, being divine as well as human, he forms a connecting link between God and created things. His universal nature (djāmīya) gives him a unique and supreme position in the order of existence. Al-Djīlī divides the attributes of God into four classes: attributes of the Essence (Oneness, Eternity, Creativeness, and the like), attributes of beauty (djamāl), attributes of majesty (djalāl), and attributes of perfection (kamāl). While the attributes of beauty, majesty, and perfection are manifested both in this world and the next — Paradise und Hell, for instance, being respectively absolute manifestations of beauty and majesty — the Perfect Man alone displays the whole sum of divine attributes and possesses the divine life in all its fullness. This microcosmic function, according to the Sūfistic interpretation of Kurʾān 33, 72, he freely accepted as a trust from the hands of his Maker. He contains the types of every spiritual and material thing. His heart corresponds to the Throne of God (ʿarsh), his reason to the Pen (qalam), his soul to the Tablet (al-lawḥ al-mahfūz), his nature to the elements (anāṣir). He is the copy of God (nuskhāt al-Ḥaqq); cf. the tradition that God created Adam in His own image.

This theory shows the influence upon Sūfism of Gnostic ideas (cf. Bousset, Hauptprobleme der Gnosis, p. 160 sqq.). The Insān al-Kāmil is the Insān al-Kādim of the Manichaeans, the Ādam Qadmōn of the Qabbālā. It was inevitable that on Islamic ground the representative Superman should be the Prophet Muḥammad, the dogma of whose pre-existence established itself, even in orthodox circles, at an early date (see Goldziher, Neuplatonische und gnostische Elemente im Ḥadīṡ in Zeitschrift für Assyriologie, xxii. 324 sqq.). Many Sūfis, adopting the Plotinian doctrine of emanation, identify Muḥammad, the Perfect Man, with Universal Reason or the Logos. Al-Djīlī takes care to state that Muḥammad is the Most Perfect Man (akmal), to whom the saints and the rest of the prophets are subordinate. He holds that in every age Muḥammad assumes the form of a living saint and in that guise makes himself known to mystics (cf. Goldziher, loc. cit., concerning the doctrine of the transmission of the nūr muḥammadi). We find a further concession to Islām in the principle that the Perfect Man must continue to obey the religious law. "Perception of the sublime Essence", al-Djīlī says, "consists in thy knowing, by way of divine revelation (kashf), that thou art He and that He is thou, and that this is not ḥulūl [q. v.] nor ittiḥād, and that the slave is a slave and the Lord a lord, and that the slave does not become a lord nor the Lord a slave".

INSHĀ' (A.) Invention. According to the book entitled, Mafātīḥ al-'Ulūm, by ed. van Vloten, p. 78, inshā' has the special meaning of the preparation of a document which is afterwards examined by the head of the office and drawn up in its final form with or without alteration; that is to say, a rough draft of a document. The 'ilm al-inshā' is epistolography, the art of drawing up letters and documents. Among the Arabs the celebrated private secretary of the last Omayyad ruler Marwān II, 'Abd al-Ḥalīm b. Yahyā (on him cf. Ibn Khallikān s. v.), is regarded as the first who distinguished himself in this art. On the subject we have a large number of works in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish, which incidentally include much valuable data for the history of culture. Such are the great work by al-Kalkashandī [q. v.], Ṣubḥ al-A'ṣḥā, and the much shorter handbook by Ibn Faḍl Allāh [q. v.] entitled al-Ta'rīf bi'l-Muṣṭalah al-Sharīf. Arabic guides to letter writing were also composed by Marī b. Yūsuf, Badr al-Inshā' wa 'l-Ṣifāt fi 'l-Mukātabāt wa 'l-Murāsālāt, repeatedly printed at Būlāk, Cairo and Constantinople, sometimes together with a similar work by Ḥasan al-'Attār [q. v.] which is known by the simple title of Inshā' al-'Attār. Older than the books mentioned is the Ḥusn al-Tawassul itā Shīrāt al-Tarassul of Ibn Fahd al-Ḥalabī (Cairo 1298, 1315). In Arabic there are also a large number of collections of model letters. Cf. the sections concerned in the catalogues of Arabic MSS. Recent works: S. Shartūnī, Manuel de style épistolaire, Bairūt 1880; J. Ḥarfūsh, Correspondence Commerciale, Bairūt 1902; E. Fumey, Choix de Correspondances Marocaines, etc. 1903 etc. In Persian in addition to the collections of letters by Ibn Mu'ayyad al-Baghdādī, by Hindūshāh al-Munshī al-Nakhdjīwānī, by Abu 'l-Faḍl [q. v.] etc. we have the letterwriters by Harkam [q. v.], by Khālifa Shāh Muḥammad (Djāmī al-Kawānīn, ed. Lucknow 1846 and Cawnpore 1864), Saiyid al-Inshā'-i naw Zuhūr, Teherān 1327 etc. Turkish letterwriters were composed by Nerkesizāde, Kinalizāde. On the celebrated collection by Ferīdūn enough has been said above ii. 95. Cf. also Khairāt Efendi, Inshā' (Būlāk 1242). Modern works:

Aḥmed Rāsīm, Ilāweli Khazīna-i Mekātīb (Stambul 1331); Mehmed Fu'ād, Rehber-Kitābet-i 'Osmaniye yakḥod Mukemmel Munshā' (Stambul 1328); Sa'īd Efendi, Guide complet de correspondance turco-français (Constantinople 1331), etc.

The professional letterwriters (kātib, q. v.) in the chancelleries (dīwān al-inshā') are called munshī, but in India every educated native, especially a native teacher of languages is called munshī. Cf. Hobson-Jobson, s. v. Munshiee. Cf. also the articles DAWĀTDĀR and KĀTIB, where further references are given.

IN SHĀ' ALLĀH, "If Allāh wills". The duty of frequently using this phrase, even when no doubt can really enter, is based upon Kur'ān xviii. 23 and xlviii. 27. In these passages Allāh, addressing the Prophet, uses it; in the second passage the event so conditioned was certain to happen and is even qualified by Allāh himself with a bi-l-ḥaqq, "in verity". This Allāh is said to have done to admonish (iltadīb) the Prophet to the use of the phrase. A tradition is also quoted in which Muḥammad, addressing the dead buried in the cemetery of al-Madina, saluted them with the Peace, and added, "and we, if it be the will of Allāh, shall join you" — a thing of which there could be no doubt. It is therefore used a) in cases where a doubt can really enter; b) to show modesty in replying to a question or remark of a flattering nature, but never when what is answered was unflattering; c) to show good manners (ta'addub) towards Allāh in submitting verbally and formally to his will, and thereby to gain a blessing (tabarruk). This formal submitting of all things to the will of Allāh makes the phrase in usage equivalent to the expression of a desire or hope. If some one tells you that the death of a friend is imminent, you must not say in shā' Allāh, but you should if you are told that he is getting better. The Saiyid al-Murtaḍā (see reference below) says that a sect, al-Marāziḳa, existent in his time in Egypt, followers of a certain 'Uṭmān b. Marzūk, pushed the use of the phrase so far as to fall into heresy (bid'a).

INSHĀ' ALLĀH KHĀN, Indian poet, born in Murshidābād; about 1200 he settled in Lucknow, where he secured the patronage of Prince Sulaimān Shikūh; he died about the year 1230. In addition to a Persian and an Urdū dīwān, he wrote a Persian mathnawī entitled Shir u Birinjī; by order of the Nawwāb of Oudh, Sa'adat 'Alī Khān (1212—1223), he wrote a grammar of the Urdū language, entitled Daryā-yi Lafāfāt, and published a collection of the witty sayings of the same prince, under the title Lafā'if al-Sa'adat.

I'RĀB (A.) Technical term in Arabic grammar, frequently translated by "inflection", has however a much narrower meaning. For in the nouns it only applies to the formation of cases but not to numbers and in the verb it refers exclusively to the distinction of the moods of the imperfect and therefore is not applied, as Flügel, Die gramm. Schulen der Araber, p. 15, erroneously assumes, to the formation of the genders of the verb and its tenses and even to that of the personal forms, which are regarded as nominal elements added to the verb proper.

According to the view of the Arab grammarians in practice every occurrence of irāb presupposes as effective cause a governing word, āmil [q. v.]. In contrast to irāb is bināʾ [q. v.] which is applied to all words which retain their form irrespective of syntactical influences. According as it is capable of irāb or not, a word is called muʿrab or mabnī. The two conceptions āmil and irāb have thus to be regarded as the central points round which the theory of syntax of the Arab grammarians turns. Where a distinction is made between declension (taṣrif) and syntax (naḥw in the narrower sense), the theory of the irāb, as ʿAlī al-Djurdjānī, Kitāb al-Taṣrifāt, ed. Flügel, p. 61, 10 rightly says, is, in contrast to our view, excluded from the former. On the other hand, ilm al-naḥw is sometimes actually called ilm al-irāb (Flügel, Gramm. Schulen, p. 15, note 1).

The Arahs further differ from our grammatical notions in having no comprehensive terms for "case" and "mood"; but use the same terms without distinction for the various cases and moods if they agree in phonetic character. These terms are taken from the terminations of the cases of the triptote singular of the strong nouns and from that of the affixless forms of the moods of the imperfect of the strong verb. This results in the following division: 1. rafʿ (u) = nominative (e. g. radjul-u) and indicative (yaktul-u); 2. djarr (i) = genitive (radjul-i); 3. naṣb (a) = accusative (radjul-a) and subjunctive (yaktul-a); 4. djazzm (lack of vocalisation) = jussive mood (yaktul). The three first named are originally simply names of the vowels concerned; they are still used as such not infrequently by older grammarians, without reference to the irāb and even for vowels in the interior of a word, and this use is even found in Sibawaih, in spite of the fact that (i. 2, 3) he expressly reserves them for irāb. The usual usage in Sibawaih however proves that even then they were felt to be genuine terms for the corresponding cases and moods. They are in fact used by him in cases where the declension is formed in quite a different way from that of the above scheme. Thus e. g. the nominative of the sound masc. plural (muslim-ū-na) is called rafʿ, the oblique case (muslim-i-na) sometimes djarr or naṣb, although here, according to the view of the strict Arab grammarians the declension is made through the consonants w and y. It is similar with the dual.

In the noun two kinds of declension are distinguished for the singular (in the widest sense, i. e. including the broken plural). The noun (ism) is either munṣarif i. e. it has all three cases (trip-tote) and has nunation (tanwīn); or it is ghair munṣarif, i. e. it has as its declension vowel only a for the genitive and accusative, that is, it has actually only two cases (diptote) and has no nunation. In this connexion it should be noted that those nominal forms of roots with weak third radical, which, like ʿaṣa, really show no case changes at all, and according to our view are indeclinable, are traced to corresponding strong forms through the application of definite phonetic laws and like the latter — although according to the terminology of the finished system only taḥḍīrān (virtually) — are considered muʿrab and further as munṣarif or ghair munṣarif. Moreover a noun has not irāb as an unalterable character; although radjulu is in general considered muʿrab, this does not prevent that in the vocative: yā radjul-u and in combination with the tā of the general negation: tā radjul-a hunā, the Arabic grammarians do not regard the radjul-u or radjul-a as rafʿ or naṣb but as mabnī sui generis. The Arab grammarian always rivetted his attention on the individual form and not on its place in a system of declension or conjugation, for which he has not even a name. It is therefore quite natural that he should in the imperfect also interpret the 2 and 3 pl. fem. (yaktul-na, taḥṭul-na) as mabnī, because here the verb remains unaltered before the na, which is considered the representative of the pronoun, also in the strong roots in all three moods. In the other forms of the imperfect, which have the affixes i-na, ū-ni, ū-na, i, ā and ū or, according to the Arab view, the consonants y, alif, w, represent the pronominal subject, while the retention of the n with its auxiliary vowel is considered a mark of rafʿ and its omission as a sign of djazzm and then of naṣb. The Arab grammarians do not recognise at all an energetic "mood" with a name of its own; to them there is simply a strengthening n (nūn muʾakkida) added to the imperfect forms, which become mabnī before it. As their n is not a formative element merged in the verb but is regarded as a separate particle, the energetic mood is discussed in Arabic grammars under the particles, which seems strange to us.

On the reason why the linguistic phenomenon here discussed has been given the name irāb, later native scholars puzzled their heads and gave various unsatisfactory suggestions; cf. Ibn al-Anhārī Asrār al-ʿArabīya, p. 9, 15 ff. According to Wetzstein (Ztschr. f. Völkerpsychologie, vii. 461), irāb means Beduinising, transferring into the language of the Beduins. V. v. Rosen similarly interprets it (Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., xxviii. 170): "to speak as a genuine desert Arab". Vollers (Volksprache und Schriftsprache im alten Arabien, p. 141) entirely agrees with Wetzstein; on the other hand, Noldeke (Beiträge zur semitischen Sprachwissenschaft, p. 5) says that the application of the term to the Beduins as the only men speaking pure Arabic at the time is "indeed possible but not certain". The obvious thing may be here too the most probable. ʿAraba, the verbal noun of which is irāb, means primarily, to arabicise, to give a word an Arabic form, to pronounce it in the genuine Arab way; the word is commonly enough applied, particularly also by Sibawaih, to foreign words adopted into the Arabic vocabulary in which case there is of course no possibility of a reference to the Beduins, as the contrast between ʿAdjam and ʿArab, non-Arabs and Arabs, is obvious. If we reflect that the cradle of Arab learning was in the Irāk with its population, predominantly Aramaic and Persian, whose language completely failed to distinguish cases and moods, that the latter must have been the most striking characteristic of Arabic in contrast to the foreign languages with which they were acquainted, especially as according to good and abundant evidence it was particularly difficult for the non-Arah proselytes, who contributed a strong contingent to the linguistic scholars, so that they frequently found it a stumbling block, one will find it quite natural that irāb "arabicising", by narrowing of meaning should come to have the above limited technical meaning; irāb is therefore at bottom only arabicisation $\alpha\alpha\tau' \xi\theta\alpha\chi\alpha\nu$. How much irāb was considered the exclusive advantage of the Arabic language is clear from the passionate polemic of Ibn Fāris [q. v.] against the assertion that the Greeks also had an irāb (Goldziher, Muh. Studien, i. 214).

Bibliography: A very useful survey is given in the first sections of the Adjurrūmiya of Ṣanhādī in Brünnow [Fischer]'s Chrestomathie; chapters 2 to 7, 40 and 41 of the Asrār al-Arabiya of Ibn al-Anbārī are more detailed and very suitable as an introduction to the controversies of the Arab grammarians. For the rest the student must be referred to the larger grammars in Arabic. (J. WEISS.)

AL-IRĀQ, also called al-irāk al-arabi in contrast to al-irāk al-adjami. In the older period al-irākān, "the two 'Irāqs'", meant the two oldest Muslim towns in the country, Kūfa and Baṣra (Yāqūt, iii. 628, 11 sq.). Later this name was applied to al-irāk and al-djibāl [q. v.] together; Yāqūt iii. 15, 18 knows al-irāk alone as the name usual among the Persians for al-djibāl and explains this by saying that the Saldjūk ruler who held the 'Irāk also conquered al-djibāl. As he lived in Hamadhān, the people referred his title as "Lord of al-irāk" to the province of which this was the capital; it is however rather to be assumed that the Saldjūkī, called himself "Lord of the two 'Irāqs'" (with a well-known mubālagha) and that the people began to call the eastern part of the kingdom 'Irāk also, at the same time differentiating al-irāk al-adjami and al-irāk al-arabi.

The meaning of the name is uncertain. The Arab hypotheses are not satisfactory: irāk = low lying ground, according to Ibn al-A'rābi in Yāqūt, iii. 628, 13 sq.; "coastland", according to al-Khalil in Yāqūt, iii. 628, 21 sq. At the same time the 'Irāk is called al-Sawād, i. e. the country of a dark colour, owing to the cultivated land, in contrast to the bright white-yellow steppes, the contrast between the two being expressed in the names by the Beduins, who are very susceptible to colour effects. But the two names are not synonymous: sawād is a movable term, 'irāk is fixed; one talks of the sawād of Kūfa, but not of the 'irāk of Kūfa. Balkhī's statement (Iṣṭakhri, p. 85, 3; Ibn Hawkal, p. 166, 1 sq.) is typical: "Between Baghdād and Kūfa lies a sawād with a network (of cultivated fields) which shows no gap"; this is a statement based on a correct general conception. It consists only of one long, not very broad, strip of valuable fertile country running from N. to S. in the 'Irāk and, if one wishes to describe the canal system, this continuous fruit garden must be taken as a basis. In Ibn Khurdādhbih there is still a memory of the name which 'Irāk had under the Persian kings: dili Erānshahr, which he translates "the heart of the 'Irāk" (5, 18 sq.: cf. Ibn Rosta, p. 104, 4); this agrees with the fact that al-Khwarizmī understands by Erānshahr Persia including the 'Irāk, and that, according to Yazīd al-Fārisī, the whole of Erānshahr was compared to a body of which the heart was the 'Irāk, similarly also Aṣmā'ī (according to Yāqūt, i. 417). The first Persian name of the 'Irāk was Sūristān (Balādhuri, p. 276, 5; Ibn Rosta, p. 103, 23 sq.; Mas'ūdi p. 177, 1; Tabarī, i. 819, 8; cf. Nöldeke, p. 15, Note 3).

The following details of the Geography and History of the country may be given here:

Al-irāk is the flat country which is bounded in the west by the Syrian steppe, in the south by the steppe and desert areas of Arabia and the north shore of the Persian Gulf, in the east by the southern spurs of the Zagros (Djabal Hamrīn) and west Khūzistān, in the north by a line from al-Anbār to Takrit. This northern border line marks the rising ground which in the oldest period formed the limits of the dry land; south of it alluvial land was gradually formed, which on account of its wealth of water, easy to distribute, possessed the most favourable conditions for profitable cultivation; it does not however appear that the administrative frontier ran along the natural boundary and the northern frontier is usually given as a line from Takrit to al-Haditha, which is about 60 miles N. W. of Hit and was even included in al-irāk. From the geographical point of view Khūzistān (Susiana), which adjoins it on the east, also belongs to the 'Irāk, as it is not separated by any natural boundary; the same is true of the Ṭāfi, i. e. the high lying ground of steppe-like character which begins before the gates of Baṣra and Kūfa. Wherever in the district the ground rises above the level of the river valleys in such a way as to form a barrier against inundation, and at the same time serves as a road, the Arab geographers speak of the ṣahr or "ridge" and frequently give the route along it as well as that by the river. If one takes together the many arms of the delta of the Ṣhaṭṭ al-'Arab and the banks of the great rivers with their tributaries and canals, the extent of coast is extraordinarily large in proportion to the whole; the sea with the rivers also forms a system. The possibilities of development appear unlimited; only the regulation of the rivers requires constant attention to prevent the banks being washed away by floods, which would make economic development impossible; breaking of the banks led to the formation of great swamps; the land between the rivers assumes a steppe-like character when there is no irrigation by canals. This was not sufficiently done even in the best period of the country. At present only about a tenth of the whole area of the 'Irāk is under cultivation (agriculture and systematic cattle-rearing). The total area of the 'Irāk from al-Haditha to 'Abbādān cannot be reckoned to be more than 26,900 square miles (about the size of Bavaria): of this only about 2690 sq. m. are under cultivation. I append the estimate of Deutsch (following Willcocks), Mag. f. Technik und Industriepol., No. 7 of 4, x 1913: Babylonia had 21,500 sq. m. with 850,000 inhabitants of which 1690 sq. m. are north, south and west of Baghdād. Tholenz (Zeitschr. d. Ges. f. Erdkunde Berlin, 1913, p. 329 sqq.) estimates the area affected by the great irrigation scheme at 5190 square miles (cost of the scheme £ 26,500,000; to take 30 years to carry out). Tholenz tells me that one of the main conditions for the complete opening up of the country is that the bed of the Tigris be dredged; along with this should go also the revival of the course which is usually thought to have been the principal one in Arab times, that of the modern Ṣhaṭṭ al-Haiy; although this riverbed at Kūt al-'Amāra (the Mādhārāyā of the geographers) branches off from the present main course of the river, it is still doubtful whether it is the main bed of the Arabs and not rather a channel made by man (so de Sarzec in Heuzey, Origines Orient. de l'Art, p. 17); on it lay Wāsīt; unfortunately however the exact site of this town is not known; the latest travellers to visit the ruins (Koldewey and Moritz) did not describe them (Sarre and Herzfeld, Archäolog. Reise, i. 247). The Shatt al-Haiy, on which Lynch in 1838 was able to travel in a steamer and on which it is still said to be possible for a part of the year to reach Suḵ al-Shiytkh, entered the swamps (al-Baṭā'ih [q. v.]) at al-Ḳaṭr, through which it reached, under the name Nahr Abi 'l-Asad, the Dījlā al-'Awra, the "one-eyed" Tigris, identical with the pre-Muslim and modern Tigris. The Euphrates divided somewhat below al-Musaiyib into the two arms, the western, Shatt Hindiya, and Shatt al-Hilla, the eastern; since the main stream was turned forcibly into the Hindiya arm, the bed of the Hilla arm has been in danger of drying up; it was not till the Hindiya Dam was finished at the end of 1913 that the waters were fairly distributed. According to Qudāma, the western arm, which makes a slight curve to the west, is called al-Alkamī (p. 233, 16 sq.; so also Mas'ūdi, Tarbiḥ, p. 52, 5), and the eastern arm is called Sūrā; the former runs towards al-Kūfa and is lost in the swamps; the Sūrā arm, more accurately Nahr Sūrā al-A'la (Ibn Serapion, p. 28), passes the important town of Ḳaṣr Ibn Hubaira (ruins a little north of Babel, Tell 'Imrān 'Alī); 6 farsakh below Ḳaṣr Ibn Hubaira the upper Sūrā passes into the lower Sūrā canal; its direct continuation eastwards is called Ṣarāt al-Kabīra, and after passing the town of al-Nīl it is called Nahr al-Nīl and reaches the village of al-Ḥawl (4 miles from al-Nu'māniya on the Tigris), where one can tranship cargo and sail direct to the Tigris or turn to the south, reaching the Tigris at Nahr Sābūs (opposite Mādhārāyā, which lies on the east bank) (on the subsidiary name Zāb, Syr. zābā, see Marquart, p. 164). The lower Sūrā (Sūrā al-Asfal) passes several places, among which the locality called al-Djāmi'an by Ibn Serapion is the al-Hilla of the later geographers (founded about 495 = 1102 by the Mazyadid Saif al-Dawla); this arm is the modern Hilla arm; at al-Hilla a canal branched off to the S. E., the Nahr Nars, said to be called after the Sāsānid Narsēs (292) who ordered it to be made. The Sūrā and the Nars finally pour their waters into the Budāt canal (budāt, Yāqūt, I, 770), which crosses the northern edge of the Baṭā'ih and is taken from the western arm of the Euphrates, a day's journey north of Kūfa near al-Qanāṭir, which is apparently identical with the Aramaean Pnmbēdita (= fam al-Budāt), the celebrated centre of Jewish scholarship (mentioned by Benjamin of Tudela in the xiiith century); after it takes the waters of the Sūrā and Nars, the Budāt (Euphrates arm) after a course of about 40 miles enters the great swamp.

The two main rivers were joined higher up by canals, in addition to the above waterways. The important canal, Nahr Dudjail, which branched off from the Euphrates near al-Rabb (9 miles from Anbār, 16 from Hit) and reached the Tigris between 'Ukbarā and Baghdād, does not belong to the 'Irāk but to al-Djazīra which adjoins it on the north; it sent off numerous branch canals into the districts belonging to the 'Irāk (Maskin, Qaṭrahbnl); this canal, it appears, was silted up in 340 (951), and its name was transferred to an arm which branched off from the Tigris not far from Sāmarrā. From al-Anbār onwards four canals leave the Euphrates: 1. Nahr 'Isā: its course is not certain but it may in general be identified with the modern Nahr Ṣaqlāwiya; it is called after 'Isā b. 'Alī (Ibn Serapion: Mūsā) b. 'Abdallāh h. al-'Abbās, whose ḡaṣr lay only a little above the junction of the canal and the Tigris, within the zone of the city of the Caliph; according to Ibn Serapion (p. 14, and Yāqūt, iv. 842), it left the Euphrates at Qanarat Dimimmā (Abu 'l-Fidā', p. 52, 14, has Dahamā, which is probably simply a mistake for Dimimmā); Abu 'l-Fidā, l. c., also says (on the authority of Sulaimān b. Muhannā) that the canal comes from a place below al-Anbār (on the English map the ruins of al-Anbār are entered as "Sifera" on the north bank of the Ṣaqlāwiya, 6 miles from its beginning) near al-Fallūjā; it irrigated the ṭassūdī Fērōzābūr; at al-Muḥawwal, a number of canals branched off towards Baghdād; it entered the Tigris below the Ḳaṣr Ibn Hubaira; on the English map the Ṣaqlāwiya canal runs through the lake of Akkar Kuf, i. e. 'Akrāḡuf of the geographers (e. g. Yāqūt, iii. 697) which is assumed to be at the south end; Le Strange wishes to locate the Muḥawwal of Ibn Serapion there; on R. Kiepert's map in Oppenheim's book, the Khōr of the Ṣaqlāwiya is called in the southern part Khōr al-'Asadj: not far from the beginning of the canal, west of the Euphrates, on the English map is marked the Hahbania (Hibhāniya) lock, which is one of the main works in Willcocks's irrigation scheme; on Midhat's plan for draining the Ṣaqlāwiya swamp, see Oppenheim, ii. 281; a different account is given by Balkhī (Iṣṭakhri, p. 84 sq.; Ibn Ḥawḳal, p. 165); according to him, small streams run off from the Nahr 'Isā which again join together to form a stream, the Nahr al-Ṣarāt, which enters the Tigris, while the main stream, Nahr 'Isā, itself reaches the Tigris in the middle of Baghdād: ships can sail on it to its end, while navigation is not possible on the Nahr al-Ṣarāt on account of the weirs; 2. Nahr Ṣarṣar branches from the Euphrates 3 farsakh (about 12 miles) below Dimimmā, flows through a part of the district of Bādūrāyā (spelled -rayā in Yāqūt, i. 460, this is not correct; it can only be -raiya or rāyā) and reaches the Tigris 4 farsakh (16 miles) above al-Madā'in, so Ibn Serapion, p. 15; according to Balkhī (Iṣṭakhri, p. 85; Ibn Ḥawḳal p. 166), the network of canals which intersects the continuous Sawād between Baghdād and Kūfa [cf. above p. 513^a] begins with the Nahr Ṣarṣar, on which lies the little town of Ṣarṣar, 3 farsakh from Baghdād according to Yāqūt, iii. 381, who says that the Nahr 'Isā is sometimes called Nahr Ṣarṣar; there is obviously confusion with the Nahr al-Ṣarāt, on the connections of which with the Nahr 'Isā, see just above; 3. Nahr al-Malik, branches from the Euphrates 5 farsakh below the Nahr Ṣarṣar and reaches the Tigris 3 farsakh below al-Madā'in; it is also the name of a ṭassūdī in the Sawād; (so Ibn Serapion, p. 16); Le Strange's statement (p. 68), that the Nahr al-Malik began at al-Fallūjā is incorrect; this is impossible, for this place is only about 12 miles from the head of the Nahr 'Isā, while the head of the Nahr al-Malik is at least 30 miles from that of the Nahr 'Isā and should be sought on the maps somewhere about Khān Maḡdam; Nahr al-Malik was also the name of one of the four ṭassūdī's of Bihkubādī al-Awsat, while the two Fallūjā were ṭassūdī's of Bihku bādh al-A‘lā; 4. Nahr Kūthā leaves the Euphrates about 3 farsakh south of Nahr al-Malik and reaches the Tigris 10 farsakh below al-Madā’in; it flows through an extraordinarily rich country and many canals go off from it watering the ṭassūdī of Kūthā in the Kūra of Ardashir Bābakān and a part of the ṭassūdī Nahr Dīawbar; it flows past Kūthā Rabbā (Ibn Serapion, p. 15); Ibn Ḥawqāl, p. 168 (Yāqūt, iv. 317), mentions besides Kūthā Rabbā, where Abraham was born and buried, a Kūthā al-Ṭarīk (Arabicised Aramaic?); Kūthā Rabbā is perhaps to be sought in the Tell Ibrāhīm of the maps (due east of Musaiyib). Of the canals from the Tigris which are independent of the Euphrates, one has already been alluded to: Nahr Dudjail [see p. 514^a]; in Balkhī (Iṣṭakhri, p. 77 sq.; Ibn Ḥawqāl, p. 156) its exit (fūha) is a little below Takrīt; it waters parts of this town and then the Sawād of Sāmarrā up to the vicinity of Baghdād (Iṣṭakhri: “a large part of the Sawād of Baghdād is irrigated by it”). This was the earlier state of affairs; later the name was limited to the southern part of the canal or (more correctly) of the Tigris arm; this is reflected in the account in Yāqūt (ii. 555), where the river rises between Takrīt and Baghdād below Sāmarrā returning to the Tigris after flowing through a large area. Abu ‘l-Fidā’, who only compiled without troubling about discrepancies, gives both accounts; p. 56, 3, according to Yāqūt’s Muṣhtariḥ, p. 289, according to Ibn Ḥawqāl. Abu ‘l-Fidā’ has however combined Ibn Ḥawqāl’s version with a note by Ibn Sa‘īd, to the effect that the Nahr al-Ishāki is in the south of and east of Takrīt; the latter is fully dealt with by Ibn Serapion, p. 18 sq. (translation and commentary, p. 265 sq.); although the ms. of Ibn Serapion agrees in saying “east” with Abu ‘l-Fidā’ (or Ibn Sa‘īd), “west” is certainly the correct reading. The difference in the statements may be explained by the various stages; in the older stage there was a large canal (arm) of the Euphrates, which was called sometimes Ishāki after its maker, and sometimes by the diminutive Dudjail. Sāmarrā wrought great havoc: the senseless extravagance exploited the land for purposes of luxury; when the days of splendour were over, many a good work of the older period disappeared, including the northern works of the Ishāki-Dudjail; only antiquaries still knew anything of it; the rest of the world only knew of the Dudjail which even the extravagance of Sāmarrā had not been able to destroy and which is said still to exist (entered on Kiepert’s map in Oppenheim). To restore all these once lifegiving watercourses is the task to be solved by civilisation in the next decades. The scheme has been drawn up by the English engineer Willcocks (cf. his Irrigation of Mesopotamia, Cairo 1905). So far the Hindiya dam has been completed (opened in December 1913); the lock of Habbāniya is being built and it was intended to have it finished in 1916. One of the greatest tasks, the drainage of the marshes between Kūfā and the Tigris around Ḳurna and Baṣra and the restoration of a sufficiently deep and broad channel for the Euphrates, now becomes of subsidiary importance, for, although the waterway still retains its importance beside the railway which is to connect the two important cities of the land, the railway, which is to run along the south edge of the marshes and north edge of the Arabian steppe, will suffice to carry the traffic and waterways through the marshes will be mainly regarded as feeders for the railway. For certain goods the water-route from and to Nedjef will be a necessity, if they are to be able to compete in the markets. The canals to be revived cannot be intended as transport channels; the principal rule for the ‘Irāk has been rightly laid down that the watercourses are there for irrigation purposes and not for navigation. But people have gone too far in their zeal against the latter use, and the two great rivers must not remain any longer unused, but they must be made to carry the valuable cargoes if we are not to be reproached with neglecting an economic factor of the first importance. The lower course of the Euphrates between Ḳurna and the junction of the modern main canal and Tigris at Gurmat ‘Alī (10 m. north of Baṣra) is a swampy area [Baṭiḥa, q. v.] which probably at an earlier period stretched to Muḥammara. Compared with the earlier extent of the Baṭiḥa as given by the Arab geographers (Ḳudāma, 5100 sq. miles? as only linear measure is given, uncertain; Sprenger’s calculation, according to Mas‘ūdi (Babylonien, p. 47) is wrong; see thereon Wagner in Nachr. Gött. Ges. Wiss., 1902, p. 239; the marshes began quite near Kūfā) the modern extent is limited, about 1730 sq. m. (but the area north of the Baṭiḥa, between Shaṭṭ al-Haiy and the Tigris is not yet investigated: there are said to be extensive marshes there also). Even now there are still a number of ḥawr (vulg. ḥōr, also hawr: for some notes on the word, see Lidzbarski, Johannesbuch, p. 144, note 5) i. e. lakes formed by inundation; the English map shows in addition to Ḳhōr Abū Kelām and Ḳhōr Dīazā’ir also Ḳhōr al-Hamar, the largest area of water. There are also lakes formed by innundation in the whole area between the Hindiya arm and the Shaṭṭ al-Haiy; they are to be distinguished from the waters called baḥr, like Baḥr Nedjef and Baḥr al-Shināfiya; the Baṭiḥa and the borders of the ḥawr’s are intersected by navigable canals. The Ḳhōr Huwaiza or Ḳhōr al-A‘zam through which the Ḳherkhā flows to the Tigris also belongs to the Irāk. Ḳhōr is also the name of the watercourses in the delta of the Shaṭṭ al-‘Arab, which have a different character from the lakes formed by inundation.

The rich soil of this country provides a fertile crop of corn of the first quality. Knowledge of this at one time penetrated into Arabia, the Beduins of which were on terms of intercourse with the principality of al-Hira [q. v.], which lay on the borders of the blessed country and saw both sides. Every rising political power in Arabia when it felt strong enough had to make its first attack on the rich ‘Irāk. Here the material basis was to be found for a government which wished to set out on a policy of conquest: here were found the means to satisfy the “warriors of the faith” to whom the booty offered them by the conquest of this country seemed more valuable than the prospect of the joys of Paradise. Arab tradition makes this clear in the story that the Beduins were urged by their wives to get them the rich corn that grew in the ‘Irāk. But ‘Irāk was at the same time the door for an invasion into the Persian empire. Muḥammad, who had a good political instinct, could not fail to notice that in his period a great struggle was raging between the two world powers of which he might be able to reap the benefit as tertius gaudens. The only clear revelation on foreign politics which survives (others have been lost) hopes for the victory of the defeated Byzantines (Sūra xxx. 1): a weakened Persia was in the interest of the Arabian policy of conquest, the guiding spirit in which from the first was 'Omar. The war on two fronts was taken up with a boldness which cannot be sufficiently admired. The conquest of Syria and of the 'Irāk was completed so thoroughly that 25 years after the death of the Prophet the crisis of the first civil war could be passed without serious consequences. The conquerors fell upon the 'Irāk in full strength and here they won their first great victories. In strong, sudden blows the Persian outposts on the Euphrates were taken and the advance relentlessly continued until in the battle of Nahāwand (21 = 642) the Sāsānid power was overthrown. With great skill the Arab generals created a strong base of operations about 400 miles long with the camps of Baṣra and Kūfa as its eastern and western termini (the whole of the materials on the founding of these two cities is given by Caetani, years 16, p. 238 sqq.; 17, p. 13 sqq.). The rich capital of the country, Ktesiphon, which consisted of a group of towns, was ruthlessly plundered and destroyed and the foundations of a new fortified town were not laid upon it, but on the ruins the unimportant al-Madā'in (see Nöldeke, p. 16, note 1; Streck, p. 246—279) dragged on a miserable existence till it was absorbed by Baghdād. Great care was devoted to the administration of this part of the young empire by the far-seeing 'Omar. Kūfa and Baṣra received separate governors, that of Kūfa was at first Sa'd b. Abī Waqqās, whose place was taken at the wish of the constantly grumbling Kūfis by 'Ammār b. Yāsir [q. v.] who was not fit for the office; he was succeeded by Muḡhira b. Shu'ha, who had been dismissed from Baṣra on account of a scandal, until Sa'd was restored to office (25 = 646); then followed al-Walīd h. 'Ukha (25—30 = 646—650) and Sa'id b. al-'Āṣi (30—33 = 651—654). Baṣra was more stable; there Abū Mūsā al-Ash'ari [q. v.] ruled from 17—29 (= 638—650); he played an active part in settling the quarrel between 'Alī and Mu'āwiya after the battle of Ṣiffin. He was succeeded by 'Abd Allāh b. 'Amir [q. v.], who hurried to the help of 'Othmān but arrived too late. In 35 (655) 'Alī sent to Baṣra 'Othmān b. Hunayf, and 'Ammār h. Shihāb to Kūfa. Ziyād Ibn Abīhi (cf. Lammens' monograph) sent by Mu'āwiya as governor to Baṣra in 46 (665) became ruler of the whole of the 'Irāk in 50 (670) and by a salutary firmness restored order in the turbulent country. He died in Kūfa in 53 (673), before his "brother" Mu'āwiya; his son 'Ubaid Allāh became governor of Baṣra and Kūfa in 55 (675); under him Ḥusain b. 'Alī [q. v.] met his death and he persecuted the Shī'a. An important change in the fortunes of Baṣra took place when in the period of confusion after Yazīd's death (64 = 683), the Tamīm, the northern Arabs of Baṣra, fell to 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zuhair [q. v.], as did the people of Kūfa. The 'Irāk seemed to be lost to the Omayyads for a time. The efficient 'Abd Allāh h. al-Zuhair, who was firmly established in Mecca, appointed his governors in the 'Irāk; the bold and cunning guerilla leader Mukhtār in 66 (686) was able to expel the governor of Baṣra, but in the next year he fell in the battle of Ḥarūra' near Kūfa. The death of Muṣ'ab b. al-Zuhair essentially altered the situation; his best officer, al-Muhallab, joined 'Abd al-Malik [q. v.] and a governor of the Damascus government returned to Baṣra (72 = 694). The Khāndjīs were a source of continual unrest; they were spread over the 'Irāk and adjoining Khūzistān; they never permanently held a dominating position and were opposed by all the other parties. The governorship of Kūfa was sometimes combined with that of Baṣra, but in that case the governor-general had deputy governors under him. We know of the following governors of Kūfa: 53—55 (673—675) 'Abd Allāh b. Khālid, 55—58 (675—678) al-Daḥḥāk b. Kaīs, 58—59 (678—679) Ibn Umm al-Ḥakam, 59—60 (679—680) al-Nu'mān b. Bashīr; 64 (684) we find 'Amir b. Huraith (Ibn al-Athīr, iv. 109) as deputy (khāṭifa) of 'Ubaid Allāh (cf. under Baṣra) in Kūfa; in the same year Mukhtār appeared in Kūfa, where 'Abd Allāh b. Zubair had a governor. In Kūfa in 75 (694), the activity of al-Ḥajjīdjādī h. Yūsuf [q. v.] began; he had been appointed governor of the whole of the 'Irāk by 'Abd al-Malik and his able and energetic administration suppressed all rebellion. The revolt of the Baṣris, who had joined the pretender 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad h. al-Ash'ath [q. v.], was finished by the battles of Dair al-Djānādjīm [q. v.] and Maskin (83 = 702). Al-Ḥajjīdjādī took efficient measures to put an end to the seditious activities of the towns of Kūfa and Baṣra: he created a centre of economic and intellectual life for the 'Irāk in Wāsiṭ on the Tigris (Shaṭṭ al-Haiy), from which Kūfa and Baṣra, which were not too far distant (Kūfa 120 miles and Baṣra 180), could be ruled. 'Abd al-Malik's administrative reforms were also of great benefit to the 'Irāk; their fundamental principle was that of unity, which was indispensable for a healthy development; the most important was the reform of the currency, which began in the year 75 (694) and replaced the Byzantine and Persian coins current in the empire by coins with Arabic legends (the older emblems were retained on some of the copper coinages; on the silver in some parts of the empire the bust of Khosrow and the fire altar were retained and only the confession of faith was placed on the margin). 'Abd al-Malik acquired further merit by organising the postal service although it was only used for carrying persons and messages in the interest of the government. Finally Arabic was ordered to be the official language; previously official documents had been in the language of the country or in it and in Arabic. Under al-Walīd also (86—96 = 705—715) al-Ḥajjīdjādī retained his peculiar position. The figure of this man, in spite of the contradictory, on the whole unfavourable, accounts of the Arab annalists is still quite distinct to us. We know that there was a whole school which systematically depicted in black colours all that the Omayyads did, especially all the actions of their great statesmen; this is the 'Irāk school, the chief representative of which is Saif h. 'Omar (clearly elucidated by Wellhausen, cf. Caetani, year 21, p. 305). Unbiased historical research will do justice to the merits of al-Ḥajjīdjādī, but it must confess that one element in his administration had a pernicious influence on the development of the whole empire: that was the way in which he favoured his north Arabian countrymen, the Kaīsīs. Therefore all the Yamanīs in the army and the government and all elements in the population who sided with the

Yamanīs were against him, as were also the 'Alids, whose pretensions he ruthlessly combatted. He took energetic measures against all men who fought for their particular interests, like al-Muhallab, who used every party when it seemed to be for his advantage. The tension produced by al-Hadīdjādī's ruthless procedure did not find full vent in explosion, as al-Walid, a true son of his father, by his cautious and clever policy was able to avoid fatal outbursts of the principal feud, viz. that between the ʔaisīs and the Yamanīs. The storm burst as soon as al-Walid had died, for his brother Sulaimān who followed him (96—99 = 715—717) was under the influence of the enemies of al-Hadīdjādī, the embittered Yamanīs. Al-Hadīdjādī was spared the pain of the change, for he died six months before al-Walid. The new epoch which began with Sulaimān first showed itself in the appointment of Yazid b. al-Muhallab, one of the most dangerous intriguers and agitators, as governor of the 'Irāk (95 = 714). The new lord began a reign of terror: the most prominent men of the North Arab party were persecuted and ill-treated. With Sulaimān's death there began a period of government by factions, which at every change in the throne resulted in intolerable uncertainty and dangers. 'Omar II, son of 'Abd al-'Aziz b. Marwān, checked the activities of Yazid b. al-Muhallab for a time by imprisoning him (in the citadel of Aleppo, Ibn al-Athīr, v. 36); scarcely had 'Omar died (101 = 720) when Yazid escaped; the rebellion which he at once stirred up in Baṣra was suppressed by Maslama b. 'Abd al-Malik (102 = 721); as a reward his brother Yazid II (101—105 = 720—724) appointed him governor of Khorāsān, Baṣra, and Kūfa, separate deputy governors for them being placed in them by Maslama. The appointment of Khālīd b. 'Abd Allāh al-Ḳasrī as governor of the 'Irāk by Hishām (105—125 = 724—743) had a beneficial result. With the death of Hishām, however, the completest confusion prevailed throughout the empire; passions were vented without restraint, and the factions of North and South Arabs into which all prevailing antithesis almost all other differences were merged, fell on one another. Al-Walid II who followed Hishām was a ʔaisī fanatic who had al-Ḳasrī cruelly executed. In Marwān II (127—132 = 744—750) a Marwānid once more took energetic steps against the rebellions. In the 'Irāk he also put down Khārīdī risings. But the flame which the cunning 'Abbāsids Abu l-'Abbās (al-Saffāh) and Abū Dja'far (al-Manṣūr) kindled in Khorāsān was no longer to be extinguished. Their general Abū Muslim in 130 (748) won the decisive battle against Marwān's governor, Naṣr b. Saiyār. The governor of the 'Irāk, Ibn Ḥubaira, could not check the evil. The Yamanīs in Kūfa rebelled and gave up the city to the enemy and it became for a time the headquarters of the 'Abbāsids. Marwān himself was decisively defeated on the Great Zāb in 132 (750). The 'Abbāsids took the place of the Omayyads. Going back for a moment we may mention a political principle introduced by Mu'āwīya and maintained by his successors as a regular rule, but for which the rule of the Omayyads would certainly have disappeared more quickly. Mu'āwīya succeeded in consolidating his rule in the 'Irāk and in arabicising and islamising the country in a relatively short time by his policy of wise moderation, which was seen especially in the consideration he paid to the inclinations of the people and in the introduction into the army of the principle of territorial military service. While at first the troops in the 'Irāk were foreigners but stationed only in a few depots, the numerous conversions to Islām soon supplied sufficient men for the local forces. The fact that these troops were not used outside the country or only in campaigns against the east had the disadvantage that the enemies of the Omayyads were able to find a strong support in them. Abū Muslim fought with 'Irākīs and Persians against the Omayyads, who only had the Syrian troops on their side. In the civil administration also Mu'āwīya and his successors showed themselves far-seeing statesmen: although they did not allow the 'Irākīs to choose their own governor, but imposed rulers upon them, yet they wisely gave way to appeals and changed the individuals, an unimportant concession which in no way meant an alteration of the system. In yet another way the Omayyad rule was beneficial to the 'Irāk. These rulers recognised that the 'Irāk with its agriculture, dependent on special methods of cultivation, required to be administered with particular care; neither arbitrary interference nor complete laissez faire were here suitable. In not a few cases the representatives of the central government saw to improvements proposed by the natives, like Maslama, the Caliph's brother, who built a canal. The economic results of the Omayyad rule in the 'Irāk are to be all the more highly appreciated as they had to reckon with the hostility of the population (Kūfa was in the hands of the Shī'a, Baṣra in the power of the Khārīdīs). The difference between Syria and the 'Irāk during the Omayyad period is that in Syria there was union and coherence and in the 'Irāk continual strife. The Shī'a and Khārīdī troubles have already been mentioned as well as the fighting between North and South Arabs, who opposed one another in the 'Irāk under the names "Tamīm" and "Azd"; in spite of these troubles the great Marwānid succeeded in lessening the differences and bringing about a certain degree of coherence in the whole empire. The turn given to the Muslim empire by the victory of the 'Abbāsids seemed likely to make the unity permanent. The transference of the Caliph's capital to the new city of Baghdād consolidated the connection of the regions belonging to the central zone. On the other hand, this measure already concealed the germ of decay, since the west could no longer be commanded from Baghdād, while this move did not result in a firmer authority over the eastern territories. Yet the area within the immediate sphere of the Caliph's influence, with Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia, the 'Irāk, and Persia, was still so important both in territorial extent and in values inherited from the pre-Muhammadian period that the 'Abbāsids and their statesman might have been able to build a permanent structure of indestructable political power and economic prosperity. Under al-Manṣūr this great empire was a type of a political magnitude such as had hardly ever been attained before and can only be compared with the Roman empire under Hadrian. The Roman empire and the caliphate under the early 'Abbāsids are hypertrophied structures, they are colossal with feet of clay. The imminence of collapse is the mark which they bear on their brows. In the causes of their decline they have much in common, but each of them had besides its own special conditions. The error in the structure of the caliphate, which was bound to prove fatal, lay in basing the sovereignty of the dynasty on aristocracy of birth and religion. Alongside of the clan which championed this was another of the same character which unceasingly endeavoured to make good its claims and to work for the overthrow of the dominant clan. The latter were the descendants of 'Alī and Fāṭima, whose partisans formed themselves into a politico-religious party and were a great danger, not so much on account of their numbers, for then as now they cannot have numbered more than a tenth of all Muslims, but they formed the most intelligent and most industrious part of the Muslim population. Besides the clan and religious elements in the feud there soon appeared a third, the racial. The predominant majority was Arahic. These Arabs treated the Persians with contempt; the latter had also to attach themselves as clients to an Arab clan. Their ill-treatment led them to join with the other group, the Shī'at 'Alī "the followers of 'Alī", who were severely oppressed by the dominant clan and its government. Their common sufferings formed a strong bond of union. A religious and nationalist party grew out of the at first purely Arab Shī'at 'Alī. "Persian" and "Shī'a" gradually became synonymous. The danger was at first averted: a skilful policy bridged over the differences for a space of about 40 years. The Caliph al-Manṣūr, the second 'Abbāsīd (136—158 = 754—775), summoned a prominent Persian, named Khālid, of the Barmak family, said to be related to the old royal family, to a high office in the Government. Under his successors, unusually capable and clever men, this family attained an almost autocratic position. This period marks the zenith of the political power and economic prosperity of the caliphate, while at the same time a civilization flourished that was conditioned by a limited external adaptation to the great cultural elements which the conquering Arahs found in Syria and Bahylonia; but the foundations for a further prosperous development were not created. Nor could it be otherwise; for the system of government which at the very beginning of the Omayyad period had replaced the originally democratic principle was based upon the idea that the prosperity of the Muslim community was secured by placing at the head of the government the man most worthy of this office. To exercise his control perfectly he had to have unlimited power and very soon this conception of the caliph became accepted to such a degree that he was actually regarded as the "Shadow of God". In practice this absolute ruler was usually not only not the most worthy but frequently one who had the gravest moral defects and at the same time a plaything in the hands of those who exploited the community in his name. In an administration of this kind two tendencies developed in a most disastrous fashion: the formation of gigantic fortunes and the preponderance of the "priesthood" of one particular theological school. At the same time a number of adventurers arose who troubled little about the superman on the Caliph's throne. The caliphate broke up into a number of communities which existed almost independently alongside of one another. In each of these communities developments followed the course settled by local conditions. The 'Irāk also followed its own devices. From the beginning of the Būyid rule to the end of the Saldjūk period it was a province of a kingdom whose centre was in Persian 'Irāk, but there was no marked policy of interference by the rulers: provided that the inhabitants bore patiently the oppression of their foreign masters and their heavy demands for money, they were allowed liberty to maintain their national life. The revival of the authority of the caliph under the vigorous Caliph al-Nāṣir brought no essential alteration. This period, besides, was soon ended by the Mongol invasion.

In the long period of 'Abbāsīd rule the 'Irāk suffered many vicissitudes. When the caliphs were strong, the conflicts between the various elements and the aspirations of ambitious adventurers were speedily crushed; otherwise, the land suffered considerable unrest; for the Kūfa and Baṣra people were incurable as regards their main faults. The new capital attracted the worst elements to itself; at the same time the revival of economic prosperity brought masses into the country who when the time came could be stirred up by ambitious individuals, as for example happened with the rebellion of the Zandj imported from East Africa; finally, the religious fervour which was glowing beneath the ashes, again and again hurst forth in burning and consuming flames. The extraordinary skill with which the Barmakids and, under their guidance, three caliphs maintained the delicate balance between Arabs and Persians, was lacking when the Barmak family was destroyed. The extermination of the Barmakids which resulted in an essential alteration in the ethnic balance of power in the 'Irāk, meant that the policy of conciliation and mediation between the two main elements, the Arahic and Persian, was at an end. The overthrow of the balance first showed itself in a series of 'Alid troubles, which began with the rising of Ibn Ṭabāṭahā (199 = 815). The capital stood by the Sunni caliphate and even went so far as to oppose the Caliph himself when the latter in pursuit of an untenable policy of conciliation made the mistake of planning to give the succession to the 'Alid Imām al-Ridā as husband of his daughter and adopting the green colour of the 'Alids. As soon as he saw his mistake, he undid his measure not without the use of force. The extermination of the Barmakids did not conduce to the strengthening of the political power of the Arahs in the 'Irāk, but to its destruction, for the dislocation of the intimate relations in the central province led to the introduction of a new element into the court service and thus into political life. Al-Mu'taṣim created for himself a Turkish praetorian guard and lived under its protection in Sāmarrā which was founded by him. The Turkish force with which the caliphs surrounded themselves stood alone and the existing Arab bodies of troops fell into the background before it, as the former had much more energy and soldierly spirit. The people thus became unfit to defend themselves and were at the mercy of those who ruled the land with the help of foreign troops, either as the appointed representatives of the Caliph or as usurpers who entered the land by force. These foreign bodies also endeavoured to gain control of the other provinces. We have already seen that Turkish families gained the ruling power in Egypt and therefore in Syria, but this did not mean the coming of a system of regionalism, although the land furnished hardly any troops worth mentioning. In the ʿIrāk under al-Mutawakkil Turkish praetorians came into power and made any orderly government impossible. The caliphs with a few exceptions (al-Muʿtaḍid 892—902) and al-Muktafi (902—908) were utterly incapable and occasionally criminally self-seeking. The struggle for power around the caliph, that is for the office of generalissimo (Amīr al-Umarāʾ), came to an end for a time through the rise of the Buyids (334 = 945), who ruled the two ʿIrāks, Babylonia and Media (cf. the beginning of the article). During the great disturbances which attended the complete collapse of the decadent Buyid family and the rise of the strong Turk family of Saldjūks (447 = 1055) a peculiar combination arose: a Turk general of the Buyid army, Arslān al-Basāsīrī [q. v.], ruled for a short time in the ʿIrāk in name of the Fāṭimid al-Mustanṣir (451 = 1059). But as a result of the great distance between the ʿIrāk and Egypt and southern Syria (the inhospitable Syrian steppe makes it necessary to take a devious route via north Syria) there could be no question of real Fāṭimid rule in the ʿIrāk. The intervention of al-Basāsīrī was an episode which very soon passed. The Saldjūks, who appeared as the main champions of the Turks and held the caliph completely in their power, also considered themselves the protectors of the true Muslim doctrine and persecuted the Shīʿa wherever it raised its head in the ʿIrāk. Although they showed an inclination for Persian culture (the great Saldjūks resided not in Baghdād but in Iṣfahān), they did not interfere with the Arab culture of the ʿIrāk. The temporary redemption of a certain amount of power by the caliphate under Nāṣir al-Dīn made only little alteration in the political and religious conditions. The ʿIrāk became an easy prey to the Mongol conqueror Hūlagū (656 = 1258), and its capital Baghdād sank to be a minor provincial town on the extinction of the caliphate. The desolation of the country, which as a result of the complete neglect of organised irrigation had begun as early as the beginning of the xth century, continued. The ʿIrāk became steppe country with a few large villages and a few cultivated stretches on which the cultivation of the date-palm was alone of some importance. The incorporation of the ʿIrāk in Persia by the powerful Ṣafawid Shāh Ismāʿīl (915 = 1509) was not permanent. The country very soon (941 = 1534) fell to the Ottoman empire, of which it was a province until 1918.

IRAM, the name of an individual or tribe which occupies the same position in Muslim genealogy as Aram in Biblical, as may be seen from a comparison of the Muslim series ʿUṣ b. Iram b. Sām b. Nūh with the Biblical ʿUṣ b. Aram b. Shem b. Noah. The Muslim line probably, like many others, entered historiography under Jewish influence and therefore gives us no new information regarding the dissemination of Aramaeans in Arabia. The name is identified with that of the Iram Dhāt al-ʿImād discussed below, the vocalisation of which was established. Perhaps this explains why the Muslims say Iram instead of Aram.

Tradition has still further developed the connection with the Aramaeans. The people ʿĀd [q. v.] were called Iram; when the ʿĀdis were destroyed, the name Iram was transferred to Thāmūd whose descendants were thought to be the Nabatheans of the Sawād. It was also known to Muslim scholars that Damascus in ancient times was called Iram i. e. Aram.

IRAM DHĀT AL-ʿIMĀD occurs in the Kurʾān only in Sūra 89, 6: "(5) Hast thou not seen how thy Lord dealt with ʿĀd, (6) Iram dhāt al-ʿImād, the like whereof hath not been created in the lands". — The connection between ʿĀd and Iram in these verses may be interpreted in various ways, as the commentaries explain at length. If Iram is taken in contrast to ʿĀd, it is intelligible why Iram also has been taken as a tribal name; ʿImād could then be taken in the sense of "tent-pole". According to others, the poles are a description of the giant figure of the Iram, which is thus particularly emphasised. If Iram stands in idāfa to ʿĀd, it is more probable that Iram dhāt al-ʿImād is a geographical term: "Iram with the pillars". This is the prevailing opinion among Muslims. What is exactly referred to, however, is a point on which opinions differ widely both in east and west. According to Yāqūt, the view most frequently held is that which considers dhāt al-ʿImād an epithet of Damascus [q. v. i. 903^a]. Djairūn b. Saʿd b. ʿĀd [see DAMASCUS, i. 904^b] is said to have settled here and have built a town adorned with marble columns. Loth has used this tradition in support of his view that only Aramaic traditions are associated with the name Iram.

Iram, however, is frequently referred by Muslims to South Arabia to which ʿĀd also belonged. ʿĀd had two sons, Shaddād and Shadīd. After the death of the latter, Shaddād subdued the kings of the world; when he heard of Paradise he had a town built on the steppes of Aden which was to be an imitation of Paradise. Its stones were of gold and silver and its walls studded with jewels, etc. When Shaddād, after neglecting the warning of Hūd [q. v.], wished to see the town, he was destroyed by a tornado with his whole retinue a day's journey from Iram and the whole town buried in sand.

In a tradition given by al-Masʿūdī (ii. 421) the story does not have a tragic ending. After Shad-dad had built Iram, he wished to erect a duplicate of the town, on the site of Alexandria. When Alexander the Great came to found Alexandria, he discovered traces of a great building with many columns of marble. On one of these was an inscription of Shaddād b. ʿĀd b. Shaddād b. ʿĀd in which he related that he had had this town built on the model of Iram dhāt al-ʿImād; but God put an end to his life: no one should be tempted to undertake too great a thing. — It is easy to see that this tradition is connected with the romance of Alexander, in which it is related (Pseudo-Callisthenes, ed. C. Müller, i. 33) that at the building of Alexandria a temple with obelisks was found which had an inscription of King Sesonchis who ruled the world. The warning mentioned in al-Masʿūdī's inscription is also quite in the tenor of the Alexander legend. We therefore must not expect here a tradition concerning the site of Iram. It must be noted, however, that Ṭabarī also in his commentary on the Qurʾān gives the view that Iram was identical with Alexandria.

It is further related that a certain ʿAbd Allāh b. Kīlāba while seeking two lost camels came by chance on the buried town, from the ruins of which he brought musk, camphor, and pearls to Muʿāwiya. All these however became dust when exposed to the air. Muʿāwiya summoned Kaʿb al-Aḥbār [q. v.] to him and asked him about the town. The latter at once replied: "It must be Iram of the pillars, which was to be found in thy caliphate by a man whose appearance is as follows". The description fitted ʿAbd Allāh exactly. The hardly concealed tone of mockery with which al-Masʿūdī relates all this (Murūdj, iv. 88) is worth noting.

According to Muslim scholars, this Iram dhāt al-ʿImād lay near ʿAden or between Ṣanʿā and Ḥaḍramawt or between ʿOmān and Ḥaḍramawt. It should be noted that the form of the name Iram is South Arabian: Hamdānī mentions a hill and a well of the name Iram in South Arabia. This fact is a refutation of the opinion of Loth, who considers Aramaic references exclusively.

It is likewise clear that we have not to accept the connection between the tribe Iram = Aram and Iram dhāt al-ʿImād which is assumed by Muslim tradition. — The story of the finding of the family tomb of ʿĀd b. Iram is found in D. H. Müller, Südarabische Studien (Sitz. ber. Akad. Wien, philos.-histor. Klasse, lxxxvi. 134 sqq.).

IRĀN. [See PERSIA.]

IRATEN, Berber AIT IRATEN (cf. AIT), Arabic BANU RATEN, a tribe of Great Kabylia, whose territory is bounded on the north by the Sebau, in the west by the Wādi Aisi, which separates them from the Banū Yenni, in the south by the district of the Ait Yahyā and in the east by that of the Ait Frausen, and forms a hilly country from 3000 to 3500 feet in height, yielding olives and figs and some corn. The inhabitants are settled in several villages, of which the most important are ʿAdenī, Tawritū Amokrān, Usammör, and Agemun. To-day the Banū Ratén form a single dwār community (cf. DAWĀR at the end) of 9781 souls belonging to the mixed community of Fort National.

We know little about the history of the Ait Iraten. Ibn Khaldūn (Hist. des Berbères, transl. de Slane, i. 256) mentions them as inhabitants of "the mountains between Bougie and Tedellys". They were nominally under allegiance to the governor of Bougie and were on the list of tribes liable to kharāj, while they were actually independent. At the time when the Marinid al-Ḥasan undertook his campaign to Ifrīkiya, they were subject to a woman, called Shamsi, of the family of the ʿAbd al-Ṣamad, from whom the chiefs of the Ait Iraten were descended.

During the whole Turkish period, the Ait Iraten maintained their independence, secure behind their mountains. They formed one of the most powerful federations in Kabylia, which comprised five arsh: Ait Irdjen, Akerma, Usammör, Aug-gasha, and Umala, and could put in the field a force of 2800 men. They kept their independence until in 1857 the French under Marshal Randon for the first time penetrated into the Kabylia mountains (Djebel Djurdjura: cf. ALGÉRIE, i. 270^a). To prevent a hostile invasion of their territory the Ait Iraten arranged to give hostages and to pay tribute. Nevertheless, their land remained a hotbed of intrigues against French rule, so that Randon in 1857 decided to subdue them completely. The French troops leaving Tizi-Uzu on May 24 conquered all the Kabyl villages in succession and on May 29 destroyed the army of the Ait Iraten and their allies on the plateau of Sūḳ al-Arbʿā. On May 26 the Ait Iraten offered to submit. To keep them in check Randon at once began to build Fort Napoléon (now Fort National) in the heart of their country and thus placed "a thorn in the eye of Kabylia". The Banū Ratén were then quiet for 14 years, but in 1871 they again had recourse to arms and took part in the siege of Fort National, which however the rebels did not succeed in capturing.

IRBID or Arbad (corruption of an older Arbel, see the following article), the old town (of which the ruins only now exist) of Arbela, on a hill on the road from Tiberias through the so-called "Dove Ravine". Among the ruins those of a synagogue are noteworthy (see Kohl and Watzinger, Synagogenruinen in Galilea, p. 59 sqq.). The remarkable rock caves in the neighbourhood played an important role in later Jewish history. Tradition places here the tombs of the mother of Moses and of four of the sons of Jacob, Dan, Issachar, Zebulon and Gad.

Another Irbid-Arbad, likewise an ancient Arbela, lies in the district of Balḳā' [q. v.], 12 Arab miles from Baisān. There the Caliph Yazid II died.

(FR. BUHL.)

IRBIL, the name of various places in Mesopotamia:

1. a town in the wilāyet of Mōṣul, about 50 miles E. S. E. of Mōṣul, 12 hours N. of Altyn Köprü (see i. 322^b) in 36° 11' N. Lat. and 42° 2' E. Long. (Greenw.). Irbil (Erbil, in the common language also Arbīl) is the Arba-īlu of the Babylonian-Assyrian and the Arbira of the Old Persian cuneiform inscriptions. This place, which is mentioned as early as in Assyrian documents of the ixth century B. C., played no special political role in antiquity. Its main importance was rather based in the pre-Achaemenid period on the possession of a highly venerated sanctuary of the goddess Ishtar. Arbailu was the Delphi of ancient Assyria; at the same time however it was of great importance as the junction of caravan roads. It is mainly to this favourable position at the junction of roads that Arbailu owes the fact that it has survived as an existence and a name alone out of the famous cities of Assyria.

Irbil, almost equidistant from the two rivers named Zāb, formed from the earliest times the centre of the district cut off on north and south by these two rivers. In ancient times this was called either Arbelitis, after the capital, or, from the Zābs, Adiabene (the Hedayab of the Syrians). It practically coincided with the "land (ard) Irbil" of the Arab geographers. As after the decline of Niniveh, Arbela was the only important town of Assyria proper, the name Arbelitis was later extended to Assyria (even as early as the time of the Diadochi). Adiabene was then also interpreted in this wider sense. In the second half of the second century B. C. a small kingdom arose there, which was able usually to maintain its independence during the Parthian period. Under the Sāsānids Irbil was the residence of governors, who occasionally enjoyed very great independence. One of these, Kārdagh, who lived in the citadel of Melḳi near Irbil, suffered a martyr's death in 358 under Sapor II for adopting Christianity.

In the Muslim period Irbil does not appear until far on in the time of the later 'Abbāsids. In Ṭabari's great history it is never mentioned; of the older Arab geographers only Ibn Khordādhbih ixth and Qudāma (xth) mention it in dealing with the division of Arab 'Irāḳ as the capital of a district (fasiṣḡ) of the province of Ḥulwān; cf. Bibl. geogr. Arab., ed. de Goeje, vi. 6, 3, 235, 2. Irbil was later considered to belong to the Džazira, particularly to the province of Mōṣul. In 563 (1167) Zain al-Dīn

'Alī Kūṭūk b. Begteḡīn founded a small state with Irbil as capital. The most famous ruler of this Kurd dynasty of Begteḡīnids [q. v. i. 688^b sq.] was Muzaḡḡar al-Dīn Kōkbūri, Saladin's brother-in-law. Under him Irbil reached its greatest prosperity during the middle ages. Kōkbūri in 586 (1190) considerably extended the kingdom which he had inherited from his brother. He conquered the adjoining minor principalities and also brought the district of Shehrizōr (with Kerkūk) under his rule. A number of foreigners then settled in Irbil, which soon became an important town. Several times a year Kōkbūri gave brilliant festivals which brought visitors from far and near. This was especially the case with the feast celebrated with great ceremony on the birthday of the Prophet, which was combined with a great fair (cf. Ibn Khallikān, ed. Wüstenfeld, fasc. vi. 66). The lower town of Irbil at the foot of the citadel hill owes its origin to this prince. He also founded a school which bore his name, the Madrasa al-Muzaḡḡariya, at which the father of the celebrated Arab historian Ibn Khallikān (born in 608—1211 in Irbil) was professor. For the Ṣūfīs Kōkbūri built a monastery (ribāṭ) in Irbil.

When Kōkbūri died childless in 630 (1132), he left his kingdom to the caliph al-Mustansir whose much shrunken secular power thus received a not inconsiderable accession. The latter had however first of all to use force to gain possession of his heritage, for the inhabitants of Irbil refused to recognise the 'Abbāsīd as their suzerain. The general Iḳbāl al-Sharābī, who was sent by al-Mustansir, succeeded in occupying the refractory town after a siege; cf. Ibn al-Ṭiḡṭāḡā, al-Faḡḡrī (ed. Ahlwardt), p. 37, 380, 12; Barhebraeus, Chron. Syr., ed. Bedjan, p. 466 sqq. and Weil, Gesch. d. Chalifen, iii. 468. Soon afterwards the Mongols knocked at the gates of Irbil. By 628 (1230) they had entered the radius of the town in their raids (cf. Ibn al-Athīr, ed. Tornberg, xii. 328). In 633 (1235) they were plundering in its streets (cf. Barhebraeus Tārīḡḡ Mukḡḡṭaṣar, ed. Beirut, p. 436, 9). In 634 (1236) they appeared again, set the lower town on fire and besieged the citadel, which was valiantly defended; but after 45 days they retired on payment of a considerable ransom; cf. Barhebraeus Tārīḡḡ Mukḡḡṭaṣar, p. 437, 12 sqq., and Wüstenfeld in the Abh. d. Gött. Gesch. d. Wiss., xxviii. (1881) p. 120, and also d'Ohsson, Histoire des Mongols, iii. 69, 71, 73. When in 656 (1258) Hūlāḡū began his advance on Baghdād, he at the same time sent one of his generals to Irbil. The fortress was defended by the Kurds against all attacks for over a year. It was only with the help of Badr al-Dīn Lu'lu' of Mōṣul that the Mongols finally succeeded in taking the hotly contested town. Cf. Rashīd al-Dīn, Hist. des Mongols de la Perse (ed. Quatremère), i. (1836), p. 314 sqq.; Barhebraeus, Chron. syriac., p. 506, 3 sqq.; Barhebraeus, Tārīḡḡ Mukḡḡṭaṣar, p. 472, and Weil, Gesch. der Chalifen, iv. 9; d'Ohsson, op. cit., iii. 256 sqq. In the period that followed Irbil had again to snuff a great deal from the horrors of war and the raids of neighbouring Kurd and Arab tribes. The last days of storm and stress were experienced during the Turkish campaign of Nādirshāh in 1743. After a 60 days' siege the victorious Persian king was able to enter the town. Until far into the first half of the sixteenth century Irbil belonged to the great pashalik of Baghdād and as one of the most important military points in it was garrisoned by a strong force of Janissaries. When the wilāyet of Mōsul was separated from that of Baghdād, Irbil went with the former.

The conversion to Christianity of the district of Adiabene and the adjoining regions was mainly conducted from Irbil. A bishop had his seat here at a very early date. The diocese originally comprised only the area between the two Zāb, therefore it was called by the Syrians the diocese of Hedayab or, from the two seats of office, of Arbel or Hāzza (a village near A.). At the beginning of the 7th century Irbil was elevated to the rank of an archbishopric, to which the whole of Assyria proper was subordinated. Not till a later date was the bishopric of Nineveh (Mōsul) or Āthūr separated from it as an independent ecclesiastical province. On the importance of Irbil in pre-Islāmic Syrian church history, cf. especially the chronicle probably composed by a clergyman of the diocese of Irbil, which A. Mingana published in Sources Syriacques, i. (Leipzig 1908) and Sachau discussed in the Abh. der Berl. Akad. d. Wissensch., 1915, No. 6. This chronicle is primarily concerned with the history of the bishops and martyrs of our bishopric for the period 100—540 (551?) A. D. See also Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire Perse (1904), passim (Index, p. 356).

In 1268 the Nestorian Catholicos moved his see from Baghdād to Irbil. But as early as 1271 he removed from here to Ushnū in Ādharbaidjān, since the Christians as a result of the machinations of the Assassins became suspect among the Muslims and had to suffer many insults, cf. Barhebraeus, Chron. Eccl. (ed. Abbeloos and Lamy), ii. 439; do., Chron. Syr., p. 525, 10 sqq., 526, 21 sqq.; D'Ohsson, op. cit., iii. 469 sq. The position of the Christians of Irbil under the successors of Hūlāgū [q. v.], and specially under Ghazān [q. v.] and Uldjaitū, was on the whole very miserable. Kurds and Arabs often fell upon them, plundering and murdering, first of all in the years 1274 and 1285; cf. Barhebraeus, Chron. Syriac., p. 528—529, 557, 8 sqq. In 1295, as an inscription of the 17th century which still exists in the monastery of Mar Behnam records, the Īlkhān Baidū ravaged the region of Irbil, cf. H. Pognon, Inscript. Semit. (Paris 1907), No. 76, p. 135. In the year 1296, as a result of a royal edict, all Christian churches of the town were destroyed (Barhebraeus, op. cit., p. 596, 18 sqq., and Histoire de Mar Jabalaha, ed. Bedjan, 1895, p. 113); in 1297 the Kurds besieged during several months the Christians who had taken refuge in the upper town (cf. Hist. de M. Jabalaha, p. 121—131). In 1310, in the reign of Uldjaitū, the Christians, after bravely defending themselves for over three months on the citadel against the besiegers, Arab, Kurd, and Mongol, were overcome and exterminated. We possess an illuminating description of these dark days for Irbil from the pen of the biographer of the then Catholicos Jabalaha iii. (see Hist. de M. Jabalaha, p. 154—201). From this time onwards Irbil ceased to be a Christian town. But since then also dates the decline of the town. A few Syriac inscriptions on the walls of a building now used as barracks (kishla) recall the earlier Christian population; cf. Cuinet, op. cit., p. 857. In Irbil itself there are no longer any Christian families; a few (united Nestorians) so-called Chaldaeans, are however to be found in the village of Ainkawo (also written Ainkeba, Ankawa, Ankowa) a short hour's journey from Irbil, certainly the Amkaba of the Hist. de M. Jabalaha, p. 192, and probably the Amkābādh of Barhebraeus, Chron. Syr., p. 557, 11) as its exclusive inhabitants. Next to the Christians the Kurds form numerically the strongest element in the population of the town. From the 11th century the Hadhabanī or Hākamiya Kurds were settled in and around Irbil; on them cf. Ritter, Erkunde, ix. 620; Quatremère in Notices et extraits des manuscrits, xiii. 301 note 1, 309—313 (extracts form the geographical and historical work of al-'Umari, died 749—1348); G. Hoffmann, Syrische Akten persisch. Märtyrer (1881), p. 236, 272. The chiefs of these Kurd tribes, who possessed a considerable number of citadels in the region of Irbil, were frequently fighting with one another for the possession of the town. Accounts of such local feuds in the middle of the 11th century are given for example by the histories of Ibn Khaldūn and Badr al-Dīn Aini; see Tiesenhausen in Mém. présentées à l'Acad. Imp. des Sciences de St. Pétersbourg, viii. (1859), p. 141, 160—161.

As to the present population of Irbil, it numbers, according to Cuinet (1892), 3260 inhabitants of whom 497 are non-Muslims (Jews). The number of houses is said to be 1822 (Belck and Lehmann, in 1899, estimated those of the upper town alone as 800), besides the serai of the Turkish governor, 2 mosques, 10 Muslim chapels and 16 schools. According to the late administrative division of Turkey, Irbil was the capital of a kaḍā belonging to the sandjak of Shehrizōr and was divided into two districts (nāhiya's) comprising 330 villages and 12000 inhabitants.

Irbil consists of the lower town and an upper town grouped around the citadel. The lower, built by Kökbürī (called Kotrak, according to Cuinet), which lies at the west and south bases of the citadel hill, makes a very poor impression and now lies for the most part in ruins. It was earlier much more extensive, as may be deduced from the fact that the ditch which once surrounded it now lies far beyond the present scanty group of houses. The lower town is the centre of commercial life and contains the bazaars and khāns. Of noteworthy buildings the remains of a large mosque with an imposing minaret, about 203 feet high and 48 feet round (cf. the description in Rich, ii. 15 sqq.), are especially striking; according to an inscription on the minaret, it was built by Kökbürī. This mosque is perhaps identical with the Masjid al-Kaff mentioned by Kazwīnī (loc. cit.), in which, according to him, there was a stone with the imprint of a man's hand. Obviously this refers to a sanctuary with a print of 'Alī's hand (Kaff, panāja), of which others are known in the 'Irāk, Mesopotamia, and Persia; cf. for examples, v. Berchem, in Herzfeld-Sarre, Archaeolog. Reise im Euphrat- und Tigrisgebiet, i. 24).

The upper town with the citadel rises from a round hill not quite 65 feet with fairly steep sides. It is obviously artificial. In its interior are massive vaulted subterranean passages and chambers. It is crowned by a strong castle which is surrounded by a wall now somewhat ruined, 48 feet high, set with crenellated parapets and bastions. This gigantic tell with the picturesque citadel upon it has always aroused the astonishment of travellers; from several hours' journey distant it can be seen commanding the plain. To some extent it reminds one of the castle hills of Hims and Halab — with which it has been frequently compared —, but it surpasses both considerably in the grandeur of its mass. The castle is occupied by the kā'immaḩām and the other officials of the town. The houses of private citizens are quite close to the surrounding wall. Systematic excavations have not yet been undertaken in Irbil nor is anything known of any accidental finds of antiquities.

The importance of Irbil at the present day is mainly based on its position as a commercial depot and centre of a busy through trade. Important caravan routes enter it from different directions. First mention should be given to the very ancient road which runs from Baghdād via Kerkūk, Altyn-Köprü to Irbil and thence to Mōsul; it is the most direct route between Baghdād and Mōsul, as it was formerly between Babylon and Nineveh. Two roads run from Irbil to east and north and lead over rough mountain passes to the country of Ādharbaidjān; the one goes in the first place to Rowāndūz in the north east and the other to Khoi Sandjaḩ in the east. On the roads from Irbil and the distances, see especially Rich, ii. 296—297; Jones in the Journ. of the Roy. Asiat. Soc., 1855, p. 380; and Cuinet, p. 793 sqq.; the road from Irbil to Marāghā is described by Hoffmann, op. cit., p. 231 sqq.

The town of Irbil is the centre of a splendid, very fertile country, which looks to the eye more a flat than an undulating plateau. With an average height of 1300 feet (the lower town of Irbil is 1332 feet above sea level) it forms the watershed between the two Zābs. There is a complete absence of trees, but it affords excellent corn-growing soil; cotton flourishes here exceedingly and is manufactured in the town. The Persian geographer ḩamd Allāh Mustawfi praises the cotton grown here in his geographical work Nuḩḩat al-Kulūb about 1340. Numerous streams run in winter through the plain but there is no perennial river so that irrigation has in part to be conducted by subterranean aqueducts. In the north the spurs of the Kurd Alps come fairly near Irbil; west of the town rises the Demir-Dagh, to a height of 1600 feet. In the north east and east the plain is bounded by the Derdedawān Dagħ in the south (at Altynköprü) by the Zergazawān-Dagħ. In the Southwest the plateau of Irbil is bounded by the Shemamlik lowland plain which stretches to the bank of the Great Zāb.

The well cultivated plateau is covered by numerous Kurd villages. The Kurd tribes, who camp in the summer in the hills of Rowāndūz, migrate hither in the winter. Most villages are built quite near characteristic tumuli; everywhere one finds extensive mounds of ruins, evidence of better days, when this land so richly endowed by nature was on a much higher level of civilization than at present.

5. The statement by Yāḩūt (i. 189, 21) that the town of Ṣaidā (Sidon) was called Irbil is probably an error.

It is not impossible that the places named Arbela (Irbil, Irbid) outside of Assyria were founded by inhabitants of the Assyrian Arbela and were called by them after their native town.

(M. STRECK.)

IRTIFĀ' (A.) = height: in astronomy the height of a constellation, that is its distance from the horizon measured on a circle passing through zenith and nadir (vertical, ā'irāt al-irtifā'); in geometry it is also used for the height of a plane figure (triangle, parallelogram) or of a body (prism, cylinder), but 'amūd (pillar, plumb line) is much more commonly used. (H. SUTER.)

IRTISH a large river in Siberia, in the basin of the Ob. Its two sources, the Blue and the White Irtish, rise in the Great Altai; after their junction the river as far as Lake Zaisan bears the name "Black Irtish"; after leaving the lake it flows for about 180 miles through steppe country as the "White" or "Slow Irtish", then for 60 miles with a stronger current as the "Rapid Irtish" through a hilly country. At the town of Ustkamenogorsk it enters the Great Siberian plain which sinks away towards the Arctic Sea and besides several smaller tributaries, it receives on the right the Om and Tara, on the left the Ishim and the Tobol and falls into the Ob below the village of Samarowsk. The whole length of the river is 2230 miles of which only 253 are in the Chinese Empire. The railway bridge at Omsk is 765 yards long; the greatest breadth of the river in its lower course is about 875 yards.

The name is mentioned as early as the Orkhon inscriptions of the viiith century A. D. (W. Radloff, Die altürkischen Inschriften der Mongolei, 2nd Ser. p. 19; written without vowels). Mas'ūdī in Kitāb al-Tanbih (ed. de Goeje, p. 62) speaks of the "Black" and the "White Irtish" and makes both fall into the Caspian Sea. The author of the Hudūd al-'Ālam (f. 10^b) thinks the Irtish a tributary of the Volga; the name is vocalised Artush (or Artush) in the ms. which is in keeping with the story based on a popular etymology (ār tūsh "Man, come down", given by Gardīzī (text in Barthold, Ōljet o po'endāte v. Sredn'uju, Aziju, p. 82). In spite of the trading route from Fārāb [q. v., ii. 53], mentioned by Gardīzī, to the Irtish, the country was little affected in the middle ages by Muslim culture. The river is only seldom mentioned, e. g. in the history of Timūr's campaigns, Zafarnāma, Ind. ed., i. 475 and 495 (Irtish). The Muslim town found by the Russian conquerors on the lower course of the river, with its main fort near the mouth of the Tobol, was probably founded in the Mongol period by colonists from the Volga region. Whether the stories heard by Radloff (Aus Sibirien, i. 146) of the sending of preachers of the Muslim faith from Bukhārā are based on facts, is doubtful. In any case, Islām only began to spread up the Irtish from the north under Russian rule (see BARABA, i. 65^{1b} sq.). All the towns and villages on the Irtish, as well as in its valley, only arose under Russian rule; down to the xviiith century there was no town farther south than Tara; Omsk and the towns south of it were only founded by Peter the Great.

The Irtish is navigable almost up to the rivers which form it. Between Tobolsk and Ustkamenogorsk there is regular steamship traffic. Sometimes the steamers go up as far as Zaisan and then up the Black Irtish to the Chinese frontier and even beyond it. Since the making of the Siberian railway, the Irtish is of still greater importance as a traffic route. (W. BARTHOLD.)

'ISĀ, the proper name of Jesus in the Qur'ān, and thence in Islām, is explained by some western scholars (Marracci, ii. 39; Landauer and Nöldeke, Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesells., xli. 720) as a form imposed upon Muḥammad by the Jews and used by him in good faith. They called Jesus Esau (עֵשָׂא) in hatred and said that the soul of Esau had been transferred to him. Others (J. Derenbourg, Rev. des Études juives, xviii. 126; Fränkel, Wien. Zeitschr., iv. 334; Vollers, Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesells., xlv. 352; Nestle, Dict. of Christ and the Gospels, i. 861) hold that the name originated naturally by phonetic change from the Syriac Yeshu' (ܝܫܘܥ) combined with imitation of Musā. For the Muslim explanation of the name see al-Baidāwī on Qur'ān iii. 40 (ed. Fleischer, i. 156, l. 2). Titles and descriptions applied to Jesus in the Qur'ān and of importance for his position in the theological system of Islām are: "Son of Maryam" (e. g. iii. 40; iv. 169; xix. 35, and often); he was born of Mary, a virgin, by the direct creative act of Allāh; — "a Word (kalima) from Allāh" and "his (Allāh's) Word" (iii. 40, iv. 169); this is the creative word "Be" (kun) which Allāh cast (alqā) into Mary; the creation of Jesus is thus compared (iii. 52) to that of Adam; — al-Masīh (iii. 40, iv. 169 and often), evidently from the Hebrew māshīah, but how understood by Muḥammad is quite uncertain; for Muslim explanations see al-Baidāwī, i. 156, ll. 2 sqq., — "a Spirit from Allāh" (iv. 169), so the angels are called spirits and he was a spirit directly from Allāh, so, too, Allāh formed Adam and breathed into him of his spirit (min rūhī, xv. 29; xxxviii. 72); later Islām called him al-Rūh (Lisān, iii. 290, l. 15) and even Rūh Allāh (al-Kashshāf of al-Zamakhsarī, ed. Lees, i. 338); — 'Abd Allāh (xix. 31); "he is nought but an 'abd" (xliii. 59); "he will never disdain to be an 'abd of Allāh" (iv. 170); 'abd, literally "slave", is best rendered theologically by our "creature"; man, for Islām, is the property of Allāh and not simply his servant, cf. 'ēbhedh in the O. T. and δοῦλος in the N. T. and especially of Jesus in Philipians, ii. 7; — "One of those brought near" (to Allāh, min al-mukarrabin, iii. 40); again the angelic association; later Islām sometimes explains this of his state after his ascension (su'ūd, raf'), when he was a semi-angel flying round the throne ('arsh) of Allāh (insī malakī, Kiṣāṣ of al-Tha'labī, ed. Cairo 1314, p. 227); but Muḥammad in his Mī'rādī found him in the second heaven (Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī, v. 53, ed. Cairo, 1315); — Wadīh, "worthy of regard in this world and in that to come", (iii. 40); al-Baidāwī explains, "as prophet in the one and as interceder in the other"; — Mubārak, "blessed wherever I am" (xix. 32); but al-Baidāwī explains the word here and elsewhere as "possessing much profit for others", apparently possessing a baraka; — Qawl al-ḥakk, "the sure saying" in xix. 35 is obscure and may be not a title but apply to the statement made — see al-Baidāwī, i. 580, l. 25. He is a nabī, "prophet" (xix. 31) and rasūl, "messenger" (iv. 156, 169; v. 79), and he has a "book" (kitāb, xix. 31), which is the Indjil (v. 50; lvii. 27). The sending of him is a "sign" (āya) and "mercy" (rahma, xix. 21); he, and his mother are a "sign" (xxiii. 52); he is made an "example", "parable" (mathal, xliii. 57, 59). He brought "proofs" (bayyināt) and "wisdom" (ḥikma, xliii. 63; v. 109), and was aided by Allāh with the rūh al-kudus (ii. 81; v. 109), obscure like all mentions of rūh in the Kur'an but explained by later Islām as Djibril; so al-Baid. (in loco) and Lisān, iii. 290, l. 15. Allāh taught him (iii. 43; v. 110) and he possessed peculiar miraculous powers of raising the dead, healing the sick and making clay birds and, by the permission of Allāh, breathing life into them (iii. 44 sqq.; v. 110 sqq.).

On the death of Jesus the statements of the Kur'an are contradictory. It is certain that Muḥammad rejected the Crucifixion and accepted the Ascension, apparently in the birth-body and not in a glorified body; the crucifixion was prevented by a change of resemblance (shubbiha lahu, iv. 156), again an obscure phrase explained later by the commentators that his likeness was put upon another and the other crucified in his place. But his death is referred to: — "before his death" (iv. 157); "on the day I die and on the day I am raised, alive" (xix. 34), yet this verse may have been a mistaken repetition of verse 15. In iii. 48 Allāh says to him, "I am about to take thee to myself (mutawaffika) and lift thee up (rāf'uka) unto me". The first expression is commonly used of a blessed death, but that is not necessarily its meaning here, for it is also used in the Kur'an (vi. 60) of Allāh's taking to himself the souls of sleepers during sleep, to be returned when they awake; cf. Fränkel in Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesell., lvi. 77. For his Second Coming the only Kur'anic authority is xliii. 61, a very obscure verse, the reading even of which is in doubt. Some read, "And he is verily a knowledge (la'il-mun) of the Hour", i. e. by (the descent of) whom the approach of the Hour is known. But others read, "a sign (la'alamun) of the Hour" and even, "a reminder (ladhikrun)". Others, again, refer the pronoun to the Kur'an, "it is". His second coming being taken as established, his death is put after it and the references in iv. 157 and xix. 34 are thus explained; as also the descriptive kahlan in iii. 41, because he was taken up by Allāh as a "youth" (shābb) before he attained kubūla, "middle age" (cf. al-Baid. on these passages). The later doctrine of his return is given soberly by al-Baid. on xliii. 61: that he will descend in the Holy Land at a place called Afik with a spear in his hand; that he will kill with it al-Dadīdjāl and come to Jerusalem at the time of the ṣalāt of the morning (ṣubḥ); that the imām will seek to yield place to him but that he will refuse and will worship behind him according to the shar'ia of Muḥammad; thereafter he will kill the swine and break the cross and lay in ruins the synagogues and churches and kill all Christians (Naṣārā) who do not believe in him (ed. Fleischer, ii. 241). To this last point reference is supposed to be made in iv. 157, "there is none of the People of Scripture but will verily believe in him (or: in it) before his death". One of the explanations of this in al-Baid. (i. 241, l. 4) is that after he has killed the false Messiah (al-masīḥ al-dadīdjāl) not one of the People of Scripture will be left who does not believe in him, so that the community (millā) will become one, the community of Islām. Then will come universal security of man and beast and Jesus will remain for forty years; thereafter he will die and the Muslims will hold funeral service for him and bury him [at Medina, it is universally accepted, beside Muḥammad, in a vacant space between Abū Bakr and 'Umar]. But others interpret, "before he — the believer — dies", even though it is thus a useless belief, he being at the point of death.

So little can be gathered from the Kur'an. The oldest traditions have but little more, as in the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī where 'Isā is merely mentioned in connection with Dadīdjāl in Kitāb al-Fitan, Part ix. 60, ed. Cairo 1315. Muḥammad had been interested in the idea of Anti-Christ as the story of Ibn Saīyād shows (Macdonald, Religious Attitude in Islam, p. 34 sqq.), but the early Muslims, for political and theological reasons, developed elaborately in forged traditions the doctrine of the Last Things, and especially of the Mahdī and Jesus. Thus the Maṣābiḥ has much more, see ed. Cairo, 1316, ii. 136 sqq., 140 sq. (chaps. on Signs of the Hour and on the Descent of 'Isā). See, too, al-Tha'labī, Kiṣaṣ, p. 22 sqq.; the full account of 'Isā, the most complete of all, covers pp. 215—229; Tabarī, ed. Leiden, i. 713 sqq., and Ibn Wāḍih, Historiae, ed. Houtsma, i. 74 sq., give extracts from the Gospels. But in this development the rôles assigned to Jesus and to the Mahdī came to be confusingly alike, and one party tried to cut the knot with a tradition from Muḥammad. "There is no Mahdī save 'Isā b. Maryam". For this and also for their respective rôles when they were distinguished, see al-Sha'rānī, Muḥṭaṣar of the Tadhkira of al-Kurtubī, p. 118 sqq. (ed. Cairo 1324). Ibn Khaldūn in his Mukaddima (ed. Quatremère, ii. 142—176 = De Slane's transl., ii. 158—205) gives a philosophical examination of the whole subject, showing the untrustworthiness of the different traditions and tracing the development of the idea of a restorer of Islām before the end, as it was influenced by Shī'ites of different degrees, by Fāṭimites and by Sūfis. An explanation given by him of the tradition quoted above is: "None has spoken in the cradle (mahd, cf. Kur. xix. 30) save 'Isā" (ed. Quatremère, ii. 163); for another see al-Kurtubī, p. 118. On the whole subject Goldziher in his Vorlesungen, p. 230 sqq. and notes thereon, has a few luminous pages. See the same, p. 313 sq., for the modern Aḥmadiya sect in India which teaches that Jesus escaped from Jerusalem, wandered to the East, settled at Srinagar in Kashmir and died there, where his tomb is still shown. Ghulam Aḥmad, the founder of the sect, professed to be both Jesus returned and also the Mahdī. Finally, Goldziher has well remarked that for Sunni Islām, as opposed to Shī'ism and other outlying sects, the expectation of a future restorer of faith and life has never become fixed as a dogma but is only the mythological embellishment of an ideal representation of the future. This may well be due to lack of Kur'anic basis.

From the above it is evident that Muḥammad had learned a definite story of Jesus from some heretical Christian teacher, in defense of whose position he polemizes vigorously in the Kur'an. He knows more, of sorts, about him than about any other of the religious figures of the past. But it is evident, too, that he omits something. For the appearance on earth of this unique figure, a second Adam, a semi-angel, a Logos much like that of Philo but with a difference, we are given no reason. It is not explained how he is a "sign", a "mercy", and an "example" or "parable" (xix. 21; xxiii. 52; xliii. 57, 59). At his birth he — as had been the case with his mother — was guarded from the touch of Satan, who seeks by touching every newly born infant to implant a tendency to sin (iii. 31 and al-Baid., in loco). Some even say that he and his mother, in consequence of this, never committed sin (Kiṣaṣ, p. 210). But it should be noticed that the same is said, even more absolutely, of John the Baptist because he it called ḥaṣūr, "chaste" in Qur'an iii. 34; cf. al-Baid. and Kiṣaṣ, p. 211 sqq. But all the Qur'an has is that Mary's mother exclaimed (iii. 31), "Verily, I put her and her seed in thy (Allāh's) care from the stoned Shaitān". How much or how little of the later view was in the mind of Muḥammad or was a legitimate development of his position it is impossible to say. He left something untold and classed Ṭsā with all the other prophets, although so essentially different. The story of the table with food sent down from heaven (v. 112 sqq.) which is to be to them a festival (ʿid) and a sign to all generations seems a genuine confusion on the part of Muḥammad himself in regard to the eucharist. It is significant that the commentators (al-Baid., i. 280) most commonly say that the food was a large fish, thus suggesting the ṭybbūc symbol.

Later Islam has pictured Ṭsā as separated from all human ties except to his mother, as constantly wandering, barefoot and without abiding place, passing the night in worship wherever he might be when the sun set, living from day to day for nothing but devotion and miracles of benevolence (Kiṣaṣ, p. 218). At the Judgment he will be the example of absolute poverty (Sukr, al-Ghazālī, Durra, p. 90 sqq.). At the mawḥif on that day men will ask him to intercede for them with Allāh and he will refuse, not for any sin of his own, as in the case of the other prophets, but because his followers have taken him and his mother as gods along with Allāh (Durra, p. 62 sqq.); cf. many other forms of this tradition in the Iḥyāʾ, ed. with comment. of Sayyid Murtadā, x. 489 sqq. Margoliouth has gathered a valuable catena of his sayings and doings from the Iḥyāʾ, in the Expository Times, vol. v., 1893-94, pp. 59, 107, 177, 503, 561.

ṬSĀ B. ʿALĪ [See ʿALĪ B. ṬSĀ.]

ṬSĀ B. MUḤANNĀ, SHARAF AL-DĪN, an Arab Amīr, who played an important part during the war between the Mamlūks and the Mongols in Syria. His genealogy in Ahu 'l-Fida' (Constant. 1286 A. H.), iv. 91, is Ṭsā h. Muḥannā b. Mānī b. Ḥadīṭha h. ʿAṣaba h. Faḍl. Salamīya and Sarmin were the seats of his family; he probably belonged to the Rabīʿa. His grandfather Mānī and other members of the family are several times mentioned in the history of Ḥalab by Kamāl al-Dīn (cf. Blochet, Histoire d'Alep, p. 168, 210, 213). Ṭsā fought on the side of Ḳuṭuz in the battle of ʿAin Djalūt [q. v.] in 658 (1260) and in the following period also was usually on the side of the Mamlūks, although there were frequent quarrels, as the Mamlūk sultāns on the one hand had little trust in the Amīrs and the latter like true Beduin chiefs troubled little about the government and, if occasion arose, did not hesitate to join the Mongols. Ṭsā was already on bad terms with Baibars [q. v.] and the feud became fiercer under Kalāʾūn as Ṭsā had taken the side of Sonḳor al-Ashḳar. In 679 (1280) the two even called in the help of Abākā [q. v.] and his Mongols but this unnatural alliance did not last long; soon afterwards Ṭsā had a reconciliation with Kalāʾūn and fought on his side in the battle of Hims in 680 (1281) against the Mongols. Ṭsā died soon afterwards and his son Muḥannā Ḥuṣām al-Dīn succeeded him. The latter continued his father's policy; in 692 (1293) treacherously arrested by Sultān Khālīl, he was released again and recognised as Amīr of the Arabs. He intervened with Sultān al-Nāṣir on behalf of Ḳara Sonḳor, which gained him the former's enmity, so that he joined the Mongol Ilkhān. After the treaty of peace between the Mongols and the Mamlūks in 723 (1323) Muḥannā returned to Syria. Muḥannā, who made the pilgrimage to Mecca in 697 (see Wüstenfeld, Chron. der Stadt Mecca, ii. 275), died in 735 (1334-35). Ibn Baṭṭūṭa (ed. Paris, i. 169 sqq.) gives a detailed account of him and (iii. 271 sqq.) gives interesting information on the fortunes of a member of the family who was at the court of the Sultān of Dīhlī, Muḥammad Shāh.

Muḥannā left several sons but they soon fell out with one another. Nevertheless, the amirate of the Arabs remained for over a century in the family of Ṭsā b. Muḥannā and the dynasty is said to have survived till 879 (1474). The authorities available, however, do not enable one to give in any detail the later vicissitudes of the family.

ṬSĀ B. MUṢĀ B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿALĪ B. ʿABD ALLĀH B. AL-ʿABBĀS, nephew of the two first ʿAbbāsīd Caliphs, al-Saffāh and al-Manṣūr. In the last year of his reign al-Saffāh had homage paid to his brother Abū Djaʿfar and after him to his nephew Ṭsā h. Muṣā as heirs-apparent. Ṭsā, who a few years previously had been appointed governor of Kūfa, retained this office after the accession of Abū Djaʿfar al-Manṣūr. When the ʿAlid Muḥammad h. ʿAbd Allāh rebelled in Medina in 145 (762), Ṭsā was sent with an army against him. On the advance of the Syrians, many of the people of Medina saved themselves by flight and in Ramaḍān of the same year (Dec. 762) Ṭsā stormed the city. Muḥammad fell in the battle and his head was sent to the Caliph. In the meanwhile his brother Ibrāhīm had raised the standard of revolt in Baṣra. The Caliph's troops were defeated and as the revolt was spreading more and more, al-Manṣūr feared that the easily influenced people of Kūfa might be involved in the revolution, so he went in person to the city. He succeeded in keeping the city under control while Ṭsā hurried with help from Medina. His advance guard under Ḥumaid b. Ḳaṭṭaba was defeated in Bāḳhamrā [q. v.] and a part of the main army also at first retired, but Ṭsā mastered the situation, Ibrāhīm's troops were put to flight and he himself was slain. By the victory of Bāḳhamrā on 25 Dhū l-Ḳaʿda 145 (Feb. 14, 763) al-Manṣūr's rule was secured. Nevertheless he treated Ṭsā slightly and wanted to exclude him from the succession. The Caliph had even said when he sent him against Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh: "I do not care which of the two kills the other", and in 147 (764—765) he had homage paid to his son Muḥammad al-Mahdī as successor and even deposed Ṭsā from his governorship, because he declined to abandon his rights. In the end Ṭsā had to give in and pay homage to al-Mahdī, on condition however that he was to follow the latter. After al-Manṣūr's death he wished to renew his claims as his consent had been extorted from him by threats; his attempts met with no success and in the reign of al-Mahdī he had again to renounce the succession in favour of Mūsā al-Hādī, son of al-Mahdī. He died in 167 (783—784).

ṬSĀ B. 'OMAR AL-ṬHAKAFĪ, Arab grammarian and reader of the Qur'ān, died 149 (766). He is regarded as one of the first representatives of the grammatical school of Baṣra and is said to have taught Sibawaihi [q. v.]. To the data collected about him by Flügel, Die grammatischen Schulen der Araber, p. 29 sqq. and after him by Brockelmann, Gesch. d. Arab. Litt., i. 99, may be added that Yāqūt, Irshād, ed. Margoliouth, vi. 100 sq. has an article on him.

ṬSĀ B. AL-SHAḪH B. AL-SALĪL AL-SHAIBĀNĪ was appointed governor of Ramla in 252 (866) and a few years later (256 = 870) gained possession of Damascus also. But when he embezzled the Syrian taxes, al-Mu'tamid sent Amadjūr as governor to Damascus, who put to flight Ṭsā's troops commanded by his son Manṣūr. Ṭsā himself retired to Armenia, where the governorship of this province was given him by the Caliph. On the part which he played here, see Thopdschian in Mitteil. des Seminars für Orient. Sprach., vii. 2, p. 119. In 266 (879) Ṭsā was in Āmid and with other Arab amīrs waged an unsuccessful war against Kundāḫik, governor of Mōṣul. Three years later, in 269 (882), he died. His son Aḥmad held his own in Diyār Bakr however, seized Māridīn (279 = 892) and Marāgha (280 = 893) and fought successfully with the Armenian Sempad I (cf. Thopdschian, op. cit., viii. 2, p. 173 sq.). He died in 285 (898). According to a statement by Ibn al-Mu'tazz (see his poem Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., xl. 756, and the editor's note, ibid., xli. 242 sq.), he had to hand over to the Caliph the treasures captured from Ibn Kundāḫik and found himself so hard pressed then in 281 (894) that he was on the verge of applying for assistance to the Christians. The Caliph after Aḥmad's death advanced against his son Muḥammad and besieged him in Āmid. In the end Muḥammad and his family were captured. The Shai-bānids, nevertheless, still played a part later in Diyār Bakr, and Ibn Baṭṭūṭa (ed. Paris, i. 163) found them still in South Armenia.

ISAĀK. [See ISHĀK.]

ISĀF, name of an idol at Mecca, which is almost always mentioned along with Nā'ila. Tradition relates that a man and a woman of the Djurhum were so called and were turned into stone as a punishment for indecent conduct in the temple. They were first of all placed as a warning on al-Ṣafā and al-Marwa, but were later idolatrously worshipped by order of 'Amr b. Lu-haiy. It is therefore a question of two sacred stones, but the origin of their names is so far unexplained. Attempts are given in Dozy, De Israëlieten te Mekka, p. 197.

ISĀGHUDJĪ, isagoge, from the Greek εἰσαγωγή, is an Arabic adaptation of the Introduction (al-Madkhal) to the categories of Aristotle composed by Porphyry of Tyre. According to Ṣāḫid al-Andalusī (Ṭabaqāt al-Ūmam, Beyrout 1912, p. 49), the Arabic translation was made directly from the Greek by Ibn al-Muḥkaffāc [q. v.] and, according to the Fihrist (i. 244), it was made from a Syriac version by Aiyūb b. al-Kāsim al-Raḫḫī. In any case, it is certain that Arabic versions of Porphyry's work were multiplied quite early, in commentaries, epitomes and adaptations. Of the latter we only possess the two following: 1. that of Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibrāhīm b. 'Omar al-Bīḳā'ī al-Shāfi'ī (cf. Brockelmann, Gesch. d. Arab. Litt., ii. 142—3, No. 14; with a commentary by al-Sanūsī, cf. op. cit. and Bibl. Nat. of Algiers, Cat., No. 1382 No. 1); 2. that of al-Abharī [q. v. and add Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, Cairo 1310, ii. 132], which is the best known and the most annotated. This little treatise on logic discusses very succinctly the following subjects: term, definition, proposition or judgment, opposition, inversion, syllogism, controversy, rhetoric, poetics, sophistry. The Isāghudjī of al-Abharī was put into radjaz verses by al-Akhḫārī [q. v.].

ṬSAWĪ. [See NASRĀNĪ.]

ṬSAWIYA, ṬSAWA (AISSAOUA), a collective name from the singular Ṭsawī (cf. Marçais, Textes Arabes de Tanger, p. 397 sq.): a name given to the khwān [q. v.] or members of the Moroccan religious brotherhood founded by Sidi Muḥammad b. Ṭsā and derived from this last name.

In spite of the fame of this brotherhood, the life of Muḥammad b. Ṭsā al-Fihri and his origin are little known. The ethnic al-Fihri suggests a Spanish Arab origin. He travelled a great deal in his youth and was initiated in the east into the ecstatic exercises of the religious orders of the ḍariya and the Sa'diya. Returning to the guhrib, he became a disciple of the Shaikh Abn toubbās Ahmad al-Hārithī, who was a pupil of ten jazūlī [q. v.]. On the death of his master, Muhammad b. 'Isā succeeded him at the head of his sāwiya of Miknāsa az-Zitūn (Mequines). He died here about 1524—1525 and was buried in the sāwiya beside one of his shaikhs, named Boghān al-Halabi, a native of the east. Muhammad b. 'Isā had greatly extended the organisation of his pupils. He formed them into an autonomous religious order administered by the shaikh or his khalīfa (lieutenant) with the assistance of a kind of council of 40 members. The latter live in seclusion in the sāwiya or mother-house of Mequines and only leave their retreat once a year, on the day of the festival of the mūlud or anniversary of the birth of the Prophet. This brotherhood follows the rule of the Shādhiliya Sūfis, adding the special ecstatic exercises for obtaining physical insensibility. This insensibility is obtained with the help of a dance accompanied by jerking movements backwards and forwards, the adepts holding one another's hands and forming a chain round a brazier. Once they become insensible, the 'Isāwiya devour living scorpions, pieces of glass, stick long needles into their bodies, beat themselves with the blades of swords, etc. At public festivals these ceremonies often end with a meal of a sacrificial and sacramental character when these highly wrought dervishes devour like madmen the raw flesh of an unskinned animal (sheep or goat) and tear and rend it in the most horrible and repugnant manner imaginable. According to the legend, God, at the prayer of Muhammad b. 'Isā, granted the disciples of this shaikh a complete immunity from wounds and disease. Accordingly these dervishes have the power of driving out illness, caused almost always by the djinn, by taking it upon themselves. This is why they are called to houses where there is illness or an epidemic and where they are begged to go through their usual exercises.

Since their appearance in the xvth century the 'Isāwiya, who at first spread through the Mequines and Fez regions, have enjoyed great influence on ignorant and fanatical populations. Muhammad b. 'Isā used his prestige to stir up the people to a holy war against the Portuguese and Spanish Christians. His successor, Abu 'l-Rawā'in, raised the people of Fez against the last Marinids in favour of the new dynasty of Sa'dī Sharīfs. Since that date the political activity of the 'Isāwiya has not been mentioned by historians; in any case they have not taken part in the various political revolutions — at least not as an organised brotherhood.

During the lifetime of Saiyidi Muhammad b. 'Isā one of his disciples, named Abu 'l-Hādīdjādī Yūsuf b. Ahū Mahdī 'Isā, founded a sāwiya of this brotherhood at Figuig (S. E. Morocco). From there the 'Isāwiya spread through the regencies of Algiers and Tunis. Their present field comprises primarily Morocco, where they are numerous, especially in the west. In Algeria they have their principal sāwiya's at Remsht (in Oran); in the Dwar of Uzara (province of Algiers) there is a sāwiya founded by a grandson of the founder of the order; they have also sāwiya's of less importance almost everywhere, notably at Constantine, Bona, etc. In Tunisia they are found especially at al-Kef, at Tunis, Bizerta, Susa, Sfax, Gahes and the island of Djerha. They are not widely disseminated in Tripolitania and are almost unknown in Egypt. Like all the great Moroccan religious orders they have a sāwiya at Mecca.

(A. COUR.)

ISBA' (A.) "finger", the inch, an Arab measure of length, as in Europe the twelfth part of the foot (ḥadam), $\frac{1}{12}$ of the ell (dhira'). The inch belongs to the earliest of the Arab measures of length and was marked, probably from the earliest period, on the Nilometer of the island of al-Rawḍa built in 96 A. H. [see MIḤYĀS]. Its length there is 2.2925 cm. = 1 inch (the ell is 54.07 cm. = 21.8 inches). Being a derived measure the inch is not an invariable magnitude, for example to-day in Cairo the inch of the dhira' muhandasa = 3.195 cm. = 1.25 inches, of the dhira' istanbuli = 2.82 cm. = 1.1 inch, of the dhira' hindāwa = 2.658 cm. = 1.05 inch, and the dhira' baladī or maṣrī = 2.404 cm. = .95 inch. In Turkey the most usual is the dhira' ḥalabī of 68.58 cm. which gives an inch of 2.857 cm. = 1.15 inch. It should be noted however that the name iṣba' has long become obsolete in everyday life and the ell in the east is very commonly divided into quarters (rub') and twenty-fourths (kīrāf), wherever the metric system has not completely driven out the native system.

ISFAHĀN, ʿAsradāva, Ptolemy, vi. 4; Firdawsi: Sipāhān; in Arabic Isfahān, an important town in Persia, formerly the capital under the Sāfawids, now the chief town of the province of 'Irāk 'Adjami. Its name means "the armies" (Hamza al-Iṣbahānī) and has been referred by a popular etymology and in derision to asbāh, which in the local dialect means "dog" (Median σπάνα, Herod. i. 110). It was formerly composed of two adjacent towns, Djayy, on the site later occupied by the shahristān, the "city properly so called", and Yahūdiya, "the Ghetto", a Jewish colony established there, it is said, by Nebuchadnezzar (Schreiner, Revue des Etudes Juives, xii. 259; Ibn al-Fakīh, p. 261, 20) or under Yazdigird I at the request of his Jewish wife Shōshan-dukht (E. Blochet, Liste des Villes, § 54 in Recueil des Travaux, xvii., 1895; J. Marquart, Erānsahr, p. 29). Ancient legends, which are transmitted by Ibn Rosta, attribute the building of the citadel to Kay-Kāūs [q. v.] and it was later rebuilt by Bahman, son of Isfandiyād. There are two versions of the story of the capture of Isfahān by the Muslims. According to the historical school of Kūfa, the capture took place in 19 (640); by order of the Caliph 'Omar, 'Abd Allāh b. 'Iṭbān marched on Djayy, which was commanded by one of the four pādshāpān of the Persian empire (= governors, Nöldeke, Gesch. d. Perser u. Araber, etc., p. 151, nō. 2, cf. A. Christensen, L'empire des Sassanides, p. 87), who, after several battles, capitulated on condition that the djizya was replaced by an annual tribute. Ṭabarī (ed. Leyden, i. 2637 sqq.) gives the date as 21 A.H. The Baṣra school says that in 23 (644) Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī [q. v.], after Nehāwand, took Isfahān or that his lieutenant 'Abd Allāh b. Buda'il received the capitulation of the town on the usual conditions of the establishment of kharāj and djizya (al-Balādhuri, p. 312): on these varying versions see Caetani, Annali, v., yr. 23, § 4—25. It was taken again, after a rebellion, in the Caliphate of al-Mu'tazz, during Mūsā b. Boghā's campaign against the 'Alids of Ṭabaristān (247 = 861). Its population was decimated and its notables deported (al-Balādhuri, p. 314). It was henceforth an important town, the capital of a large province and a centre of industry and commerce. Ibn Rosta, who lived there and wrote his book probably about 290 (903), enumerates its four gates and 100 towers; the geometrician Ibn Loddā measured its diameter (it was round in plan) and found it to be 6,000 cubits or half a parasang. The Būyid Rukn al-Dawla increased the town and repaired its walls, which were still standing in the vth (xith) century. There was a building there like a fortress, which bore the same name as the citadel of Hamadhān, Sārūk (Sārūye, Fihrist, p. 240, 16, 27, 241, 14; Hamza, p. 197; Ibn al-Fakīh, p. 219, 241, 244). Silver mines were found in the neighbourhood, the exploitation of which had been abandoned since the Muslim conquest, and mines of copper, antimony, zinc, etc. The distribution of the water from the Zinda-rūd for irrigation purposes and the name Zarrin-rūd, river of gold (cf. Flandin, Voyage, ii. 336), adopted by Ibn Rosta, were attributed to Ardashīr, son of Bābak. To the present day the cultivation of the poppy, cotton, and tobacco constitutes the wealth of the country.

Passing under the rule of the Sāmānids after 301 (913), it was taken by Mardāwīdj b. Ziyār in 316 (928) and taken from the Būyids by Maḥmūd of Ghazni shortly before his death in 421 (1030). It was the favourite residence of the Saljūq Malik Shāh. The Ismā'īlīs made numerous converts there at the beginning of the viith (xiith) century. During the Mongol invasion a battle fought under its walls by the Sultān of Khwārizm, Djalāl al-Mangobirti, although indecisive, saved the town (625 = 1228); it nevertheless became part of the Mongol Empire. Muḥammad b. Muẓaffar took it from Abū Ishāk Indjū in 757 (1356). When occupied by Timūr, the inhabitants rebelled and were massacred (pyramids of 70,000 heads, 790 = 1388). It was taken by the Ottoman Sultān Sulaimān during the rebellion of prince Ilkās-Mirzā (955-1548). After the battle of Gulūnābād (1134 = 1721) the Afghān Maḥmūd besieged Isfahān and it suffered terribly from famine and capitulated, which resulted in the abdication of Shāh Husain. Its population was massacred for a fortnight after the victorious rising in Qazwin (1136 = 1723); it was liberated by Ṭahmāsp Kūli Khān (Nādir Shāh) in 1141 (1729).

Choosing Isfahān for his capital, Shāh 'Abbās I [q. v., i. 7^b sq.] made it a large and beautiful town, with a large population (at least 600,000 in the xviiith century), whence the Persian proverb Isfahān nisf-i dīhān "Isfahān is half the world". It lies along the Zinda-rūd (now called Zāyindarūd), which is crossed by three fine bridges, one in the centre of the town, Pul-i Djulfa or Pul-i Allāhwerdi Khān, because it leads to the suburb of Djulfa [q. v.] and was built by the general of 'Abbās I, now called Pul-i sf o sih Čashma (bridge of the 33 arches), the two others at the two extremities of the town, the lower, the bridge of Bābā Rukn, which led to the cemetery in which the mausoleum of this dervish stood, now called Pul-i Ḥasanābād; the bridge of Pul-i Mārūn (Marnon in Chardin, i. e. Mārū, the name of a district) also called the bridge of Shahristān, higher up the river. A fourth bridge called Pul-i Cūbi ("wooden bridge") connected the two parts of the palace of Sa'adatābād.

The town was surrounded by a wall of earth, badly kept and encroached on by houses and gardens. This wall had eight gates, — formerly twelve —, but four were built up (see their names in [Dupré] Voyage en Perse, 1819, ii. 158). Isfahān was divided into two parts, Djawbara and Dardasht, which were inhabited by the hostile factions of Ni'mat Allāhī and the Haidari. The Maidān-i Shāh, "Royal Square", is a long rectangle enclosed by a canal built of bricks coated with a kind of plaster called āhak-i siyāh, "black mortar"; behind it along its margin are ranged the houses which separate the square from the bazaar which surrounds it outside, as well as large buildings like the gateway of the royal palace, the mosque of the Šadr, the clockwork pavilion, the royal mosque in the south and the imperial market on the north. The centre of the square was marked by a tall pole used for target shooting and two great columns of marble used as goals for the game of polo (čawgān). The Royal Mosque (Masjid-i Shāh), which is still in existence, completely covered with enamelled bricks, was built by Shāh 'Abbās I at the end of the xvith century; it is one of the most beautiful buildings in the world. Shāh Šafi I covered its gates with silver. The mosque of the Šadr, also called the mosque of Faṭḥ Allāh, is much smaller. The pavilion of the clock was built for the amusement of 'Abbās II; it was a clock which struck with musical chimes at each hour of the day; a clockwork arrangement caused large marionettes fastened to painted figures to move along the wall, as well as birds and other animals in painted wood. The imperial market (kaisariya) was, like the other buildings in this square, entered by a gateway covered with bricks of faïence; the centre was surmounted by a dome. The finest stuffs were sold there. The royal palace also had an entrance on this square through a large gateway (ālū kapy, the many coloured gateway), always open, day and night, used as a place of refuge (bast). In the centre of the garden was the pavilion called the Pavilion of the Forty Pillars (chihil sutun), although there are only eighteen of them; it consists of a hall and two rooms covering the royal throne; its walls were covered with paintings.

The Kārwan-sarāi of al-Khurasāni and that of Maḥsūd 'Aṣṣār (the presser of oil), the palace of the Ṣadr marwūfāt, "superintendent of religious endowments", built by Rustam Khān, the Kārwan-sarāi Ḥalālī built by order of 'Abbās II, the tower of Khwādja 'Alam, usually called Gulbar, "laden with flowers", the Tower of the Horns, covered from top to bottom with heads of wild beasts with their horns, a memorial of great hunts, the citadel called Tabarak (Chardin, Kal'a-i Tabarruk, "Castle of the Benediction") were the most beautiful monuments adorning the capital. The garden of Hazār Djarīb was formed of twelve terraces and fifteen avenues of trees, of which some were watered by a canal; pavilions and fountains completed the decorations.

The misfortunes of Persia during the Afghān conquest and the removal of the capital to Ṭeherān under the Kādjārs ruined Isfahān. The Avenue of the Čahār Bagh still exists, as well as the Madrasa-i Mādar-i Shāh, the "college of the king's mother", but many of the beautiful plane trees which adorned it were cut down and taken to Ṭeherān for the building of the palace of Zill al-Sultān. The three bridges are in a good state of preservation. One can still see the Madrasa of Sultān Ḥusain, which dates from a little before the Afghān invasion, the palace of Hesht Bihišt, which belonged to Šarīm al-Dawla, Zill al-Sultān's minister, and in the village of Gulādun, in the environs of Djulfa, the two Mināra-i Djunbān, "moving minarets" (explanation of the phenomenon in Mme Dieulafoy, La Perse, p. 278). The Maidan-i Shāh has preserved its fairy-like, aspect; in the evening and morning the royal musicians (tambourines and trumpets) still play in the naḳkāra khāna opposite.

The poet Khākāni (vi = xiith century) devoted a long ode of 81 verses to the praises of Isfahān (Kulliyāt, ii. 512).

AL-ISFAHĀNĪ, ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. DĀ'UD B. 'ALĪ. Born in 255 (868), this fakih succeeded his father at the age of 16 as head of the Zāhiri school (cf. DĀ'UD B. KHALAF); he died in Baghdād in 297 (909). His juridical polemics against Ibn Suraidj, al-Nāshī al-Akbar, al-Ḥallādj and al-Ṭabari are recorded, but what has made his memory endure is a work of his youth, the Kitāb al-Zuhra (ms. Cairo, Fihrr., iv. 260), containing in 50 chapters 5000 verses selected from the poets on "the aspects of love, its laws and variations" accompanied by personal notes in very elegant prose. He there expounds the Platonic conception of amour courtois (ḥubb 'udhri) with a grace which has never been surpassed. The friendship which linked him till his death to Muḥammad b. Djāmi' al-Ṣaidalāni, to whom this book is dedicated, has become famous (cf. Ibn Faḍl Allāh al-'Umari, Masālik al-Absār, Vol. fuḳahā', Ch. v., s. v.; Brockelmann, Gesch. d. arab. Litt., i. 520). (L. MASSIGNON.)

AL-ISFAHĀNĪ. [See ABU 'L-FARĀDJ.] ISFARĀYĪN, formerly a small fortified town in the N. E. Khōrāsān, south of the Atrek, in the province of Naisābūr, five relays distant from this town. Its name, which is still given to the plain in which it was situated, is derived by popular etymology from ispar-āyīn "shield-like" on account of the custom of the inhabitants of carrying shields, but it used to be called Mihradjān, a name which since the time of Yāqūt has been given to a village in the vicinity. The citadel which defended it was called Qal'a-i Zar "fortress of gold"; in the great mosque, there was a vessel of brass 12 cubits (gaz) in circumference. The district produced excellent grapes; there were many rice fields there. The inhabitants were Shaf'is and have produced a certain number of jurists. Sacked by the Mongols in 617 (1220) it was destroyed in the Uzbek invasion a little before 1006 (1597). Its site is now represented by the ruins of Shahr-i Bilkis.

ISFENDIYĀR OĖHLU, the name of a Turkoman dynasty, which founded the independent kingdom of Ḳastamūni on the decline of the Saldjūk kingdom of Kōniya, at the end of the viith (xiiith) century in N.W. Asia Minor, in the ancient Paphlagonia. The name is taken from that of the best known ruler of this dynasty, Isfendiyār Bey; in the xvith century we find the name Kizil Aḥmedlu, from Kizil Aḥmed, the brother of Ismā'il Bey. The Byzantines called the Isfendiyār OĖhlu "the sons of Amurias" or of Omur. The founder of the dynasty appears to have been Shams al-Dīn b. Yaman Djāndār, who held a grant of the district of Aflāni; he went to war with Mas'ūd II (681—697 A. H.), captured the town of Ḳastamūn and in 690 A. H. (Münedjimbāshi) was appointed governor of the districts seized by him by the Il-khān prince Kaikhātu. He seems to be identical with Sonkor Bey Shemsî Pasha, who conquered Boli according to Ewliyā, ii. 173. His son, Shudjā' al-Din Sulaimān Pasha (700—740 A. H.), at first acknowledged the suzerainty of the Ilkhāns, but afterwards made himself independent and conquered Sinope, which was still in possession of a daughter of Mas'ud II. He is mentioned in Ibn Battūta (ii. 343 sqq.), Shihāb al-Dīn (Not. et Extr., xiii. 340 and 361 sq.) and Abu 'l-Fidā' (Géographie, ed. Reinaud, ii. 1, p. 35; 2, p. 142, 145); Pachymeres, ii. 345 sqq. and 456 sq., knows him by the name Σολυμάνης. His successors were: his son Ibrāhīm Pasha; 'Adil Bey, son of the Emīr Ya'qub and grandson of Shams al-Dīn (about 746 A. H.); Djālāl al-Dīn Bāyazīd, son of 'Adil Bey, called Kötörüm by the Ottomans, died 787 A. H.; Sulaimān Bey, son of Bāyazīd, from 787—795 A. H.; Sultān Bāyazīd I killed him and seized the land (according to Rev. Hist., p. 389; the Ottoman chronicles make no mention of Sulaimān Bey and make Bāyazīd Kötörüm reign till 795 A. H.). Mubārīz al-Dīn Isfendiyār, son of Bāyazīd, was restored by Timūr in 805 A. H. He died on Ramaḍān 22 843 A. H. About 820 A. H. he had to cede the towns of Tosia, K'angri and Kal'edjik and the district of Djānik to Meḥammed I and later the rich copper mines to Murād II; Ibrāhīm, son of Isfendiyār, 843—847 A. H.; Ismā'il, son of Ibrāhīm; was deposed by Sultān Meḥammed II at the instigation of his brother Kizil Ahmed in 864 or 865 A. H. and died in Philippolis, which was allotted to him as a residence by the Sultān. He was the author of a widely circulated book, Hulawiyāt-i Sultānī, on the ritual prescripts of Islām. His brother Kizil Ahmed fled to Uzun Hasan after the confiscation of Kastamūni, returned to Constantinople after the death of Meḥammed II, and was honourably received by Bāyazīd II; his son Mirzā Meḥammed married a daughter of the Sultān and his grandsons Shemsî and Muṣṭafā Pasha filled high offices under Selim II and Murād III; Shemsî Pasha in particular had great personal influence as the confidant (muṣāḥib) of Murād III. He fabricated a genealogy of the "Kizil Ahmedlu Isfendiyār-Oghlu" which went back to Khālīd b. al-Walīd, and invented the name Kizil Ahmedlu for the dynasty of Isfendiyār-Oghlu. Descendants of this family still exist and, when at the beginning of the xviith century it was feared that the Ottoman ruling house might become extinct, the Kizil Ahmedlu were considered amongst others as possible claimants to the throne on account of their frequent marriages with relatives of the Sultāns.

ISFİD DIZ. [See KAL'AT SEFİD.]

ISHAK, the Biblical Isaac, whose birth, according to the Talmud (Rōsh hash-shānā, p. 11), took place at the feast of Passah and, according to Muslim tradition, in the night of 'Ashūrā (al-Tha'labī, p. 60 and al-Kisā'i, p. 150), was promised to his father Ibrāhīm a year previously by Allāh (also in Gen. R. 45). Ibrāhīm was in the habit of eating only when the poor and hungry shared his meals. On one occasion fifteen (al-Tha'labī, p. 48) or three (al-Kisā'i, p. 146) days happened to pass without a guest appearing. Three strangers then appeared before whom he set a roasted calf. But they did not touch it (Kur'an, xi. 73). They said "We eat nothing without paying its price". He said "The price is that you should utter a blessing before and after the meal" (al-Tha'labī, l. c.; Gen. R. 54). They then foretold to him the birth of a son. Sāra laughed at this, as she was 90 and Ibrāhīm 120 years old. The latter said: "Then he shall be sacrificed as an offering to God!" (These features probably have their origin in the accounts in the Midrash [Gen. R. 55; Tanchuma Gen. 40]). When seven years old, Ishāk visited the sacred place. Ibrāhīm then received in a dream the order to make a sacrifice to God. In the morning he sacrificed a bullock and divided its flesh among the poor. In the night the voice again said to him: "God demands a more valuable offering". He killed a camel. In the following night the voice said: "God demands thy son as an offering". Ibrāhīm awoke in horror and said: "O my son, I saw in a dream that I must sacrifice thee" (Kur'an, xxxvii. 101). The latter replied: "Father, do what was ordered thee. Thou wilt find me a patient person, if God will" (102). Taking a knife and a rope they went together to the mount. Ishāk said: "Father, take my shirt from my hody, lest my dear mother find blood upon it and weep for me. Bind me firmly, so that I do not move, and look away while sacrificing me, lest thou lose thy courage" (al-Kisā'i and al-Tha'labī, l. c., following Gen. R. 56; cf. also Sefer hayyāshār, Wayyērā and Pirke de R. El. 31). "May God comfort thee for my loss! Give my mother my shirt that it may comfort her and do not tell her how thou didst sacrifice me. Never look at hoys of my age, lest grief overwhelm thee!" Ibrāhīm directed the knife against the throat of his son but three times it slipped and glanced aside. Then a voice called to him: "Ibrāhīm, Thou hast satisfied the vision" (Kur'an xxxvii. 105). Then a ram appeared, which said it had been the offering of Hābil and had hitherto been in Paradise; it was offered as a sacrifice (Aboth V; Pirke de R. El. 32, and al-Kisā'i). When a rumour arose that Ishāk was a founding adopted by Ibrāhīm, God gave father and son the same figure so that they were very like one another. But Ibrāhīm was grey (Baba M. 87; Gen. R. 53; al-Kisā'i, p. 152).

As the Kur'an verse above quoted does not state, which son was to have been sacrificed, many Muslim theologians refer the intended sacrifice to Ismā'il (al-Zamakhsharī and al-Baidāwī on the passage; al-Taharī, i. 291; Ibn al-Athīr, i. 88; al-Tha'labī, p. 55—56; al-Kisā'i, p. 150). But it may be said that the oldest tradition — al-Tha'labī expressly emphasises the "Ashāb and Tābi'un", i. e. the Companions of the Prophet and their successors from 'Omar h. al-Khattāb to Ka'b al-Aḥbār — did not differ from the Bible on this question.

ISHĀK B. HUNAIN B. ISHĀK AL-'IBĀDĪ, ABŪ YA'KŪB, the son of Hunain b. Ishāk [q. v.], a physician and philosopher, but more important as the translator of Greek, mainly philosophical and mathematical works into Arabic. He was in great favour with the caliphs al-Mu'tamid and al-Mu'tadid, and the vizier of the latter, Kāsim b. 'Ubadī Allāh. He died in Rabi' II 298 or 299 (Nov. 910 or 911) in Baghdād. Of his most important translations we may mention the Elements of Euclid, afterwards improved by Thābit b. Qurra, his Data, the Almagest of Ptolemy, also improved by Thābit, Archimedes' books On the sphere and cylinder, Menelaus' Sphaerica, Plato's dialogue Sophistes with the commentary of Olympiodorus, the Categories of Aristotle, his Topica, Hermeneutica and Rhetorica, de Coelo et Mundo, de Generatione et Corruptione, a part of the Metaphysics. Of these translations the following has been edited: — Aristotelis Categoriae cum versione arabica Isaaci Honeini et variis lectionibus textus graeci e versione arab. ductis a J. Th. Zenker, Lipsiae 1846. — Into the question, which of these translations were made from the Syriac and which direct from the Greek, we cannot enter here, but refer the reader to the Bibliography. In the case of several of these translations there are still doubts as to whether they are by Ishāk or his father Hunain.

ISHĀN, Persian pronoun 3rd pers. plur. The word is used in Turkestan in the meaning of shaikh, murshid, ustād, pir, teacher, guide [see DERWISH i. 950^a], in contrast to murīd, adherent, pupil. When the term first appears has still to be investigated; it certainly existed in the middle ages; the celebrated Khodja Ahrār (died 895 = 1490 in Samarkand) is always called ishān in his biography. The rank of ishān is frequently transmitted from father to son. The ishān lives with his followers in a dervish monastery (khānqāh, in Central Asia pronounced khānaka), sometimes also at the tomb of a saint. Most ishān's make journeys from time to time into the steppes, where they have more adherents among the Kirgiz and receive richer presents than from the settled population. Greater attention was attracted to the ishān's by a rebellion stirred up by an ishān in Farghāna in 1898; but the literature on the subject is still extremely scanty. Cf. J. Geijer, Materiali k izučeniū bitovich čert musul'manskogo naselenija Turkestanskogo kraja. AL-ISHRĀKIYŪN (scil. al-Hukamā') i. e. the adherents of the Hikmat al-Ishrāk or mushrikīya (read by many, e. g. Pococke, Munk, Renan, as mashrakīya = eastern). The name is given especially to the disciples of al-Suhrawardī (died 1191) but the name and the matter are older. On the name cf. HIKMA; it is really a question of the syncretic philosophy of Hellenism, which reached the east from Neo-Platonic, Hermetic and allied sources and was there amalgamated with old Persian and other speculations. It is a spiritualistic philosophy with a mystical theory of knowledge. God and the world of spirits are usually interpreted as light and our process of cognition as an illumination from above through the intermediary of the spirits of the spheres. The following are regarded as particular authorities for this doctrine: Hermes, Agathodaemon, Empedocles, Pythagoras, etc., and Plato more than Aristotle (at least the genuine one). These authorities are often described as prophets or inspired sages. From the beginning to the present day, this philosophy of revelation has influenced Muslim philosophy to a great extent. The so-called Peripatetics in Islām are in part under its influence, Ibn Rushd perhaps least of all.

AL-ISKĀFĪ, ABŪ ISHĀK MUHAMMAD B. AHMAD [or IBRĀHĪM] AL-KARĀRĪTĪ, al-Muttakī's vizier. In 323 (934—935) he is mentioned as secretary to Muḥammad b. Yāqūt, chief of police in Baghdād, and in Shawwāl 329 (June—July 941) the Caliph gave him the office of vizier, but after only six weeks, in Dhu 'l-Kā'da (July—Aug.) of the same year, the Amīr al-Ūmarā' Kūrtekin dismissed him. Some time after Kūrtekin's fall he received his rank again but could only hold it for 40 days. In Shawwāl 330 (June—July 942) he was again given the same office and after he had held it for 8 months 16 days, the Ḥamdānīd Nāṣir al-Dawla [q. v.] dismissed him.

AL-ISKANDAR, ALEXANDER THE GREAT (the Arab authors usually see the Arabic article in the first two letters of the name). In the Muhammadan accounts of the world-conqueror there are here and there echoes of genuine historical tradition but as a rule we have to deal with legendary tales, which originate in the romance of Alexander (see the article ISKANDAR-NĀMA below) and were considerably extended and embellished by later writers. We confine ourselves here to giving in its broad outlines what the older Arab historians relate on the subject. In the first place it should be noted that Alexander's genealogy is artificially made up in various ways as may be seen from Friedländer's Die Chahirlegende und der Alexanderroman, p. 294 sqq. As a rule, however, the name of his father Philip is correctly given, frequently in the form Filekūs, Failakūs or otherwise corrupted, as well as that of his mother Olympias (also almost always in a corrupt form); some authorities even give the name of his grandfather Āminta or Āmintās. Even in the earliest historians however we find also the view, which owes its origin to Persian national pride, that Alexander was not the son of Philip, but of Dārāb (Dārā al-Akbar) so that he was the half-brother of Dārā (Dārā al-Aṣḡhar), the last Persian king. It is said that, when Philip was conquered by Dārāb and had to pay a yearly tribute in golden eggs, his daughter, who is given the name of Halai (otherwise in Firdawsī) to get a fantastic etymology for the name Alexander, was married by Dārāb but on account of her repulsive odour was at once repudiated by him and sent back to her father. They endeavoured in vain to cure her defect by a medicine called sandarūs; when the princess bore a son, he was called Alexandros after the name of his mother and that of the medicine. The boy was brought up at the court of his grandfather; his tutor was Aristotle, and after Philip's death he succeeded him. Alexander soon omitted to pay the tribute and, when his half-brother, who had in the meantime become king of Persia, demanded it Alexander sent the messenger home with the answer that he had killed and eaten the hen which laid the golden eggs. We omit here the story of the symbolic gifts which Dārā sent to Alexander and Alexander's reply, although it is found as early as al-Ṭabarī i. 699. Alexander then prepared for war, collected a great army and went first of all to Egypt, where he founded buildings (see AL-ISKANDARIYA). In the meanwhile Dārā also had assembled his troops and Alexander advanced against him, until the two armies met on the Euphrates where a sanguinary battle took place (its site is also placed elsewhere), in which Alexander was victorious. Dārā fled, but was treacherously wounded to death by two of his own people who sought thereby to gain the favour of Alexander. According to some accounts, several encounters took place between Alexander and Dārā but in the end the result was the same and Alexander met his dying foe. The latter recommended his wife to his care and asked him to see to the punishment of the murderers and to other matters; in particular he expressed the wish that Alexander should marry his daughter Rushang (Roxana). Alexander promised to fulfil his requests and ordered Dārā's obsequies to be carried out in regal fashion. As a result of his marriage with Rushang he now acted as the legitimate ruler of Persia, ordered the affairs of the government, and advanced on India to conquer Fūr (Porus), who was allied with Dārā. He had a fierce battle with Porus and only succeeded in disposing of him by rendering his elephants innocuous by stratagem and finally overcoming his opponent in single combat. Another Indian king, named Kaid, submitted to him voluntarily and sent him four valuable gifts (a virgin of wondrous beauty, a vessel which never became empty, a physician and a philosopher who could answer every question). He then took an interest in the Brahmins (gymnosophists) and had a conference with them in which he put various questions which they answered. After thus becoming acquainted with India he began his expeditions throughout the whole world, which are however usually but briefly mentioned by the historians. After India, came China and Tibet (Dinawari mentions the meeting with Candace) and finally he went to the Land of Darkness and met Khidr (Khadrir). The historians apparently knew a great deal about all this, but they omit to narrate it, either because they thought that it was not the contemporary of Dārā but an older Dhu 'l-Karnain who was the real hero of these incidents, or for other reasons. We shall deal with this question below: here it is sufficient to say that Alexander finally died on his return to Persia at Shehrzūr or in Bābil, according to al-Dinawari, in Jerusalem, at the age of 36, after reigning 13 or 14 years (many other figures are also given). According to some accounts, he died from poison and having a presentiment of his approaching end, sent a letter of consolation to his mother in Alexandria. The corpse was placed in a golden sarcophagus, over which the philosophers spoke in turn and in brief speeches emphasised the vanity of earthly greatness. The sarcophagus was taken to Alexandria and buried there in a tomb, which, according to al-Mas'ūdī, still existed in 322 (964).

Among Orientals, Alexander is not only the world-conqueror and founder of cities — he is said to have founded 12, all called Iskandariya —, but the hero who reached the ends of the earth (cf. i. Macc. i. 3). It was not lust of conquest but the thirst for knowledge that was his motive. Philosophers therefore accompanied him everywhere and the wonders of nature and enigmatic problems attracted his special interest. Mubashshir b. Fātik and al-Shahrzūrī, quoted by Mirkhwānd, therefore deal with Alexander in their biographies of Greek philosophers. Cf. Meissner in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morg. Gesellsch., xlix. 583 sqq. At the same time he appears as the champion of the true faith, because his epithet, Dhu 'l-Karnain, which is variously interpreted [cf. i. 961^b sq.] led to his being identified with the prophet of the same name mentioned in Qur'ān xviii. 82 sqq. This is however not approved of by all expositors; the majority distinguish an earlier and a later Dhu 'l-Karnain; the later is then identical with Alexander. For further details and the peculiar confusion with Musā in Qur'ān xviii. 59 sqq. see the articles KHIDR (Khadrir) and YĀDJŪJ WA-MĀJŪJ. The connection indicated by Lidzbarski, Meissner and others of these stories with very ancient Oriental ideas and myths (Gil-gamish epic) will there be dealt with.

ISKANDAR AGHĀ. [See ABKĀRIŪS.]

ISKANDAR BEG. [See SCANDERBEG.]

ISKANDAR BEG MUNSHI, was born about 968 (1560). After following the profession of an accountant for a time, he devoted himself to acquiring the art of composition, in which he soon became proficient and was appointed a Mun- shi to Shāh 'Abbās I (996—1038 = 1587—1628). He was by the side of Wazīr I'timād al-Dawla at the time of his sudden death during the siege of Urmia, 1019 (1610). Abū Ṭalib Khān, the son and successor of the Wazīr, was his patron. He died 1038 (1628).

He is the author of Tārīkh-i-'Ālam Arā-i-'Abbāsī, a detailed history of the reign of Shāh 'Abbās I with accounts of his predecessors. Extracts from this work have been published by Dorn, Muh. Quellen zur Gesch. der südl. Küstenl. des Kasp. Meeres, iv. 238—374; Lithogr. Teherān 1314.

ISKANDAR KHĀN, a Shaibānid, ruler of Mā-warā' al-Nahr, 968—993 (1561—1583). During his reign the authority was really exercised by his son 'Abd Allāh [q. v. i. 25], who in Shaibān 968 (Apr. 17 — May 15, 1561) had declared his uncle Pir Muḥammad, prince of Balkh, deposed and had his father Iskandar proclaimed Khān of all the Uzbegs. Iskandar himself like his father and grandfather was a weak-minded man; according to Abu 'l-Ghāzī (ed. Desmaisons, p. 183), the Khān had only two good qualities: he observed with painful exactitude all prescribed (farīda) and recommended (nāfila) prayers and was unrivalled in his skill in falconry. He died on Wednesday 1st Djumādā II 991 (22nd June 1583); in one of the chronograms made on the occasion of his death he is called "prince of dervishes" (pādīshāh-i darwīshān).

(W. BARTHOLD.)

ISKANDAR-NĀMA, the Romance of Alexander. The Kur'ān, Sūra xviii., gives evidence of the early acquaintance of the Muhammadans with the romance of Alexander (Pseudo-Callisthenes). What is there (vs. 59 sqq.) related of Mūsā is really taken from this story. This is not the place to discuss the earlier history of this romance. For this see Nöldeke, Beiträge zur Gesch. des Alexanderromans (Denkschr. der Kais. Akad. der Wiss., Vienna, xxxviii) and the older works quoted there.

According to this investigator, the source of the Syriac and Arabic tales of Alexander is to be sought in an original Pahlavi recension which, according to Fraenkel, Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morg. Gesellsch., xlv. 319, may have been written by a Christian of Syrian nationality who wrote in Persian. The oldest Arab accounts in the Hadīth have been collected by Friedlaender in Die Chadhir-legende und der Alexanderroman, p. 67 sqq.; and the oldest Arab historians have been mentioned in the preceding article. Later versions in Arabic are also discussed by Friedlaender, op. cit. The oldest poetic version of the Alexander saga in Persian is from the pen of the celebrated poet Firdawsī and is briefly analysed by Spiegel, Die Alexandersage bei den Orientalen. Another version was composed by Nizāmī, also briefly discussed by Spiegel, l. c. On the works on the subject by Éthé, Bacher and Clarke, see the article NIZĀMĪ.

Amīr Khusrāw [q. v.] and Djāmī [q. v.] have also dealt with this subject. A Persian prose romance is mentioned by Rieu, Cat. Pers. Mss. Brit. Mus. p. 568, and Pertsch, Verzeichn. Berlin, N^o. 1033—1036.

A little known version in Eastern Turkī we owe to the celebrated Mir 'Alī Shīr [see NEWĀ'ī]. The Ottoman Turkish version by Aḥmedī [q. v.] is based on the Persian of Firdawsī (see Gibb, A History of Ottoman Poetry, i. 203 sqq.). A similar work by Fighānī [q. v.] is also mentioned (Gibb, op. cit., iii. 36).

On the Indian adaptations cf. Garcin de Tassy, *Litt. Hind. et Hindoustanie*², i. 494, ii. 431, iii. 473; J. F. Blumhardt, Cat. of Hindustani printed Books in the British Museum, mentions a Kār-nāma-i Sikandari by Gokulaprasāda (p. 102^a) and a versified Kiṣṣe-i Sikandar by Djāmāl al-Dīn (p. 147^a). The Malay, Javanese and Buginese tales of Alexander are fully described in Vreede, Cat. van de Javaansche en Madoereesche Hss. (Leiden), p. 32 sqq.; H. H. Juynboll, Cat. van de Maleische en Soendaneesche Hss. (Leiden), p. 194 sqq., and v. Ronkel, Cat. van de Mal. Hss. (Batavia), p. 255 sqq. See also the article Alexander de Groote in the Encyclopaedie van Nederlandsch-Indie, 2nd ed., i. 29 sqq. ('s-Gravenhage—Leiden 1917).

Bibliography: In so far as it is not given in the article, it is most fully given in Friedlaender's book. Cf. also Chauvin, Bibliographie des ouvrages arabes, vii. 79 sqq.

AL-ISKANDARIYA, occasionally AL-ASKANDARIYA, often SIKANDARIYA, ALEXANDRIA, the principal seaport of Egypt, in Ptolemaic times the second city of the world, now among the most important trade centres of the Mediterranean, with a population of nearly 400,000 including a strong foreign element, is situated at the Western angle of the Delta in latitude 30° 11' N. and longitude 29° 51' E. It was founded in 332 B. C. by Alexander the Great. When it came into the hands of the Arabs, it was the capital of Egypt and, though its glory had diminished, it was still a great and splendid town. Under Muhammadan rule it declined to the verge of utter ruin. Its revival dates from the beginning of last century. The present Alexandria is almost entirely modern and needs no description here. It covers the site of mediaeval Alexandria, of which nothing is left but the most scanty remains.

Topography. The port of Alexandria is formed by a peninsula, consisting originally of an island, called Pharos, joined to the mainland by a mole or causeway seven stadia long and known for that reason as the Heptastadium. On the north eastern point of the island stood the Pharos, the great lighthouse built by Ptolemy Soter. This famous building, prototype of all our lighthouses and generally acknowledged to have been one of the wonders of the world, survived the Arab conquest by several centuries. The Arab writers call it the manāra or manār. Their accounts show that it consisted of a large and lofty structure of white stone, square in plan and massive in frame, above which rose a pile of brick and plaster in the form of an octagonal tower, tapering into a round tower towards the top, with a dome at the summit; they differ greatly as to its height. There are records of the Pharos having been damaged by earthquake and having been repaired on various occasions in the Muhammadan period. A large part of it fell in 724 (1324), but some portion seems to have been standing a century later. Soon afterwards it had collapsed entirely and in 882 (1477) the present Fort Pharos was built by Ka'it Bāy [q. v.] on its ruins. The harbour to the east of the peninsula was originally the principal harbour of Alexandria, and (contrary to what is sometimes stated) was the one generally used in Muhammadan times. Even up to the middle of the xviiith century the western harbour was resorted to only by galleys, but later it came into use for trading ships, though Christian vessels were not admitted to it until 1803. The Heptastadium broadened in the course of time by the accumulation of silt from being quite narrow into an isthmus, some three-quarters of a mile in width; it was vacant of buildings in the middle ages. The town lay to the south, covering an oblong area of about 3 km. by one km. Its walls remained in existence till 1811. They consisted of an outer wall some 20 feet high, backed in most parts of the circuit by a thicker and higher inner wall distant some 20 to 25 feet from it; both inner and outer walls were flanked by frequent towers. A further defence was afforded by a moat or ditch designed to be filled from the Nile in case of need. The town had four gates: Bāb al-Bahr leading to the Heptastadium, Bāb Rashīd, Bāb al-Sidra at the beginning of the road to al-Maghrib and Bāb al-Akhḍar leading to the cemetery. The walls had been repaired in the reign of Baibars [q. v.] and again in 703 (1303) after an earthquake, in which 17 of the towers had been thrown down; al-Ghūrī also repaired the towers during his reign. The whole system was a curious specimen of mediaeval fortification. It is not possible to say for certain when it was built. A solitary remnant was the so called Tour des Romains, which recently stood near Ramla railway station.

Statements by Arab writers of the ixth to xiiith centuries, when pieced together, give a general description of the town itself. It was laid out on a regular plan; eight straight streets intersected eight others at right angles, producing a chess board pattern with direct and continuous thoroughfares, a marked contrast to the meandering roads and blind alleys usual in Eastern towns. The streets were colonnaded, columns were used in most of the buildings; many of the columns were marble. Marble was abundant in the buildings and was employed also in paving some of the highways. There was a market street, a league (so it is said) in length, all built of marble, both its walls and floor. The columns and stones were often of prodigious size and enormous blocks were poised at great heights. Much variety and beauty of colour and fine workmanship were displayed. For instance, pillars like emerald and others resembling onyx are mentioned, all of the highest polish and finish. In the inside of the town there were gardens (kurūm) and sycamores. A remarkable feature was that the houses were built on vaults supported by columns, rising above one another in as many as three tiers. The object of this subterranean architecture was to provide cisterns for the storage of water, which was derived from the Nile, and also from the rain, for Alexandria has a fairly considerable rainfall in winter. Materials for reconstructing the plan of the town are quite insufficient. The monuments and buildings noticed may be divided into three classes. In the first, those which dated back to ancient times, there come Pompey's pillar or the column of Diocletian ('amūd al-sawārī), the one important ancient remain still standing in its place; Cleopatra's needles (al-misallātān), the two well known obelisks removed in recent times, one to London and the other to America; the Caesarian, a most famous edifice, originally a temple and afterwards the patriarchal church or cathedral, which appears to be mentioned once under the name of al-Kaisariya and is probably to be identified with Kanisat Asfal al-Ard, alluded to as a wonder; the remains of the still more famous Serapeum, consisting of a forest of columns known as Sawārī Sulaimān, many of which were still standing in position in the xiiith century; a magnificent dome called Kubbāt al-Khaḍrā', spoken of by several writers; a colossal brass statue known to the Arabs as Sharāḥīl, which stood on a rock in the sea; its foot was as long as the utmost stretch of a man lying down at full length; this statue was melted down in the time of al-Walid. In the second category come the churches, buildings but rarely alluded to by Muhammadan writers. Besides the patriarchal church referred to above, which was dedicated to St. Michael, there were two churches of St. Mark, a church of St. John, a church of Al-sūfir (the Saviour), churches of St. Cosmas and St. Damian, St. Mary Dorothea, St. Faustus, St. Theodore, St. Athanasius, a Greek church of St. Saba. The list might be extended, but as a rule little more is known of the churches than their names, though one or two of them are described as beautiful or highly ornamented. The great church of St. Mark, which contained the tomb of the saint, was situated a short distance within the Eastern gate on the right hand of one entering. The shrine was known in the xviith century. Whether the modern church of St. Mark occupies the same site does not appear, but it seems that none of the existing churches, even if they mark the site of old ones, preserve any features of interest. There are instances of churches having been built at Alexandria in Muhammadan times; on the other hand, some were destroyed in popular commotions or deliberately demolished and some were converted into mosques. The third class of buildings consists of additions made by the Muhammadans. In it may probably be placed the citadel (ḥiṣn), described as strong and swept by the sea from the west, whence it would seem that it was situated at the north west corner of the town. It was in existence as early as the viiith century. An ancient citadel, presumably pre-Muhammadan, which was in being in the xth century, contained a government house (dār al-imāra), built by one of the early Arab governors. The Mamlūk sultāns had a similar house (dār al-sulṭān), which was situated on the sea-shore and contained many columns of variegated marble and had courts paved with marble, — some ancient palace reserved for their use, but rarely, if ever used. One reads of a ḥāṭa or hall of al-Mu'ayyad. There was an arsenal or armoury "sufficient to equip the people of Egypt". The places of worship included an oratory or muṣallā, which, as at Fustāt, had fallen into ruin within a couple of centuries of the conquest. There was a mosque attributed to 'Amr b. al-Āṣī [q. v.], but whether it stood on the same site as the present mosque of 'Amr seems doubtful. The second principal mosque, the western mosque or mosque of the Septuagint, also known as the mosque of the 1001 columns, had been a monastery up to the end of the ixth century, and seems to have been converted into a mosque between this time and the middle of the xth. A large mosque "built" by Badr al-Djāmālī [q. v.] in 477 (1084) is presumably represented by the existing Djāmī' al-Attārīn, which would seem to be identical with the mosque and former church of St. Athanasius. Ibn Ṭulūn built a mosque on the Pharos. Early shrines were a mosque of Mūsā near the Pharos, mosques of Sulaimān, of al-Khidr, and of Daniyāl, still in existence — one notes the Jewish association of these names —, of Dhu 'l-Karnain or Alexander, and the mosque of al-Rahma, marking the spot where 'Amr stopped the slaughter when he entered Alexandria the second time.

In the xivth century, Alexandria is described by a European traveller as "exceeding beauteous and strong" and "exceeding clean" and "carefully kept". In 1507, according to another, there was "nothing to be seen but a prodigious heap of stones" and "it was rare to see a continuous street"; in 1634, the town was "almost nothing but a white heap of ruins". There is mention of many houses of Jews on the Heptastadium in (about) 1580, built there "in respect of the air", the earliest allusion, it seems, to habitations on the peninsula. The scanty remnant of the population concentrated there not long after, forming "a new city of very mean appearance" and leaving the town within the walls almost entirely deserted. Enough has come under European observation fully to prove the former splendour of Alexandria. At the present moment the principal remains, apart from the column of Pompey, are a few of the cisterns.

Alexandria was joined to the Nile by means of a long canal. This work had a tendency to silt up and, instead of being kept open by regular clearing, it was allowed from time to time to become more or less thoroughly blocked and then it was re-excavated. Occasionally after re-digging, it was open to traffic all the year round, but as a rule only for a part of the year. In 1800, the navigable period was only about 20 days. Sometimes communication by water was cut off altogether and the people of Alexandria had to depend on their cisterns for their drinking supply. In the earlier part of the Muhammadan period, the canal left the river at Shāhbūr. In the xith century an alternative waterway from the Nile below Fūwa, through the lakes of Idkū and Abū Kīr to the neighbourhood of Alexandria, came into use. Al-Nāṣir in the xivth century either improved or reconstructed this channel, the original canal from Shāhbūr being abandoned. Various lesser alterations took place subsequently. The damage resulting from the neglect of the canal can be easily understood. It is one of the reasons why the surroundings of Alexandria had become, generally speaking, a desolate waste at the beginning of the xivth century. Maryūt was once busy and thriving and the progress of its gradual decline can be traced. Buḥairat al-Iskandariya, identical with the now dry lake of Abū Kīr, has alternated between water and dry land more than once in the Muhammadan epoch.

History. When Alexandria was surrendered to the Arabs in 21 (642), a considerable number of Greeks took advantage of the terms of the capitulation and left it, abandoning their homes. The Arabs on taking possession did not molest the inhabitants. The well known story of the burning of the great library by order of the Khalifa 'Umar, which belongs to this time, cannot be accepted as true. On their re-entry into Alexandria after the invasion of Manuel in 25 (645), the Arabs revenged themselves on the inhabitants by a massacre; churches were burnt and the town walls, it is said, were thrown down. In the first century of the Hijra, Alexandria was of great importance to the Arabs as a naval station. Hence, no doubt, the rapid increase in the number of its garrison, part of which was drawn from Madina, and the frequency of visits by the Umayyad governors of Egypt. The Arab occupation at first was purely military. An Augustal was in office late in the century, a sign that the civil administration continued unchanged for a long while. When the last of the Umayyad khālifas fled to Egypt, al-Aswad, a grandson of 'Ukba b. Nāfi', declared for the 'Abbāsids at Alexandria. His followers included 30,000 Muslims of Buḥaira and Maryūt. This host, however, was dispersed by a detachment of 500 troops sent to Alexandria by Marwān; the Khalifa's men entered the city and there was slaughter there again. The 'Abbāsids rewarded al-Aswad with grants of lands at Alexandria, which seem to have been Umayyad possessions previously. In the course of the struggle between al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn, Alexandria was contended for by the Arab tribes of Lakhm and Muddilj. A band of Arab adventurers or pirates from Spain, who happened to be in the port, took advantage of the opportunity to seize the town and managed to hold it against all comers for 16 years (196—212 = 811—827). Four or five sieges occurred during their tenure and, although there are not many details, it is clear that it was a period of tyranny, misrule and excesses, and altogether most disastrous to Alexandria. At this time a band of religious revolutionary fanatics styling themselves Ṣūfis came into view. There are some signs of similar associations at Alexandria more than a century earlier. Al-Mutawakkil (not Ibn Ṭulūn) built the walls of Alexandria in 244 (858), for fear of attacks by the Greeks. If these walls were the origin of the walls of 1800 — which is not proved — the town had already become reduced to half the size it had been at the conquest. But little appears during the next two centuries. Alexandria was occupied two or three times by the Fātimids [q. v.] before they achieved the conquest of Egypt. A notable event of the Fātimid period was the transfer of the Coptic patriarchate from Alexandria to Cairo. For a while during the slave revolt (about 460 = 1067) Alexandria was in the hands of the blacks. It was the centre of revolts in 479 and in 487 and on each occasion was taken by siege. A descent by Sicilian Normans on Alexandria in 550 (1155) is mentioned. Amaury, King of Jerusalem, in conjunction with Shāwar and forces of Egypt and aided by the Pisan fleet, besieged it in 562 (1166), when it was occupied by a Syrian garrison, which included Saladin himself. A formidable Sicilian attack on Alexandria in 569 (1173) was beaten off. Baibars built up the galleys at Alexandria and restored them to what they were before. In 762 (1365) Alexandria was surprised and plundered by the King of Cyprus. There is evidence that it had declined greatly in importance by this time, inasmuch as its governors were persons of quite minor rank. The Mamlūk sultāns very rarely visited it. They made constant use of it as place of imprisonment for political offenders. Guns were included in its defence in the xvth century, and al-Ghūrī, when he feared an attack by the Turks, sent a large quantity of ordnance to it in 922 (1516). After the Turkish conquest, the taxes of Alexandria were not included in the revenue of Egypt, but were paid direct to Constantinople. In the xvth century it served as the port of Turkish galleys, which were dismantled and hauled up during the winter. The marauds of these vessels extended as far as the Straits of Gibraltar and the prisons of Alexandria held many Christians they had captured. The ruins of the town now began to be used to provide materials for beautifying mosques and other buildings at Constantinople. The French took Alexandria in 1798. It was taken from them by the British and held by them till 1803. The British took it again in 1807, but gave it up in the same year on the disastrous failure of their expedition in support of the Mamlūk Beys. Muḥammad ʿAlī restored its fortunes: he rebuilt the walls (1811), constructed the Maḥmūdiyya canal (1819), built the arsenal or dockyard (1829), also the Palace of Ra's al-Tin, and encouraged development in various ways. The population was estimated as low as 6000 in 1777, probably an underestimate, but after the events of 1798—1801, it is not likely to have been much more. In 1828 it is stated to have been 12,528 — smaller than that of Rosetta. By 1839, it was estimated at 40,000 and in 1862 at 164,400. In 1871, it was 219,602. As a result of disturbances during the rebellion of ʿArābī Pasha [q. v.] in 1882, the forts of Alexandria were bombarded by the British fleet in July; next day part of the town was destroyed by the moh.

Manufactures, trade. Alexandria was noted for its weaving. Its textiles are described as incomparable and are said to have been exported to all quarters (cf. EGYPT, ii. 17^b). Some of the linen manufactured at Alexandria was so fine that the flax for the stuff was sold for its weight in silver and that for the embroidery in it for many times its weight. Alexandrian silks occur in Fātimid inventories (xth to xiith centuries) and it is believed that some of the fabrics presented by Popes to churches of Italy in the viiith and ixth centuries were executed by Alexandrian workmen. A great number of miscellaneous manufactures, the character of which is not specified, are said to have been carried on. It was as a market for the products of the Indies rather than those of Egypt that Alexandria was of special importance to trade, particularly for the spices, pepper, cloves, nutmegs, cinnamon, ginger and so forth, — though the list of commodities included other articles such as pearls and precious stones. After being landed on the west side of the Red Sea and carried to the Nile by caravan, this merchandise was transported to Alexandria by the river and canal. It was in constant demand in Europe and elsewhere, so that Alexandria was resorted to by people from all parts for commerce. This trade can hardly have been maintained during the early part of the Muhammadan epoch and for various reasons is not likely to have become active until the era of the Fātimids. Towards the end of the reign of the Umayyads or the beginning of that of the ʿAbbāsids, Christian ships began to visit the port, and in the removal of the relics of St. Mark to Venice in 828, according to the well known story, there is evidence that commercial relations with Venice subsisted then. It seems, contrary to what might have been expected, that the trade with the west was stimulated and developed as a result of the Crusades. In the xiith century it was well established, and people from all Christian kingdoms resorted to Alexandria; a contemporary names 28 Christian towns or states represented by traders there. Among the number were Amalfi and Genoa, which with Venice appear to have been the earliest in the field, Ragusa, Pisa, Provence, and Catalonia. Besides Christians were to be met Muhammadans from Spain and Barbary and from Mesopotamia, Syria, and the countries towards India. It is known that ships belonging to Alexandria went at the same epoch as far as Almeria in Spain. Each of the various Christian communities at Alexandria had its own fondaco (funduḥ), a building in which the merchants warehoused their goods and also resided. The Venetians, as the leading commercial power, obtained a second fondaco in the xiiith century, besides other privileges, and they had also a fondaco at Fūwa. Their colony was presided over by a consul, and the Pisans, Marseillaise and Genoans likewise had consuls there in the xiiith century. Florence established a consul in the xvth century. The first English consul was appointed in 1583. There are many details of commercial treaties, the customs, measures taken with regard to the trade by the Sultāns, disputes between Christians and the inhabitants and between the Christians themselves, and other similar matters showing the conditions under which the merchants carried on their work and the difficulties they suffered. The discovery of the route by the Cape of Good Hope in 1498 diverted the Indian trade from Alexandria and reduced the commercial importance of the port to small proportions. When the trade in coffee and other commodities began in some measure to flourish in about 1680, a certain revival at Alexandria manifested itself.

Bibliography: The materials for a history of mediaeval Alexandria are widely scattered. Contributions are to be found in almost every one of the principal Arab histories of Egypt: see the article EGYPT. To be noticed particularly are Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam (ed. Massé, Cairo 1914, in progress; ed. Torrey, in preparation); al-Masʿūdī, Murūḥ al-Dhahab (Cairo 1303; Paris, 1861—77); Bibliotheca Geographorum Arabicorum, i.—viii.; al-Idrīsī, ed. AL-ISKANDARIYA = ISKANDARŪNA (see ISKANDARŪN). According to Taḏq al-'Arūs, iii. 276, al-Iskandariya was the name of 16 distinct places called after Alexander the Great, including the town of Balkh as well as the two towns mentioned above.

(RHUVON GUEST.)

ISKANDARŪN (Alexandretta), the Iskandarūna or Iskandariya of the Arabs (see the variants of the MSS. of al-Iṣṭakhri and Ibn Ḥawkal), the port of Aleppo on the Mediterranean, is the ancient Ἀλεξάνδρεια κατὰ Ἴσσον, which was afterwards also called little Alexandria (Ἀλεξάνδρεια ἡ μικρά in Malalas, ed. Bonn, p. 297), which was reproduced by the Aramaic diminutive form of the Arabic Iskandarūna; it should not be confused with the place of the same name between Sūr and Akkā, cf. Makrizī, Hist. des Mamlūkes, ed. Quatremère, ii. 2., p. 256 sqq.; Dimishkī, transl. by Mehren, p. 280. The Ἀλεξανδρών of Skylitzes, ii. 677, is formed from Iskandarūna and from Ἀλεξανδρών there then arose the form ἡ Ἀλεξανδρός (Michael Attal., p. 120; Zonaras, iii. 691; Georgius Cyprius and the episcopal list, Byz. Ztschr., i. 248); the form usual with us (the Roman diminutive formation) is used as early as the Western pilgrims of the middle ages (Wilbrand von Oldenberg, i. ch. xviii). Under Arab rule Iskandarūn belonged to the ajund of Kinnasrin-Halab; the castle is said to have been built in the reign of the Caliph al-Wāthik (Abu 'l-Fida', ed. Reinaud, ii. 2, p. 33). In the wars between the Byzantines and the Arabs the town was repeatedly taken by the former (Mnralt, Chronogr. Byz., year 1068; Ibn Ḥawkal p. 121). In Abu 'l-Fida's time it was deserted. In the period following it again gained importance as the port of Aleppo, which was beginning to flourish, but the unhealthy climate, a result of the surrounding swamps, and the not very favourable conditions at the port have so far impeded the commercial development of this important place. It is the capital of a kaṣā with 10—15,000 inhabitants. It is connected with Aleppo by a road 60 miles long.

ISLĀM is the name which Muhammadans in every country give to their own faith. The word means "submission", "resignation", (to God), and occurs eight times in the Kur'ān, in such verses as iii. 17, "The (true) religion with God is Islām"; v. 5, "This day have I perfected for you your religion and have completed My favour upon you and it is My pleasure that Islām be your religion"; vi. 125, "Whomsoever God wishes to guide, He opens his breast unto Islām". See further art. MUSLIM.

In the present article merely a statistical account will be given of the extent to which the Muslim religion prevails in the various countries of the world at the present day. For an exposition of the religious tenets and ordinances of Islām, the development of dogma etc., the reader is referred to articles such as Allāh, Muḥammad etc., and for the biography, history, geography etc., of Muhammadan peoples, to the appropriate articles under each head.

Various estimates of the total number of Muhammadans in the world have been made, differing as widely as from 175 to 270 millions; but there is a large element of uncertainty about any estimate, as in several countries where Muhammadans are to be found in large numbers, no religious census has ever been taken, and accurate statistics are accordingly wanting. This is particularly the case in the land in which Islām had its origin, and any estimate of the total Arab population must be conjectural only. Some reliance may be placed on the figures given for the districts under European control, as 56,000 (Aden and the neighbouring islands, Perim, Sokotra, etc.), and 89,000 (Bahrain Islands), but estimates of the population in the independant parts of Arabia, e.g. Nadjd, Hadramūt, etc. — 2,500,000 (Zwemer), 3,500,000 (Hartmann) — and those (e.g. Ildjāz, Yaman), under Turkish suzerainty, — 1,050,000 — can be tentative only. The Arabs are not however confined to the limits of the country that bears their name; as early as the third century of the Christian era had commenced those scattered migrations of Arabs to the north which gradually led to the formation of settlements in Palestine, Syria, and Mesopotamia; as time went on, advantage was taken of the conflicts between the Byzantine and Persian empires, and larger numbers of nomad Arabs settled in the more fertile countries bordering on the arid land of their origin. This migratory movement culminated in the vast expansion of the Arab race, rendered possible by the conquests of the seventh century, when the Arabs despoiled the Byzantine empire of some of its fairest provinces and subjugated the whole of the territories of the Persian king. The fact that the Arab language was gradually adopted throughout the greater part of Syria, Egypt and North Africa is some evidence of the interpenetration of Arab blood in the population of these countries, and a steady, though intermittent, stream of migration from Arabia into Africa set in across the Red Sea. Another stream moved eastward across the Indian Ocean and by the middle of the eighth century Arab traders had made their way as far as China and were present in large numbers in Canton. Arab trading settlements are found scattered throughout the Malay Archipelago, and at different historical periods small groups have established themselves on the coasts of British India, and individual Arabs have made their way to most parts of the Muhammadan world, especially those accessible by sea. But no attempt has ever been made to estimate the total number of these Arabs living outside the limits of the Arabian Peninsula, as separate groups in the Muslim populations of which they form a part.

For some countries of Asia which are under European rule, we have accurate statistics. In India, where varieties of religious belief are carefully noted, the Muhammadans, according to the Census of 1911, numbered 66,647,299, out of a total population of rather more than 315 millions. (For details as to the varied composition of the population, see article INDIA, § 1). The Muhammadan community shows a tendency to increase in numbers relatively to their Hindu fellow-countrymen; in the decade ending 1901, while the total population of India increased by 2.4%, the Muhammadans increased by 8.9%; in the following ten years, their number rose by 6.7%, as compared with only 5% in the case of Hindus. Proselytism may partly account for this, but the chief reason for the rapid growth appears to be that their social customs are more favourable to a higher birth-rate than those of the Hindus; they have fewer marriage restrictions, and widows frequently re-marry. Conversions to other religions are not frequent, but Christian converts from Islām are numbered by thousands in Northern India, especially in the Panjāb (The Mohammedan World of To-day, pp. 170, 294), and a certain number of Muhammadans of Hindu origin have been re-absorbed into Hinduism through the missionary activity of the Ārya Samājī (v. art. INDIA, § 5c). In Ceylon, in spite of the intimate trade relations with Arabia, Islām has not achieved any great extension among the inhabitants and there were in 1912 only 284,000 Muhammadans, out of a population of over four millions.

For the Malay Peninsula and Archipelago, complete statistics are wanting. One estimate (Zwemer) gives 673,159 as the Muhammadan population of the Federated Malay States and the Straits Settlements, while another (Hartmann) gives nearly double that figure. Introduced into Malacca from India, Islām spread along the great trade route to Java and the other islands of the Archipelago. The Muslim population of the Dutch Indies in 1905 was 35,034,025, including 29,605,653 in Java, and was said to be rapidly increasing as the result of conversions to Islām from among the sections of the population that still remain heathen; on the other hand Christian missionaries have been in recent years winning converts from Islām in Java, where more than 300 baptisms are said to take place every year, and in 1906 there were living 18,000 Christians who had been converted from Islām (The Mohammedan World of To-day, p. 237); in Sumatra the various missionary societies working in this island claim to have made 6,500 Christian converts, together with 1150 catechumens, formerly Muhammadans, since the year 1860 (ib., pp. 222, 228).

In Siam, Islām has never succeeded in exercising much influence; converts have been won in the north through contact with the neighbouring Malay States, and in the coast towns as the result of intercourse with the Malay Archipelago; but the total number of Muhammadans is probably not more than 300,000.

In other parts of Asia under European rule, there are found in the French possessions in Indo-China 1,146,000 Muhammadans out of a population of 17,800,000; in the Asiatic possessions (including the Caucasus) of the Russian Empire 11,966,700 Muhammadans out of a population of nearly 25 millions; and in the Philippine Islands, under American rule, 277,547 Muhammadans out of 8½ million inhabitants.

But when we pass to countries in which accurate census returns after the European method are entirely wanting, there is still more uncertainty as to the figures. In Persia, an estimate made by Christian missionaries assigns to Islām all but 500,000 out of the five millions of inhabitants. In Afghānistān it is conjectured that there are about four million Muhammadans.

The first serious attempts to ascertain the number of the Chinese Muslims were made by Broomhall and d'Ollone; the former suggests 8,421,000 (Islam in China, p. 215), the latter (Recherches sur les Musulmans Chinois, p. 430), 4,000,000 only. These figures are in striking contrast to the exaggerated estimates made in the 19th century when their number was alleged to be as much as 20 or 30 millions or even 70 millions; but some Christian missionaries consider that the more recent estimates are too low. But whatever proportion the present Muslims bear to the total population of China, it is probable that their numbers were considerably larger before the massacres that accompanied the suppression of the many Muhammadan insurrections of which a list is given by d'Ollone (op. cit., p. 436), in which millions of persons are said to have perished. In Tibet there are believed to be as many as 28,500 Muslims, most of them settlers from China and Kashmir, with a few converts, and descendants of converts. Islām has succeeded in gaining but few adherents in Japan, and these in quite recent years; there are probably not more than 200 Muslims in Japan itself, but about 25,500 in Formosa.

In regard to some of the oldest parts of the Muhammadan world, now included in the Asiatic possessions of the Sultān of Turkey, and excluding the independent parts of Arabia, various estimates of the Muslim population are given e.g. 11,190,000 (Hartmann) and 12,278,800 (Zwemer), but in the absence of accurate census returns these figures can be considered as approximate only. (v. A. de la Jonquière, Histoire de l'empire ottoman 3, p. 457 sqq., Paris 1914).

Next to Asia, Africa is the continent that contains the largest number of Muslims, but materials for an exact judgment are so wanting that estimates given even by the most recent investigators vary from 42 to 76 millions. The most rigid investigation has been made by Professor D. Westermann, and his figures, with a total of 42,039,349, have been adopted by Zwemer as follows: Abyssinia, 500,000; Egypt, 10,269,445; Liberia, 280,000; the rest of this continent forms part of the empire of one or other of the powers of Europe, but for the greater part of these vast dominions no exact census returns are available; Belgium, 60,000; France, 15,085,000; Germany, 1,480,000; Great Britain, 12,539,904; Italy, 1,365,000; Portugal 330,000; Spain, 130,000. While much of these estimates is necessarily conjectural, some reliance can be placed upon the figures given for those parts of the continent in which the population is almost entirely Muhammadan, e.g. Morocco (in which there are 3,100,000 out of a total of 3,220,000); or in cases where whole sections of the population such as the Hausas or the Fulbe have adopted Islām. This faith is still making progress among the heathen tribes and new converts every year come in to swell the numbers of the faithful.

In Europe, on the contrary, the influence of Islām continues to decline. What the population of Muslim Spain may have been in the days of its widest extent, it is impossible even to conjecture, but in 1492 the Jewish and Muslim community together numbered over two millions, and when Philip III expelled the last remnant of the Moriscos in 1609—1615, the number of those who left the country was probably about 500,000. (H. C. Lea, The Moriscos of Spain, p. 359, London 1901).

At the present time, the Muhammadans in Europe are almost entirely confined to Russia and those countries that formed part of the Turkish dominions at the beginning of the 19th century. In Russia in Europe, the total number of the Muhammadans is about 3,500,000, but there has been no religious census in the Russian empire since 1897; they are mainly Tatars by race, but proselytism has taken place to a considerable degree among Finnish tribes such as the Cheremiss, the Votiaks and the Chuvash. Since the promulgation of the edict of religious toleration in 1905, there has been an increasing number of accessions to the faith of Islām. There is a considerable amount of uncertainty about the religious statistics of the Balkan Peninsula, and even the official estimates are open to grave suspicion of being manipulated to suit some political or racial interest.

In Turkey in Europe (in 1900) there were said to be about 3,200,000 Muhammadans; Hartmann, writing in 1909, gives 3,295,000. In Bulgaria, the Muhammadans number 603,876 out of a total population of nearly 4½ millions. In Rumania there are about 43,700 Muhammadans, living for the most part in the Dobruđja. In Serbia in 1910 there were 14,435, and in Montenegro 14,000. In Albania the total Muhammadan population is said to be 334,000, of whom 12,000 are Gypsies, 40,000 Serbs and 26,000 Albanians. Greece still contains 24,000 Muhammadans, while in the island of Crete the number has shrunk to 27,852; but so recently as 1909 there were 33,496 Muhammadans on the island, and in 1881 more than 73,000. In Bosnia and Herzegovina the indigenous Serb population includes 612,137 Muhammadans, and in the rest of the Austrian empire there are about 1450 more. In the other countries of Europe, chiefly France and Great Britain, there are some small scattered groups of Muhammadans, mostly of African or Asiatic origin, temporarily resident in these countries.

Emigration and commercial activity have added 8000 Muhammadans to the population of North America, and 166,000 to that of Central and South America (including the West India Islands, where there are 10,499 in Trinidad and 3000 in Jamaica). In Australia there are 195,000, chiefly at Perth.

Bibliography: The first comprehensive attempt to give a statistical survey of the followers of the faith of Islām, was made by Hubert Jansen, Verbreitung des Islams in den verschiedenen Ländern der Erde (Berlin 1897), but his figures are often very exaggerated, and later investigations have shown that much smaller estimates are nearer the truth. Martin Hartmann, Der Islam: Geschichte—Glaube—Recht (Leipzig 1909), gives detailed statistics, but does not mention his sources of information. S. M. Zwemer in chapter iii. of Mohammed or Christ (London 1916), gives a census of the Muslim World, with a bibliography. Separate studies have been made of the statistics of certain parts of the Muhammadan world e.g. by M. Broomhall, Islam in China (London 1910); S. Bobrovnikoff, Moslems in Russia (The Moslem World), vol. i. London 1911; D. Westermann, Der Islam in West- und Zentral-Sudan (Die Welt des Islams, i. 85 sq., Berlin 1913), and G. Kampffmeyer, Statistik der Mohammedaner auf der Balkanhalbinsel und in Österreich (ib., i. 32—33). For Africa and Asia see The Mohammedan World of To-day (New York 1906). Details as to the spread of Islam are given for their respective territories by the British and Dutch governments in their decennial official publications, the Census of India and Koloniaal Verslag respectively. Religious statistics are given in The Statesman's Year Book, published annually in London. The Revue du Monde Musulman contains articles giving statistics of the Muhammadan population of several countries, see Index général des volumes I à XVI (Paris 1912). (T. W. ARNOLD.)

ISLĀMĀBĀD, a town of some importance in the south-eastern part of the valley of Kashmīr situated at the head of the navigable channel of the River Djehlam. Its Hindu name was Anantnāg, but it was named Islāmābād after the Muhammadan conquest, probably by Sulṭān Zain al-ʿĀbidīn, 820—872 (1417—1467). The town was formerly famed for its shawl manufacture, but this has died out, and at present the only manufacture is that of white felt, embroidered rugs and embroidered tablecloths. In the immediate neighbourhood are the celebrated Hindū Shrine of Mārtand and Djahāngīr's gardens at Aṭibāl.

ISLĀMĀBĀD. The name Islāmābād was given on more than one occasion by the Emperor Awrangzēb to towns conquered from Hindūs. Of these the most important are Čittagong (Čāṭgām) [q. v.], at the head of the Bay of Bengal, Čāknā in the Deccan, and Mathurā on the Djamnā. Islāmābād became a mint in gold and silver from the time of Awrangzēb to that of Shāh ʿĀlam II, and copper was also struck there by the last mentioned emperor. It is generally supposed that Čittagong was the place of mintage of these coins, but Mr. C. J. Rodgers ascribed them to Mathurā. Čāknā however received the name Islāmābād in 1070 (1659) and Čātgām not till 1075 (1664). The name is not now in actual use for any of these three towns.

ISLAMBOL. [See ISTAMBOL.]

ISLĀM GIRĀY, the name of three Khāns of the Crimea.

1. Islām Girāy I b. Muḥammad Girāy, brother of Ghāzī Girāy I (q. v., ii. 151^a). During the troubled period that followed the death of his father, he succeeded, as his brothers had done before him, in occupying the throne for a short time (a few years till 939 = 1523), but he was not recognised by the Sultān. After the appointment of his uncle Šāhib Girāy, he rebelled against the Sultān and was murdered in 944 (1537).

2. Islām Girāy II b. Dewlet Girāy, brother and predecessor of Ghāzī Girāy II (q. v., ii. 151^a), 992—996 = 1584—1588. In contrast to his successor he was not popular in his country and was only able to maintain his position with Turkish help.

3. Islām Girāy III b. Selāmet Girāy, 1054—1064 = 1644—1654, in contrast to the two other Khāns of this name, was a vigorous, warlike ruler who also took up a more independent attitude than his predecessors to the Porte and played a prominent part in the political events of his time, notably in the liberation of Little Russia from Polish rule. In his youth he spent seven years in Polish imprisonment. Several raids into Russia were made by him. About 1650 he even made an attempt but without success to enter into relations with Queen Christina of Sweden and to procure money from her for the campaigns against Russia. Islām Girāy died in the beginning of Šahbān 1064 (began 17 June 1654) at the age of 50 after reigning 10 years and five months. For the Bibliography see the article BĀGHČE SARĀI, I. 562 sq.; see also the documents edited by Veliāminof Zernof, Matériaux pour servir à l'histoire du Khanat de Crimée, p. 340 sq. The last document composed shortly before the death of Islām Girāy is specially important, it is a threatening letter from the Khān to the Czar Alexei Michailovič (p. 475 sq.).

ISLY, in Berber Isli (the betrothed), a river in North Africa. It rises in western Morocco in the S. W. of Uđjda, runs from S. W. to N. E. through the land of the Angad, passing near Uđjda, then under the name of Wēd Bū Nu'aim joins the Muila, a tributary on the left bank of the Tafna.

Several battles have been fought on the banks of the Isly. The 'Abdalwādī Sultān Yaghmorāsen was defeated there by the Marinids in 648 (1250) and 670 (1271). On Aug. 14, 1844 Marshal Bugeaud won a decisive victory there over the Moroccan troops commanded by Mūlay Muḥammad, son of Sultān Mūlay 'Abd al-Rahmān. The Moroccans were encamped at Djarf al-Akhḍar on the right bank of the river. The Moroccan camp was captured and the army scattered. This victory won for Bugeaud the title of Duc d'Isly.

ISM (A.) plur. asmā', properly "name", technical term in Arabic grammar for the first part of speech, the nomen, noun. The term corresponds exactly to the Greek ὄνομα used as early as Aristotle, and to the Sanskrit nāman, which is found as an established term in the Nirukta of Yāska, who lived many generations before Pāṇini, an authority of the fourth century B. C. There is however no interconnexion; the term occurred spontaneously and obviously in every day speech, in which nāman, ism and ὄνομα comprise all words — not merely proper names — which signify a thing, especially one perceived by the senses. In fact, such words represent in the first class of words the predominant element for thinking and speaking (cf. Ztschr. d. Dtsch. Morgenl. Ges., lxiv. 380 sq.). It is not therefore a consideration based on grammatical science but the simple and most obvious semasiological point of view which underlies the term among the Indians, Greeks, and Arabs. The same is true of the Arabic term for the second part of speech, فعل, which means "action", while the word قوله (saying), which goes back to Aristotle, the precursor of our "verb" and the Sanskrit ākhyātam, used already by Yāska, which means "communicated, related", point to the predicative function, i. e. they are chosen from a logical or syntactical point of view.

To the asmā', first of all of course belong the substantives, for which there is no special term, and the proper name, al-ism al-'alam (see 'ALAM) is distinguished from the ism al-djins or class name; the latter again is divided into ism 'ain and ism ma'nā (Mufaṣṣal, § 3) accordingly as it denotes a concrete or an abstract. As with the Greeks and Romans the adjective (sifa [q. v.], also wasf or na't) belongs to the ism and the numeral (ism al-'adad). Differing from them, the Arabic system includes the personal pronoun (qamūr, q. v.) under the ism — the reason being partly the meaning of the words concerned as characterising things and partly their conditions of inflexion — and the demonstrative pronouns (asmā' al-ishāra), classed as muḥamāt [q. v.], the relative (al-asmā' al-mauṣūlāt), and the infinitive (maṣdar, q. v.) and (as had been done by the Stoics), the participle, active and passive (ism al-fā'il and ism al-maf'ūl); at the same time the Arabs were by no means unaware of the close relations of the participle with the verb as regards etymology, meaning and syntactical application, which led the Greek grammarians to insert a part of speech called significantly μετοχή between the noun and the verb. Finally there are considered as nouns, even the exclamations and appeals of very different linguistic character, classed in our grammars under the inappropriate name of interjections, and even purely onomatopoeic formations like ghāḡ of the crows' caw. The Arabs called these words, when they have a verbal (usually imperative) significance, asmā' al-af'al, otherwise aṣwāt i. e. tones, sounds (sing. sawt). That their classification under the nouns was really only made because they could not be placed anywhere else in the three-fold scheme, is rather bluntly confessed by Ibn al-Haḍḍib in the commentary to the Kāfiya (Constantinople 1311) p. 75,8 a f.: wa 'lladhī yadullu 'ala 'smiyatiḥā ta'adhdhuru 'l-harfiyati wa 'l-f'iliyati fihā "and what shows their character as nouns is the circumstance, that the character of particle and of verb is impossible with them".

In order, however, to be just to the Arab grammarians, one must not forget that the division of the parts of speech usual among us, which goes back to the ancient grammarians, is of an arbitrary character, and that the attempt to build up a strictly logical system is quite impossible of execution (H. Paul, *Prinzipien der Sprachgeschichte*³, § 244).

Sibawaihi does not give a definition of ism in his survey of the three parts of speech in his first chapter, because the term was intelligible without more ado. He contents himself with three examples: radjūl (man), faras (horse), and ḥā'it (wall), merely names of species of concrete things. The two definitions, made by the Baṣri al-Mubarrad (d. 285 = 898) and the Kūfi Ta'lab, (d. 291 = 904) and given by Ibn al-Anbārī in Kitāb al-Inṣāf, p. 2, have, as Ibn al-Anbārī himself says, more the character of an etymological explanation. The former, who derives ism from the root smw, the second conjugation of which, sammā means "to name", says: al-ismu mā dalla 'ala musamma "tahtahu" ism is that which indicates something named that underlies it". Ta'lab, who derives ism from the root wsm, "to mark with a brand (stigma, nota)", says: al-ismu simatun tūda'u 'alā 'l-sha'fi yu'rafu bihā, "ism is a mark (nota) put on a thing by which it is recognised". This explanation by its remarkable similarity recalls that of Priscian (ed. Keil), i. 57, 3: vel, ut alii, nomen quasi nota men, quod hoc nota mus unius cujusque substantiae qualitate. It is not till a later date that we recognise the Aristotelian definition: φωνή σηματική κατὰ συνθήκην ἕνευ χρόνου κτλ among the Arab grammarians. Thus al-Sīrāfi (d. 368 = 978) says: Kullu sha'fi'n, dalla 'alā ma'nān ghaira muftarinin bi-zamānin muḥaṣṣalin min muḍṭiyin aw ghairihi, fahuwa 'smu, "everything that indicates a conception without being associated with a definite time namely the past etc., is an ism" (Jahn, Sibawaihi's Buch über die Grammatik, Note 5 zu § 1; Ibn Ya'ish, p. 25, 19). This is the definition which with slight variations became usual later (see Ibn Ya'ish, p. 16, 13). Instead of "with a definite time", the Kāfiya says "with one of the three times" (present, past, and future): Ibn al-Hādij (l. c., p. 7) gives a full explanation of the reason of this extension of the ἕνευ χρόνου and of the difficulties resulting from the nature of the Arabic language in regard also to this definition.

The points of view from which the Arab grammarians regard the declensions of nouns are given in their general lines in the article IRĀB. It may be further mentioned that Arab terminology has no equivalent for our "number" and "gender". The word ḡins borrowed from the Greek γένος is never used for grammatical gender, as Merx, Historia artis grammaticae apud Syros, p. 145 and 151, erroneously assumes; even with the grammarians the word only means the genus to which the species (naw') is subordinate (Ibn Ya'ish, p. 22—7). For all details of the theory of the noun in the system of the Arab grammarians, the reader must be referred to the original works, to which Fleischer's Beiträge zur Arab. Sprachkunde give valuable elucidations. (J. WEISS.)

ISMA (A.), in dogmatics, immunity from error and sin, such as is ascribed in Sunni Islām to the prophets and in the Shī'a to the imāms also. As to the extent of their immunity, the orthodox theologians differ in opinion as regards the prophets except Muḥammad (on such points as whether it also exists before or only after their prophetic calling or whether it includes immunity from all kinds of sin or only applies to minor slips). It is applied in unlimited fashion to Muḥammad only, in opposition to his own judgement. Among Sunni authorities Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī in particular extends the isma to all prophets in the greatest degree. According to the Shī'a teaching, isma is inherent in the imāms to a higher degree than in the prophets on account of their exalted qualities of substance. Abū Zaid al-Balkhī (d. 322 = 934) wrote a Kitāb 'Ismat al-Anbiyā' (Yāqūt, Irshād, i. 142, 5 a fine), as did Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (Brockelmann, i. 507, n^o. 14). Every work on Muslim dogmatics contains a chapter on these questions and the different views in regard to them (e. g. Ibn Hazm, Milal, ed. Cairo 1321, iv. 1—31; Ma-wāḳif, ed. Soerensen, p. 220 sqq.); a mystic definition of isma is given by al-Ghazālī, Mizān al-'Amal (Cairo 1328), p. 116 paen.

ISMĀ'IL, the son of the patriarch Ibrāhīm, is mentioned several times in the Qur'ān. In Sūra ii. 130 (= iii. 78) and iv. 161 it is said of him that he received revelations. In xix. 55 he is called a messenger and prophet, who summoned his people to ṣalāt and zakāt. These references fit in very well with Muḥammad's account of the religion of Ibrāhīm. In Sūra ii. 127, he is called one of the fathers of Jacob, along with Ibrāhīm and Ishāq; and in ii. 119, he, along with Ibrāhīm, is commanded to purify the Holy House at Mecca.

Tradition knows nothing of Ismā'il as a messenger nor of his revelations nor has it explained his relations to the spread of the religion of Ibrāhīm. It knows that his mother Hādjar bore him to Ibrāhīm as his first-born and that a feud arose between Hādjar and Sara. With the intention of disfiguring Hādjar, Sara even pierced her ears; so this then became the fashion with women. Ismā'il and Ishāq are also said to have fought with one another occasionally. In the end, Sara's jealousy induced Ibrāhīm to decide to travel to Arabia with Hādjar and Ismā'il. The party was guided by the Sakina or, according to others, by Gabriel (on the form of the Sakina, cf. The Navel of the Earth, Verh. Kon. Akad. v. Wetenschappen, Afd. Letterkunde, Nieuwe Reeks, xvii. n^o. 1 p. 60 sqq.).

When Ibrāhīm and Ismā'il had dug the foundations of the Holy House, Ismā'il helped his father in the building of the temple. When this work was completed, Ibrāhīm abandoned the boy with his mother in the barren country, afflicted by thirst. In her need, Hādjar stood on the hills al-Ṣafā and al-Marwa and looked for water and ran hither and thither between them, the origin of the sa'y [q. v.]. Gabriel then called "Who art thou? To whom did Ibrāhīm entrust thee?" The boy then impatiently thrust his foot (or finger) into the sand and a spring arose; if Hādjar had not hurriedly scooped up the moisture in her jug, the Zamzam would have become a bubbling spring. It is also said that Gabriel pushed his heel into the ground and the Zamzam burst forth beneath it.

In those days the Djurhum [q. v.] lived near the sanctuary; after Hādjār's death, Ismā'il married one of their daughters. In his absence Ibrāhīm visited his wife but did not find a very hospitable reception; when the woman afterwards repeated to her husband some words which Ibrāhīm had said, he understood that the latter was suggesting he should divorce his wife. He did this; afterwards he married another woman of the Djurhum. Ibrāhīm visited her also and in the same allusive fashion gave his approval to the new choice.

Ibrāhīm and Hādjār, according to Muslim tradition, are buried in the ḥidjr of the Holy House, a distinction which they share with most of the prophets: the prophet belongs to the home of the prophets.

Muslim tradition also knows the story given in Genesis xxii. But there are several theologians who say, it was not Ishāk but Ismā'il that was the ḥabīb. For this view, the sayings of 'Abd Allāh b. 'Omar, Ibn 'Abbās, al-Sha'bi, Muḥjahid, etc. are quoted. It is related, for example, that 'Omar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz asked a Jew convert to Islām about this difference of opinion and he answered: "The ḥabīb is Ismā'il; the Jews know this also, but as they are jealous of you, they say it was Ishāk".

Ibrāhīm is also considered the ancestor of the North Arabian tribes. In the native genealogies, the Arabs are divided into three groups; al-bā'ida (those who have disappeared), al-'arība (the indigenous) and al-mustarība (the arabicised). Ismā'il is considered the progenitor of the last group, whose ancestor is called 'Adnān. The chain between Ismā'il and 'Adnān is given in very divergent forms, sometimes in partial agreement with the list in Genesis xxv.

ISMĀ'IL, formerly a Turkish fortress, now the district town in the Russian gouvernement of Bessarabia, on the left bank of the Kilia arm of the Danube, between the lakes of Jalpuch and Katlabuch, with about 40,000 inhabitants (in 1897: 31293). The name Ismā'il (Moldavian Smerl, Smil, or Smerl, also Simil) is said to be derived from the Slav zmij, a snake or dragon, the epithet of several Moldavian princes; according to a Turkish folk etymology, from the alleged conqueror, a Kapudan Ismā'il, who took the town under Bāyazīd II in 1484.

The origin of the town is unknown. It is said to have been at one time in the hands of the Genoese. It only attained importance under the Turks as a fortress to curb the Budjak Tatars, who had been settled there in 1569, and particularly as a point d'appui of the Turks against the advance of Russia, owing to its splendid strategic situation as the best gate of sortie from the north into the Dobruja and the intersection of the roads from Galatz, Khotin, Bender and Kilia. After Ismā'il had been taken by the Russians without a blow in 1770 in the First Russo-Turkish War, the Turks endeavoured with the help of foreign engineers to make the town, which was restored to them by the peace of Kūčūk Kainardje in 1774, the strongest fortress on the left bank of the Danube, an "army fortress" (ordu ḫal'asi), i. e. the permanent quarters of large bodies of troops of a defensive character. The fortress, thought to be impregnable, was taken as early as Dec. 11 (22), 1790 by the Russians under Suvorov in spite of a most valiant defence by the Ser'asker Aidosli Mehmed Pasha; in the three days' massacre over 26,000 Turks, including the whole Muslim population, were killed, 9000 taken prisoners and only one escaped by swimming the Danube bearing the appalling news. This deed of arms, celebrated by Byron and Djerzhavin, aroused a tremendous sensation in Europe; in Constantinople it resulted in a revolution and the execution of the Grand-Vizier.

By the peace of Jassy in 1791 Ismā'il was restored to the Turks and fortified again by them. (The splendid stones with the ṭughra of Selim III, testifying to the restoration of the fortress in 1794—5, are in the Odessa Museum). But in 1809 Ismā'il again capitulated to the Russians, to whom it remained by the peace of Bucarest in 1812, whereupon many colonists settled there, viz. Russian fugitives and sectarians, especially Ras-kolniki, Rumanians, Greeks, Bulgarians, Armenians, Jews and Gipsies. In 1810 General Tutchkov founded at a short distance from Ismā'il the town of Tutchkov, which bears his name and gradually expanded to form one town with Ismā'il. By the peace of Paris in 1856, Ismā'il after the demolition of its fortifications was added to Moldavia with a portion of Bessarabia and remained Rumanian till its capture in the last Russo-Turkish War on 14 April 1877, by the Russians, to whom it finally passed by the treaty of Berlin.

Only a few ruins of the fortress exist. The town, which in spite of many vicissitudes of war (such as being plundered by the Cossacks) was at one time an important centre for traffic in fish etc., fruit and corn and a populous town (always with a very mixed population, in contrast to the purely Tatar population around), suffered severely through the wars and the forcible expatriation of the former population of Bessarabia. At the present day its commerce is again highly developed in spite of the by no means favourable shipping conditions.

ISMĀ'IL I, founder of the Šafawī dynasty of Persia, born of a Šūfi family, settled in Ardabīl [q. v., i. 425 sq.] in Ādharbaidjān since the time of the šaiḫh Šafī al-Dīn, who was said to be descended from the imām Mūsā al-Kāzim. He was the son of the šaiḫh Ḥaidar [q. v.]; after the death of his maternal grandfather, Uzun Hasan (about 883 = 1478), in the confusion of the anarchy that followed, supported on the one hand by the followers of his father and on the other by the seven Turkish tribes which had taken his side (Ustādjlu, Shamlu, Tekkelu, Behārlu, Dhu 'l-Kadr, Kādjār and Afshār), Ismā'il collected an army of 7,000 men, who received the name of Kizil-bāsh [q. v.]. In 908 (1502) he was master of Shirwān, Adhar-baidjān and 'Irāk 'Adjami and now took the title of shāh ("king"). In 914 (1504) he extended his kingdom eastwards as far as Herāt, westwards to Diyār Bakr and Baghdād; but the forcible propagation of the Shī'a tenets which he conducted in the newly won territories brought him the enmity of his nearest neighbours on the north and west, the Khān of Bukhārā and the Ottoman Sulṭān, both Sunnis.

The former, Muḥammad Shaibānī Khān, who had made himself master of Turkistān after his victory over Bābur [q. v.], was defeated near Merw by Ismā'il in a great battle, in which he himself was killed (Shaibān 916 = Dec. 1510). This success brought Ismā'il into the possession of the whole of Khurāsān, but he could not prevent the Uzbeks from founding an independent kingdom in Khwārizm with Khīwa as its capital. He fought with less success against the Ottoman Sulṭān Selīm I. In the plain of Cāldirān (east of Lake Umiya) the Persian cavalry gave way before the infantry of the Janissaries supported by artillery (2 Rādjab 920 = 23 Aug. 1514). Tabriz, Ismā'il's capital, and Mesopotamia and West Armenia as far as Mōsul were occupied by the Turks (921 = 1515). Ismā'il compensated himself to some extent for this loss by the conquest of Georgia, but he sought to attain the realisation of his plans of revenge against his most dangerous enemy by an alliance with European powers. An offer of this kind was made him by Charles V, after Leo X and Maximilian I had previously in 923 (1517) thought of gaining Ismā'il as an ally against the Turks, but on account of the great distance which separated the Shāh and the Emperor (it took almost six years for a letter to reach Charles V from Ismā'il), no definite agreement was reached.

Ismā'il died in 930 (1524) at Ardahil where the tombs of the Šafawīs are. The beautiful and valuable MSS. on the history of the Šūfī family now in the Imperial Library at Petrograd came from the library attached to the tomb of Shāh Šāfi. Ismā'il restored the Persian kingdom and his dynasty ruled till its overthrow by the Afghāns over two centuries later.

ISMA'IL II. Safawī of Persia, son and successor of Shāh Tahmāsp I. After the latter's death on 15 Šafar 984 (14 May 1576) his son Haidar Mirzā with the support of the Turkish tribe of the Ustādjlu sought to usurp the throne, but on the day after his accession he was seized in the ḥaram on the information of his sister Perī-Khānum and murdered during a rising in which the Ustādjlu and Afshār fought the Kizil-bāsh. Ismā'il, to whom his father had refused the rank of walī 'ahd (heir-apparent), as he knew him to be cruel and hard-hearted, had been a prisoner for nineteen and a half years in the fortress of Kaḥkaha. But he was released by the Kizil-bāsh and proclaimed Shāh on 27th Djumāda 984 (22 Aug. 1576). A greedy and covetous man, he filled his treasury with all the gifts offered him without offering anything in compensation. He also neglected to visit his aged mother who had retired to the mosque of Shāh 'Abd al-'Azīm. He thus made himself hated by all his subjects. The princes of the ruling house were put to death by him in 985 (1577) under the pretext that they had planned a rising with the support of Turkish dervishes. He forbade the Shī'is to curse the persons revered by the Sunnis. He was particularly fond of giving himself the title Adil (the noble), which he certainly did not merit. He died, after a reign of a little over two years, in his capital Kazwin of apoplexy after taking an electuary in Ramadān 986 (Nov. 1578).

ISMA'IL b. AHMAD, ABŪ IBRĀHĪM, a Sāmānid prince (amir) of Mā warā' al-Nahr, who laid the foundations of the power of his dynasty, born in Faighāna in Shawwāl 234 (28 Apr.—26 May 849), from 260 (874) to 279 (892) governor for his brother Naṣr in Bukhārā; he continued to reside in this town even after he became amir of Mā warā' al-Nahr by the death of his brother and in 280 (893) was confirmed in this position by the caliph. In the same year he undertook a campaign as far as Tarāz (the modern Awliyā-Atā, q. v.), conquered this town and changed its principal church into a mosque. On his struggle in Mā warā' al-Nahr with the Šaffārid 'Amr b. al-Laith see the latter article, i. 335^b. Although Ismā'il was declared to be dismissed from his office by the Caliph and his province granted to 'Amr, the Caliph expressed his satisfaction to the victor at the result of the struggle. The heritage of the Šaffārids in Khurāsān was disputed by Muḥammad b. Zaid, prince of Ṭabaristān. Ismā'il's general, Muḥammad b. Hārūn, not only succeeded in driving the enemy out of Khurāsān but even conquered Ṭabaristān; but he then rebelled against his master, adopted the white colour, the colour of the rebels against the legitimate government (Ṭabarī, iii. 2208) and occupied Raiy; Ismā'il had to take the field in person against the mutinous general; after his defeat, Raiy and Kazwin were incorporated in the Sāmānid kingdom and its frontiers thus settled in the west (289 = 902). In 291 (904) an inroad by a numerous Turkish people was repulsed with the help of volunteers from other Muslim countries (Ṭabarī, iii. 2249). The date of Ismā'il's death is given as 14 Šafar 295 (24 Nov. 907). In Bukhārā, which was made the capital of the Sāmānid kingdom by him (cf. i. 777^b), his tomb is still shown, but its authenticity is not vouched for by inscriptions either on the building or on the sarcophagus.

ISMĀ'IL B. BULBUL, ABU'L-ŠAKR, vizier of al-Mu'tamid. In 265 (878—9) Abu 'l-Šakr was appointed vizier; but the real ruler was al-Muwaffak, the Caliph's brother. At the beginning of Šafar 278 (May 891) a rumour gained currency that al-Muwaffak, who was then very ill, had died in Baghdād. His son Abu'l-'Abbās, the future caliph al-Mu'tadid, had also a strong following among the population of the capital and, when Abu'l-Šakr had the Caliph brought with his family from al-Mada'in to Baghdād and placed them in his own palace and not in that of al-Muwaffak, the adherents of Abu 'l-'Abbās believed that Abu 'l-Šakr was going to take the side of the weak and insignificant Caliph, and forcibly liberated Abu 'l-'Abbās, who had been imprisoned in 275 (889) for disobedience to his father. But when they learned that al-Muwaffak was still alive, Abu 'l-Šakr was abandoned by many of his followers and had to take refuge with al-Muwaffak, while his house was plundered. After the death of al-Muwaffak in Šafar, Abu 'l-Šakr was arrested however and all his houses given over to be plundered.

ISMĀ'IL B. AL-KĀSIM. [See ABU 'L-'ATĪHIYA.]

ISMĀ'IL B. NUḤ, ABU IBRĀHIM AL-MUNTAŠIR, a Sāmānid, after the fall of his dynasty in 389 (999) was carried a prisoner to Ūzgend in Farghāna; he succeeded in escaping from there in disguise and for several years contested the rule of Mā warā' al-Nahr with the Turkish conquerors. After his last defeat, he fled with only eight followers across the Oxus and was murdered in Rabi' I or Rabi' II 395 (16 Dec. 1004 — 12 Febr. 1005) by the leader of an Arab tribe at Merv. ISMĀ'IL B. ŠARIF, MÜLĀY, Sultān of Morocco, second of the dynasty of 'Alawī or Filālī Šarifs, also called Ḥasanī [q. v. for the genealogy of these Šarifs].

On the death of Sultān Mūlay al-Rashīd, the empire of Morocco was divided. Mūlay Ismā'il, governor of Mekines and brother of the deceased sultān, was proclaimed sultān in this town. He advanced at once on the capital Fās, which had declared against him and seized it. He was proclaimed there on 11 Dhu 'l-Hiǧdja 1082 (Apr. 14, 1672), being then 26 years of age.

But three rivals, his brother Mūlay al-Ḥarānī in Tāfilālt, his nephew Aḥmad b. Maḥraz, proclaimed in Morocco and in Sūs, and thirdly the guerilla chief al-Khiḍr Ghilān in the northwest, took the field against him. They were supported by the Turks of the Regency of Algiers who feared the establishment of a solid power in the west of the Maghrib and endeavoured to make trouble there. Mūlay Ismā'il at first drove his nephew Aḥmad b. Maḥraz out of the town of Morocco, defeated Ghilān in the north of Fās and had him put to death. But Aḥmad b. Maḥraz once more raised the lands of the south and the Atlas. To obtain peace Ismā'il had to recognise his nephew as Amir of the lands south of the Atlas and his brother al-Ḥarānī as Amir of Tāfilālt.

These civil wars, which had lasted five years, had hardly terminated when a descendant of the Marabouts of Dilā, Muḥammad al-Ḥāǧǧ al-Dilā'i, also supported by the Turks of Algiers, fomented a terrible rebellion in the country of Tādla and the provinces of western Morocco. But his Berber troops could not withstand Ismā'il's disciplined troops, especially his artillery. Mūlay Ismā'il, being victorious, terrorised the people to keep them quiet; more than ten thousand were beheaded; thousands of prisoners of war along with Christian slaves had to help to build the palace of Mekines, which the Sultān made his military capital. At the same time the plague carried off thousands of victims (1090 = 1679) in the regions of the Gharb and the Rif.

The vigorous repression of the Berber revolts and the epidemic afforded Mūlay Ismā'il a certain respite. He took advantage of it to raise a professional army. He enlisted former negro slaves gave them wives, allotted estates to them, trained them in the use of arms, and made of them the famous Black Guard of the 'Abid-Bukḥārī which was to assure him supremacy over all Morocco.

At the same time, nominally to favour the intransigent religious party, but in reality to watch the dealings of the Turks and Europeans in the seaports, and to counteract the influence of the corsairs, he organised the corps of the Mudjtahidūn or "volunteers of the faith". The latter corps, the cadre of which was formed by several hundred carefully selected 'Abid, waged an unceasing irregular warfare against the European possessions. They took 1 a Mamora (al-Ma'mūra), the modern al-Mahdiyya, by surprise from the Spaniards. Mūlay Ismā'il collected over 100 pieces of artillery there (1681). They harassed the English at Tangiers and the latter evacuated the town after blowing up the mole and the fortifications (1684) (cf. Davis, The History of the Second Queen's Royal Regiment, i., London, 1883, p. 118 sqq.). Larache also was forced to succumb to the blows of the "volunteers of the faith" in 1689, Azilā in 1691. But all attempts against Mlila and Ceuta failed. It was in vain that Mūlay Ismā'il endeavoured to get Louis XIV to aid him against Spain. French commerce had to suffer for some time as a result.

But the Peace of Ryswick in 1697 raised considerably Louis XIV's prestige above his enemies. Mūlay Ismā'il then sought his alliance against the Turks of Algiers who were mixed up in all the plots made in the Atlas against the Šarifs of Fās. An entente between France, the Bey of Tunis and the Sultān of Fās was then concluded. The latter even tried to cement it by a matrimonial alliance and demanded the hand of the Princess de Conti (cf. Plantet, Mouley Ismail et la Princesse de Conti, Paris, 1893). In spite of the failure of the latter plan, the entente secured to France great commercial benefits at Salā, Tetwān and Safi. Frenchmen superintended the building of the palaces, roads, and forts of the Sultān and sometimes (like Pillet) accompanied his artillery. On his part, the Sultān organised several expeditions against the Turks with the help of France, whose merchants supplied him with arms and munitions. But the slowness of the Moroccan armies did not enable Ismā'il to reap the advantages expected. He even allowed his ally, the Bey of Tunis, to be defeated near Constantine, which enabled the Turks of Algiers to come to fight the Moroccans in the west in full strength in 1701 and to drive them back.

The expeditions of Mūlay Ismā'il against the Turks, in spite of their relative lack of success, enabled him to pacify his frontiers where he built or renovated the fortifications. He built the fort of Reggāda in the mountain of the Banū Ya'lā commanding the high valley of the Wād Sharef and the lands of the Arab tribes of the High Plateaus. He built the fort of 'Ayūn Sīdī Mallūk in the plain of Angād and that of Salwāu in the land of the Trifa. He thus closed the exits on his north-east frontier. Forts built in the lands of each tribe kept the country quiet, especially the Marabouts, the natural allies of the Turks, whose privileges were tending to pass into the hands of the Sharifs. The latter gradually took over the direction of the religious elements, which were organised into brotherhoods. Ismā'il completed his system of domination by the creation of military zones. Tāza, notably, had its walls rebuilt. This town became the headquarters of the eastern march. A garrison of 2500 'Abid secured the passage from western to eastern Morocco by the pass of Tāza. It also had to keep in control the Berbers of the Rif in the north of this ravine, and the Berbers of the middle Atlas in the south.

For this organisation and these works, Ismā'il raised his revenues from a monopoly of the commerce at his ports and from continual raids on the tribes of doubtful loyalty. The monopoly besides filling his treasury enabled him also to prevent contraband traffic in horses and arms.

But hardly had the Sultān, after reigning 50 years succeeded in imposing, either by skill or terror, peace within his territory than the rivalries of his sons brought his hopes to nought. He had centred all his policy on the struggle against the Turks of Algiers. He could not realise his dream. He died on 27 Radjab 1139 (March 30 1727) just when the dissensions that were breaking up the Regency of Algiers might have secured his success. He was succeeded by his son Mūlay Aḥmad al-Dhahabi.

ISMĀ'IL ḤAKKĪ, SHAIKH ISMĀ'IL ḤAKKĪ AL-BRUSEWĪ or AL-ÜSKÜDĀRĪ, a celebrated Ottoman scholar and poet and one of the most prolific of mystical writers. Born in 1063 (1652—3) in Aidos in Rumelia, to which his father had retired after the great fire in Constantinople, he had at quite an early age the benefit of instruction by the Djelweti Shaiḫ Fazlī Ilāhī 'Oṭmān. In Adrianople he was initiated into the higher branches of knowledge and Djelweti mysticism. At the age of 20 he began his fruitful activity as an author in Brusa. On account of some of his mystical tracts he was banished at the instigation of the 'ulamā to Rodosto. The impulse to wander peculiar to many members of Muhammadan orders never allowed him to settle permanently anywhere, especially as he had not unfrequently to suffer from the fanaticism of the 'ulamā. After a two years' pilgrimage to Mecca and long stays in Üsküb, Damascus and Scutari he finally settled in Brusa, where he built a mosque and monastery in 1135 and died in 1137 (1724—5). The date 1127 also given is in contradiction to the date of composition of several works.

Ḥakkī composed over a hundred theological works and mystical treatises, which still enjoy considerable esteem and some of which are printed. The best are Rūḥ al-Bayūn (Būlāk 1276 = 1859—60 in four volumes), a celebrated commentary on the Qur'ān: Rūḥ al-Mathnawī, a commentary on Djalāl al-Dīn Rūmī, and Faraḥ al-Rūḥ (Delight of the Soul), a commentary on the Muḥammadiye of Yāzīdji Oghlu Mehmed b. Šālīḥ b. Kātib, Būlāk 1252 and 1258, Constantinople (lithography) 1258. The following are also often mentioned: Sharḥ al-arba'in ḥadīth, Constantinople 1253, ed. by Mollā 'Alī al-Ḥafīz; Kitāb Hudūd al-Bāliḡa and Reṣḥat 'Ain al-Ḥayāt (1291); Tuḥfe-i Ismā'iliye (1292); Sharḥ al-Kabīr, 1257 (1841); Sharḥ Shifab al-Imān, 1305; finally a commentary on the Pañd-nāma of 'Atā'i.

ISMĀ'IL ḤAKKĪ, a modern Turkish man of letters and literary historian, editor of the periodical Mekteb, a moderate follower of the old Asiatic school and a former officer of artillery. Besides a few poems, tales, translations, and articles in periodicals, a series of treatises on literary history have been written by him.

In 1308 (1890—91) appeared his collection of poems Sawdā-i Khazan yakhod Tehassur (Autumn Love or, Repentance too Late). Two Milli stories written under French influence: İki Ḥaḳīkat (Two Truths) published in n^o. 7 of the Arakel kitab khānesi dīeb romanları, 1311 (1893—94). In the periodical Mekteb appeared his translation of Octave Feuillet's Roman d'un jeune homme pauvre under the title Ḳālī'siz. He translated Lamartine's Raphael and Gratiella. His literary studies are more important, as there is by no means a superfluity of such works in Ottoman literature. In the four volumes of his On dördüncü 'aşrın Türk Mühâr- virleri (The Turkish writers of the xvth century), 1308—1311 (1890—3), he deals with Ahmed Midhat Efendi, Ekrem Bey, Djewdet Pasha and Shams al-Din Sâmî Bey. Of his Muâşir Şâ'irlerimiz (Our contemporary Poets) only the first part appeared in 1311 (1893), which gives specimens of Nabî-zâde Nazım Bey, 'Ali Rûhi Bey, Emîr Humâyî Bey and Mu'allim Djûdî Efendi. His 'Othmânî Meshâhîr-i Üdebâsi (The most famous Ottoman Authors) stopped after the first volume also: Mu'allim Nâdjî, 1311. His Muntakhabât-i Terâdjim-i Meshâhîr also was not completed. Hakkî also wrote on Mir 'Ali Shîr and the Çağatai poets. In 1907 he published a very poor history of Russia to the time of Paul I from a French source: "Records of the North or the History of Russia".

ISMÂ'İL PASHA, Khedive of Egypt (1863—1879), second son of Ibrâhîm Pasha [q. v.]; born in 1830, he was educated in Paris, and was employed by his uncle, Sa'îd Pasha [q. v.] in various diplomatic missions, to the Pope, Napoleon III and the Sultân of Turkey. In 1861 he suppressed an insurrection in the Sūdân, and two years later succeeded his uncle as wâlî of Egypt; he was the first of the descendants of Muhammad 'Alî [q. v.] to be styled Khedive, a title bestowed upon him in 1867, by Sultân 'Abd al-'Azîz [q. v.], whom he had gratified in the previous year by increasing the tribute paid to Turkey from £ 376,000 to £ 720,000, obtaining in return permission to change the law of succession to direct descent from father to son, instead of to the eldest male of the family, according to the Turkish custom. In 1873, another firmân from the Sultân made the Khedive in many respects an independent sovereign.

Isma'îl was a man of large ideas, with extensive schemes for reform; he remodelled the customs system, and established a post office; introduced gas and water and other improvements into Cairo, Alexandria and Suez, created the sugar industry and otherwise stimulated commercial progress, by extending railway and telegraph lines, building docks and harbours, and digging canals for irrigation purposes. He encouraged education, established the first schools in Egypt for girls, the polytechnic school for the training of military officers and the medical college; on his accession there were only 185 public schools, but during his reign the number rose to 4,817. In 1869, he opened the Suez Canal, with great pomp and magnificence, in the presence of the Emperor of Austria, the Empress Eugénie and other princes, and availed himself of this occasion to take rank among European sovereigns. In 1875, in place of the old system of consular jurisdiction in civil cases, he established the Mixed Tribunals.

He endeavoured also to develop the Sūdân on the same line as Egypt, and to suppress the slave trade there. In 1865 he had obtained from the Sultân of Turkey a firmân assigning to him the administration of Suwâkin and Massawa, and subsequently (1870—1875) extended his authority over the coast of the Red Sea from Suez to Cape Guardafui. In 1874 he sent an expedition to Dâr

Fûr [q. v.], defeated the forces of the slave-trader, Zubair Pasha [q. v.], and annexed this country, but further progress eastwards was checked by the resistance of the Abyssinians.

But these various schemes for the aggrandisement of Egypt were costly, and the Khedive had borrowed and squandered money recklessly, both for public purposes and personal ostentation, so that by 1876 the debt of Egypt to foreign financiers had risen to nearly one hundred million pounds, and the country was so impoverished that its ordinary resources were no longer sufficient for the most urgent needs of the administration. Being no longer able to raise loans in the European market, on April 8, 1876, he suspended payment of his Treasury bills. The European powers intervened on behalf of the bondholders and instituted a Commission of the Public Debt, and established the Dual Control, in accordance with which an English official was appointed Controller-General of the revenue and a French official Controller-General of the expenditure of the country. A Commission of Inquiry in 1878 led to the vast landed property of the Khedive being placed under a similar control, and Isma'îl accepted a constitutional ministry, including English and French ministers, under the presidency of Nûbâr Pasha [q. v.]; but in February 1879 Isma'îl dismissed him, on the occasion of a military disturbance headed by 'Arabî Pasha [q. v.], and two months later dismissed his European ministers also, and resisted the demand of the Governments of England and France that the British and French ministers should be reinstated. On June 26, 1879, he was deposed, and four days later he left Cairo for Naples, where the King of Italy had placed a residence at his disposal; later, he went to Constantinople, where he died March 2, 1895.

ISMÂ'İL PASHA, called NISHÂNDJÎ, Grand Vizier of the Turkish Sultân Sulaimân II, a native of Ayâsh in the province of Angora. After first of all filling the office of a çokadâr (mantle-bearer) to the Sultân he was retired with the rank of Beylerbey of Rumili. In 1809 (1678) he entered the office of tuḡhrā-writers and on the outbreak of unrest in the reign of Sulṭān Muḥammad IV received the rank of a vizier (1098 = 1687). After the assassination of Siyāwush Pasha in the rebellion of the Janissaries, which took place on the accession of Sulaimān II to the throne, he was appointed Grand Vizier, but dismissed after holding the office for 69 days (1 Rājāb 1099 = May 2 1688), imprisoned in the citadel of Kāwālā and soon afterwards banished to Rhodes. Prosecuted by the heirs of Zain al-ʿĀbidin Pasha, Beylerbey of Rūmili, who had been unjustly executed by his orders, he was beheaded in accordance with the jus talionis by order of the Grand Vizier Köprülü Mustafa Pasha at the age of over 70 in Rājāb 1101 = April 1690. Although of a mild temperament in his youth he grew tyrannical and cruel in the exercise of power. Instead of taking supreme command of the troops himself, he chose quite incompetent people as generals like the rebels Yegen ʿOthmān Pasha.

ISMĀ'IL AL-SHAHĪD, MAWLĀNĀ, was born on the 28th Shawwāl 1196 (1781) in a renowned Dihli family which traces its pedigree to the Caliph ʿUmar. He was the only son of Mawlānā ʿAbd al-Ghanī and nephew of the illustrious Mawlānā Shāh ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (d. 1239 = 1823). While a mere boy he lost his father and was brought up as an adopted son under the care of his uncle Mawlānā ʿAbd al-Kādir (d. 1242 = 1826). In childhood he was very inattentive and fond of swimming in the Jamna, but as he had a retentive memory and a sharp intellect, in time he became a learned man. He was shocked at the gross shirk (idolatrous tendency) which then prevailed amongst the Muslims of India. He preached the doctrines of Islām against all opposition. It was at this time that he came in contact with al-Saiyid Ahmad al-Mudjaddid. The religious sanctity of the Saiyid won his admiration and he became his disciple and was his constant companion throughout his life. In 1236 (1820) they made a pilgrimage to Mecca, whence they proceeded to Constantinople. There the Hādjdīs were received with marked consideration. Six years later they returned to Dihli and began to deliver religious lectures with redoubled energy. Many people were reclaimed from the darkness of ignorance to which they had been reduced owing to the indolence of the professional Mullās. Mawlānā Ismāʿil's rapid success excited the envy of the Mullās who afraid of being discredited with the public tried to lower him in their estimation by severe criticism and malicious censures. But truth triumphed and they were all silenced. In 1243 (1827) Mawlānā Ismāʿil, with his religious guide, proceeded to Peshāwar and declared a religious war against the Sikhs. They were joined by large numbers of people and succeeded in establishing their authority at Peshāwar. But owing to some innovations upon the usages of the Afghāns, their authority was overthrown. They had to fly across the Indus but fell in with a Sikh detachment; a skirmish took place in which Ismāʿil with his spiritual guide met with his death in 1247 (1331).

He is the author of the following works: 1) Risālat Uṣūl al-Fiqh, a treatise on the principles of Muhammadan law according to the Hanafi school, printed, Dihli A. H. 1311. 2) Manzab-i Imāmat, a Persian treatise on the problem of the imāmat. 3) Taḥṣiyat al-Imān, an Urdū treatise on theology, printed 1293, translated into English by Mir Shahāmat ʿAlī (v. Journ. Roy. As. Soc., xiii. 316 sq.). 4) Shirāt al-Mustakim, a treatise in Persian on the Islamic doctrines; on its contents cf. Journ. of the As. Soc. of Bengal, i. (1832) 479 sqq.

ISMĀ'ILĪYA, a Shīʿa sect, so called because it stopped the series of Imāms at Ismāʿil, eldest son of Djaʿfar al-Šādiq [q. v.], the sixth imām, so that Ismāʿil to them was the seventh; his father had at first nominated him as his successor, but having learned of his eldest son's intemperance, he changed his decision and declared Mūsā, his second son, as his successor. The Ismāʿiliya refused to admit this alteration, claiming that the imām, being infallible, could not have prejudiced himself by drinking wine and that it was not permitted to God to change His opinion, contrary to what Djaʿfar had stated. Ismāʿil died five years before his father at Medīna in 143 (760/1) and was buried in the cemetery of Baḳī al-Gharḳad. In spite of the precautions taken by the father to have the death of his son confirmed by numerous witnesses, his partisans would not admit his decease, claiming that he was still alive five years after his father's death and that he was seen in the market at Baṣra, where he cured a paralytic by taking his hand. The sons of Ismāʿil, involved in the political persecutions of which the ʿAlids were victims, left Medīna; Muḥammad, the elder, went to hide in the district of Damāwand, near Raiy; his descendants concealed themselves in Khurāsān, then in the Kandahār region and migrated to India, where they still exist at the present day. ʿAlī, his brother, set out for Syria and the Maghrib. From their places of retreat, the descendants of Ismāʿil sent out missionaries (dāʿi q. v., plur. dāʿi) to traverse the Muslim world and there preach the doctrine known as that of the esoterics (Bāḳiniya), whose starting point was the allegorical exposition of the Qurʾān. One of these missionaries was Maimūn, called al-Kaddāh "the oculist", whose son ʿAbd Allāh [q. v. i. 26] became chief of the branch of the Karmatians [q. v.]. With the assistance of a rich Persian, Muḥammad b. Ḥusain, called Zaidān, who had read in the stars that the Iranians were going to regain the empire (Fihrist, p. 188; O. Loth, in Morgenländische Forschungen, p. 307; M. Amari, Storia dei Musulmani di Sicilia, p. 114), he made them adopt his system, at once religious and social. At the end of the third century A. H. ʿUbaid Allāh b. Muḥammad al-Mahdi, recognised as imām by the Berbers of the tribe of Ketāma [q. v.], founded in Tunisia the empire of the Fātimids [q. v.] or ʿUbaidis, soon afterwards extended to Egypt.

Ismāʿiliya of Persia. Hasan b. Sabbāḥ [q. v.] was born in Raiy and was there instructed in the doctrine of the Bāḳiniya; to perfect himself in it, he went to Egypt in the caliphate of al-Mustansir in 471 (1078—1079); after a stay of a year and a half there, he was expelled and returned to Persia to act as a missionary and surreptitiously introduced himself into the fortress of Alamūt [q. v.], where he had already numerous partisans (6 Radjab 483 = Sept. 4 1090). Taking this castle as a base, he made raids in all directions with his disciples, taking the existing fortresses by surprise and building new ones. It is said that he made beautiful gardens in which the fidā'i's [q. v.], initiates of the first degree, enjoyed in anticipation the delights of Paradise; but it is more probable that this paradise was purely imaginary and was a result of the hallucinations caused by taking hashish [see the article ASSASSINS].

Thinking this a dangerous establishment, the Saldjūk Sultān Malik-Shāh ordered the Amir Arslān-Tāsh to attack Ḥasan b. Šabbāh (485 = 1092). He laid siege to Alamūt but was completely routed in a nocturnal sortie by the garrison. In the same year another centre of Ismā'ili propaganda, the fortress of Dere, was besieged in vain by another lieutenant of the Sultān, Kizil Šarygh. The death of Malik-Shāh put an end to these attempts of repression. Forty days previously the assassination of the vizier Nizām al-Mulk by a fidā'i, named Zāhir Arrānī, had been the first of these mysterious executions which were to plunge the Muslim world in terror. Two of the disciples of the master, the rā'is Muzaffar and Kiyā Buzurg-Umid [see BUZURGUMID], seized respectively the fortress of Gird-kūh and Lemser (Lenbeser, Hamdallāh Mustawfī, Nuḥḥat al-Kulūb, p. 61) (495 = 1102). Sultān Muḥammad sent against the Ismā'iliya Nizām al-Dīn Aḥmad, who for seven years ravaged the country round Alamūt, and next the Atābeg Nushtigin Šir-gir, who was about to take Lemser and Alamūt at the end of the year 511 (April 1118), when the Sultān's death interrupted the campaign. Sandjar, terrified by the sight of a dagger which a fidā'i had plunged in the ground in front of his throne, made peace with the Ismā'iliya.

Ḥasan dying on 26 Rabī' I 518 (June 12 1124) Kiyā Buzurg-Umid succeeded him and reigned without being disturbed till his death on 26 Dju-mādā I 532 (May 11 1138); it was the same with the latter's son, Muḥammad (died 557 = 1162). Muḥammad's son Ḥasan, called 'Alā dhik-rihi al-Salām introduced innovations into the cult. He placed the minbar opposite the kibla, while the rule is that the pulpit should be placed to the left of the mihrāb (559 = 1164) and he claimed to be a descendant of Nizār, son of al-Mustansir, which gave him the quality of Imām; the rescript in which he took this title and fixed the Ismā'ili doctrines, is called by his followers the sermon of the resurrection. At the end of four years he was assassinated at the castle of Lemser by his brother-in-law, a descendant of the Būyids. His son Muḥammad II avenged his death by the execution of the members of the family of the murderer and reigned undisturbed for 49 years. While the latter had carried on his father's tradition, his son Djalāl al-Dīn Ḥasan III on the contrary announced at his accession his intention of re-establishing the true religion of Islām. He ordered the mosques to be rebuilt and re-established public worship on Fridays. He was therefore given the name Naw-Muslimān (new Muslim). He died of poison like his father. His son 'Alā al-Dīn Muḥammad

III was only nine years old; his youth as well as a loss of blood caused by an accident in the fifth year of his reign forced him to withdraw from public affairs. Henceforth he lived confined to his palace and was murdered during a fit of intoxication (last day of Dhu 'l-Ka'da 651 = Jan. 21 1254) at the instigation of his son Rukn al-Dīn Khūr-Shāh. Hūlāgū [q. v.] having received orders from the Mongol emperor to destroy the stronghold of these dangerous fanatics (654 = 1256) laid siege to the fortress of Maimūndiz, where Rukn al-Dīn was. The grand-master surrendered, was kept a prisoner and taken to the court of Mangū, who refused to receive him; on his way back he was murdered on the banks of the Oxus. The fortress of Alamūt capitulated; that of Gird-kūh in Dāmghān held out for three years. The last traces of Ismā'iliya disappeared from Kuhi-stān in the reign of the Mongol Khān Abū Sa'īd, who sent a proselytising mission to Kāin. Shāh-Rukh, son of Timūr, also had the last followers of heresy hunted out in the same province; the only persons that could be suspected were a few soldiers, Saiyids or derwish.

Ismā'iliya of Syria. Their establishment in this country followed soon after their installation in the mountains of Dailam. They are found at Aleppo towards the last years of the xith century of our era in the reign of the Saldjūk prince Ridwān b. Tutuḥ, who was converted to their doctrines by a physician-astrologer. Their first victim was the father-in-law of this prince, Djanāh al-Dawla Ḥusain, lord of Himṣ, as he was about to march against the count of St. Gilles to make him raise the siege of Ḥiṣn al-Akrād [q. v.]. He was assassinated while at prayers by three Persians disguised as Sūfis. The astrologer was not long in dying suddenly (he was perhaps assassinated) and handed on his power to a companion, also of Persian origin, Abū Tāhir Ibn al-Sa'igh. The Ismā'iliya took Apamea by a ruse in 499 (1106), but the Crusaders took it from them again very soon afterwards. Their excesses provoked a massacre of their partisans at Aleppo (507 = 1113). The missionary Ibrāhīm, having escaped, tried to seize Shaizar on the Orontes by taking advantage of a Christian festival. In spite of the successful surprise, the inhabitants, led by the Amirs of the family of Munqidh, regained the barbecan (bāshūra) and were hauled up by ropes into the interior by the women who had remained there. Although the Ismā'ilis had again gained a certain amount of influence in Aleppo the ruler Ilghāzī prevented their gaining possession of the Ka'fat al-Sharif [cf. p. 231^b infra]. — On Ramaḍān 23, 515 (Dec. 5, 1121) Ismā'ili fidā'i's assassinated the Fātimid vizier al-Afdal b. Badr al-Djamālī [q. v.].

A rising of the population of Āmid (Diyār-Bakr) resulted in the massacre of the proselytes they had made in this town (518 = 1121) but the acquisition of the fortress of Bāniyās [q. v.] re-established their fortunes; Tughtegin, prince of Damascus, wishing to save his favourite Bahrām from the ill-treatment of the Damascenes, had left it to him. Bahrām fell in battle in 522 (1128) against the rebel natives. Ismā'il the Persian succeeded him; after the massacre of his partisans at Damascus (15 Ramaḍān 523 = Sept. 1 1129) he handed the citadel of Bāniyās over to the Crusaders.

To make up for this loss, the Ismā'iliya purchased from Saif al-Mulk b. 'Amrān the castle of Qadmūs (527 = 1132), where Benjamin of Tudela still found a few decades later the residence of the head of the sect, and captured by a trick that of Maṣyāth (Maṣyāf). At this time they held no less than six fortresses in Syria, — as many as ten according to William of Tyre —. To avenge the murder of Raymond I, count of Tripoli, the Templars attacked them and forced them to pay tribute.

At this period, the Isma'īliya (from 1169) had at their head Rāshid al-Dīn Sinān, son of Sulaimān, grandmaster of the Assassins, who came from the neighbourhood of Baṣya and had studied at Alamūt. The immoralities to which they abandoned themselves roused against them the inhabitants of the town of al-Bāb, between Buzā'a and Aleppo, who smoked them out of their retreats and exterminated them as far as possible (cf. also Ibn Džubair, ed. Wright—de Goeje, p. 249 sq.). On 11th Dhu 'l-Ka'da 571 (May 22 1176) Ṣalāh al-Dīn just missed being a victim of an attempt against him by the fanatics and was saved by the strips of iron which lined his bonnet; to avenge himself he was going to lay siege to Maṣyāth, but refrained from taking the town on account of the fatigues undergone by his army or perhaps in face of threats of the Assassins. He even seems to have made a pact with his enemies, for he stipulated in the treaty concluded with Richard Cœur de Lion that it should apply equally to the lands of the Isma'īliya.

On Rabī' II, 13, 588 (Apr. 29 1192) two Isma'īlis attacked Conrad of Montferrat, lord of Tyre, just as he was coming from dinner with a bishop and assassinated him. Later Raymond, elder son of Boemund IV le Boigne, prince of Antioch, was killed in the church of Anṭarsūs.

Hullāḡ, before putting to death Rukn al-Dīn Khūrshāh, grandmaster of Alamūt, received from him an order to the commandants of the fortresses in Syria to hand them over to the Mongols. Four of these castles were actually surrendered as soon as the Mongols appeared in Syria in 658 (1260) but were retaken soon afterwards by their old masters on the victory of the Mamlūk Sultān Kūṭuz. It was Sultān Baibars who finally conquered these fortresses from 668 to 671 (1270—1273). From that date the Isma'īliya recognised Egyptian sovereignty and continued to supply assassins to rulers willing to employ them; Ibn Baṭṭūṭa (ed. Paris, i. 166, 167) knew that they were in the pay of al-Malik al-Nāṣir Muḥammad b. Qalā'ūn.

Isma'īliya in India. They are known by the names of Khodja [q. v.] or Mawlā; their chief is the Agha Khān [q. v.], whose official title is His Highness Aga Sir Sultān Muḥammad, a great sportsman and devoted to travelling, a contributor to the Nineteenth Century and to East and West; he fills an important position in politics and in 1906 was president of the deputation sent to the Viceroy by the Muslims of India. He is the descendant of the old imāms and can trace his descent direct to Abu 'l-Ḥassān, governor of Kirmān under the Zand dynasty, who afterwards retired to his estate of Maḥallāt near Kumm. The latter's son was Shāh Khālil Allāh, called Saiyid Kahkī, murdered in 1817 at Yazd; to the latter's son, Agha Khān Maḥallātī, Faṭḥ 'Alī Shāh gave the hand of one of his daughters; rebelling in 1838 he had to leave Kirmān and take refuge in Sindh, where he found some Nizārī Khōdjas; he lived successively in Bombay, Poona and Bangalore.

Muḥammad is the son of this Agha Khān; from his father he has inherited his taste for sports.

Present Distribution of the Isma'īliya. There are still several thousands in Syria, who live in the ancient fortresses of Maṣyāth, Qadmūs, etc. They are inoffensive, and faithful subjects of the Ottoman empire; the plundering of the first of these sites by the Nuṣairis in 1809 produced the ms. publ. and transl. by Stanislas Guyard (Fragments relatifs à la doctrine des Ismaélites in Notices et Extraits, xxii. i. 1874). In Persia there are some in the district above mentioned of Maḥallāt near Kumm: in Central Asia they are found in Badakhshān, Khokand and Karategin, as well as in a district near Balkh; in Afghānistān, they are known under the name of Mustadi. In Kāfiristān (valleys of Djalālābād and Kemar) there are many Mawlāis, as well as in several valleys of the upper Oxus (Sāriqol, Wakhān and Yāsīn). In India there are 99476 in the districts of Adjmīr, Merwāra, Rājputāna, the Punjab and Kashmīr, and 52658 in those of Bombay, Baroda and Coorg (Census of India, 1901, I, 561 sqq.). They are not all followers of the Agha Khān. Among the Bōhorā [q. v.] of Guḍjarāt, the Dā'ūdī, who form the bulk of the community (130,000), are Isma'īlī (Rev. du Monde Musulman, x. 472).

They are numerous in 'Omān: there are some in all the towns; their headquarters are at Maṭrah, near Muscat. They are also found at Zanzibar and in what used to be German East Africa, where they number tens of thousands and are increasing in numbers by conversions.

Doctrine. God is entirely without attributes, incomprehensible and incapable of being cognised. He did not create the universe directly; by an act of will called amr, he made manifest Universal Reason, in which are all the divine attributes and which is God in his implied outward manifestation. As prayer cannot be addressed to an inaccessible being, it is turned toward his exterior manifestation, Reason, which thus becomes the real divinity of the Isma'īliya. As one cannot attain to knowledge of God, but only of Reason, the latter is given the names of the Veil, the Place, the Antecedent, Spirit, the First.

Reason creates the universal Soul, whose essential attribute is life, as that of reason is knowledge; being imperfect in the latter respect, it necessarily strives to reach perfection. Whence arises a movement which is the inverse of emanation. The Soul produced primal matter, which forms the earth and the stars; it is passive and receives the impress of forms, the ideas of which exist in Reason.

There are two necessary and primitive entities, space and time. The combined action of these five entities produces the movements of the spheres and of the elements. The appearance of man is explained by the need which the universal soul feels to attain perfect knowledge in order to rise to the nature of universal Reason. When this end is attained all movement will cease. To gain salvation knowledge must be acquired, which can only come from the earthly incarnation of Reason, the Prophet, with his successors the Imāms. Incarnate reason is called nāṭiq "speaking", and the incarnate soul asūs "foundation"; the first is the Prophet, manifesting the revealed word, the second is the interpreter of this word by means of the inner meaning which this word contains (ta'wīl).

The three last principles became the imām, the ḥudūdīya, charged with giving proof of the mission of the asās, and the ḍawī or "missionary". Muḥammad was the nāṭiq and 'All the asās.

There were several degrees of initiation (at first seven, then nine). The missionary began by putting embarrassing questions to the neophyte on knotty points of Muslim theology (the usual process with the Bāṭiniya) and led him quite gradually to admit that these difficulties were easily solved by the allegorical and symbolical interpretation of the Qurʾān. Calculations made from the numerical value of letters played an important part (see Fragment ii. of St. Guyard and the article HURUFĪ above ii. 338 b). When the proselyte had acknowledged the force of his arguments, the missionary made him take an oath not to reveal any of the mysteries which were going to be entrusted to him and taught him that in order to be saved it was necessary to submit blindly, perinde ac cadaver, to the spiritual and temporal guidance of the Imām. The majority of the adepts did not pass beyond the first or second stages of initiation; the missionaries hardly reached the sixth. Only a few superior individuals could hope to reach the higher degree (cf. the theories of the Shīʿa and mystics on the insān kāmīl [q. v.]).

Paradise allegorically signified the state of the soul which had reached perfect knowledge; hell was ignorance. No soul was condemned to hell eternally; it returned to earth by metempsychosis until it had recognised the imām of the epoch and had learned theological knowledge from him. Evil did not exist as a principle and would one day disappear through the progressive assimilation of all creation to universal reason. In spite of the reputation as assassins, which tarnished the fame of the Ismāʿīliya, it should not be imagined that their crimes were the application of a dogma; one should rather see in this the excesses of the absolute political power which the grandmasters had arrogated to themselves. Rousseau (Annales des Voyages, xiv. 286) has noted that those whom he knew were hospitable and of a gentle temperament. They do not care to travel, are active at home, much attached to their religion, which however differs very much from the old creed, and are brave at need and obedient to their chiefs.

ISMĀʿĪLIYA, a town situated about the middle of the Suez Canal. It was laid out in 1863 during the construction of the Canal, and named after the Khedive Ismāʿīl. It was a place of much importance whilst the work of excavation went on, but as soon as the canal was completed, it quickly decayed. In recent years it has recovered some of its prosperity through the traffic between Cairo and the mail steamers. It is connected by railway with Port Saʿīd, Cairo and Suez, and there are good hotels, baths, etc. The town is surrounded by plantations and gardens, Lake Timsāḥ being on the south side.

ISPAHĀN [see ISFAHĀN.]

ISPAHBAD (Pahlavi spāh-pat, head of an army, Procopius' σπαρβέτης), general of cavalry. Under the Sāsānians, as a proper noun, it meant one of the seven privileged families of Arsakid origin; as a common noun, it was applied to the fifth of the great hereditary offices, the command of the cavalry (Theophylactes, iii. 8); the second of these offices, that of military affairs in general, was that of the Ērānspāhbadh. Under Khusrāw I Anōshā-Rawān, Persia was divided into four great military commands, the chiefs of which had the title ispahbad and had each under their orders a pā-dhospān (viceroys), who was formerly independent. After the conquest of Persia, Ṭabaristān, separated from the rest of the country by the high chain of Elburz, maintained its independence for a considerable time under princes who had the title ispahbad (Arab. al-ispahbadh, al-Balādhurī, p. 336 paen.). Māziyār (Mayazdyār) b. Kārīn was appointed by the Caliph al-Ma'mūn governor of this province with the same title (ib., p. 339). The coins struck by these princes give the names of Khwarshēdh I in 93 (711) and 97 (715), Farukhān (105–110 = 723–728), Dādḥ Burdj Mihr in 120 (738), Khwarshēdh II (122–148 = 740–765); after 151 (768) the names are those of Muslim governors. When in the viith (xiiith) century, the family of Bāward reconstituted an independent state in Ṭabaristān, these princes, who added Muslim titles to their Iranian proper names, revived the title ispahbad ('Alā' al-Dawla 'Alī b. Shahriyār b. Kārīn, Nuṣrat al-Dīn Rustam, Tādj al-Mulūk 'Alī b. Mardāwīdj, Ḥusām al-Dawla Ardāshīr b. Hasan).

ISPANDĀRMADH (P.), twelfth month of the Persian solar year, also name of the fifth day of each month.

ISPARTA (in Ibn Baṭṭūṭa: Sabartā; Sabārṭa in the Arabic translation of the Acts of the Apostles, xxi. 1, for the Greek Patara, cf. Ztschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., ix. 731), the ancient Baris Pisidia (Pliny, Nat. Hist., v. § 147; Ptolemy v. § 5), was taken from the Byzantines by the Ṣaldjūks of Kōnya in the reign of Kīlidj Arslan III (600—601 = 1203—1204) (Houtsma, Rec. de Textes rel. à l'Hist. des Seldjoucides, iii. 62 = iv. 26). After the downfall of the kingdom of Kōnya Isparta belonged to the Ḥamidoğlu [q. v.] and was sold by the last ruler of this dynasty in 783 (1381—2) with the greater part of his lands to Sultān Murād I (Leunclavius, Hist., p. 238; Saʿd al-Dīn, i. 98). Under Ottoman rule Isparta was the residence of the sandjak-bey of Ḥamid-eli, now it is the headquarters of the mutesarrif of Ḥamidābād and of the Greek Metropolitan of Pisidia. The population of the prosperous town is estimated at 30,000, of whom 6000 are Greeks and 500 Armenians; it has numerous mosques (13 djāmiʿ, 63 masjid), the mosque of Firdaws-bey being a work of Sinān, 9 madrasas and a library of 600 volumes; also 8 Greek churches and one Armenian, the former not without interest. Among the products of industry may be mentioned carpets (600 looms), aladja and boghazi (250 workshops), silk, attar of roses, and alcohol.

ISRĀʾ. The term isrāʾ is taken from the Kurʾān, Sūra xvii. 1: "Glory to Him who caused His servant to journey by night (asrā bi ʿabdihi laylān) from the sacred place of worship to the further place of worship, which We have encircled with blessings, in order that We might show him some of our signs! Verily He (i. e. God) is the Hearer and the Beholder." — We do not know whether this verse originally formed part of chap. xvii or was first promulgated in some other context, nor need we enquire what may have been the real sense of the verse. In any case it is noticeable that the tradition gives but three explanations.

¹⁰. The older one, which disappears from the more recent commentaries, detects in this verse an allusion to Muḥammad's Ascension to Heaven. This is the more interesting, as these traditions (Bukhārī, ed. Cairo 1278, ii. 185, Bāb kāna ʿl-nabiyyu tanāmu ʿainuhu walā yanāmu

kalbuhu, n^o. 2; Muslim, ed. Būlāk 1290, i. 59; Ṭabarī, *Tafsīr*¹, xv. 3, cf. Der Islam, vi. 12, 14) retain also the original signification of the story of the Ascension which has been shown to be the initiation to the prophetic career (Bevan, Muhammad's Ascension to Heaven, p. 56; Schrieke, Der Islam, vi. 1 sqq.; see the art. MĪRĀDJ). This explanation interprets the expression al-masjid al-aḳṣā, "the further place of worship" in the sense of "Heaven" and, in fact, in the older tradition isrāʾ is often used as synonymous with mīrādj (Der Islam, vi. 14).

²⁰. The second explanation, the only one given in all the more modern commentaries, interprets al-masjid al-aḳṣā as "Jerusalem" and this for no very apparent reason. It seems to have been an Umayyad device intended to further the glorification of Jerusalem as against that of the holy territory (cf. Goldziher, Muh. Stud., ii. 55 sqq.; Der Islam, vi. 13 sqq.), then ruled by ʿAbd Allāh b. Zubair. Ṭabarī seems to reject it. He does not mention it in his "History" and seems rather to adopt the first explanation (see Der Islam, vi. 2, 5, 6, 12, 14; Ṭabarī, Annales, i. 1157 sqq., a passage which appears to represent the historian's final verdict formed on full consideration of the evidence before him, cf. Bevan, op. cit., p. 57).

Explanations ¹⁰ and ²⁰ concur in interpreting ʿabd in xvii. 1 by Muḥammad and this seems to be right (Der Islam, vi. 13, note 6). The idjmāʿ admitted both interpretations and, when the Umayyad version had arisen, harmonised the two by assigning to isrāʾ the special sense of night journey to Jerusalem. The Ascension, having lost its original meaning, was altered in date, being made to fall at a later period (see art. MĪRĀDJ) and it became possible to combine both stories as appears, in fact, to have been done previously by Ibn Ishāk in the oldest extant biography of Muḥammad (Bevan, op. cit. p. 54).

The story of the night journey to Jerusalem runs as follows:

One night as Muḥammad was sleeping in the neighbourhood of the Kaʿba at Mecca (or in the house of Umm Ḥānī, Der Islam, vi. 11) he was awakened by the angel Gabriel who conducted him to a winged animal, called Burāk (Bevan, op. cit., p. 55, 57, 59; Der Islam, vi. 12 sq., with the literature quoted there and the art. BURĀK), and with Muḥammad mounted on this animal they journeyed together to Jerusalem. On the way thither they encounter several good and several wicked, powers (Mishkāṭ al-Maṣābiḥ, ed. Dihli 1268, p. 521 sq.; Baghawī, Maṣābiḥ al-Sunna, ed. Cairo 1294, ii. 179, with a harmonising interpolation) and visit Hebron and Bethlehem (Nasāʾi, Sunan, ed. Cairo 1312, i. 77 sq.; Nuwairi, MS. Warner 2^a, p. 93, l. 7—10). At Jerusalem they meet Abraham, Moses, and Jesus, of whom a description is given (e. g. Bukhārī, ed. Cairo 1278, ii. 147). The ṣalāt is performed, Muḥammad acting as imām and thereby taking precedence of all the other prophets there assembled. This meeting with the Prophets at Jerusalem resembles and may well have been modelled on the transfiguration of Jesus on Mount Tabor (Matth. xviii. 1; Mark ix. 1; Luke ix. 28), cf. Der Islam, vi. 15.

Standing at the hidjr Muhammad saw Jerusalem and described it to the unbelieving Kuraishites (Bukhārī, ii. 221, iii. 102; Muslim, i. 62; Tabarī, Tafsīr, xv. 5, l. 14 a. f., etc.). The story is woven into a connected whole as follows: Muhammad journeys by night to Jerusalem, returns and at Mecca describes his adventures; the Kuraishites disbelieve him and Muslims apostasize; Muhammad seeks to defend the truth of his story, but he has forgotten the particulars; whereupon Allāh causes him to actually behold Jerusalem (see Der Islam, vi. 15 sq.).

In the more modern and longer narratives the story is further amplified (see e. g. A. Müller, Der Islam in Morgen- und Abendland, i. 86 sq.). The prophet is said to have held 70 000 conversations with Allāh, although the whole journey proceeded so quickly that, when he returned, his bed was still warm and the watercup which he had overthrown with his foot at his hurried departure, was not yet empty. By Muslim theologians the question has been discussed, whether the isrā' happened while Muhammad was asleep or awake and whether it was his spirit or his body which journeyed. The orthodox opinion is that the journey was performed by Muhammad with his body and awake. Tabarī in his commentary (xv. 13) very decidedly supports this meaning for the following reasons: 1) If the prophet had not been carried away in a corporeal sense the event would afford no proof of his divine mission and those who disbelieved the story could not be accused of infidelity. 2) It is stated in the Qur'ān that God caused his servant to journey, not that He caused his servant's spirit to journey. 3) If the prophet had been carried away in spirit only, the services of Burāk would not have been required, since animals are used for carrying bodies not for carrying spirits (Bevan, op. cit., p. 60; Schrieke, Der Islam, vi., 13; Tabarī, Baidāwī, and Baghawī, Tafsīr, ad xvii. 1). Mystics and philosophers often favour an allegorical interpretation (Goldziher, Geschichte der Philosophie im Mittelalter in Kultur der Gegenwart, i. v., p. 319).

ISRAEL. [See ISRĀ'ĪL.]

ISRĀFĪL, the name of an archangel, which is probably to be traced to the Hebrew Serāfīm as is indicated by the variants Sarāfil and Sarāfin (Tāzī al-'Arūs, vii. 375). The change of liquids is not unusual in such endings. His size is astounding; while his feet are under the seventh earth, his head reaches up to the pillars of the divine throne. He has four wings: one in the west, one in the east, one with which he covers his body and one as a protection against the majesty of God. He is covered with hair, months and tongues. He is considered to be the angel who reads out the divine decisions from the well-kept Tablet and transmits them to the Archangel to whose department they belong. Three times by day and three times by night he looks down into Hell and is convulsed with grief and weeps so violently that the earth might be inundated by his tears.

For three years he was the companion of the Prophet, whom he initiated into the work of a prophet. Gabriel then took over this task and began the communication of the Qur'ān.

Alexander is said to have met him before his arrival in the land of darkness; there he stood upon a hill and blew the trumpet, tears in his eyes. If he is called Lord of the Trumpet, it is mainly because he continually holds the trumpet to his mouth in order to be able to blow at once as soon as God gives the order for the blast which is to arouse men from their graves. It is however also said that Isrāfīl will be first aroused on the day of the Resurrection. He will then take his stand upon the holy rock in Jerusalem and give the signal which will bring the dead back to life.

In modern Egypt it is said that his music will refresh the inhabitants of Paradise.

ISRĀ'ĪL, the name of the patriarch of Israel. only appears once in the Qur'ān, apart from the frequent name, Banū Isrā'īl, for the people of Israel. In Sura iii. 87 it is said: "All foods were permitted to the Israelites except that which Israel declared forbidden for himself before the Tora was revealed". According to the commentators, this means that the restrictions on food were only revealed as a result of the wickedness of the Israelites. Their ancestor himself only refrained from eating camel flesh or drinking camel milk; according to some, because he was afflicted with the disease called 'irḳ al-nasū, which kept him awake by night and left him during the day. He therefore made a vow to abstain from his favourite food, if he should be cured. According to others, he did not eat the irḳ al-nasū (nervus ischiadicus) by the advice of his physicians; or he abstained from all sinews (irḳ). The word is a translation of the Hebrew gid and al-nasū is a transcription of the Hebrew nasheh. This points to Genesis xxxii., the well known story of the dislocation of Jacob's thigh by the angel as an explanation of the fact that the Israelites "to this very day" do not eat the nervus ischiadicus.

The question remains how could Jacob's private abstinence be obligatory for the Israelites. According to some, a prophet, as Jacob was, is by nature qualified to decide questions of law (Arabic muḍjtahid). According to others, Jacob received God's permission to make this regulation.

The rest that is told of Isrā'īl in the Qur'ān is found under the name Ya'qūb. At first Muhammad seems to have regarded Ya'qūb as a son of Ibrāhīm. In the prophecy made to Sara, he says: "Then we promised her Ishāḳ and afterwards Ya'qūb" (xi. 71; cf. Snouck Hurgronje, Het Mekkaansche Feest, p. 32). The commentaries hasten to explain that according to the Arabic usage "afterwards" must refer to the grandson.

It is further stated in the Qur'ān that Ya'qūb on his death bed warned his sons to be steadfast in the faith of Ibrāhīm (ii. 126 sqq.); like most of the patriarchs he received revelations (ii. 130 etc.).

Muslim legend is acquainted with the main points of Jacob's history. Only divergent and non-Biblical features will be noted here. Ya'qūb was actually older than his twin brother Esau. When he was going to be born in front of the latter, Esau was angry and the two brothers quarrelled even in the mother's womb. Esau then said: Wallāh, if thou wishest to be born first, I shall close up my mother's womb and kill her. Ya'qūb then yielded and Esau was the first born. — This story is also found in Jewish literature. — After winning the first born's blessing by trickery, Ya'qūb fled to his uncle. From fear of Esau he concealed himself by day and travelled by night (yasrī or yasir fil-lail), hence the name Isrā'īl. The Muslim legend therefore does not know of the change of name at Pnuel. — As to his marriage with two sisters, it is said that Moses was the first to forbid this. But it is also said that Ya'qūb did not marry Rāhīl until after Liyā's death.

ISSIK-KUL (Turkish "warm lake"), the most important mountain lake in Turkistan and one of the largest in the world, situated in 42° 30' N. Lat. and between 76° 15' and 78° 30' E. Long., 5116 feet above sea level; the length of the lake is about 115 miles, the breadth up to 37 miles, the depth up to 1381 feet, and the area 2400 square miles. From the two chains of the Thian-Shan, the Kungei-Alatau (in the north) and the Terskei-Alatau (in the south) about 80 large and small mountain streams pour into the Issik-Kul, of which the most important, Tup and Djergalan, flow into it from the east; of the others there may be mentioned: on the south bank, the Karakol, Kizil-Su, Djuka (or Zauka), Barskoun and Ton, on the north bank, two Ak-Su's and three Koi-Su. On the origin of the depression Kutemaldi, which now connects the Ču with the Issik-Kul [cf. Ču, i. 880b sqq.], views differ; it is said that the Kočkar, now the upper course of the Ču, previously flowed into the Issik-Kul and the latter had an exit in the Ču; at present the Kočkar sends an arm to the Issik-Kul through the Kutemaldi only when it is flooded; at other times there are only a few ditches there filled with water, without any definite current. The question is only of importance for geology and physical geography; in the historical period the Issik-Kul has, as all accounts show, always been a salt lake without an exit.

The oldest of these descriptions we owe to the Chinese writer Huan-Čuang (viith cent. A. D.); the Chinese name (Jo-Hai = warm sea; the lake never freezes) corresponds exactly to the Turkish name. The latter first appears in the Hudūd al-'Ālam (372 = 982—3); in Ḳudāma (ed. de Goeje, p. 262) the lake is only mentioned, but not named. The ms. of the Hudūd al-'Ālam has Iskūk (f. 3b) or Iskūl (f. 18a); the form was probably the same in the Muǧmil al-Tawarikh (the ms. has S-kūk, cf. W. Barthold, Turkestan etc., i. 19); Gardizi, (in Barthold, Ōljet, etc., p. 89 ult.) writes Isigh-Kūl, Djahānī quotes Iskūl from al-Kharakī in Nallino, al-Battānī, p. 175, but with tashād over the k. In the history of Timūr's campaigns, in Sharaf al-Din (Zafar-Nāma, Ind. ed., i. 494, ii. 634), as well as in Ibn 'Arabshāh (Egypt. ed., p. 156) the form is Isī Kūl, in the Tārīkh-i Rashīdī (cf. the text in Barthold, Ōljet etc., p. 50, note 1), Isigh Kūl.

In the oldest Chinese accounts (from the i^{ind} century A. D.) the land appears in the possession of the nomadic people of the Wu-sun. But from the viith century A. D. on, permanent settlements, even towns are mentioned. One of the trade routes from China to Western Asia at that time led through the Badal pass to the south bank of the Issik-Kul and from there into the valley of the Ču; the most important market on the Issik-Kul was Barskhān, the name of which is probably identical with the modern name of the river Barskoun. Gardizi gives a legend due to a popular etymology about Alexander the Great and Persians left behind by him on the Issik-Kul; this popular etymology makes certain the reading Barskhān against the form Nushdjan given by de Goeje according to Yāqūt, iv. 823. According to Gardizi, Barskhān could put 6000 men in the field; according to Ḳudāma, the principal place on the shore of the lake could itself raise 20,000 men (Barskhān, according to Ḳudāma, consisted of nine towns, four of some size and five small ones). Three days journey west of Barskhān lay Tūnk, the name of which obviously corresponds to the name of the river Ton; between Barskhān and Tūnk there were only to be seen tents of the nomad Djikil. 12 farsakh west of Tūnk was the town of Yār, which could raise 3000 men. In Hudūd al-'Ālam there is further mentioned "a prosperous place, visited by merchants", the town of Sīkūl, on the border between the settlements of two nomad peoples, the Djikil and the Khallukh (Karluk); the town probably bore the name of the lake; a town "Yssicol" on the north shore of the lake of the name is still given in the Carta Catalana of the year 1375 A. D.; there was said to be an Armenian monastery with relics of the Apostle Matthew (Notices et Extraits, xiv. Pt. ii., p. 132 sq.).

Of this civilization, which probably was destroyed about the same time (viiith = xivth century) and under the influence of the same causes as the civilization on the Ču [cf. i. 881], only a few walls and mounds of brick, and some cemeteries have survived, including a Muhammadan cemetery on the Kungei-Aksu with inscriptions of the vith (xiith) century (Protokoli Turk. Kruzhka Ljub. arkh. xi. 5 sq.) and a Nestorian cemetery discovered in 1907 on the Djuka, with inscriptions in Syriac and Turkish; one of these inscriptions (of 1330 A. D.) was published by P. Kokowzoff (Bulletin de l'Académie, etc. 1909, p. 774 sq. 788 sq.).

The Turkish and Mongol nomads liked to use the shores of the Issik-Kul as a winter resort on account of the favourable weather conditions (the snow here rarely lies to any considerable depth), so that the Issik-Kul is several times mentioned in the military history of Central Asia. A fortress was built by Timūr "in the middle of the lake", i. e. on an island, to which, amongst others the Tatars deported from Asia Minor were banished. It is probably the same fortress as is called Koi-su by Haidar Mirzā [q. v., ii. 219] (Tārīkh-i Rashīdī, transl. Ross, p. 78); a Mongol amir is said to have sent his family there in the ixth (xvth) century, to put them in safety from the inroads of the Kalmucks. At the present day there are no islands in the lake; the disappearance of the island mentioned, with the fortress upon it was probably caused by an earthquake.

Connected with this perhaps is the fact that pieces of bricks and other fragments are frequently washed up on the shores of the Issik-Kul. On the Issik-Kul itself it is said that a great town here was overwhelmed by the waves of the lake and its walls and buildings can be seen in clear weather; but this story has so far not been confirmed and is probably based on folklore about sunken cities (which is to be found in the most diverse countries). The catastrophe, if there was one, can only have happened comparatively recently; Haidar-Mirza, to whom we owe the latest and fullest account of the Issik-Kul in Muḥammadan literature (Tārīkh-i Rashīdī, p. 366 sq.), knows neither of the disappearance of an island nor of rubble being washed up, nor of any sunken towns. What Haidar-Mirza has to say about the Issik-Kul corresponds in general to the facts, but there are a few peculiar assertions. He says for example that on account of the great proportion of salt in it, the water is unsuitable for washing in; in reality the proportion of salt is very slight.

In the xviith—xviiith centuries the shores of the lake were under the rule of Buddhist Kalmucks; Tibetan inscriptions in the country south-east of the lake still recall this period. The Mongol name of the Issik-Kul was Temurtu-Nor, "iron lake": many of the mountain streams flowing into the Issik-Kul carry ferriferous sand; small knives, etc. are made from this iron by the Kara-Kirgiz; the Turkish peoples about the same time also called the lake Tüz-Köl ("Salt-lake"). Even in the Kalmuck period the Kara-Kirgiz [q. v.] had grazing grounds here; the land remained in their possession after the conquest of the Kalmuck kingdom by the Chinese; Chinese rule was never firmly established here in spite of several attempts; About the middle of the xixth century the Russians advanced across the Ili; the Issik-Kul was reached in 1856 by Colonel Khomentowski; a part of the Kara-Kirgiz was forced to submit to Russian rule as early as 1855 and the remainder in 1860. The Russians founded the town of Karakol, called Przewalsk since 1888, so far the only town in the country round the Issik-Kul (according to the census of 1897, 7987 inhabitants, now about 15000) and several villages; all these settlements are in the eastern part of the Issik-Kul valley: the western part is still inhabited only by nomads. The settlements are still, as in the middle ages, called after the rivers on which they lie; the official Russian names are rarely used, even by Russians; even the Russian peasant always says "Tūp" for Preobrazenskaya and "Kizil-su" (which is corrupted to "Kozeltzi") for "Pokrowskaya". Thanks to the fertility of the soil, the villages are in a flourishing condition, in spite of the frequent earthquakes.

ISTAKHR, a town in Fārs [q. v., ii. 70]. The real name was probably Stakhr, as it is written in Pahlavi; the Armenian form Stahr and the abbreviation ST on Sāsānian coins point in the same direction. The form with prosthetic vowel is modern Persian; it is usually pronounced Istakhar or Istahar, also with inserted vowel Sitakhar, Sitakhar, Sitarkh; cf. Vullers, Lex. Pers.-Lat., i. 94^a, 97^a, ii. 223, and Nöldeke in Grundr. der Iran. Philol., ii. 192. The Syriac form is Istahr (rarely Istahr), in the Talmud probably Istahar (סְטַחָר, Megilla 13^a, middle). According to the statements of Persian authors, the town received its name from the lakes or swamps there. Perhaps however, it is better to be derived with Spiegel (Erānische Altertumskunde, i. 94, note 1) and Justi (Grundr. der Iran. Philol., ii. 448) from the Avestan stakhrā "strong, firm"; for the latter word cf. Chr. Bartholomae, Alliran. Wörterbuch, p. 1591.

Istakhr lies in 29° 50' N. Lat. and about 53° E. Long., a short hour's journey north of Persepolis, in the narrow valley of the Pulwar or Murghāb (also called Siwand-Rūd), which soon emerges into the fair fertile, but now partly inundated plain of Marwdašt. We have no accurate information regarding the foundation of the town. But it may be assumed with certainty that it took place very soon after the decline of the Achaemenid capital Persepolis, which was caused by Alexander the Great. The ruins of the latter in any case formed a quarry which was much used for the building of the new town. Istakhr was at first merely the chief town of the district of Fārs, the centre of which had probably always been in this neighbourhood. A few decades before the collapse of the Arsakid kingdom, it figures as the residence of local chiefs. The Sāsānians came from the region of Istakhr. Sāsān, grandfather of Ardashir I, was superintendent of the fire-temple of the goddess Anāhīd in the town of Istakhr (Tabari, i. 814), the fire of which is said to have suddenly been ominously extinguished in the night of the birth of Muḥammad. After the foundation of the Sāsānian kingdom this town was also considered its religious centre; the heads of slain enemies, including those of Christian martyrs were hung upon it by the Sāsānian kings as trophies of victory. Istakhr was henceforth considered the official capital of the New Persian monarchy, as Persepolis has been in the age of Achaemenids, but just as, with the latter, Susa had in practice been the centre of government, so with the Sāsānians, Ktesiphon was the real capital. The remote district of Fārs, difficult of access, is too little suited to be the centre of a powerful empire. The Byzantines seem to have known nothing of Istakhr, for them Ktesiphon alone was the centre of Sāsānian rule. Indeed Istakhr does not play a prominent part in history; it is only occasionally mentioned.

Soon after occupying the 'Irāk the Arabs conquered Fārs. The inhabitants of Istakhr in particular opposed a stubborn resistance to the advance of the Muslims. The first attempt to take the city, undertaken in 19 (640) by al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī, governor of Bahrain, with insufficient forces and against 'Omar's express orders, failed completely. The strong army raised by Shahrak, the prince of Fārs at that time, could not be checked by Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī. It was only with difficulty that he succeeded in fighting his way along the coast of the Persian Gulf to Basra with the help of troops sent to meet him from that place. It was not till 23 (643) that Istakhr had to capitulate to an Arab army commanded by Abū Mūsā al-Ash'ari and 'Othmān b. al-'Aṣ. But its citizens afterwards rebelled and slew the Arab governor set over them. The governor of Basra, 'Abd Allāh b. 'Amir [q. v.], whom the Caliph sent against the rebels, was only able to take the town after severe fighting. In the suppression of the revolution many Persians met their death. The estimates, no doubt exaggerated, of the Arab authors speak sometimes of 40,000, sometimes of 100,000 of the enemy slain. This second capture of İstakhr probably took place in 29 (649), but according to some accounts, it was in 28 (648), cf. J. Wellhausen, Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, vi. (1899) 111 sq. For other details of the Arab expeditions against İstakhr see: Balādhuri (ed. de Goeje), p. 389 sq., Ṭabari, Annales (ed. Leiden), i. 2546 sq., 2549, 2696 sq., 2830; Ibn al-Athir (ed. Tornberg), ii. 420 sq. iii. 30 sq., 77 sq.; Chronique de Ṭabari (Pers. vers., by Bel'ami), transl. Zotenberg, iii. 452—3; Weil, Gesch. der Chalifen, i. 86—7, 163, and thereon A. D. Mordtmann in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., vi. 455—6; Caetani, Annali dell' Islām, iv. 151 sq., v. 19—27, vii. 219—20, 248—56.

İstakhr, which in the Sāsānian period can have yielded little in size to the ancient Persepolis, remained a fairly important place during the early centuries of Islām also. However it gradually sank to be merely the chief town of a province and was the capital of the kūra, bearing its name, the largest of the five districts into which the province of Fārs was divided, comprising its northern and north eastern parts. The heaviest blow suffered by the erstwhile Sāsānian capital was the foundation in 64 (684) of Shīrāz (a day's journey south of İstakhr), which soon became the capital of the province of Fārs and attained great prosperity, particularly from the iiird (ixth) century. Henceforth İstakhr, declined visibly. From the description of the geographer al-İstakhrī, a native of the town, it was about the middle of the ivth (xth) century a town of medium size of the area of an Arab (= Roman) mile; the wall around it was in ruins. Al-Mukaddasī, writing about thirty years later (985), praises the splendid bridge over the river in İstakhr and the fine park. Concerning the chief mosque, situated in the bazaars, he mentions the remarkable pillars with "bull"-capitals. This probably refers not to an original Achaemeid building, but to a Sāsānian, — al-Mukaddasī mentions that the mosque was thought to have been previously a fire-temple —, in the building of which pieces of carvings from Persepolis had been used. Only a few years after the date of al-Mukaddasī's account, a fatal catastrophe overwhelmed the town, brought upon it by the rebellious attitude of its citizens to their suzerain Šamsām al-Dawla, a son of 'Aḍud al-Dawla [q. v.]. The latter sent against it an army under the amīr Kutulmysh, who laid it in ruins. This sealed the ruin of İstakhr. In a description of the province of Fārs dating from the beginning of the viith (xiith) century, in the Persian Fārs-Nāma, it is described as a modest village with barely a hundred inhabitants. Probably the whole area of the former town was quite uninhabited before the end of the middle ages.

As to the mint of İstakhr, coins struck here in the Sāsānian period bear the abbreviation ST (𐭠𐭡) in Pahlavi characters; this certainly means İstakhr. Numerous specimens of these coins exist from the reign of Yazdedjird II (from 438 A. D.) to the end of the dynasty. In the Muhammadan period also the Pahlavi legend with the above abbreviation was retained for a considerable time. Such coins struck in the name of the Caliph or of governors are known down to the year 70 (689), cf. for example the references in Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., viii. 13, 147 sq., xii. 56, xix.

400, xxxi. 148, xxxiii. 120, 131. On the other hand, the Pahlavi coins with mint-names İrān (𐭠𐭡𐭠) and Bābā (𐭠𐭡𐭠) — contrary to Mordtmann (ibid., xxxiii. 114—5 and Sitz.-Ber. d. Bayr. Akad. d. Wiss., 1874, p. 250—1) — are not to be attributed to İstakhr: cf. Noldeke, Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., xxxiii. 691—2. Of Arab coins struck in İstakhr specimens are known from 88 (706) and 90 (708) to 167 (783): Stanley Lane-Poole, Cat. of Orient. Coins in the Brit. Mus., x. p. ciii.; H. Lavoix, Cat. des monnaies musulmanes de la Bibl. Nat., i. 518; and the notes in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., ix. 249, 250, xvi. 776, xxii. 286, xxxix. 19, 38.

The present system of ruins at İstakhr, which still awaits a detailed investigation, is fairly extensive (about 5—6 miles around); the Pulwar and a small irrigation canal led off from it across the ruins and divide the area into two almost equal parts. The remains of the town are mainly recognisable in the mounds of earth of varying height. Here and there parts of the surrounding walls still exist. The most remarkable seems to be a place lying towards the village of Ḥājjdji-ābād — called Ḥarim-i Djamshid = "Djamshid's Harem" (cf. below) by the travellers J. Morier and Ker Porter —, where a column stands erect in the midst of an area covered with fragments of pillars. Its capital, composed of bodies of bulls, at once shows it to have been removed from Persepolis. We shall not go wrong, if we look here for the mosque mentioned above, described by al-Mukaddasī. The most detailed account of the ruins of İstakhr is that of Flandin and Coste, who spent two months in the neighbourhood about the end of 1840; cf. the pictures in the great volume of plates, Voyage en Perse, ii. (Paris 1843 sq.), Pl. 58—62, and the archaeological text accompanying it, p. 69—72, and also Flandin's Relation du Voyage, ii. (1852), 137.

In the vicinity of İstakhr there are several other sites remarkable for their monuments or history. For example about 700 yards north of the village of Ḥājjdji-ābād, which lies quite near the north-east corner of the ruined area of the former Sāsānid capital, there are natural caves in the valley of Tang Shāh-i Sarwān. One of them, which contains an inscription of historical importance of Sapor I (241—272 A. D.), is usually called Shāikh 'Alī by the Persians, as a pious ascetic of this name is said to have ended his days in it; at the same time one hears it called Zindān-i Djamshid, "Djamshid's prison". Similar popular names like "Zindān, Ḥarim" (cf. above Djamshid's Ḥarim) are also found elsewhere in Persia and in the 'Irāk; cf. DAŠTADJIRD, i. 926, and my Seleucia und Ktesiphon (Leipzig 1917), p. 55. Prominent buildings and monuments of antiquity are frequently attributed to Djamshid, a mythical ruler of ancient Iran whom the Muslim Persians identified with the Saimon of legend (cf. below, Takht-i Djamshid).

Another place of historical importance is the Naḳsh-i Rādjab, "Sculpture of Rādjab" (a legendary personage), about 3/4 mile S. W. of İstakhr. This is a ravine-like split in the wall of rock on the south bank of the Pulwar, which is adorned with three Sāsānian reliefs. Sarre thinks (Sarre u. Herzfeld, Iranische Felsreliefs, p. 98) that this decoration may be explained by the special purpose of the place (a sanctuary of the God Ormuzd?) as the consecrated place of coronation of the Sāsānian kings.

On account of its considerable remains from the ancient and mediaeval Persian periods, the best known sites are Takht-i-Djamshīd and Naqsh-i Rostam, the former a short hour's journey south of Iṣṭakhr on the south bank of the Pulwar, the latter on the north bank of this stream about 1½ miles from Iṣṭakhr.

Takht-i Djamshīd is the most usual name among Orientals for the complex of Achaemenid palaces of Persepolis. Persian popular fancy frequently gives imposing buildings the name of takht, i. e. bench or throne, of a celebrated legendary king of the past. Besides Takht-i Djamshīd one also hears the older name Čihil, or abbreviated, Čil Minār (also Menāre), "the 40 pillars", which is found as early as the Persian historians of the xivth century. This name is taken from the most noteworthy parts of the whole site, the colonnade of King Xerxes I with its pillars originally 72, now only 13 in number. 40 is a round number very popular in the east to express a considerable number; a cave called Čihil Sutūn (the 40 pillars) is shown, for example, in the valley of Shīrwān in Luristān (cf. H. Grothe, Wanderungen in Persien, Berlin 1910 p. 62). The number 1000 is also used in quite a similar fashion to 40. This explains another name, common at an earlier period, Hazār Sutūn, "the 1000 pillars", which first appears at the beginning of the ivth (xth) century in the annals of Hamza al-Iṣfahānī, as well as several times in later Persian chronicles. There is also the name Haft Sūr, "the seven walls", found as early as about 1100 A. D. The Arab geographers of the middle ages from about the iiird (ixth) century know the ruins of the Persepolitan terrace by the name Ma'ab Sulaimān, "Sulaimān's playing-ground", with which we may compare the name Kursī Sulaimān, "Solomon's stool (throne)", found in the Persian history Mudmil-i Tawārikh (beginning of the vth = xth century), which in its turn may have been the model for the present synonymous name Takht-i Djamshīd. It may be noted that Takht-i Sulaimān is also found elsewhere on Iranian soil as a geographical name: for example, a part of the group of ruins called Takht Mādar-i Sulaimān (Murghāb; q. v.), a mound of ruins in the S. E. of Ādharbaidjān, a mountain east of Kābul, and finally the town of Ōsh (see above, ii. 63^b) in Farghāna; cf. Ritter, op. cit., vii. 482, viii. 130, 443, ix. 808; 1040.

The "Bench" or "Throne" of Djamshīd (Solomon) is an artificial stone terrace of polygonal, almost rectangular shape, which lies at the foot of a steep, dark grey mountain of rock. The latter, according to the reports of recent travellers, now bears the name Kūh-i Raḥmat, "hill of mercy", but this is not to be found in literature; it apparently dates only from the post-mediaeval period (first mentioned by Sir Thomas Herbert in the beginning of the xviith century). The name still heard by Ouseley, Shāh Kūh, "royal hill", might be older; it coincides with the βασιλικὸν ὄρος of Diodoros (xvii. 71). At the same time, according to the same authority, the inhabitants also use the name Kūh-i Takht, "hill of the throne (of Djamshīd)". The section of the Kūh-i Raḥmat which forms the back wall of the platform contains three tombs of Achaemenid kings. The people know these by the names of the "mosque", the "bath" and the "mill of Djamshīd", according to Stolze (Verhandl. der Gesellsch. f. Erdkunde in Berlin, x., 1883, p. 273). The terracc, which at the same time bears a markedly fortress-like character, was, as already mentioned, only intended for royal palaces and monumental buildings; the town of Persepolis lay in its immediate vicinity. Ancient remains of it may be still recognised. Older travellers were able to identify even more of these ruins lying outside the Takht-i Djamshīd in the area of the town. It may be expressly mentioned that the view held by Stolze and Andreas (o. c., p. 256 sq., and Persepolis, i. 3) that the citadel and town of Persepolis are to be sought at Naqsh-i Rostam, to be exact, the former at Naqsh-i Rostam and the town on the site of the later Iṣṭakhr, while the buildings in Takht-i Djamshīd were intended for solemn ceremonials closely connected with the cultus, does not appear tenable; cf. against it most recently Herzfeld in Sarre-Herzfeld, o. c., p. 100 sq. The Persian historians make a similar mistake when they identify Persepolis with Iṣṭakhr without more ado, and in order to be able to explain all the ancient and mediaeval monuments and ruins in the plain of Marwdašt and its more immediate vicinity as the remains of a single town, ascribe to it the fabulous extent of 16 parasangs in length and 16 parasangs breadth.

Iranian tradition varies regarding the founder of Persepolis-Iṣṭakhr; sometimes it is Kayūmarth, the mythical ancestor of the Persians, sometimes the builders or extenders are legendary rulers of the past like Kayūmarth's descendants Hōshang (Ushhangj), Tahmūrath, Djamshīd, Kai Khusrāw. Solomon also is named, for whom the spirits (djinn) subject to him carried out marvellous works. A legendary princess, Humāy, who plays the role of Semiramis as a builder in Irān, is also mentioned. Persian tradition transfers to Persepolis-Iṣṭakhr the residence of the old Iranian kings and makes them be buried there also. According to Firdawsī's Shāhnāma, the town was the residence of the reigning dynasty from the time of Kai Kūbād. Maslim writers connect the origin of Persepolis with Solomon; the name given by them, Ma'ab Sulaimān, has been mentioned above. According to their legend, this king dwelled alternately here and in Syria and was rapidly carried by the djinn from one place to the other. Separate buildings on the terrace of Takht-i Djamshīd bear in Arabic writings the names "mosque" and "batb of Solomon" (cf. with these the above mentioned names of two royal tombs of Kūh-i Raḥmat). Solomon — so the story goes — shut the wind up in a room there; Persian sources of the xiiith and xivth centuries still speak of a "prison of the wind" here (Zindān-i Bād) (cf. the reports in Ouseley, o. c., ii. 381, 387).

Unfortunately the Arab accounts of the monuments of Persepolis are rather defective and moreover in parts distorted into fairy tales; cf. especially the accounts of the geographers al-Iṣṭakhrī, al-Muḥaddasī and al-Kāzwinī (see Schwarz, l. c.); various not uninteresting information is given by Persian historians of the later middle ages, especially Hamd Allāh Mustawfī and Ḥāfiz Abū (see Ouseley, ii. 380 sq., 387 sq.) According to these two, the pillars of the ruins there were celebrated as a source of zinc oxide (zūtiyā) important for medical purposes. The vandal disfigurement of the heads of the figures on the bas-relief of Takht-i Djamshīd (and still more so in Naqsh-i Ruṣtam) is primarily due to the fanaticism of the Muslims with its objection to the representation of human faces.

The caliph al-Manṣūr (754—775) wished to use the ruins of Persepolis, like those of al-Mada'in-Ctesiphon, as a quarry, but was persuaded against it by the advice of his vizier Khālīd al-Barmakī, who said that Persepolis was used as place of prayer by 'Alī; see Fragm. Hist. Arab. (ed. de Goeje), p. 256.

Various Muslim rulers have perpetuated their visits to the ruins of Persepolis by having inscriptions incised. Here are to be seen three Arabic inscriptions in Kufic characters by members of the Būyid dynasties (ivth = xth century), three inscriptions, two Persian and one Arabic, of Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Ibrāhīm, a grandson of Timūr (ixth = xvth century), also three inscriptions (2 Arabic and 1 Persian) of 'Alī b. Khālīl, a grandson of Ūzūn Ḥasan (ixth = xvth century). These inscriptions were thoroughly discussed by de Sacy in his Mém. sur diverses antiquités de la Perse (Paris 1793), p. 139 sqq. Some emendations thereon were given by Noldeke in Stolze, Persepolis, ii. 6. H. Petermann, Reisen im Orient, ii. 188, also mentions an inscription of the Muzaffarid Muḥammad b. al-Muzaffar b. al-Muzaffar b. al-Manṣūr (d. 765 = 1363). The various verses scratched on the walls show the high respect in which Persepolis has always been held among the Persians; their modern poets often make allusions to the ancient capital of the country.

As to Naḳsh-i Rūstām, its primary significance is only the steep south wall of the long, high mass of rock, Ḥusain Kūh, which has in niches four Achaemenid royal tombs and Sāsānian reliefs. But the name is often extended to the whole of Ḥusain Kūh. The name Naḳsh-i Rūstām is due to the popular idea that the sculptured figures there represent the Iranian national hero Rūstām. Before the wall of the tombs there rises a remarkable towerlike building, now called Ka'ba-i Zardusht, "the Ka'ba of Zoroaster". As to its real purpose the opinions of of scholars vary; probably it has something to do with a former fire temple. Two other small buildings are perhaps to be similarly regarded, not far from the Ka'ba-i Zardusht on the summit of a rock called Sang-i Sulaimān, "the stone of Sulaimān", cf. Ouseley, o. c., ii. 300. We may also mention that the Sāsānian sculptures of Berme Delek 5 miles E. S. E. of Shīrāz are also called Naḳsh-i Rūstām.

A stone platform in two layers on the south bank of the Pulwar (about 500 yards W. of Naḳsh-i Radjab) is called by the inhabitants of the district, Takht-i Rūstām, "the throne of Rūstām". The latter, in view of its limited dimension, can only have served as the pedestal of a sepulchral monument or of a fire temple. Cf. Flandin et Coste, Voyage en Perse, ii. 72—73 (and Pl. 63). Instead of Takht-i Rūstām, the name Takht-i Fā'ūs, "peacock-throne", is also used. The name Takht-i Rūstām is found elsewhere in Irān also: cf. Ouseley, o. c., ii. 522).

At a somewhat greater distance from Iṣṭakhr, about 3—4 hours journey N. W., on rocky peaks stand three forts within 1½ to 2 miles of each other. All three, which lie practically in a straight line, are frequently comprised under the name Ka'ā or Kūh-i Iṣṭakhr, "the citadel" or "the mountain of Iṣṭakhr", also Kūh-i Rāmdjird, from a district of this name on the left bank of the Kur (into which the above mentioned Pulwar flows). Firdawsī in a distich speaks of the Sih Diz-i Gumbadān-i Iṣṭakhr, "the three fortresses of Iṣṭakhr" (cf. Ouseley, o. c., ii. 386). At the same time the separate castles have each their own names, which have however changed frequently in course of time according to the reports of the older historians and travellers. The most important of the three, the Ka'ā-i Iṣṭakhr in the narrower sense, is also called Miyān Ka'ā, "the central fort", from its position between the other two. Flandin and Coste heard it called Ka'ā-i Sarw, "the cypress castle", from a single cypress tree standing there. For the two other citadels Persian authors, for example, give the names Ka'ā-i Shikastah, "the broken (ruined) castle, and Ashkunawān (Sakunawān and similar names). To judge from the traces of foundations and pieces of walls found between the forts there were once all linked up by fortifications.

In the Muslim history of Fārs, especially in that of Iṣṭakhr, these inaccessible fortresses played an important part. They were regarded as most essential military points d'appui for the holding of the surrounding country. The most prominent is the "citadel of Iṣṭakhr" proper, the origin of which Persian legend places in mythical times by assuming it was built by King Djamshīd. The old Irānian ruler Gushtāsp is said to have deposited the Avesta, written on cowhides with golden ink in the castle of Iṣṭakhr, after his conversion to the doctrine of Zoroaster; the citadel is therefore also called Diz-i Nibisht (Castle of the writing) or Kūh-i Nibisht (Hill of the writing; so in Hamd Allāh Mustawfī); cf. Ṭabari, i. 676; and Ibn al-Aṭhīr, i. 182, 9, as well as the Persian reports in Ouseley, o. c., ii. 344, 364, 370—1, 375, 384. Under the caliphate the governor of the province of Fārs very frequently resided in this stronghold, which was easily defended by its natural situation. Thus the governor Ziyād b. Abīthi was able to hold out up here against Mu'āwiya for a considerable time after 'Alī's death; cf. Wellhausen, Das arabische Reich, etc. (Berlin 1902), p. 76. The Būyids, who not infrequently stayed in the region of Iṣṭakhr (cf. the inscriptions dating from their time mentioned above, at Takht-i Djamshīd; 'Imād al-Dawla [q. v.] was buried in Iṣṭakhr), paid particular attention to the citadel of Iṣṭakhr. 'Aḳud al-Dawla [q. v.] in the ivth (xth) century built on it a great system of cisterns, taking advantage of a natural pond already there, which could provide water for several thousand persons for a whole year and which aroused the admiration of contemporaries and of later generations. In 467 (1074) the rebel Faḍlūya, who had seized the government of Fārs, was besieged by the troops of Niẓām al-Mulk in the sultanate of Malik Shāh in the citadel of Iṣṭakhr. An earthquake which suddenly caused the cisterns to overflow forced the besieged to a premature capitulation. Faḍlūya was then kept a prisoner in the fortress and put to death next year after an unsuccessful attempt to escape. The castle was later much used as a state prison for high officials and princes. About 1590 the citadel was still in good condition and inhabited. Some time afterwards a rebel general of Fārs took refuge in it and it was besieged by Shāh 'Abbās I, stormed and destroyed. Pietro delle Valle, who stayed here in 1621, therefore found it in ruins.

The citadel of Iṣṭakhr has so far been only rarely visited by European travellers, e. g. by Morier, Flandin (and Coste), and Vambéry. According to the account by Flandin and Coste, to whom we also owe drawings and plans of the citadel, it stands on a plateau 300 yards round, about 1300 feet above the plain. Of the old defences there have survived the powerful ramparts solidly built of stone; the great system of cisterns of the Būyids, among which a well hewn deep into the rock is specially remarkable, is still to be seen. All the ruins that survive seem only to date from the Muslim period. Cf. on the castles of Iṣṭakhr the accounts from Persian sources in Ouseley, o. c., ii. 371, 376, 385 sq., 389, 395—7, 399, 404—5, 407, 531; Ritter, viii. 863—5, 868, 877; Flandin et Coste, Voyage en Perse, ii. 71—72; Flandin's Relation du Voyage, ii. AL-IṢṬAKHRĪ, ABŪ IṢḤĀK IBRĀHĪM B. MUḤAMMAD AL-FĀRISĪ, an Arab geographer, whose biography is nowhere to be found, because in the geographical handbook ascribed to him, which bears the title Masālik al-Mamālik and is printed in the first volume of de Goeje's Bibliotheca Geogr. Arab., no biographical data are given. De Goeje however has shown that his work is only a new edition of an older one by Abū Zaid al-Balkhī, just as later Ibn Ḥawkal [q. v.] took al-Iṣṭakhrī's work as a basis for his own after giving up his first intention of only making some corrections to it, as al-Iṣṭakhrī himself, whom he had met in 340 (951—952), had asked him to do. It is thus at least certain that he must have lived in the first half of the ivth (xth) century. The text which was published in facsimile by J. H. Moeller as early as 1839 only contains a synopsis of the book.

ISTAMBOL. [See CONSTANTINOPLE.]

ISTANKŌI, Turkish name for the island of Stanco = Cos; cf. Cuinet, La Turquie d'Asie, i. 435 sqq.

ISTĀR (στατήρ), a weight in the apothecary's or troy system, taken over from the Greeks and usually estimated according to two different scales. On the one hand we find the equations: 1 istār = 6 dirham and 2 dānaḡ = 4 mithḡāl (an apothecary's stater); on the other, we have 1 istār = 6½ dirham = 4½ mithḡāl (commercial istār in the East). The first equation will only be correct if the coined dirham and the mithḡāl maiyāl are taken $\frac{2.97 + 2 \times 2.97}{6} = 18$. 18 = 4.72 ×

4 = 18.18; the second equation is approximately correct only if we take the coined dirham and the old mithḡāl (gold dinār) $2.97 \times 6.5 = 19.3 = 4.25 \times 4.5 = 19.125$. In both cases the result is a much larger amount than that of the usual Greek stater. The further ratio that 20 istār go to the raṭl (pound) is only true of the istār of 6½ dirham and the Baghdād raṭl of 130 dirham.

ISTIBRĀʾ (A.) means the "inquiry whether the uterus of a slave woman is empty", prescribed by Muslim law. If a Muslim acquires a slave girl by purchase, inheritance or by any other means, the law forbids him to cohabit with her, until it is ascertained that she is not pregnant, in order that there may be no uncertainty about the paternity of the children. The prescribed period of waiting ends after the first menstruation or, in the case of pregnancy, after the birth of the child, and lasts a month for non-menstruating women. Further a slave, after she is manumitted, may only enter into a marriage after the expiry of the legal istibrāʾ period.

ISTIFHĀM (from the root F H M "to understand"; x. "to ask to be made to understand", i. e. to ask a question), technical term of Arabic grammar denoting "interrogation", "interrogative sentence". An interrogative sentence is nominal or verbal, and is subject to the grammatical rules governing the sentence in general. An interrogation may be indicated merely by the tone of the voice, but more often it is introduced by one of the interrogative particles (harfu 'l-istifhām) 'a, hal, 'am, etc., or by an interrogative pronoun or adverb, e. g. man = who?, mā = what?, kaifa = how?, etc.

ISTIḤSĀN (A.), i. e., to consider something ḥasan (i. e. good). This is the name given to a method of argument used in the Ḥanafī school to settle fiqh rules in conformity with the requirements of every day life, equity or social conditions. The object of istiḥsān is much the same as that of istiṭlāḥ (i. e., to think that something is ṣāliḥ, i. e., in the general interest or most appropriate) applied in the Mālikī school. According to both methods, the results of ḥiyās (i. e. analogy) were often simply disregarded, when it was considered necessary or simply desirable to depart from the strict demands of theory. For this arbitrariness istiḥsān and istiṭlāḥ are objected to by many and have never been generally recognised as reliable fundamentals in the science of law (uṣūl al-fiqh).

ISTIKBĀL (A.), in astronomy means the opposition of sun and moon i. e. their relative positions when the difference of their longitudes is 180°, as is the case notably during an eclipse. Mukābala is also occasionally used but this word is a common term among the astrologers for the opposition of two planets. The opposite of istikbāl is idjtimā' = conjunction, i. e. the relative positions of sun and moon when they have equal longitudes, as is the case for example in an eclipse of the sun. In astrology other expressions are commonly used for the conjunction of planets among themselves or with the sun and moon, viz. mukārana, iktirān and ḵirān.

Besides these positions (opposition and conjunction), astrology further distinguishes the hexagonal (tasdis), the tetragonal (tarbi'), and the trigonal (tathlith) aspect, according as the angle between the two planets and the earth is 60°, 90° or 120°.

(H. SUTER.)

ISTIKHĀRA (A.), the prayer (duʿā') of a man who has not yet made up his mind, in order to be inspired with a salutary decision regarding an intended enterprise, a journey, etc. This term is connected with the first conjugation of the verb ḫal, especially in its use in phrases like Allāhumma ḫir li-rasūlka (Ṭabari, Annales, i. 1832, 6); ḫir laku (Ibn Sa'd, ii. 11, 73¹¹, 75, 2); ḫāra 'l-lahu li (ibid., viii. 92, 25). The proverb istakḫir allāha fi 'l-samā'i yakhir laka bi-'ilmihī fi 'l-kaḍā'i (Ibn Sa'd, viii. 171, 18; Kālī, Amālī, ii. 106 paen.) is even given from the pre-Islamic period, but it is hardly to be believed that such an aphorism could date from that time. In Islām the formality of the religious istakḫāra, consists of a form of prayer of some length, traced back to the Prophet in Bukhārī, Tawḥīd, n^o. 10, Da'awāt, n^o. 48 (ed. Krehl-Juynboll, iv. 202, 450), Ibn Maḍja (Dihlī 1282, p. 99 infra) — the authenticity of which however is doubted even by Muslim critics, in Ibn Ḥaḍjar al-Haitamī, Fatāwī ḥadīthiyya, Cairo 1307, p. 210 —, whereas Tirmidhī (Bulāḳ 1397), ii. 266, gives only the brief formula: Allāhumma ḫir li wakḫtir li (cf. Dhahabī, Mizān al-'itidāl, ed. Lucknow 1884, i. 315, 4) only as a ḥadīth of doubtful authenticity. It is introduced by two raḳ'a's (ṣallā rak'atai al-istikḫāra, Subkī, Ṭab. al-Shāfi'iyya, vi. 175, 6 infra). Directions are also given regarding the verses of the Qur'ān to be recited within the two raḳ'a's (Nawawī, Adḥkār, p. 56). In 'Awfī, Lubb al-Albāb (ed. Browne), i. 210, 12, people go to the mosque to perform the namāz-i istikḫāra; but this is not obligatory. It is the rule that the istikḫāra appeal should be made from case to case before a definite purpose, and not in a summary fashion (e. g. in the morning for all cases which may crop up in the course of the day) ('Abdārī, Madḫhal, iii. 240 infra).

In keeping with the above mentioned traditional saying, Muslim practice shows the istikḫāra in use from the earliest times. The oldest example, probably quite independent of that ḥadīth, seems to be Aghānī, xix. 92, 3 sqq. The poet 'Adjdjādī (Diwān, n^o. 12, 83; Arāḍiyya al-'Arab, p. 120) praises Ḥadjdjadī, because he undertakes nothing without securing God's approval (ilā rabbahu istakḫāra). And when 'Abd Allāh b. Tāhir enters on his office of prefect of the 'Irāk, his father impresses upon him repeatedly in a letter of advice he sends him, to observe the istikḫāra in all official business (Ṭaifūr, Kitāb Baghdād, p. 49, 7, 52, 3, infra, 53, 4). In this way literature gives numerous examples of the custom that the Muslim before important as well as unimportant resolutions, in private as well as public enterprises, also conquerors before their expeditions, thought to secure the divine approval by istikḫāra. This habit indeed is sometimes fictitiously credited to them, as for example when Mu'āwiya is made to observe the istikḫāra before designating Yazid as his successor (Aghānī, xviii. 72, 6). The Caliph Sulaimān tears up the patent of succession drawn up in favour of his son Ayyūb, when he feels that the salutariness of his decision was not suggested to him by istikḫāra (Ibn Sa'd, v. 247, 6). Ma'mūn observes istikḫāra for a month before appointing 'Abd Allāh b. Tāhir, Ṭaifūr, op. cit., p. 34, 6). Cf. the loud istikḫāra prayer of al-Muqtadir on his accession (with four rakʿa's), 'Arib, ed. de Goeje, p. 22, 14). In the 1001 Nights in the tale of Uns al-Wudūd and Ward fi 'l-Akmām the latter's mother performs a "ṣalāt al-istikhāra of two rakʿa's" in order to obtain an effectual indication in regard to her daughter's love affair (373th Night, ed. Bulāḡ 1279, ii. 269). The choice of a baby's name seems occasionally to be made after an istikhāra by the namer (Snouck Hurgronje, Mekka, ii, 139, 1). There is no lack of examples to show that in deciding thorny theological questions the learned arguments were strengthened by istikhāra (e. g. Nawawī, Tahdhīb, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 237, 3 infra). Authors in the introductions to their books very frequently mention istikhāra as the motive or excuse for the publication (cf. Dhahabī, Tadhkirat al-Huffāz, ii. 288, 1). A story, of course quite unhistorical, makes 'Omar II only allow the publication of a work of Ahran b. A'yun which he had in his library, after he had exposed it for 40 days with an istikhāra at his place of prayer (Ibn Abi Uṣaib'a, i. 163 infra).

The form of the istikhāra laid down by religious usage (istikhāra sharʿiyya) is usually in actual practice accompanied by all kinds of forms not sanctioned in the Ḥadīth, for example the expectation of receiving the divine inspiration in a dream (ἐνύπναιος) after a prayer (Snouck Hurgronje, Mekka, ii. 16, note 4; Doutté, Magie et Religion dans l'Afrique du Nord, p. 413) or strengthening the istikhāra formula by an oracular casting of lots, in which the alternatives are written on cards (Ṭabarṣī, Makārim al-Akhṭāk, Cairo, 1303, p. 100). Such additions are strongly condemned by fervid Sunnī orthodoxy ('Abdārī, op. cit., iii. 91 sqq.). There is also the istikhāra by opening the Qurʾān (al-qarḥ... fi 'l-muḥṣaf... wa-taḥ-dim istikhāratin, in Ibn Bashkuwāl, p. 243 ult., cf. Farajī ba'd al-Shidda, i. 44; an anecdote on the subject is given by Kaẓwīnī, ed. Wüstenfeld, ii. 113, 18 sqq.); other works (see Suyūṭī, Buḥyāt al-Wuʿāt, p. 10, 17), as in the case of the Sortes Virgilianae, are employed for the purpose by the Persians, especially the Diwān of Ḥāfiẓ, or the Mathnawī of Dīlāl al-Dīn Rūmī (cf. Bankipore Catalogue, i. n^o. 151). This use of the Qurʾān is likewise rigorously forbidden by most Sunna authorities (cf. Damīrī s. v. Ṭair, ii. 119, 8 sqq., ed. Bulāḡ 1284; Murtaḍā, Ithāf al-Sāda al-Mutaṭṭaʿin, Cairo 1311, i. 285 infra); this custom in connection with the istikhāra has led among the people to an excessive use of faʿl magic with the Qurʾān, of which a full account is given in Lane, *Manners and Customs*³, Ch. xi., i. 328. — There is a proverb mā khāba man istakhāra wa-lā nadima man istashāra (as ḥadīth in Ṭabarānī, Muʿjam Saḡhūr, ed. Dihlī, p. 304 infra). Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Zubairī in the beginning of the ivth (xth) century wrote a Kitāb al-istikhāra wa 'l-istikhāra (Nawawī, Tahdhīb, p. 744, 3).

ISTPNĀF (A.) means in Muslim law: the performance over again from the beginning of a religious act (e. g. a ṣalāt) which has in some way been interrupted. If, on the other hand, only the part still to be performed when the interruption took place is later carried through, this is called bināʾ (i. e. the continuation of an interrupted act).

ISTINDJĀʾ (A.) means a purification fully described in the Fīḥ books in the chapter on ritual purity. It is a religious duty (according to Abū Ḥanīfa, however, only a recommended action) for every Muslim who has attended to the call of nature. A Muslim is in general allowed to delay this purification until he is about to perform the ṣalāt, or has to be in a state of ritual purity for some other reason.

ISTINSHĀK (A.), the inhaling of water through the nose, is considered by most *ṣaḥīḥ*s as a sunna (i. e. a commendable act, according to Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal however, a religious duty) both at the ghuṣl [q. v.] and the wuḍūʾ (i. e. the major and minor ritual purification).

ISTISHĀB (A.), i. e., the seeking for a link (i. e., to something which is known and certain). This is the name of a process of settling fīḥ rules by argument, which was especially used in the Shāfi school and with certain limitations among the Ḥanafis also. This seeking for a link means the endeavour to link up a later set of circumstances with an earlier, and is based on the assumption that the fīḥ rules applicable to certain conditions remain valid so long as it not certain that these conditions have altered. If for example on account of the long absence of some one it is doubtful whether he is alive or dead, then by istishāb all rules must remain in force which would hold if one knew for certain that he was still alive. The Ḥanafis only recognise istishāb in so far as it concerns the retention of rights already granted, the *Shāfi*s on the other hand even when it is a question of assigning new rights. An absent man for example would not be recognised by the Ḥanafis as legitimate heir to an inheritance falling due while he was away, but he would be according to the *Shāfi*s, as the latter assume that even during his absence he can obtain new rights.

ISTISKĀʾ (A.), prayer for rain. The treatises on canon law expound in what circumstances the ḥadīth prescribes the istikṣāʾ prayer as an obligatory act or leaves it to individual discretion. They also give details of the special ritual to be observed in this prayer. This ritual comprises 1. a prayer of two rakʿa performed in the morning outside the town; 2. the faithful ought to put on ordinary dress, without elaboration or luxury; 3. the prayer is followed by two khuṭba, of which the first is accompanied by a turning of the cloak (a sympathetic rite to produce a change in the weather); 4. the du'ā which follows the prayer is a supplication for rain; 5. the usual takbir is replaced by an invocation intended to implore God's pardon (istighfār). This prayer ought to be completed by a series of pious works recommended to the faithful (fasting, almsgiving). Prayers for rain by non-Muslims according to their religions (Jewish or Christian) are admitted and even recommended in orthodox Islām.

Rites and ceremonies to obtain rain are as ancient as man himself and vary not only according to different religious beliefs, but even among the different groups of human beings belonging to the same religion, as I have shown in my Quelques rites pour obtenir la pluie en temps de sécheresse chez les musulmans maghrébins dans Recueil de Mémoires et de Textes publié en l'honneur du XIVe Congrès des Orientalistes, par les professeurs de l'École supérieure des Lettres et des Médersas, Alger 1905, p. 49—98. The ceremonies and rites, rather varied for the Muslim countries and all, even in the orthodox ritual, much impregnated with animism and magic, may however be grouped under several rubrics: adaptation to the cult of saints; physical and moral sufferings which the faithful impose upon themselves; formulas, songs and hymns; rites relating to a kind of divinity of rain, named ghandja or an analogous name in Barbary; sacrifices of victims and communal meals; sympathetic and symbolic acts.

In the article referred to, there will be found, in addition to useful bibliographical notes, references to analogous ceremonies in non-Muslim countries. There it will also be seen that for the Maghrib these religious services have rather the character of agrarian festivals and that they take place at a fixed period of the year, but not in every season.

ITAK. [See 'ABD, i. 18.]

ITHNĀ 'ASHARĪYA (Arabic ithnā 'ashara, twelve), "the Twelvvers", a name given in contrast to the Sab'iya [q. v.], the partisans of the seven imāms, to those Shi'is who allow the series of twelve imāms and say that the imāmate passed from 'Alī al-Riḍā to his son Muḥammad al-Taḳī, to the latter's son 'Alī al-Naḳī, then to his son al-Ḥasan al-'Askarī al-Zakī, and finally to Muḥammad al-Mahdī, who disappeared and will come again at the end of time to announce the last judgement and to fill the earth with justice. The series of twelve imāms is made up as follows: 1. 'Alī al-Murtaḍā; 2. al-Ḥasan al-Mudjtabā; 3. al-Ḥusain al-Shahid; 4. 'Alī Zain al-'Abidin al-Saḍiḍ; 5. Muḥammad al-Baqir; 6. Dja'far al-Sādiq; 7. Mūsā al-Kāzim; 8. 'Alī al-Riḍā; 9. Muḥammad al-Taḳī; 10. 'Alī al-Naḳī; 11. al-Ḥasan al-'Askarī al-Zakī; 12. Muḥammad al-Mahdī al-Ḥudjdja [see these names].

Such has been the succession which has been definitely admitted since the vith (xth) century; but this sect has not always been in agreement with itself, and at one time numbered no less than eleven parties, without special names but distinguished from one another as follows: 1. al-Ḥasan al-'Askarī is not dead, he is only absent; 2. al-Ḥasan died without children, but he will return and raise from the dead; 3. al-Ḥasan nominated his brother Dja'far by will; 4. the latter died without leaving heirs; 5. Muḥammad son of 'Alī is the imām; 6. al-Ḥasan had a son, two years before his death, who was called Muḥammad; 7. there was indeed a son, but he was born eight months after his father's death; 8. al-Ḥasan died without children and the world is without an imām on account of the sins of men; 9. al-Ḥasan had a son, but he is not known; 10. an imām is necessary, but it is not known if he is descended from al-Ḥasan or not; 11. a stop is made at 'Alī al-Riḍā and the coming of the last imām is awaited, whence the name Wakīfiya given to this party, i. e. those who suspend their judgement regarding the imām's death. They were at first called Kaṭfiya (Kittīfiya), because, unlike the Wakīfiya, they admitted the reality of the imām's death or, according to others, because they interrupted the line of the imāms at Mūsā al-Kāzim, son of Dja'far, in order to keep it exclusively in the line of his descendants. Others admitted after Mūsā, the imāmate of his son Aḥmad, excluding 'Alī al-Riḍā; it is also said that Muḥammad, the latter's son, being very young at the time of his father's death, had not been able to receive from him the training for the imāmate; others admitted his quality of imām, but asked which of his sons Mūsā or 'Alī should succeed him. After 'Alī the same question arose between Dja'far and al-Ḥasan. Those who admitted the imāmate of al-Ḥasan al-'Askarī were called by objectors al-Ḥimārīya because they describe the chosen imām as an ignoramus. After the death of al-Ḥasan, some adopted Dja'far, the pretended son of a concubine, al-Ḥasan according to them not having left any children.

The Šafawids, who claimed descent from Mūsā al-Kāzim, made the Shi'a and more particularly the doctrine of the Ithnā 'ashariya the state religion of Persia, as it still is. After his accession Shāh Ismā'īl (906 = 1500) gave formal orders to the preachers of Aḥdhabidjān to preach the sermon in the name of the twelve imāms, and to the mu'adhdhins to add the Shi'a formula: "I testify that 'Alī is the saint of God". The troops were ordered to put to death any objector.

The cult of the twelve imāms has attained an extraordinary importance among the Persians; hypostases of the Divinity, they direct the destinies of the world, and preserve it and guide it. With them all is salvation; without them all is perdition (Gobineau, Religions et philosophies, p. 60). Their ministry, their intercession (ta'awus) are indispensable. Prayers with special formula are reserved for them; Sunday is sacred to 'Alī and Fātima; the second hour of each day to al-Hasan, the third to al-Husain, the fourth to Zain al-'Abidin and so on. Pilgrimage to their tombs (ziyāra) procures special rewards.

I'TIKĀD is "belief" that a thing is so. It may be only in the sense of the English "thinking", the German "Glauben", or it may be a feeling perfectly assured, and so the word is used especially of belief in religious dogmas (Lane, Dozy, Supplément). It is then exactly equivalent to taṣ-dīq, firm acceptance in the mind of a thing as true, and is distinguished from īmān, "faith" in that some held īmān to cover works ('amal) and confession (iḥṣār). Al-Taftāzānī, in his commentary on the Aḳā'id of al-Nasafī (ed. Cairo 1321, p. 7) explains that some of the revealed prescripts (aḥkām shar'īya) connect with manner of action and are called far'īya, "derivative", and 'amaliya, while others connect with belief (al-i'tikād) and are called aṣliya "basal" and i'tikādiyya (cf. al-Bādīūrī, Hashiya 'alā Sharḥ Ibn Kāsim, Cairo 1321, i. 20; Hashiya 'alā Matn al-Sanūsīya, Cairo 1283, p. 11 sq.; Luciani, Les prolégomènes théol. de Senoussi, p. 4 sqq.; Dict. of Techn. Terms, s. v. ḥukm). In consequence al-i'tikādāt is used much in the sense of al-aḳā'id, the doctrines of the faith. The exact scholastic definition of the word evidently gave difficulty. In the Dict. of Techn. Terms (p. 954) two uses are distinguished: one generally known, "firm belief", and a rarer, "conviction, certainty". The first is a mental judgment, absolute (djā'im), but susceptible of doubt (yaḥbal al-tashkik); the second is a mental judgment, absolute or preponderant (rādjiḥ) and includes 'ilm, "knowledge", which is a mental judgment incompatible with doubt or belief or opinion (ẓann). The second is sometimes called "certain knowledge" (al-ilm al-yaqīn) and excludes "compound ignorance" (al-djahl al-murakkab), the ignorance that does not know that it is ignorance. Others distinguished the first i'tikād into two; that which corresponds to fact and that which does not. See IMĀN.

I'TIKĀD KHĀN, title of a Kashmīrī named Muḥammad Murād, who gained such an ascendancy over the emperor Farrukhsiyar [q. v.] that he became his confidential adviser, received from him the title of Rukn al-Dawla I'tikād Khān Farrukhshāhī, and ultimately became his wazīr. When Farrukhsiyar was blinded and deposed in 1124 (1713), I'tikād Khān was thrown into prison and his property confiscated, but he was subsequently released, and died in the reign of Muḥammad Shāh [q. v.].

I'TIKĀF (A.) is the name of a religious custom of which the main feature is that the believer retires for a time from the world in a mosque. The i'tikāf is always considered meritorious (sunna) and is numbered among those good works which are recommended in the law-books to be performed during the last ten days of Ramaḍān, in order to participate in the blessings of the holy Ḳadar night. According to the Muslim tradition, the Prophet also used to spend the last third of the month fasting in the mosque in Medina. On the Lailat al-Ḳadar (Night of the Divine Decree) see Ḳur'ān, xlv. 2, xcvi. 1—5, cf. Ḳur'ān, ii. 181. The question what night is to be considered the Ḳadar night is not settled. According to the view of most Muslim scholars, it must be assumed that one of the last ten nights of the month of fasting (especially one of the five odd nights, i. e. 21, 23, 25, 27 or 29 Ramaḍān) is meant. According to others — and this was Abū Hanifa's view —, there are no indications that the Ḳadar night belonged to this period of the year.

I'TIMĀD AL-DAWLA (Arabic: support of the kingdom), title of the Persian Prime Minister under the Sāfawids; also called wazīr-i a'zam, "great minister", nawwāb ("Nabob", deputy) or Irān madārī, "the hinge of Persia". As the chief administrator of the kingdom he possessed far-reaching powers and no document of the king was valid without his seal; his position however was exceedingly precarious as his fate depended entirely on his master's humour. A controller (nāzir, supervisor) appointed by the king assisted him as secretary. The residence of the Prime Minister was near the royal palace in Isfahān, in the vestibule of which he held his reception. At public audiences he stood on the right of the ruler and when the latter rode out through the city he accompanied him on the right, whence his epithet wazīr-i rāst, "minister of the right". His dismissal resulted in his banishment to some town where he lived as a simple citizen. His salary consisted of a definite sum called rusūm, "fees", which he drew annually from the khāns or tribal chiefs whose interests he pledged himself to represent at court. In 1650 his income was estimated at 900 to 1000 toman or £ 14,000 to £ 16,000.

ITK. [See 'ABD, i. 18.]

ITTIHĀD, 'becoming one'. Muslim scholastics distinguish two kinds of ittihād, 1) 'real' (ḥaqīqī); 2) 'metaphorical' (maǧāzī). The former class has two subdivisions, according as the term is applied a) to two things which become one, e. g., 'Amr becomes Zaid, or Zaid becomes 'Amr; b) to one thing which becomes another thing that was not existent before, e. g., Zaid becomes some individual who did not previously exist. Ittiḥād in this 'real' sense is necessarily impossible; hence the saying, al-ithnūn lā yattahidūn. The 'metaphorical' class has three subdivisions, according as the term denotes a) one thing's becoming another thing by instantaneous or gradual transformation, e. g., water becomes air (in which case the real nature of water is destroyed by the removal of its specific form from its substance, and to this substance the specific form of air is added), or black becomes white (in which case one attribute of an object disappears and is replaced by another attribute); b) one thing's becoming another thing by means of composition, so that a third thing results, e. g., earth becomes clay by the addition of water; c) the appearance of one person in the form of another, e. g., of an angel in the form of a human being. All these three species of 'metaphorical' ittihād actually occur. In the technical language of the Sūfis, the name ittihād is given to the mystical union by which the creature is made one with the Creator, or to the theory that such a union is possible. This conception of the unitive state, like the parallel doctrine of ḥulūl, i. e. the doctrine that the Creator becomes incarnate in the creature, is generally regarded by the Sūfis as heretical, on the ground that it involves homogeneity and is therefore inconsistent with the true notion of divine unity (tawḥīd), which admits no real existence except that of God. Ittiḥād, thus understood, presupposes the existence of two beings which are made one, whereas, according to the more orthodox mystics, human individuality is only a phenomenon that passes away in the One Eternal Reality (fanā fi 'l-Ḥaqq). Sometimes the term ittihād is employed like the Sūfistic waḥdat or tawḥīd, in reference to the doctrine that all things are non-existent in themselves, but derive their existence from God and, in this respect, are one with God ('Abd al-Razzāk al-Kāshī, al-Iṣṭilāḥāt al-Šūfiyya, ed. by Sprenger, p. 5). According to 'Alī b. Wafā (quoted by Sha'rānī in al-Yawāqūt wa 'l-Djawāhir, Būlak, 1277 A. H., p. 80, l. 18 sqq.), the meaning of ittihād in the terminology of the Sūfis is "the passing away of that which is willed by the creature in that which is willed by God".

IWĀD (A.) means in Muslim law all that must be given or done as a guarantee of the fulfilment of what the other party is pledged to, in a contract or sale or other agreement.

(TH. W. JUYNBOLL.)

IYĀD, a great Arab tribe belonging to the Ma'addī (Ismā'īlī) group. Their genealogy is Iyād b. Nizār b. Ma'add b. 'Adnān. The Rabi'a, Anmār and Muḍar were consanguineous tribes of the Iyād. A section of the Iyād professed Christianity. The poet Abū Dū'ād, famous for his descriptions of the horse, and the celebrated Kuss b. Sa'ida were members of the Iyād.

At first they dwelt in Tihāma up to the borders of Nadjran [q. v.]. In the first half of the iijrd century they emigrated in large bodies to Eastern 'Irāk and thence to Mesopotamia. Among their settlements were: Anbār (they are said to have the first to introduce the Arabic characters there), 'Ain Ubāgh (behind Anbār), Sindād, Takrit, Baṭn Iyād (lying towards Kūfa), Ba'ida, Djariz, al-Djabal (in the 'Irāk), Djaww Zuraif, al-Hafā, Khidād, Mawṭhib (Mawṭhab), al-Mustarād, al-Salawṭah, Shibāk, al-Shakika (in the 'Irāk), Suwwa 'l-Adjād, al-Tha'abiya (between Mekka and Medina), al-'Udna. Among the waters of the Iyād were Laṣaf and al-Lifāz.

A section of the Iyād, probably before these large emigrations to the 'Irāk, joined the Qudā'a when the latter migrated from Tihāma to Bahrain; another remained in Wādī Bisha [q. v.]. We also find scattered settlements of the Iyād in Syria, e. g. in Antioch, Ḥimṣ (Emessa), Halab, and in Greek territory at Ancyra (Angora in Asia Minor), Bagras (Πάργαι), etc.

History: Towards the beginning of the iijrd century of our era a quarrel arose between the Iyād and Muḍar regarding the possession of the Ka'ba, which also involved dominion over Mecca, after the two tribes in alliance had driven the Djurhum from Mecca. The Iyād were defeated and emigrated to the 'Irāk, where they established themselves mainly in 'Ain Ubāgh and in scattered settlements south of al-Hira. During the first period of their sojourn in the 'Irāk the Iyād were exposed to the invasions of Djadhima b. Malik of the Azd, whose rule extended over all the Arabs in the 'Irāk. Djadhima demanded from them the surrender of their relative, 'Adī b. Rabi'a; after long hesitation the Iyād submitted and delivered 'Adī up, who then married Rikāsh, sister of Djadhima.

In the 'Irāk the Iyād seem to have acknowledged the suzerainty of the Lakhmid princes of al-Hira. During the wars of Mundhir b. Mā' al-Samā' against the Kinda chief al-Harith b. 'Amr b. Hudjr we find them in Mundhir's train. At the beginning of the viith century, the Iyād made inroads into Persian territory. They crossed the Euphrates. A detachment of Persian cavalry sent against them was completely destroyed by them near Kūfa [see DAIR AL-DJAMĀDĪM]. To defend himself against their inroads and to take vengeance on them, Khusrāw (Kisrā) Anūshirwān sent an army against them under Malik b. Hāritha, which is said to have included a detachment of the Bakr b. Wā'il [q. v.]. In spite of the warning given them by their fellow tribesman, the poet Lakit, the Iyād were surprised and put to flight. The Persians followed them and, according to a tradition, inflicted a considerable defeat on them at the village of al-Huradjiya. In consequence of their defeat, they are said to have retired into Syria. One section of them reached Byzantine territory at Ancyra, where they found others of their tribe already settled. An isolated tradition mentions a punitive expedition by the Persian king Sapōr (Sabūr) Dhu 'l-Aktāf in the ivth century against the Iyād, but there is probably confusion here between Sabūr and Kisrā. In the battle of Dhū Kār [see BAKR B. WĀ'IL] they fought alongside the Kuḏā'i tribes of Mesopotamia under Khālid b. Yazid al-Bahrāni on the side of the Persians. A section of the Iyād had made secret arrangements with the Bakr and took to flight during the battle, thereby throwing the Persian lines into disorder. After the battle of Dhū Kār they, like the other Christian Arab tribes of Mesopotamia, remained a few more years under Persian suzerainty. In the battle of 'Ain Tamr (near Anbār) we find them on the side of the Persians along with the Mesopotamian tribes under Mihrān b. Bahrām Djubin. In the reign of Abū Bakr, in the year 12 (634), a large number of the Iyād, like many of the Tamīm and the Christian Arab tribes of Mesopotamia, joined the false prophetess Saḏjāh [q. v.]. In the same year Khālid b. al-Walid [q. v.] inflicted a serious defeat on them and the Persians, on whose side they fought, at Firād (on the East bank of the Euphrates). In the caliphate of 'Omar, in the spring of the year 17 (638), the Byzantine Emperor Heraclius made the last effort to regain the province of Syria, which had been lost to the Muslims. For this purpose he sent a large army which included Iyād along with the tribes on the Euphrates and Tigris to Hims, the siege of which was begun. In the meanwhile the Muslims invaded Mesopotamia and conquered Takrit, secretly supported by the Christian Arab soldiers in the city, among whom were Iyād, who then adopted Islām. When the Mesopotamian tribes besieging Hims heard of a raid into Mesopotamia and the approach of an army, they abandoned the Byzantine army in order to defend their threatened homes. The Arabs in Kinnasrīn, Ḥalab, and other Syrian cities, who had previously joined the Byzantine army, negotiated secretly with Khālid b. al-Walid and attacked the Byzantines, who were beaten and had to take to flight. The remnants of the Byzantine troops including Iyād retired to Cilicia, whither they were followed by the Muslims and almost entirely wiped out. When in the following year 18 = 639, Iyād b. Ghanm succeeded Abū 'Ubaida [q. v.] as governor of Hims, Northern Syria and Mesopotamia, all the Mesopotamian tribes submitted and adopted Islām with the exception of the Iyād, who fled to Cappadocia in Asia Minor. Here, however, they only enjoyed their security for a brief space, for the Caliph 'Omar demanded their extradition from the Emperor Heraclius under a threat of reprisals against the Christians in his provinces, and Heraclius was forced to agree. Four thousand of the Iyād then went to Syria and Mesopotamia and submitted to the Caliph. In later times we hear almost nothing of them.

IYĀD B. MŪSĀ, ABU 'L-FADL IYĀD B. MŪSĀ B. IYĀD AL-YAḤṢUN AL-SABT AL-MĀLIKĪ, known as AL-KĀDĪ 'IYĀD, a Mālikī jurist, traditionalist, historian, man of letters and poet, born at Ceuta on Sha'bān 15, 476 (Dec. 29, 1083) and died at Marrākūsh, 7 Djumādā II (13 Oct.) or Ramaḏān 11 Dec. 544 (1149).

After studying in his native town he went in 507 (1114) to Cordova where he devoted himself particularly to Hadīth and attended the lectures of Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh b. 'Attab and Abū 'l-Walid Ibn Rushd. His teachers numbered a hundred. He returned to his native town and held the office of Kādi where his administration was much appreciated. In 531 (1136-7) he became Kādi of Cordova but after a time again became Kādi of Ceuta. He was one of the first to welcome the arrival of the Almohads and went to Salā to pay homage to their chiefs, but when he saw in 543 (1148-9) that the Almohad dynasty was weakened by discords he fled from his native town and took refuge in Marrākūsh, where he died and was buried near the Bāb Ailān.

Of the twenty works attributed to him we only know the following: 1^o. Kitāb al-Shifā bi-Ta'riḡ Ḥuḳūḳ al-Muṣṭafā, apologetic history of the Prophet, publ. at Constantinople, n. d. and in 1329, Cairo, 1276, 1312 and 1327 (voc. ed.); 2^o. Mashāriḡ al-Anwār fī Iktifā' Ṣaḥīḥ (var. İYĀS b. MU'ĀWIYA was appointed kādī of Baṣra by 'Omar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz and died at the age of 76 in 121 or 122 (739-740). He has become proverbial in Arabic literature on account of the many examples of ready wit and intuition (azkanu min Iyās, Freytag, Prov. Arab., i. 593) related of him, which were collected by so early a writer as al-Madā'inī in a work (Zakan Iyās). In this way he has become a familiar figure in literature (cf. R. Basset, Revue des Traditions populaires, vi. 67).

IZMİD (older forms: IZNUKUMİD; IZNIKİMİD; in Ibn Khordādhbeh and Idrīsī: NIKUMİDIYA; in modern times officially written İZMİR), the ancient Nicomedia, capital of the independent Liwā (mutesarriflik) of the same name (cf. KÖDJA-İLİ). The town was taken by the Saldjūks on their invasion of Asia Minor at the end of the xith century and belonged to the lands of Sulaimān b. Kutlumush (470-479 = 1078-1085) who had chosen Nicaea as his capital; shortly after his death it was recaptured by Alexius I Comnenus (Anna Comnena, ed. Reifferscheidt, i. 212, cf. 247, ii. 72) and, apart from the brief period when the Latin Emperors of Constantinople held the town (1204-1207), remained in possession of the Byzantines till it was taken from them by the Ottomans under Örkhan, according to the Turkish sources, in 727 (1325-26) or 726 (1326-7) or 731 (1230-31), according to Byzantine sources, in 1338, cf. v. Hammer, Gesch. des Osm. Reiches, i. 85 and 580; (for the legends associated with the Turkish conquest see Leunclavius, Hist., p. 186-190; Sa'd al-Din, i. 34-37; Christo Papadopoulos, p. 65 sq.). In 1399 Marshal Boucicaud had to turn back from the strong walls of the city (J. Delaville Le Roulx, La France en Orient au XIV^e Siècle, p. 371); in 1402 it was sacked by a body of Timur's troops (Ducas, Bonn ed., p. 72). Under Turkish rule İzmīd acquired special importance as an arsenal for the navy and as a yard for building small merchant vessels from the wood supplied by the rich forests of the neighbourhood. The arsenal, said to have been founded by the Köprülü's, abandoned since the middle of last century, was to have been restarted again by English engineers. The population of the town may be put at 25 000, of whom the majority are Muslims, and the non-Muhammadian element is represented by a strong Armenian community (which immigrated from Persia at the beginning of the xvith century), several hundred Greeks, and a small Jewish community. Since 1873 İzmīd has been connected by rail with Constantinople (terminal station Haidar Paşa; distance 70 miles) and since 1892 with Angora. — Only insignificant ruins exist of the ancient and mediaeval buildings; the Byzantine fortifications on the hill are better preserved, which Busbecq and Belon still saw in their original form in the xvith century. Of the Turkish buildings we may mention the madrasa founded by Sultān Örkhan in the upper city (originally a church; restored by 'Abd al-Madīd); the mosques of Pertew Paşa, Muḥammad Bey and 'Abd al-Salām Bey, built by the architect Sinān, the baths of Rustam Paşa and the Khān of Pertew Paşa. The pleasure palace with park (sarāi baghçesi) built by Murād IV has disappeared; another was built by Mahmūd II and restored by 'Abd al-'Aziz. Among the Greek churches the oldest is that of St. Panteleimon, said to be also the tomb of this patron of the city; destroyed in the reign of Murād IV, it was rebuilt in 1700 and again restored in 1861. In the neighbourhood of İzmīd lay the Champ des Fleurs (Çiçek Meidāni), where Emerich Thököly, prince of Transylvania, spent his last years, till his death on Sept. 13, 1705 in a voluntary exile (De la Motraye, Voyages, i. 309; Paul Lucas, Voy. dans la Grèce, l'Asie Min., etc. Amsterdam 1714, i. 49); his remains buried in the Armenian cemetery were brought to Hungary in 1906 with his tombstone (cf. von Hammer, Umblick, p. 192).

IZMİR (SMYRNA), the most important commercial town in Asiatic Turkey and the residence of the Wālī of the province of Aidin. The form İzmīr (in Ibn Battūta: Yazmīr) corresponds to the form used by Westerners in the middle ages, Smire, Zmirra, etc. (Tomaschek, p. 28; Esmira in Ram Muntaner, c. 202; Ismira in Schiltberger). On the incursion of the Saldjūks into Asia Minor at the end of the xith century the Turk Tzachas (Tçaxçā, only in Anna Comnena), the father-in-law of Kiliç Arslān I, who lived in Nicaea, established himself in Smyrna and undertook from there his campaigns of conquest against the islands of the Archipelago and the Hellespont; it was only after the Saldjūks were driven from Nicaea (June 1097) that Smyrnā was restored to Byzantine rule. John Vatatzes Dukas, emperor of Nicaea (1222-1255), laid out the great system of defences on the Pagus hill (Corp. Inscr. Graec., N^o. 8749), which commands the town. After the dissolution of the Saldjūk kingdom of Kōnya, Aidin, Amīr of Ephesus, seized the town about 1320, and it once more, as in the days of Tzachas, became the base for piratical raids against the islands of the Archipelago and the merchant ships of the Franks. To put an end to this the naval powers concerned combined under the aegis of the Pope and stormed Smyrna on Oct. 28th 1344 (Heyd, Histoire du Commerce du Levant, i. 538). The Knights of Rhodes, to whom the defence of the town was entrusted, built at the harbour the fort of St. Peter, near the later customs-house, which survived up till about fifty years ago. The citadel, on the other hand, remained in the hands of the Aidin-oghlu; Bayazid I, who dispossessed them, installed a sūbāshī (city governor) there. It was not till January 1403 that Timūrlenk stormed the Frankish fort and drove the knights out of Smyrna (Sharaf al-Dīn, Zafar-nāma, ii. 464—477; Dukas, p. 72 sqq.; Chalkokondylas, p. 161, cf. von Hammer, Gesch. d. osm. Reiches, i. 332 sq. and 626 sq. After the withdrawal of Timūrlenk from Asia Minor the adventurer Djunaid [q. v., i. 1063^b sq.] seized the town; on his overthrow, about 1425, the town passed definitely under Ottoman rule.

The further history of the town is of little general interest. On Sept. 13, 1472, Smyrna was attacked by the Venetian fleet under Pietro Mocenigo, plundered and set on fire (Hopf, Chroniques Gréco-Romanes, p. 207; Cippico, Delle Guerre de' Veneziani nell' Asia, p. xxvi sqq.; Zinkeisen, Gesch. d. Osm. Reiches, ii. 405). In the later wars of the Turks with the European sea-powers, the latter, in view of the numerous European inhabitants have repeatedly refrained from attacking the town, for example the Venetians in the autumn of 1694, when after the fall of Chios the Turkish fleet had retreated before them into the Gulf of Smyrna (Kantemir, Gesch. des Osman. Reiches, p. 649; Zinkeisen, op. cit., v. 175) and the Russians in 1770 after they had destroyed the Turkish fleet near Çeşme (Ypsilanti, Τὰ μετὰ τὴν ἕλωσην, p. 466 sq.; cf. v. Hammer, Gesch. d. Osman. Reiches, viii. 358). As a defence against such attacks from the sea, the Porte after the battle in the Dardanelles (June 26, 1656) in the war with Venice built defences at the narrowest part of the Gulf on Cape Sandjak Burnu, called Sandjak Kal'esi (saluting fort) or Yenika'le, which was completely destroyed by the earthquake of July 10, 1688 and then imperfectly rebuilt. In modern times the batteries were remounted and mine barriers laid during the recent wars.

From the land Smyrna has been repeatedly ravaged by the turbulent Djalālī and Ra'yā, who were a plague to Anatolia from the beginning of the xviith century, e.g. in 1600 by the hordes of Kalendaroghlu and Kara Sa'īd (Sandys, Travailes, 6th ed., London 1658, p. 12; cf. v. Hammer, op. cit., iv. 398), in 1625 by Djennet-oghlu of Karasi (Roe, Negotiations, p. 410; Zinkeisen, op. cit., iv. 55 sq.), and in 1736 by Şaribey-oghlu of Khōnās (Pococke, ii. 2 p. 38; Ipsilanti, op. cit., p. 334). Equally dreaded were the regular visits of the Barbary corsairs, who till the conquest of Algeria by the French had the permission of the Porte to recruit their crews from Smyrna and the neighbourhood (Dumont, Voyages, 1699, iv. 106 sqq.; Tournefort, ii. 198; Djewdet, Ta'rikh, iv. 23, vii. 183, x. 233). The Jewish community of Smyrna produced in the xviith century the Messianic heretic Sabbatai Şebī, the founder of the Dōnme [q. v.] sect (crypto-Jewish Muslims), which is still represented by a small body (cf. the contemporary narrative of Rycaut, the English consul at Smyrna, in the continuation of Knolles, History of the Turks, ii. 174 sqq.).

The town was twice visited by earthquakes and almost destroyed. In the first, that took place in July 10, 1688 (Ramādān 12, 1099), the Sandjak Kal'esi was overwhelmed by the waves, most of the buildings collapsed, and thousands of people — at the lowest estimate 5000 — perished among the ruins (Rāshid, Ta'rikh, i. 147^a; Rycaut, Turkish History, p. 301 sq.; Carayon, Relations inédites des Missions de la Compagnie de Jésus, p. 291 sqq.; Pacificus Smit, Vier jaren in Turkije, p. 178 sqq., 246 sq.; De la Motraye, Voyages, i. 182 sq.; Slaars, p. 76, 128). The second took place on July 3 and 5, 1778 and did equal damage, chiefly through the conflagration which broke out among the falling buildings (Bjornstāhl, Briefe, iv. 131—147; Slaars, p. 132 sq.). Almost equally dangerous was the rioting which broke out on March 14, 1797 as a result of a quarrel between Cephaloniots and Croats, and spread fire and death through the town (Djewdet, op. cit., vi. 220 sq.; Zinkeisen, op. cit., vii. 13 sq.). During the war of the Porte with Egypt, on Febr. 19, 1833, emissaries of Ibrāhīm Pasha, after he had defeated the Turks at Kōnya (21 Dec. 1832) and advanced to Kiutāhya, occupied Smyrna for Muhammad 'Alī but retired again after a few weeks (Rosen, Gesch. der Türkei, i. 171).

Smyrna is singularly poor in historical monuments. Nothing worth mentioning is left of the remains of antiquity. The amphitheatre and the circus, in which St. Polycarp, the patron saint of Smyrna, suffered martyrdom, were destroyed in the xviith century and the materials used to build the Bezeştin and the Wazırkhān (v. infra). The alleged tomb of Polycarp near the circus was changed into the grave (turbe) of a Muslim saint at the beginning of the xviiith century. The Byzantine castle on Mt. Pagus has for years been abandoned and left to decay; the old mosque and the great cistern (kırk direk), both presumably of Byzantine origin, are in ruins, and the historical foundation inscription of John Vatatzes, as well as the ancient colossal head of the so-called Amazon, which was formerly built into the wall over the entrance gate of the castle and formed the badge of the town, have in recent times been ruthlessly destroyed. The Turks considered this head to be that of Kaidafa, queen of Saba and therefore called the castle Kaidafa Kal'esi, which in the popular language has been corrupted into Kadifa Kal'esi (Velvet Castle). Among the numerous mosques (ca. 20 large, djāmi', and 46 small, masjid) the following are specially mentioned: Hişār Djāmi' (said to be the old Frankish cathedral), Şhadrewān Djāmi', Kestānepārāri Djāmi' (traditionally said to have been at one time a Greek church), Kemer-altı Djāmi', Hādīdī Hūsain Djāmi'; the large Wazırkhān and the Bezeştin were built in the years 1675—1677 by the Grand Vizier Aḥmad Kōprülü. Other old khān's (warehouses) are the Derwishoghlu Khān, Madama Khān, and the Kara 'Othmān-zāde Khān. A peculiarity of Smyrna are the numerous arcades of the Frankish quarter, the so called Ferikhāne's (corrupted from Frenkkhāne). In the year 1108 (1696—7) a mint was instituted in Smyrna to strike ducats (ashrafî) and silver piastres (ghrûshî); it closed after a few years however (Râshid, Târikh, i. 226a; cf. Ismâ'il Ghâlib, Takwîm-i Meskûkât-i 'Othmâniye, n^o. 597—600). Its great importance as a place of export for the products of the soil and industries of the interior (gums, figs, cotton, poppy seeds, opium, valonia, licorice, carpets, etc.) was attained by Smyrna in the xviiith century. The goods of more distant lands, e. g. Persian silk and the camelots of Angora in those days and down to modern times found their way to the west via Smyrna. Numerous English and Dutch merchants settled there and the English colony has played a distinguished part in the development of the country, economic and cultural. Trade with Persia and Angora resulted in a considerable immigration of Armenians. The Jews (Şefardîm) had the exclusive right to serve as brokers. The Europeans lived in the Frank quarter and conducted themselves there with the same freedom as in their own land. They were later joined by a strong community of trading Greeks, while the Muhammadan element was gradually driven into the back ground. G'aur Izmirî ("infidel Smyrna") therefore became a name of the town; the quarter of the town inhabited by the Rhodians was already so called by Timûr's time in contrast to the upper town, which remained in the hands of Muslims (Izmîr-i Gabrân in Şaraf al-Din). — The present population is estimated at about 300 000, of whom 90 000 are Muslims, 110 000 Greeks, 30 000 Jews, 15 000 Armenians, 55 000 foreigners, including 30 000 Hellenes.

IZNIK, the ancient and Byzantine Nicaea (Nikiya in Ibn Khordâdhbih and al-Idrîsî), was besieged in vain by the Arabs in their first campaigns against Byzantium in 717 and 725 (Theophanes, ed. de Boor, i. 397 and 405 sqq.) and fell at the beginning of 1081 into the hands of the Saldjûk Sulaimân, son of Kutlumush, who made his residence there. The first Crusaders under Walthey Habenichts were severely defeated before Nicaea in 1096 by Alp Arslân, son and successor of Sulaimân; next year, however, the town could not withstand the onslaught of the Crusaders, led by Godfrey de Bouillon, and surrendered on June 19/20, 1097 to the Byzantines in alliance with the Crusaders, in whose possession it remained till the Ottoman invasion. Sulţân 'Othmân I is said to have attacked Nicaea, but it was not till the time of Orkhân that it was taken after a prolonged siege in 731 (1331); he moved his capital thither for a time ('Ashîk-pashazâde and Leunclavius, Hist., p. 195; cf. Nicephorus Gregoras, iii. 508 sq.). In 1402 the town was taken and devastated by a raiding body of Timûr's troops (Ducas, p. 72; Sherif al-Din, Zafarnâma, ii. 454), but it soon recovered from this blow, and it is described as flourishing and prosperous at the time of the rebellion of Prince Muştafâ (Leunclavius, Hist., p. 525, l. 46); Bâyezîd II is said to have intended after the death of his father, Muḥammad II, to renounce the throne and retire to Nicaea.

The decline of the town began about the middle of the xviiith century; the population then estimated at 10 000 (Grelot) has since sunk to 1500. The once flourishing manufacture of faience tiles (çini), which Otter (Voyage en Turquie, i. 44) still found working in 1736, has now ceased. Only a slight memory of it, no longer understood, remains in the name Çinîzlik (for Çini Iznik, "faience Iznik"), which the town popularly bears. The present village occupies a small part of the area surrounded by the town walls and forms with its district a community (nâhiya) of the Kaḍâ of Yenîshehr, in the wilâyet of Khudawendîgiar (Brussa), while Iznik was formerly the capital of a kaḍâ of the eyâlet of Kocja-eli. The general decay has also affected the ancient buildings. The best preserved are the Roman and Byzantine walls consisting of a double rampart (best described by Prokesch and Texier; cf. theon Körte, Mitt. des Deutsch. Arch. Instituts, Athens, xxiv. 398—409) with their monumental gateways and 238 towers (Texier). The Byzantine part of these defences dates from the time of Leo III the Isaurian, who had them built here after the Arab invasion of 726 (Corp. Inscr. Graec., n^o. 8864); Michael III in 858, and later Theodore Lascaris (Corp. Inscr. Graec., n^o. 8745—8747) completed and improved them. Of the foundations of Sulţân Orkhân only a madrasa is still in use; the mosque (restored in the xvth century by Sinân for Sulaimân I) has with its 'Imâret been dilapidated for centuries; of the buildings of the family of Djandaralî Khair al-Din Pasha, the Yeshil Djâmî (built in 780—794 A. H.) and the mosque of Mukriûne Khâtûn, dedicated to Eshref-zâde Rûmî (flourished in the reign of Muḥammad II; cf. Mitt. d. Seminars f. Or. Sprachen zu Berlin, v. 2, p. 164), are tolerably well preserved; the tomb of Eshrefzāde is still a much visited place of pilgrimage. Of the three churches which the Greeks still had at the end of the xvth century (Crusius, Turcogræcia, p. 204), those of St. Theodori and of St. George have disappeared; the third, that of the Κοίμησις τῆς Παναγίας, restored in 1807, is a Byzantine building of the ixth century with additions of the xith and of interest on account of its old mosaic decorations.

(J. H. MORDTMANN.)

'IZRĀ'IL (in European literature one also finds 'Azrā'il), the name of the angel of death, one of the four archangels (next to Djibril, Mikhā'il, Isrāfil). The name is perhaps a corruption of אִרְמַיָּה, which is given by Eisenmenger, Entdecktes Judenthum, ii. 333, as the name of the prince of Hell. Like Isrāfil, whose office of trumpet-blower at the last judgment is sometimes given to him, he is of cosmic magnitude; if the water of all the seas and rivers were poured on his head, not a drop would reach the earth. He has a seat (sarir) of light in the fourth or seventh heaven, on which one of his feet rests; the other stands on the bridge between paradise and hell. He is however also said to have 70 000 feet.

The description of his appearance agrees almost exactly with that in Jewish literature: he has 4000 wings and his whole body consists of eyes and tongues, the number of which corresponds with that of the living. He however, is also said to have four faces.

At first he was an angel like others. When Allāh wanted to create man, he ordered Djibril to snatch from the earth for this purpose a handful of its main constituents. The earth, however, stirred up by Iblis, offered resistance, so that neither Djibril, nor Mikhā'il nor Isrāfil could carry out the commission. But 'Izrā'il managed to do it. On account of his hard-heartedness (kīlat al-raḥma) Allāh then appointed him angel of death.

On account of his strength he is also master of death. When Allāh had created Death, he summoned the angels to look at him. When they saw his astonishing strength, they fell down unconscious and remained lying for thousand years. Then they awakened and said: "Death is the most powerful of creatures". But Allāh said: "I have appointed 'Izrā'il to be lord over him".

Several angels of death are mentioned, as in Jewish literature; and it is said that 'Izrā'il deals with the souls of the prophets while the souls of ordinary men are under his khālifa. Special stress is laid on the beginning of Sūra lxxix. as authority for a number of angels of death: "By those who tear forth and by those who draw forth" etc. The former are said to be those angels who drag the souls of the unbelievers by force from their bodies, while by the latter are meant those who have to separate the souls of the believers from their bodies. The explanation of the verse however is not certain. In Sūra xxxii. 11 mention is made of the angel of death (in the singular).

'Izrā'il keeps a roll of mankind. But he does not know the date of death of the individuals. Whether one belongs to the blessed or the damned, he sees from the fact that the names in the first category are surrounded by a bright and those in the second by a dark circle.

When the day of a man's death approaches, Allāh causes to fall from the tree below his throne the leaf on which the man's name is written. 'Izrā'il reads the name and has to separate the person's soul from his body after 40 days.

But there are some people who strive against the separation, and object that the angel of death is acting arbitrarily. The latter then goes back to Allāh and tells him his experience. Allāh then gives him as a credential an apple from Paradise on which the basmala [q. v.] is written; when the man sees this, he yields.

Man also has other means of making it difficult for the angel of death to carry out his task. If the latter wants to creep into his throat to fetch out his spirit, the dying man recites a dhikr [q. v.] and thus closes the entrance. The angel then returns to Allāh, who advises him to try it with the dying man's hand. If the latter however is just making a ṣadaka [q. v.] the angel's entrance is again impossible. Finally however 'Izrā'il writes the name of God on the man's hand. Then the bitter feeling of separation disappears and the angel can enter to fetch the spirit. — On the other hand, it is also said that he pierces men with a poisoned lance. Another account is as follows: When a believer is on his deathbed, the angel of death stands at his head and draws his soul out as gently as water runs out of a skin. He hands it to his assistants who carry it through the seven heavens up to the highest and then place it with the body in the grave (the soul's journey to heaven; cf. Bousset in Archiv f. d. Religionswissenschaft, iv.).

But if an unbeliever die, the angel of death tears the soul out of his body in the roughest fashion. The gate of heaven closes before the soul, as it is carried up, and it is thrown down to earth again.

Characters like Idris, Ilyās, 'Isā and al-Khādir [q. v.], as is well known, were not subject to death. As regards Moses the same thing could not be asserted; but the Bible throws a veil over his death. Muslim tradition accordingly says that Moses defended himself against the angel of death, who came with the fatal message to him, and bruised his eye. Allāh said to the angel when he came back:

"If he places his hand on a cow, as many years are to be granted him as his hand covers hairs". "And then?" asked Moses. "Death", said Allāh. — It is also related that the angel of death came to Moses with an apple from Paradise; when he had smelled this, he died.

On an experience of Solomon's with the angel of death, see al-Baidāwī on Sūra xxxi. 34; on his visit to Idrīs, see that article.

‘IZZ AL-DAWLA, honorific name frequently assumed by Muḥammadan princes, e.g. Bakhtiyar [q.v.].

‘IZZ AL-DĪN, honorific name, for princes often combined with the preceding (‘Izz al-Dawla wal-Dīn). However, not only princes bear this name, but scholars also.

‘IZZET MOLLA, KEČEDJİ-ZADE MEHMET, ‘Izzet Efendi, an important Ottoman statesman and poet in the reign of Maḥmūd II. Born in 1200 (1785-6) in Constantinople, the son of the kaḍī-asker Ṣāliḥ Efendi, he devoted himself to a theological and legal career, following in his father's footsteps. When he had reached the position of Mollā of Galata, he was subsequently involved in the fall of his patron Ḥālet Efendi, as he had written satirical verses on his behalf. He was therefore banished to Keshān near Rodosto. Pardoned a year later he regained Sultān Maḥmūd's favour, who chose him as a companion. ‘Izzet received the highest religious offices. In 1245 (1829) he acted as a representative at the peace negotiation with Russia. His openly displayed bias in favour of peace at any price brought upon him the enmity of the war party, whose intrigues succeeded in getting him banished to Sīwās. There he died soon after his arrival in 1245 (1829-30), of poison, it is said. One of his sons is the statesman Fu’ād Paṣha.

In addition to numerous chronograms he composed two diwāns, Behār-i Efkār (Springtime of Thoughts), concluded about 1240 (1824-5), and Khasān-i Athār (Autumn of Actions), only put together after his death. Neither transcends mediocrity. ‘Izzet however won great renown through his two romantic Mathnawī: Gülshen-i ‘Ashk (Rose-garden of Love), completed 1227 (1812), lithogr. Constantinople 1265, is a short romance on the old Persian model with a strain of Mewlewī mysticism. The subject matter shows a pretty and original imagination. But still more attractive is his thoroughly characteristic Mathnawī composed during his exile in Keshān with the ambiguous title Mihnet-Keshān ("The Sufferer" or "Suffering in the place of exile at Keshān"). This is the poetical diary of an exile, in which ghazals, kaṣidas and chronograms are scattered through the Mathnawī verses, and it gives an interesting insight into the world of ideas of a highly educated dignitary of the time and at the same time truthfully reflects provincial life in European Turkey at the period of the beginning of Maḥmūd's reforms. The work, the language of which is already remarkably national Turkish and is interspersed with Turkish every-day idioms, secures ‘Izzet Mollā a distinguished place among the reformers of the language and the modernists. It was lithographed in 1269 at Constantinople. Ziyā Paṣha also published it in his Kharābāt: Türk Mathnawiyāt (1292).

‘IZZĪ (WAḤ‘A-NUWĪS SULAIMĀN ‘IZZĪ EFENDĪ); Turkish historiographer-royal and poet. He was the son of Ḳhalīl Agha, commander of the Baltadji Guard, and of Ḳhadīdja, daughter of Aḥmad III, and entered the Imperial Diwān as secretary. In 1156 (1743) he was appointed the seventh holder of the office of historiographer-royal (waḥ‘a-nūwis) in succession to Ṣubḥī. In 1160 he became master of ceremonies (teṣhrīfātī). He died in Djumādā II 1160 (March/April 1755) and was buried beside Shaikh Murād-zāde, who had initiated him into the Naḳshbandī order. ‘Izzī left a Diwān and a chronicle covering the years 1157—1165 (1744—1752). It was printed in 1199 (1784) as a continuation of Ṣubḥī's history. ‘Izzī's prose is more praised than his poetry. But his style is the most exuberant and to us the most unpleasing of all Ottoman historians. His fondness for chronograms is notorious. He enjoyed a considerable reputation as a calligrapher.

JACOB. [See ISRA’ĪL.]

JAEN, situated at the foot on the north east of the Iabalruz (= Djabal Kūz), west of the Guadalbullón, is the capital (1700 feet above sea level; 30,000 inhabitants) of the Spanish province of the same name (300,000 inhabitants), the area in which the Guadalquivir-Baetis takes its rise in Upper Andalusia; Andalusia in the narrower use of the word (cf. Andalucía) comprises the whole basin of the Baetis and its tributaries and from west to east includes the five modern provinces of Huelva, Cádiz, Sevilla, Córdoba and Jaén, while Andalusia in the wider sense includes also the ancient kingdom of Granada, finally reconquered in 1492 by the Reyes Católicos, Ferdinand and Isabel, with the mountainous three modern provinces on the Mediterranean, Málaga, Granada and Almería, so that greater Andalusia corresponded to the ancient classical (Provincia Hispania) Baetica.

The name Jaén is derived from the Arabic Djāyān (in Spain pronounced Djāyēn with imāla [q. v.]), the origin of which is unknown (old Spanish usually Gien), as Dozy's derivation from U-cien-se (Edrisi, Descr. de l'Afrique et de l'Espagne, transl., p. 248 sq.) seems impossible to us, especially as the ancient Ucia is rather to be sought on the Baetis itself near Andújar. Jaén is rather the ancient Aurgi or Flavium Aurgitanum, which still survives in Awraha (Yāqūt, ed. Wüstenfeld, i. 400, ii. 186), if we read Awriya instead of Awraha. Awriya-Jaén is said by Yāqūt to be the capital of the Kūrat Djāyān, also called simply al-Hāqira, the capital. At the Arab conquest, the province of Jaén was colonized by immigrants from the Syrian Djund [q. v.] of Kinnasrin. The most celebrated among its numerous scholars is the grammarian Ibn Mālik [q. v.].

The history of Jaén is naturally closely bound up with that of the adjacent capital of the western amirate and caliphate of Córdoba, after the fall of which it formed for a time a small kingdom of slight importance until in 1248 it was conquered by the Ferdinand III the Saint, of Castille. In D. Miguel Lafuente Alcántara's Historia de Granada, based quite uncritically on Conde, the history of Jaén as well as that of Málaga and Almería is superficially discussed.

JANINA (Ἰαννίνα, Ἰαννίνα, turkish Yāniya), a town in lower Albania, on the west bank of the lake of the same name, at the foot of Mount Mitzikelis, 1900 feet above the sea-level. It was formerly the capital of the vilāyet of the same name. The palace of the Pasha and two of its mosques are situated on a peninsula which runs out to the middle of the lake. It was defended by several forts. It replaced the ancient Dodona which had become the see of a bishopric, and the ruins of which are still to be seen 12 miles away; after the invasion of the Goths under Totila in 551, it took the name Joannina, derived from that of St. John (ἁγίου Ἰωάννου) who had become the patron saint of the town. In the reign of Sultān Murād II, after the capture of Salonika, the deputies of the town offered to surrender Janina to him, if he allowed the inhabitants to enjoy their privileges and liberties. The Sultān accepted their conditions, received the keys of the town and handed over to the deputies a khatt-i sharif, signed with his own hand (1st Šafar 835 = 9 Oct. 1431); it is said that the ceremony took place at a place near Salonika called Klidi (key). Eighteen officers under the charge of Sinān Beg were ordered to take possession of the town and to build outside the walls, in accordance with the treaty, the houses they were to live in; in spite of the pledge, the commissioners had the church of St. Michael in the middle of the town demolished and the fortifications dismantled; taking advantage of a festival celebrated in the church of the Pantokrator, they attacked the crowd and carried off the daughters of the best families. Janina had no particular history till the time when 'Alī Pasha of Tepe-Dilen [see 'ALĪ TEPEDİLENLİ], desiring to escape from the yoke of the Sublime Porte, made it his capital. He brought prosperity and life to the town, protecting agriculture and commerce. The siege of 1236 (1820) ruined the town. Of the 16 churches which formerly existed only six are left. The mosque of Arslān Agha was built in 1712 on the site of the ancient basilika of St. John; many ancient columns are still found there. Other noteworthy buildings are the Bairaklı Djāmi' (the "mosque of the standard"), built by Bāyazīd II, and that of Muṣṭafā Efendi. Besieged by the Greeks at the end of 1912 it capitulated on March 6, 1913, and was definitely ceded to Greece by the Turkish Empire (Treaty of Athens, Nov. 14, 1913).

Local industries include the manufacture of blankets called valensa, fine carpets, a serge called shayaḥ, slippers called yāniya čaryghy, mirrors, gold and silver thread, and garments embroidered with gold for the use of the Albanians. The population was given as 16,230 in 1874 by L. Moreau, French vice-consul in Bull. de la Société Soc. de Géogr., 6th Ser., xii. (1876), 543 sqq., cf. Peterm. Mitt., suppl. Vol. xxii. 42 sq. and supra i. 451a).

The former province of Janina comprised the sandjak of Yāniya, of Ergeri (Argyrokastro), of Preveza and of Berat, and also, before the cession of Thessaly to Greece, that of Tirhāla (Trikkala).

JANISSARIES (Turkish yeni-čeri[k], "new troops"), the name given to the regular infantry created by the Ottoman Turks in the xivth century, which became their principal force and rendered possible the vast conquests made in this and the following centuries. Their organisation goes back to Sultān Orkhān (726 = 1326), son and successor of 'Othmān, his brother and prime minister 'Alā' al-Dīn, and Kara Khalil Čendereli [see ČENDERELI], brother-in-law of Shaikh Edebalī. Before this time the chief Ottoman troops were, as in the Persian armies, bodies of horsemen called aḳyndжі (light cavalry); they were supported by infantry called in Persian piyāda and in Turkish jaya (foot-soldiers) who, although organised in companies of ten, a hundred, and a thousand men were in reality mere levies without any great cohesion. It is Kara-Çendereli's merit that he created regular regiments of infantry at an age when mediaeval Europe was still at the stage of armed bands, before the organisation of the companies of archers in England, and a century before the first standing armies in France under Charles VII. It was very probably the contact with the legions of the Byzantines, although far sunk from their former glory, that gave the Turks the idea of supporting the Turkoman cavalry with well-trained infantry. But recruiting for the latter was carried out on entirely different lines, of which, moreover, the Janissaries are the only example in history.

In the article DEWSHİRME [q. v.], it has been explained how the Ottoman government used to levy from Christian peoples conquered by them a tribute of children, who were converted to Islām and educated in special schools and continued to be regarded as slaves of the sovereign (kul); the children of Janissaries married to native women in the Barbary regencies and their descendants are called kul oğlu "sons of slaves" [cf. i. 260b, 271a]. An institution of this kind was contrary to Muslim law which does not allow a sovereign to force the dhimmi [v. DHIMMA] to give their children into slavery; the Turks who were in the service of the 'Abbāsid Caliphs came from captures made on enemy territory (dār ḥarb) and not from conquered territory (dār islām); it was only possible to form the Janissaries by an act of the ruler (urf), in disregard of canon law (shari'at).

From the first the new troops were under the patronage of the dervish Hādjdji Bektāsh and regarded as affiliated to the religious order which he had founded. (cf. BEKTĀSH and HURUFİS); as headgear they were given a bonnet of white felt, to which there was attached behind a piece of cloth in memory of the benediction, during which the saint had left his sleeve hanging on the back of his flock. This bonnet had a wooden spoon as a badge. The names of the officers were taken from various departments of the kitchen: zorbadji-bashy (chief soup-maker), ashči-bashy (chief cook), as we shall see later. The most sacred object in the regiment was the great cauldron of bronze (kazan) around which they assembled not only at meals but also to take counsel. Upsetting the cauldron was a sign of revolt, which became more frequent in course of time when, from the reign of Sultān Muḥammad IV (1051—99 = 1641—87), the ancient practice of dewshirme fell into disuse.

The corps of Janissaries was called odjak, "hearth"; it was divided into several tactical units called orta, "regiment", fixed in number and of varying strength (according to the period, 100, 500 and up to 3000 men); these orta were lodged in barracks called oda "rooms" (East Turk. otak). In the field the regiments encamped under huge round tents on which were embroidered their distinctive emblems. Numbering 165 at first, the orta were increased in number to 196, not including 59 orta formed by the 'Adjemi-oghlan [q. v.] and divided into three classes: djemā'at, "reunion, assembly" comprising 101 orta; 2. bölük, "division", comprising 61 orta; 3. segbān, "huntsmen, hound-keepers", popularly called seimen, to the number of 34 orta.

This corps was commanded by a general with the title yeni-çeri-aghasy, "agha" [q. v.] of the Janissaries", who had a special residence in the capital and offices where the business of the corps was conducted. The Sultān was not obliged to choose him from among the officers of the odjak. He was also in control of the police and of the maintenance of order in the capital; he was always followed by aides-de-camp carrying the fulaka (see FELEKE). In war this general was preceded by a white standard surmounted by a horse-tail (tug) and followed by footmen (shāfir) having the tails of their robes tucked up and fastened in their girdles. — The segbān-bashy was originally, as his name indicates, the chief of the segbān; but as, in time, the orta of the segbān were placed under the direct command of the agha, this post lost some of its importance; however when the agha set out for war at the head of the odjak, the segbān-bashi acted as his deputy in the capital with the title of kāim-makūm. The kul-kıyaya, "superintendent of the slaves", commanding the boluk, was also adjutant to the agha; in war he was chief of staff of the corps; he enjoyed great influence, being chosen for the post by the Janissaries themselves and having the right, after reporting the matter to the agha, to appoint subalterns of a rank lower than that of the zorbadji. The other general officers of the corps were in order of precedence, the sagharidi-bashy, "chief of the bloodhound-keepers", commanding the 64th orta; the muhzir-agha, "chief of the ushers", who represented the interests of the corps with the Grand Vizier; the senior and junior khasseki, "charged with special duties", who were sent into the provinces to settle questions concerning the odjak there; the bash-chaush, chief of the sergeants", commanding the 5th orta, the crier of the council, who carried out its decisions and enrolled the recruits; the kıyayeri, "the lieutenant of the intendant", representing the kul-kıyaya with the agha, who transmitted the latter's orders to the provinces; the kātib, "secretary", who had to keep the registers called kütük, "tree-trunk".

The officers of each orta were 1. the zorbadji, colonel of the regiment, an expression which has survived in vulgar Turkish with the meaning "notable of a village". 2. the oda-bashy, "chief of the barrack-room", adjutant to the preceding, who kept order on parade and saw that the rules were obeyed; 3. the wakil-kharidji, "controller of expenditure", who looked after the rations; 4. the bairakdār, "standard-bearer"; 5. the bash-eski, "chief of the veterans", the oldest soldier in the orta, who enjoyed great consideration on account of this title; as he was in command of the kara-kol, "guards", he was also called bash-kara-kollukçı; 6. the ashči-bashy, "chief cook", the quartermaster of the regiment, having under his command the yamak, "assistants", who was also head of the guard-room and of the prison of the regiment: his sign of office was a large knife; 7. the sakka-bashy, "chief water-carrier".

The offensive and defensive weapons of the Janissaries varied at different epochs; we shall give here a few indications of their nature taken from Djewād, from a stock-taking made in the depot for old arms (Museum of St. Irene) in Constantinople; slings, bow and arrows (employed alongside of fire-arms until 955 (1548), according to Şolak-zāde, Tārīkh, p. 396, 429, 510, but kept as a sport down to our own times in the clubs of the archers called kémān-kesh; at the old exercise ground at the Oğ-Meidān marble pillars mark the distance of the Sultān Maḥmūd II's shot); claw-footed and screw-jack and winding arbalests (taṭār-oky), javelin (djērid), matchlock, flintlock, blunderbuss (cf. Montecuculli, Mémoires, Bk. II), pistol, bayonet (introduced in 1151 = 1738, then dropped and taken up again in 1168 = 1755), maces (gürz, sheshpēr, topūz), whips, flails, axes, scythes, halberds, bills, straight swords, for one or two hands, sabres (kylyç, pāla, yataghan), daggers (kama), lances, bucklers, coats-of-mail covered in places with metal plates, helmets of copper or steel (the peak in imitation of the shape of a fez, terminating in a sharp point).

Each orta had an emblem which was placed upon its flags as well as upon the doors of the barracks; the Janissaries also had a habit of tattooing it on their arms and legs. Promotions in rank were always made by seniority. The Janissaries were only punished by their own officers; the punishments were imprisonment, the bastinado and death; in the last case the execution took place secretly at night at Rūmili-ḥiṣār and the body was thrown into the Bosphorus with a cannon ball at its feet; a cannon shot however announced the execution of the sentence. Soldiers who became old and infirm or disabled, were retired with a pension; they were called oturaç.

The admission of foreign elements, outside of the recruits from the ranks of the ʿadīmī-oghlan [q. v.], gradually caused the corps of Janissaries to lose its value; the origin of these abuses dates back to the Sultān Murād III, who in 990 (1582) forced the odjak, in spite of the regulations and in spite of the resignation of the agha Ferhād, to receive into their ranks acrobats and wrestlers who had amused the people at the festivals on the circumcision of the prince who was later to become Sultān Muḥammad III. Since then individuals of every kind, to gain the privileges of the corps succeeded in gaining admission to it by patronage or purchase. In 1153 (1740) the authority to deal in salaried offices (ʿulufe) which anyone could buy or sell, completed the ruin of the Janissaries as a military force. Those who were really soldiers no longer drew their pay but lived by exactions; soon hardly a dozen were found in every body of police to keep order in the streets and take their pay from the passers by.

Mutinies were frequent under the pretext of claiming an accession gift (bakhshish) which the Sultān used to distribute to the troops on his enthronement, since the abortive attempt, energetically suppressed, which the Janissaries made against Sultān Muḥammad II, on the occasion of his second reign (885 = 1451). From the time of the assassination of Sultān ʿOthmān II (1031 = 1622) the Janissaries played a part in politics, terrorised sovereigns, made and unmade grand viziers. They served as the tools of the factious, who remained in the background, escaping responsibility. The only exception was the glorious reign of Murād IV (1032—49 = 1623—40) who restored their discipline. The unfortunate wars against Russia at the end of the xviiith century persuaded the authorities that they ought to replace this obsolete and degenerate institution, incapable of reforming itself and ready to impede all progress, by new military formations. Sultān Selim III, acting on the decisions of a grand council, decided to form a regular army on the estate of Lévend-Çiftlik, lying on the heights of Orta-kiöi and Arnaut-kiöi (Bosphorus, on the European side) under the name of niḡām-i-djedid (new organisation). This attempt at reform, unpopular and opposed by the Janissaries, who did not wish to submit to military drill, led to the rebellion of Kaḇākçi and the imprisonment of Selim III in the Serāi, where he was not long in being assassinated. Bairakdar Pasha in vain gave the name seḡbān to the new militia, he had resolved to form, for it did not survive its creator.

Sultān Maḥmūd II finding himself pressed by the Russians, Egyptians and revolted Greeks, resolved to take up his brother's plans again; he created a body of regular soldiers who were called eshkendji "active soldiers", reviving an old designation given to the Janissaries when on active service; but the announcement of the beginning of regular drill provoked a mutiny (9th Dhu 'l-Ka'da, 1241 = 10th June 1826) on the Et-Maidān (the meat-square) in the centre of the barracks. The Sultān at once went in a caique to the Serāi, consulted the ʿulmā, brought out the standard of the Prophet and summoned the Muslim population, victims of the exactions of the Janissaries, to come and fight them. The gunners and marines of the navy, formed one column, the bombardiers and sappers formed a second and marched on the Et-Maidān. The great gate was barricaded but soon fell before the canon; the barracks were set on fire and the rebels overwhelmed. A great assembly, whose decision was ratified by an imperial firman, pronounced the complete suppression of the Janissaries. Since then the Ottoman empire has been able to create a regular army modelled on these of Europe.

JAPHET. [See YAFITH.]

JAVA, the most important island in the Malay Archipelago, 2390 geographical square miles in area, in 5° south. Lat. is oblong in form, as it lies with Sumatra and the Little Sunda Islands on the southern Sunda fold mountains [see INDIES (DUTCH)]. In contrast to the western (Sumatra) and the eastern (Timor) end, the oldest rocks on the island of Java are entirely covered by tertiary and later volcanic products and coral limestones. The latter show that the island was at one time for the most part sunk below the sea-level and was afterwards raised at least 4000 feet; the former come from the 109 volcanoes of the island of which 13 are still active, and cause by their weathering the great fertility of the plains and of the slopes of the volcanoes. The two groups of rock are fairly equally distributed in the mountains of the island. Flat country is found almost only along the north coast as the swell and the depth of the Indian Ocean prevents its formation in the south. The rivers are very numerous, almost all flow north and are of no great length. They are therefore of no importance for navigation except the largest, such as the Solo or Bèngawan and the Brantas in Eastern Java. But they give the water to irrigate the ricefields and are therefore of economic importance.

The oblong shape, the fertility and the excellent climate of the island have all contributed much to its great economic development. As early as the beginning of the xixth century a road was made along the north coast for military purposes by Governor-General Daendels. Since then there has developed the system of roads between the chief towns of the interior, which has been supplemented in the last quarter of last century by railways. At the end of 1917, the state railways in the west amounted in length to 1240 kilometres, in the east to 989, and in Central Java there is a privately owned line 262 kilometres long. The tramlines of the whole island measure 2135 km. (1 km. to each 28.4 sq. km. and to 7350 inhabitants). On the north coast there are harbours at Tandjong Priok near Batavia and at Surabaya and in the south at Tjilatjap. Other trading centres like Tjirèbon and Sèmarang in the north and Patjitan in the south have only natural roadsteads.

The island of Java enjoys a very favourable tropical climate without excessive heat or drought. The average temperature of the coast towns is 26°—27° C., the daily and annual variation does not exceed 5° C. The monsoon climate of the Dutch Indies [q. v.] prevails here only in a modified form; as it becomes narrower towards the west, Western Java enjoys a more regular rainfall than Eastern Java, where during our summer months little rain falls in the plains. The annual rainfall amounts in low-lying districts like Batavia to at least 80 inches and rises to 178 inches at a height of 875 feet at Buitenzorg, while in isolated estates in the northern mountains of Central Java up to 360 inches is recorded. Its climate and fertility give Java a luxuriant vegetation which in the west displays the character of the tropical rain forests and towards the east with trees like Tectona grandis (teak) and, in the cool zone, with pines like Casuarina, approximates to the monsoon forests. In consequence of the dense population and the European settlements these forests have been almost entirely uprooted except in the southwest and east, and therefore great floods occur in the rainy season. The high slopes of the mountains are well fitted for intensive agriculture, of which the tropical zone (in West Java up to 2100 feet and 27°—23° C. temp.) bears plants like rice, sugar-cane, tobacco, coffee, indigo, rubber, sweet potatoes, palms, screw-pines and mangrove forests, the subtropical (up to 5000 feet and 23°—18° C.) plants like tea, coffee and cinchona, European potatoes and vegetables, the cool (up to 8200 feet and 18°—13° C.) coffee, oaks and other trees of temperate climates. Above 8200 feet, mosses and lichens are found. The fauna of Java belongs to the Asiatic zone of India [v. INDIES]. Among the larger kinds are apes, tigers, panthers, rhinoceros, wild cattle, deer and wild boar.

The earliest mention of the name Java is found in a passage in the Kāmāyāna which Kern dates about 150. There Yavadvipa appears as the island of gold. About the same time Ptolemy (vii. 2, 29) mentions the island of Iabadiu as very fertile and yielding much gold. He interprets the name as barley-island, which is literally correct, but as barley does not grow on Java, the equally possible interpretation millet island may be more appropriate. How far these names agree with the modern geographical denotation is not clear. Java and Sumatra or a part of it are apparently regarded as a whole. (Cf. H. Kern, Java en het Goudeiland volgens de oudste berichten, and De naamsoorsprong van Java, in Verspreide Geschriften, v. [The Hague 1916], 303—21). In the old Javanese inscriptions of King Er-Laŋga of the 1031 the name is Yawa and in the Kavi poem Nagarakṛtāgama (1365) Java alternates with Yawa as the name of the island.

The oldest Arabic source in which we find the name Djāwa seems to be Yāqūt's (d. 676 = 1228) Mu'djam. But here as in some other sources it is not quite clear, what is to be understood by it, as the mention of an article of export like camphor points to Sumatra. From the time of Ibn Sa'īd (viith = xiiith century) Djāwa is usual as a name for Sumatra (Rashīd al-Dīn, Abu 'l-Fida', Ibn Battūṭa), but in 'Alī Ra'īs (1554) we find Djāwa for Java. But so early a writer as Ibn Khordādhbih (272 = 885/6) gives Djāba as the name for the island of Java (ed. de Goeje, trans. p. 46) and it is found in several later works (Ibn Waṣīf Shāh, al-Idrīsī, al-Kāzīmī, Ibn al-Wardī, Ibn Khaldūn). The name Java is also concealed in the name Zabādj, which most probably arose out of Djāwaga (Jāvaga) and means Javanese (Malay) (see H. Kern Verspr. Geschriften, iii. [The Hague 1915], 283 sq., and Iabadiu in Bijdragen tot de Taal-, Land- en Volkenkunde van Nederl. Indië, 7th Ser. iv [1905], 365 sq., cf. thereon C. Snouck Hurgronje, Een miskende Arabische palataal, in Tijdschr. voor Ind. Taal-, Land- en Volkenkunde, xlviii [1906], 85 sqq.). Al-Zabādj however refers sometimes to Central and South Sumatra and sometimes to Java and occasionally comprises the whole archipelago. Cf. on the above: Relations de Voyages et Textes géogr. arabes, persans et turcs relatifs à l'Extrême-Orient du VIII^e au XVIII^e siècles, trans. by G. Ferrand, i., ii., Paris 1913—14; G. P. Rouffaer, Article Tochten (Oudste Ontdekkings-) in Encycl. van Nederl.-Indië, 1st ed., iv. 363 sqq.). See also the article DJĀWA.

The trading journeys made by the Hindus along the coast, in dependence on the monsoon, to the Malay archipelago on the way to the Spice Islands, touched at this island also, which soon came to bear their most important colonies, presumably because of its fertility and the shelter offered by its north coast. The great accessibility of the interior enabled the Hindu peoples to settle here also, and thus their power and culture expanded quite early over this Malay island. A Chinese source mentions the presence of Hindus on the island of Java in the year 132 A. D. (cf. G. Ferrand, Le K'ouen-Louen etc., Journ. Asiatique, 11th Ser., xiii. 155 sq.). At a later period the Chinese Buddhist Monk Fa Hian says that in 414 A. D. he found many Hindus but few Buddhists on this island, which he calls Ya-va-di. This Hindu period comes down to Portuguese times but offers great difficulty to the historian as literary and oral traditions have been distorted almost to unintelligibility by fantastic additions. The best data are afforded by the numerous ruins of temples, statues, copper plates (often charters of endowment) and bronze objects with inscriptions and dates, which are found principally in central and eastern Java. They are even sufficient to enable us to sketch the changing political conditions in this Hindu period. Only a few engraved stones are older than 760 A. D., and some copper-plates from Central and Eastern Java, of which the oldest are one of the year 732 from Central Java and another of 760 from Eastern Java.

Numerous inscriptions dated later than 760 exist and are evidence of a flourishing state of Hindu civilisation in Central Java which lasted to the year 860. Eastern Java then came into prominence. It has been established that the celebrated kings Sindok, Airlangga and Djāyā-Bāyā ruled here in the xth, xith and xiith centuries. In 1222 the kingdom of Singasari in Pasuruan gained the ascendancy over that of Daha in Kēdiri. In 1294 arose the kingdom of Mādjāpahit in Surabaya, which afterwards became a great power in the Archipelago. The latter existed down to the beginning of the xvth century.

The temple ruins by their situation and architecture considerably increase the importance of these facts. They may be divided into two groups, an older in Central Java and a younger in East Java. Both are rich in marvellous buildings, which however are executed in different styles. In Central Java they are built of tufa and are closely related to Hindu architecture in British India; in Eastern Java, on the other hand, they are mainly of bricks, and here a more independent Javanese style has developed, which shows Chinese influence. Of the latter we only know that the Emperor Khubilai of China in 1293 sent a military expedition to Eastern Java, which was only partially successful. We have only a few small antiquities from Western Java.

In Central Java are the ruins of the Buddhist temples of Bārā Budur, Tjandi Mēndut, Tjandi Kalasan, Tjandi Sari, Tjandi Sēwu and the Sivaite Tjandi Prambanan. In Eastern Java the most important are Tjandi Panataran, Tjandi Singāsari and Tjandi Tumpang or Djāgā.

Ruins like those of Bārā Budur are among the most beautiful Buddhist ones. From the mixed character of their very numerous statues of gods and religious and profane reliefs it is clear that, as still the case on the island of Bali [q. v.], Brahmanism and Buddhism on Java were closely connected and existed side by side. The Buddhism of the Javanese at that time was of the Mahāyāna school.

In addition to these remains in stone, numerous objects in bronze, gold and silver, such as statues of deities, temple bells, plates etc., are found buried in the ground. Only few remains of secular buildings, even of royal palaces, have been discovered; probably these were of wood and other perishable material. (Cf. on archaeology and epigraphy, the works of Cohen Stuart, H. Kern, J. Brandes and N. J. Krom).

The above remarks show us how highly developed must have been the civilization and how flourishing the prosperity of the island to enable so many costly works to be erected. In view of the lengthy period of their existence in Java it is not surprising that these Hindu kingdoms exercised a transforming influence on the Javanese culture. We shall probably not be wrong if we assume that the Javanese at the beginning of the Hindu period were probably in about the same stage of culture as the modern Dayaks or Toradja. It seems however certain that even then they knew how to grow rice on irrigated fields, as the technical terms used in this connection are not of Sanskrit but of Indonesian origin. But it must have been considerably advanced by the Hindus.

The formation of despotic Hindu kingdoms among Indonesian tribes organized on a patriarchal system was also of economic importance, as on the one hand it abolished the great insecurity and seclusion of these tribes and secondly brought the masses of the people under the rule of their kings and nobles. The latter brought about the development of native arts and crafts whose ornamental motifs are still Hinduistic. That architecture and sculpture were greatly stimulated is shown by their products, temples and statues, and their disappearance after the introduction of Islām. Foreign trade arose through connections with the outer world in the West, and Java became the centre of the wholesale trade in spices, precious stones, timbers, resins, etc. The Javanese still use an Indian alphabet and the vocabulary of their language contains a large number of Hindu words and expressions. The introduction of writing was of the greatest importance for the advancement of civilization and on it is based the literary development of the modern Javanese.

When the Brahman sects finally attained preponderance in the island of Java, they gradually introduced the caste system in the form in which it is still found on the island of Bali. With the introduction of Islām this distinction of the classes disappeared. The gulf that exists between the common people and the nobility and official classes with the princes at their head and the submissiveness of the former must be regarded as consequences of the caste system. They are foreign to the aboriginal Indonesians.

Islām spread to Java from Malacca, into which it had been introduced by merchants from India (such as Persians and Gujaratis), and was predominant in the beginning of the xvth century. Besides the Indians, after the rise of Malacca, Malay traders also by their residence in Java created an opening for Islām. Around the families founded by such merchants at the ports, communities of native believers gradually grew up, which finally developed into small states. Influential traders no doubt succeeded in entering into close relations with princes of the seaports through marriage, whereby Islām could gain influence in the upper circles. The relations of the Mādjāpahit kingdom to its vassal states also gave occasions for the advance of Islām: it is often reported that princes of Mādjāpahit married Muslim princesses of conquered or allied states. At the same time commerce between Java and the states dependent on the island (Pasei) and an important commercial town like Malacca contributed in no small degree to the spread of Islām. In the last named place there was about 1500 large settlements of Javanese who were for the most part Muslims, according to Portuguese accounts. The latter no doubt influenced their mother country in religious matters. Influences like the above were of all the more effect in a period when there was no strong central authority in the kingdom of Mādjāpahit.

Following the trade route Islām first gained a footing on the coast of Eastern Java. There, in the xvth century, Tuban was the most important harbour of Mādjāpahit and in the following century the most important commercial town next to Grēsik. The oldest relic of the Muslim settlement in Java is the tomb of a certain Fāṭima bint Maimūn, d. 475 or 495 (1082/3 or 1101/2), in Loran. The tomb of Mālik Ibrāhīm in Grēsik dates from 822 (1419); according to native tradition, he was a merchant. According to a statement of a Chinese Muslim, there were in 1416 not yet any native Muhammadans, but a settlement of Muslims who had come from the West and a group of Chinese, some of whom were converts to Islām. In view of the position of Islām in the Moluccas about 1450, it is very probable that about the same time the Muslims "were beginning to assert their influence in Java also in the coast region from Djapara (?) to Surabaya, Tuban and Grēsik particularly". In the course of the next fifty years the communities of native Muslims with the support of immigrant Muhammadans developed into small states on the coast, which soon endeavoured to assume authority over Eastern Java. (On the above cf. B. J. O. Schrieke, Het Boek van Bonang, Leiden dissertation, Utrecht 1916, p. 1—39, and the literature there quoted; H. Kracmer, Een Javaansche Primbon uit de Zestiende Eeuw, Leiden diss. 1921).

Legend ascribes the conversion of Java to Islām to the joint activity of eight or nine walis. The names of these saints who are called by the honorific title sunan (susuhunan) and are usually named after their place of burial or activity, are as follows: (1) The already mentioned Mālik Ibrāhīm (also called Mawlānā Maghrabi) who died in 1419. (2) Sunan Ngampel (Raden Raḥmat) who about 1450 married a princess of the family ruling at Tuban and died about 1470. His tomb is in Ngampel (Surabaya). (3) Sunan Bonang, son of Sunan Ngampel's marriage with the Tuban princess and born probably about 1465. His activity in Tuban, probably as head of the Muslim community there, must fall between 1475 and 1500. He perhaps lived to about 1525. His tomb is shown in two different places (cf. Schrieke, op. cit., p. 39 ff.). (4) Sunan Giri (Raden Paku), who is considered the ancestor of the so-called priest-kings of Giri and whose tomb is on the hill of Giri near Grēsik. (5) Sunan Gunung Djati, who left his native place Pasei in 1521 and after his studies in Mecca came to Djapara and probably also to Dēmak; he had great success with his religious teaching and he married a sister of the king of Dēmak. He then went to Bantēn, where with the help of his brother-in-law he succeeded in gaining power. In 1527 he took Sunda Kalapa from the king of Padjadjaran, at whose expense he gradually extended his power. He finally settled in Tjirēbon where he died about 1570; his tomb is to be seen near by on the hill called Gunung Djati. (See Hoesain Djajadiningrat, Critische Beschouwing van de Sadjarah Banten, Leiden Diss. 1913, Haarlem 1913, Index s. v. Goenoeng Djati). 6. Sunan Kudus, buried in Kudus (Res. Sēmarang). 7. Sunan Muria, called after his tomb in the Muria Hills (Djapara). 8. Sunan Dradjat, a second son of Sunan Ngampel; his tomb is in the desa Dradjat on the road from Tuban to Sedayu. 9. Sunan Kali Djaga, whose tomb is in Kadilangu (Sēmarang) (on him cf. Hoesain Djajadiningrat, op. cit., Index). — These nine, it should be noted, are also given with partly varying names (cf. the article Heiligen in *Encyclop. van Nederlandsch-Indië*², ii., and the literature quoted there).

About 1520 a coalition of Muslim kings of the coast states under the leadership of the king of Dēmak, Raden Patah, destroyed the Hindu Javanese kingdom of Mādjāpahit. An attempt made about 1546 to conquer Pasuruan did not succeed. It appears certain also that the kingdom of Dēmak was overthrown by that of Padjang (c. 1568) and the latter again by that of Mataram (c. 1586), out of which the present "Vorstenlanden" of Central Java have arisen.

For the development of political and religious conditions among the Javanese of the xviiith and xviiith centuries Mataram has undoubtedly been the most important sultanate. It was brought to its greatest prosperity by Tjākrā Kusumā (1618—1646), also called Sultan Agung after 1641, and extended its rule over almost the whole of Java. During his reign there existed in the West the independent sultanate (since 1631) of Bantēn and the sultanate of Tjirēbon dependent on him. The kings of Giri-Grēsik at this time had great religious prestige.

By Agung's conquest of the Northern ports of Lasēn (1616), Tuban (1618), Grēsik (1622), Surabaya (1625), and Madura (1627), and by their destruction, the foreign commerce and the shipping of Java received a severe blow, which was not repaired by the foundation of the state harbour of Djapara.

The European competition of the Dutch, English, Danes etc. was thereby much encouraged. By the foundation of the town of Batavia in 1619 on the site of the former Sunda Kalapa or Djakatra the former obtained a commercial and political centre in the sphere of the despot of Mataram, who had as little success in driving them out by a siege in 1628/1629, as had the Bantēnese of the West.

The histories of the Javanese kingdoms of Mataram, Tjirēbon and Bantēn since that date show us classical examples of the destructive influence of the unbridled passions of their rulers and the latter's officials. Agung's kingdom suffered already from his many costly conquests, his successors and their relations only reigned to increase their revenues and gratify their lusts. Domestic conflicts in the royal house itself and several wars with enemies outside, incited thereby, weakened the kingdom more and more.

These circumstances had consequences which were of interest to the "Nederlandsche Generale Geotroyeerde Oost-Indische Compagnie", founded for trading purposes only and managed from Holland, and were important for the development of modern Java. These and the endeavour to maintain a monopoly drove it to a policy of conquest, which became one of the main causes of its decline at the end of the xixth century. As early as Sultān Agung's death in 1646, the Company made a treaty of mutual support with his successor Amangkura I. The latter in 1677 found himself forced to call for the Company's help when pressed by the Madurese and Macassarese. He died a fugitive and his son Amangkura II was only able to ascend the throne with the help of the Dutch Company. The kingdom was next shaken by two wars of succession (1704—1706 and 1746—1755). When the three claimants to the throne were all maintaining their position in the field during the latter of these wars, the Company found itself forced to divide the kingdom of Mataram between two of them in 1755. Thus arose the kingdom of the Susuhunans of Surakarta and of the Sultans of Djokyakarta. In 1758 the third pretender had to be pacified, by granting him the semi-independent position of a prince Mangku Negarā. At that time the Dutch East India Company already possessed the North coast of the Mataram kingdom and the central part of the West down to the South coast. Up to the end of the xviiith century the influence of this trading company on native culture remained relatively small, as their officials only dealt with the natives as far as was necessary for the compulsory deliveries of agricultural products by the kings and the monopoly of imports of clothes, opium, etc.

In the course of the sixteenth century, when the kingdom of the Netherlands had assumed the suzerainty in the Indian Empire of the East Indian Company, the conditions of life among the Javanese population have altered very much. During English rule (1811—1816), the sultanates of Bantēn and Tjirēbon in the West were completely incorporated in the territory of the Indian government and considerable stretches in Central and East Java. The foundation of the independent kingdom of Paku Alam (1813) also broke the resistance of the Sultān of Djokya. When, after the rising of 1825—1830, the present residencies of Banyumas, Bagēlèn, Madiun and Kēdiri were incorporated by the Dutch in their territories as a war indemnity, only 7% of the surface of the island remained to native princes. As they have since then been still further restricted in their powers, the situation of the masses of the people has been much improved. Before this can be judged, we must deal with the population. It consists of 33,000,000 natives, 318,700 Chinese, 72,700 Europeans, 20,370 Arabs and 3000 other foreigners; with a population of 254 to the square kilometre it is therefore one of the most thickly populated parts of the earth's surface. If we consider that in the first and second decade of the sixteenth century, the Governor-Generals Daendels and Raffles estimated the native population at four and five millions and that this enormous increase has taken place without immigration, its explanation certainly appears desirable.

The foreign inhabitants of Java, if we except those only temporarily settled there, are for the most part half-breeds, sprung from intermarriages with native women. The Japanese are included with the Europeans. The Chinese, whose families in many cases have been living for centuries in Java, come from the South Chinese province of Kwan-Tung, the Arabs from South Arabia (Hādrāmawt) and the other foreigners from British India. With a very few exceptions, these all came with the object of earning a living by commerce or industry, and they often succeed very well.

East and the Christian Javanese) are all Muslims. Their languages, customs and physique divide them into three groups: in the West the Sundanese, in the Centre the Javanese, in the East the Madurese. The differences are to be ascribed more to the influences of foreigners (Hindus) and surroundings, than to race. They all belong to the Malays of the Archipelago, but those in the West were less exposed to these influences than those in the East and Centre. The Sundanese therefore remained truer to the original type and more accessible to Islām. The Madurese on their relatively less fertile island have devoted themselves less to agriculture than to cattle-rearing and fishing and formerly to piracy, and thus became more energetic, vigorous and ruder than the Hinduised Javanese. In Western Java the latter only spread along the North and East coasts, while the Madurese are found in East Java in the residencies of Besuki, North Pasuruan and East Surabaya also. The native populations of the large towns like Batavia and Surabaya deserve special mention; in these commercial and administrative centres of the Dutch the native population arose out of traders, slaves, soldiers, political internees of the most varied origins in the course of the last three centuries. As the language formed here has become the lingua franca (Malay) of Europeans and natives for the whole archipelago, these conditions are of special importance.

The natives are an intelligent, circumspect, easily contented, agricultural people who cling firmly to their traditions. They are fond of festivals, games and the use of opium, which sometimes are lead to abuses. The long period of despotic rule has divided the people into two classes, the princes with the nobility and officials on one side and the bulk of the people on the other, and has caused a very complicated system of ceremonial to grow up, which has laid a firm hold on all their customs and also finds expression in their language. The subservience of the masses to their superiors is a further result of these political conditions. In keeping with their geographical situation the Javanese are more submissive than the Madurese and Sundanese. The awakening of Eastern Asia is now being felt even in Java.

The despot was possessor of the soil, granted it to the peasants in return for half the produce in kind and in addition levied taxes in labour and produce on his people regularly and irregularly. His relations and officials were granted lands, and in the "Vorstenlanden", where this system still prevails, these have since the beginning of the sixteenth century been let more and more to European planters. Outside these principalities, the possession of land is private among the Madurese and Sundanese and partly communal among the Javanese. The most popular crop is rice, grown on inundated fields; other food-stuffs are sweet potatoes, beans, spices and fruits; for export tobacco, coco-nuts (copra), cotton and capok are grown. Of all these a number of varieties are known. The rearing of cattle and buffaloes is only subsidiary to agriculture. The horse is used for riding and as a beast of burden but is also eaten like the sheep and the goat. All these domestic animals except cattle were imported from Asia. Hunting as a means of livelihood is of very subordinate importance. The same applies to fishing in the rivers and in the sea. Many fish are reared in artificial ponds of fresh water or on the seashore. The wholesale traffic of the island is in the hands of Europeans and Chinese, the retail is mainly carried on by Chinese and a few natives, and the huckstering in the markets is mainly in the hands of native women.

Javanese industries consist of handicrafts almost exclusively concerned with supplying local needs. Weaving and iron-smelting have decreased very much owing to the large imports of clothes, raw iron, and articles of iron. A few genuine Javanese arts like the making of kris (daggers), the manufacture of copper musical instruments and ornamental articles of copper, wood carving and batikting of cotton clothes are still practised. Only a few of their products such as brass gongs and batik clothes are exported. They bear witness to the abilities of the Javanese in these fields.

The language of the Javanese has developed out of the Old Javanese (Kawi) of the pre-Mâdjâpahit period and the Middle Javanese current down to the new Kingdom of Mataram. At the courts of the Hinduistic princes the vernacular was frequently used for the adaptation of Indian and indigenous legends; when poets and men of letters of the Muhammadan kingdom of Mataram continued in this way, the contents of those literary products became modified, but the language remained Indonesian under these Hinduistic and Muhammadan influences. Both in vocabulary and subject matter, the very rich Javanese literature has adopted much from Hindus and Muhammadans. Javanese literature contains the modern Javanese recensions of the products of three periods. From the first came Kawi poems like the Arjunawiwâha, Nâgarakrêtâgama, Bhâratayuddha (an adaptation of the Mahâbhârata) and Râmâyana in addition to mythological poems like the Manik-Maya on creation and mythology, and Bandung and Adji Saka which contain the mythical history of old Java. The versions of the Mahâbhârata are prose works from this period. From the second period comes the Pandji cycle which celebrates the chivalrous, sentimental love of the Javanese prince Pandji for the princess Angrêni and his adventures. To the third period belongs the Menak Hamzah of Muhammadan Malay origin, which deals with a Muslim hero endowed with supernatural powers who only achieves his wonderful deeds through his belief in Allâh. The Javanese chronicles or Babad's are in rhyme but are of no poetical value, and they are only of historical value when their writers are describing their own experiences. Anbiya contains the Javanese recension of the Muslim legends of prophets. The history of Moses is given in a prose work Radja Pirangon. In addition to the epic the Javanese have also didactic poetry (Wulang Reh; also the beast fable with the dwarf deer, kantjil, as the main character). Poetry is principally cultivated at the Javanese courts, but a good deal is composed elsewhere also. The lack of Javanese prose works is striking. (Cf. also under INDIES (DUTCH), p. 493 sqq. and MALAY).

In the West of the island the language is Sunda and in the East Madura, both languages closely connected with Javanese and having a similar literature, which however in keeping with the less refined civilisation of the Madurese and Sundanese shows a simpler character as regards form and matter. On account of its general interest the language of the town of Batavia and the surrounding district deserves special mention.

The Islâm of the native population possesses the same character as has already been described under INDIES (DUTCH) and indicated in its most important features for the island of Java. It is so important in the lives of the natives up to the highest classes of society that the prevailing political and economic conditions can only be understood if full account is taken of it. This Muhammadanism is grafted upon animism which often appears under Hinduistic forms.

From the economic point of view, agriculture, by far the most important industry, shows most significantly how powerfully the animistic mental attitude makes itself felt. As a result of lack of knowledge of the real conditions of growth, it causes and maintains the neglect of good tillage, of careful choice of plants, of care during growth and precautions at harvest time. Agriculture also labours under the burden of the many animistic sacrificial festivals and ceremonies, which are given a Muslim significance for the people, because a religious person prays for Allâh's blessing at them. The yield of all native crops is therefore much smaller than it would be under European management. It is the religious significance of agricultural customs to the natives that forms a great obstacle to their improvement under European guidance. The government has seriously attacked the question of the study and advance of it. It is similar with cattle-rearing; with the help of the ruling and other native chiefs, very satisfactory results have been obtained in Central Java in improving the breed of cattle and their care.

Politically Islâm is only of importance so far as its teaching regarding infidel rulers makes it appear a subsidiary factor in all troubles which arise out of economic or political grounds. Further, the belief in the personal help of the Almighty and his saints, in amulets, in invulnerability etc. leads in local disturbances to the phenomenon so inexplicable to Europeans, that sometimes a very small number of people, often lead by a guru, vigorously resist the authorities.

The rule of the Dutch is to the advantage of the natives of the Archipelago in several respects, as has already been mentioned at the end of the article INDIES (DUTCH), and on p. 578a. As regards the island of Java, in the last fifty years, economic conditions have largely contributed to this result. The very dense population of the island could not possibly support itself on the yield of their fields and other sources. But in addition there have arisen the constantly increasing sources of revenue which the natives owe to the plantations of tropical products of the Europeans. What huge sums are involved may be gathered from the amounts paid out in wages and rent to the natives by the sugar industry, which moreover is the most highly developed one.

If we consider all these facts together with what has already been said under INDIES (DUTCH), the astounding increase of the population of Java in the last century will be understood. It could only have been attained however by the fact that marriages are general and early among the natives.

As regards administration, the islands of Java and Madura differ from the other islands (Buitenbezittingen); the civil officials are accordingly divided into two classes. There are 17 residencies in Java and Madura and in districts under European residents and assistant-residents who have controllers under them. Alongside of these, the native officials with the regents at their head form the link with the people. The often peculiar organisation of the 32,000 native villages has been left untouched as far as possible.

The native princes occupy a special position. The four kingdoms arose out of that of Mataram, as was briefly outlined above. The residency of Solo or Surakarta contains the kingdom of the Susuhunan of Surakarta and in the South that of the Pangeran Adipati Arya Mangku Negara; the residency of Djokyakarta contains the kingdoms of Djokya or Djokyakarta and of Pangeran Arya Paku Alam in the South-West.

Justice is administered with slight exceptions, in the native states as well as in Java and Madura, by jurists trained in Holland.

Public instruction in the present century is being continually extended by the government, missions and private persons. In the larger places, Dutch is often the language of instruction (at the end of 1917 in 5 secondary boys' schools and two secondary girls' schools and in 198 elementary schools with European teachers). The education of the natives was conducted in 130 schools in seven year courses with Dutch, and in 991 schools in four year courses. There were 4815 village schools with three year courses, 183 schools for Chinese and 30 for Arabs.

JEREMIAH, the prophet. His name is vocalised in Arabic IRMIYĀ, ARMIYĀ or ʾURMIYĀ (see Taḍj al-ʿArūs, x. 157) and these forms are occasionally given with madd also (ʾIrmiyā).

Wahb b. Munabbih gives an account of him which turns upon the main points of the Old Testament story of Jeremiah: his call to be a prophet, his mission to the king of Judah, his mission to the people and his reluctance, the announcement of a foreign tyrant who is to rule over Judah. Jeremiah then rends his garments and curses the day on which he was born; he would rather die than live to see this. God then gives him the promise that Jerusalem shall not be destroyed except at Jeremiah's own request.

Bukht Naṣṣar then attacks the city on account of the increasing sinfulness of the people. God sent an angel in the form of an ordinary Israelite to Jeremiah to find out his opinion on the fall of Jerusalem. He twice sent the angel away to enquire how the people were behaving. The latter returned with the worst reports and communicated them to Jeremiah who was sitting on the wall; the prophet called out: O Lord, if they are on the right path, let them live, but if they are on the path of evil, destroy them! Hardly had he spoken these words than God sent a thunderbolt (ṣāʾika) from heaven which laid the altar and part of the city in ruins. In despair Jeremiah rent his garments, but God said: 'You yourself gave the word'. He then realised that his companion was an angel in disguise. He fled into the desert (Ṭabarī, i. 658 sqq.). — The second episode in the Muslim legend of Jeremiah refers to his meeting with Bukht Naṣṣar. The king found the prophet in prison in Jerusalem, where he had been interned on account of his prophesies of ill fortune. Bukht Naṣṣar at once released him and showed him honour. He thereafter remained in Jerusalem with the miserable remnants of the population. When the latter besought Jeremiah to implore God to accept their repentance, God said to the Prophet. 'Tell them only that they are to remain here'. They refused to do this and took Jeremiah with them into Egypt (Ṭabarī, i. 646 sq.). According to Yaʿqūbī, Jeremiah had hidden the ark in a cave before Nebuchadnezzar's entry into the city. — The third episode runs as follows. When Jerusalem was destroyed and the army had retired, Jeremiah came back riding on an ass. In his hand he carried a bowl of grape-juice and a basket of figs. When he stopped at the ruins of Iliyā (Aelia), he became irresolute and said: 'How can God call all this to life again?' God thereupon deprived him and his ass of life. After a hundred years had passed, God awakened him and said: 'How long hast thou slept?' He replied: 'A day'. God then told him what had happened and brought his ass to life again before his eyes; the grape-juice and the figs had remained fresh. God then granted him long life; he appeared to men in the city and in the desert (Ṭabarī, i. 666).

Of the first two episodes one can say that they are a development of Biblical statements. The third however is based on an misunderstanding connected with Sūra ii. 261: ... 'like him who passed by a city which had been laid in ruins; then he said: How could God revive this after its death? Then God caused him to die for a hundred years; He then wakened him and said: "How long wast thou dead?" He said: "A day or so". He replied, "Nay, a hundred years; look on thy food and thy drink; they are not corrupted; and look on thine ass: we will make thee a sign unto men: And look on the bones, how we will join them together, then clothe them with flesh".

The commentaries on the Kur'an identify this doubting man with various Old Testament figures, including Jeremiah. But we know that the story in Oriental legend was associated with 'Ebed Melek, who appears in the story of Jeremiah (Jeremiah, xxxix. 16 sqq.; cf. The Paralipomena of Jeremiah the Prophet, ed. Rendel Harris). The confusion of Jeremiah with 'Ebed Melek has apparently given rise to another one. 'Ebed Melek, according to the Jewish view, is one of the immortals who never saw death. In Muslim legend al-Khaḍir is one of the immortals. This is probably why Wabḥ b. Munabbih explains al-Khaḍir, "the green", as an epithet of the prophet Jeremiah. This also explains the emphasis laid on his retirement to the desert where, as in the towns, he sometimes meets men; for this is a statement which elsewhere refers to al-Khaḍir in contrast to Ilyās [q. v.] who is the patron saint on the sea.

KA'ĀNĪ, ḤABĪB ALLĀH, a modern Persian poet, son of the versifier Mirzā Muḥammad 'Alī Gulshan, born at Shirāz, was court poet to Muḥammad Shāh, successor to Fath 'Alī Shāh (1250—64 = 1834—48) and to Nāṣir al-Dīn Shāh. He was very precocious and attracted attention from the age of eight. His father died when he was eleven (Perishān, Bombay, 1277, p. 19) and he had to go to Khorāsān to complete his studies. Prince Shudjā' al-Saltāna Ḥasan 'Alī Mirzā, governor of Mashhad, took him under his protection. This was the beginning of his good fortune. In addition to the three classical Muslim languages, he learned French. He was addicted to opium but was not guilty of debauchery. He died at Teherān in 1270 (1854). He left a collection of anecdotes in prose and versé entitled Kitāb-i Perishān, "Book of Scattered Leaves", a parody of the Gulistān of Sa'dī (lithographed at the top of an edition of the Diwān, Bombay 1277, and separately at Teherān in 1302), and a Diwān containing his collected poems (lithographed at Bombay 1277, 1298, 1306 and at Teherān in 1277).

He is incontestably the greatest of the modern poets of Persia, and is perhaps the most witty of all Persian poets. His irony is deep and biting, unfortunately it is often coarse.

KAARTA, the region of the French Sudan between the upper waters of the Senegal and the Sahara. The boundaries of Kaarta are in the north the land of the Dowaish Moors and the Hōḍh [q. v.], in the east Bakhunu, in the south Beledugu and Fuladugu, and in the west the Senegal from the western branch of the Kulu pool to the confluence with the Baulé. It is a vast schistose plateau inclining towards the S. E. so that the majority of its rivers run towards the Senegal. The climate is that of the Sahelian zone: a very short rainy season followed by long periods of drought; the showers are not abundant. Surface water is rare, hence the settlements have clustered round wells which serve to irrigate gardens, planted with millet and vegetables. Although the country is steppelike in character, it is not yet unsuited to agriculture. Stretches of soil on the banks of the rivers and areas uncovered when the streams are low are especially fertile and yield two crops a year. The principal products are rice, maize, millet, earthnuts, cotton and indigo. Cattle and horse-rearing are fairly well developed. The population is not a dense one. Before the conquest of the country by the Tuculor, Faïdherbe estimated the population at 300 000 and the area at 20 700 square miles. To-day it does not seem to exceed 5 to 6 inhabitants to the square mile. This very mixed population comprises Khassonké, Peuhl and Moors in addition to the Bambara [s. d.] and Soninké, who form the most important element. Islām is observed by the Moors and Peuhl, while the Bambara refuse to have anything to do with it. The principal subdivisions of Kaarta are: — Diafunu (Tambaraka) and Diomboko (Koniakari) on the right bank of the Senegal, the Giudiumé (Niogomera) to the north of Diafunu; Tomora (Diala) in the centre; Baghé and Kaarta-Biné to the north of Fuladugu; Dianghirté in the east; Kingui (Nioro) on the Moorish borders. Adjoining the French possessions in Senegal, Kaarta was traversed at the end of the xviiith century by Houghton and Mungo Park (1795) and visited in the xixth by Durantou (1828), Raffanel (1846), Mage and Quintin (1863), and Lenz (1880).

History. Kaarta after being included in the empire of Ghāna [s. d.] and in the Mandingo empire broke up into several small kingdoms on the dissolution of the empire of Mali, which at the end of the xviiith century were conquered by the Bambara Massassi who came from Segou under a chief named Sunsa. The latter conquered Fula-dugu, Kaarta, and Bambuk and took up his residence in a place called Sontanian. His successors had to wage continual war against the Bambara of Segou. Conquered at first, they regained the advantage under the direction of Sié Banmana (1709—1760) who collected the remnants of the Massassi and reconstituted their empire with Guemu as capital. He annexed Dianghirté, Diara, Diemboko and Bambuk. Towards the end of the xviiith century, the Massassi were again overwhelmed by the people of Segou, but their chief Dassé reconstituted his army by means of slaves taken from the merchants. His successor Musa Kurabo recaptured the lost territories and added Koniakari to them. The rulers who reigned after him, suppressed the rebellions which broke out in various provinces. The last of them, Kandia (1844—54), took Nioro as his capital and after seven years of war conquered the Diawara and forced them to migrate to the Sahara. Kaarta was then a powerful state measuring 190 miles from E. to W. and 110 from N. to S. (Raffenel). Power was exercised by a chief belonging to the family of Kulubari. He bore the title of fama and his dignity was hereditary in the collateral line. His authority was absolute but in matters of importance he summoned a council formed of the Kulubari, representatives of certain tribes, and the „chiefs of the captives”.

The Kaarta kingdom fell before the blows of the Tuculor. Kandia having put to death an envoy from al-Ḥaǧǧ ‘Omar, Kaarta was invaded by the bands of this marabout. The fama’s army which took the field against the enemy was routed and the fama himself obliged to submit. The town of Nioro was occupied by the Tuculor and the members of the royal family massacred. Kandia, spared at first, was not long in suffering the same fate. Kaarta henceforth formed a province in the Tuculor kingdom and was administered by a viceroy until 1894. At this date the Sultān of Segou, Aḥmadu, disturbed by the power of his brother Montaga to whom he had confided the government of Kaarta, decided to dispossess him of it. Montaga besieged in Nioro blew himself up rather than capitulate. Aḥmadu then installed himself at Nioro and lived there till the French undertook the conquest of the Tuculor empire. In 1890, the troops of Colonel Galliéni entered Kaarta and seized Koniakari. On Jan. 1, 1891, they took Nioro and completed the subjection of the country. Aḥmadu had to take refuge in Macina. Kaarta was incorporated in the French possessions and divided into the administrative districts of Nioro, Kitā and Kayes.

KA'B AL-AḤBĀR, ABŪ IṢḤĀḲ KA'B B. MATT⁵ B. HAIṢ⁵, the oldest authority for the Jewish-Muslim traditions among the Arabs, a Jew of Yemen who became a convert to Islām in the Caliphate of Abū Bakr or ‘Omar and was called KA'B AL-AḤBĀR or KA'B AL-ḤABR, “the rabbi Ka'b”, on account of his wealth of theological, particularly Biblical, knowledge. Lidzbarski (De prophetis, quae dicuntur, legendis arabicis, Berlin diss., Leipzig 1893, p. 34 sq.) supposes that his name was originally Hebrew, ‘Akībā or Ya'qōb, and was afterwards changed into the Arabic name Ka'b. Ḥabr or ḥibr (plur. aḥbār) is taken from the Hebrew ḥābēr, a title of scholarship among the Babylonian Jews, lower than that of rabbī. Al-Khwārizmī also describes it as a Jewish title equivalent to the Arabic ‘ālim (Mafātīḥ al-‘Ulūm, ed. van Vloten, p. 35). We have very little information regarding Ka'b's life and work. According to al-Ṭabarī, he was on intimate terms with the Caliph ‘Omar; he was in his retinue when ‘Omar entered Jerusalem in 15 (636) (Annales, i. 2408), became a Muslim in 17 (638) (ibid., p. 2514) and is said to have prophesied the death of ‘Omar to him in 23 (644) three days before it happened (ibid. p. 2792). According to al-Nawawī (Tahdhīb, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 523), he was alive in the time of the Prophet, but never saw him. The Anṣārī Abu ‘l-Dardā [q. v.] said of him that he possessed great knowledge and that there was only one opinion regarding the vastness of his learning and his reliability (al-Nawawī, ibid.). From Yemen he moved to Medina in the reign of ‘Omar and then from there to Ḥimṣ in Syria. The Omayyad Mu‘āwiya, then governor of the province of Syria, is said to have taken Ka'b as teacher and councillor to his court. In the conflict between ‘Othmān and his opponents Ka'b vigorously championed the Caliph, which on one occasion brought upon him corporal chastisement by the pious Abū Ḍharr [q. v.] (Ṭab., i. 2946 sq.). He died under ‘Othmān in the year 32 or 34 (652 or 654; Ṭab., iii. 2474 sq.) at Ḥimṣ and was buried there or, as others say (Ibn Baṭṭūṭa, ed. Defrémery et Sanguinetti, i. 222; Yāqūt, Mu‘djam, ii. 595), in Damascus. His most important pupils were ‘Abd Allāh b. ‘Abbās [q. v.], one of the earliest expositors of the Qur‘ān, and Abū Huraira [q. v.].

Ka'b's teaching was given orally only; that he ever wrote a book, is, at least, nowhere stated. Many sayings seem to be credited to him; in many, notably those given by al-Ṭabarī, an older origin can be proved from rabbinical or church-patriarchal traditions (for examples see Lidzbarski, op. cit., p. 38 sq.). Reliable historians like Ibn Kūtaiba and al-Nawawī do not quote him at all or, like al-Ṭabarī, only rarely; on the other hand, he is all the more frequently quoted as an authority by story-tellers like al-Tha‘labī and al-Kisā‘ī. In almost uninterrupted succession however he appears as narrator in the aljamiadic Leyenda de José (edited in Spanish transcription by F. Guillén Robles, Leyendas de José hijo de Jacob y de Alexandro Magno, Zaragoza 1888) so that it almost seems as if this leyenda was in its whole substance a tradition descending from Ka'b. The editor translates Ka'b al-Aḥbār (in Spanish transcription Cab Alajbar, p. 4 note 2) by Caab el historiador, as he — like formerly von Hammer (cf. Lidzbarski, op. cit., p. 26 note 4) — confuses Aḥbār with Aḥḥār and calls him el narrador or el cronista. This Moresco legend is however for the most part, especially the first chapter, a literal translation of al-Tha'labī's Yūsuf legend, and also where al-Tha'labī mentions other traditionists or none at all, refers to Ka'b, who is mentioned as an authority only five times in al-Tha'labī's story, the first time in his introductory description of the creation and beauty of Joseph (Ḳiṣaṣ al-Anbiyā', Cairo 1324, p. 61, l. 4 infra). This passage is lacking in the Leyenda, as the first page of the MS is lost. The agreement with al-Tha'labī begins in the former at the very beginning, p. 3 l. 4 infra: Y despues fise Allah nacer etc., in al-Tha'labī, op. cit., p. 62, l. 23: ann Allāha ta'ālā anbata etc., where it is related that God made a tree grow up for Jacob in the courtyard of his house and whenever a son was born to him, made a branch sprout from the tree. As the boy grew, so did the branch and when the boy attained manhood, Jacob cut off the branch and gave it to his son. While al-Tha'labī here gives a quite general reference to the statements of people "who know the legends of the prophets and the history of past ages", the Leyenda as early as p. 4 and on almost every other page gives Ka'b as the narrator. This frequent reference to Ka'b is however, as a further comparison with al-Tha'labī's story shows, quite arbitrary in the Leyenda. Al-Kisā'ī in his legend of Yūsuf (Ḳiṣaṣ al-Anbiyā', Cod. Bonn So 7, p. 315—382) quotes Ka'b once as an authority viz. at the beginning, where it is related that God gave Abraham five precious gifts, which afterwards all passed into Joseph's possession and that this aroused the envy of his brothers; then follows the story of Joseph and Jacob's dream (cf. Weil, Biblische Legenden der Musulmänner, p. 101). We find Ka'b as narrator in one passage in Firdawsī's Yūsuf u Zalikhā (ed. Ethé, in Anecdota Oxoniensia, Aryan Ser., Part vi., Vol. i., Oxford 1908, p. 258, l. 2599) where he says: Ka'b-i Aḥbār was the first to say this, from Ka'b I have the following true tradition"; here follows the description of the ruler of Egypt (here called Khatrūs or Khatrūsh with the kunya Abu 'l-Ḥasan) and of his vizier Raiyān b. al-Walid (the Potiphar of the Bible) and his wife Zalikhā and of the preparation for the sale of Joseph by public auction. The fact that al-Ṭabarī in his story of Joseph (i. 371—413) does not mention Ka'b at all, and al-Tha'labī, al-Kisā'ī and Firdawsī, on the other hand, in the same story quote Ka'b as authority in different, never in parallel passages, strengthens the hypothesis that this name is a late invention not only in the Moresco legend but also in the three authors last named.

KA'B B. AL-ASHRAF, a Medina opponent of Muḥammad, according to one statement a Naḍirī, according to another, a member of the Ṭaiyī'ī family of Nabḥān but the son of a Naḍirī woman. In any case, he was an ardent champion of Judaism (cf. the expression sayyid al-aḥbār, Ibn Hishām, p. 659, 12). Aroused by the result of the battle of Badr, he went to Mecca where he used his considerable poetic gifts (in the Kitāb al-Aghānī he is called jaḥl faṣīḥ) to incite the Ḳuraish to fight against the victor. He then returned to Medina, where he is said to have compromised the wives of the Muslims by love-songs. After the prophet had uttered his fateful "Who will rid me of this man?", Muḥammad b. Maslama offered to do so and he with several others including Ka'b's foster-brother succeeded by a despicable intrigue in enticing him out of the house on a bright moonlight night and killing him in spite of his valiant resistance: cf. the confirmatory allusions in Ka'b b. Mālik's poem, Ibn Hishām, p. 658 sq., while Ḥassān b. Ṭhābit (ed. Hirschfeld, n^o. 97) gives an account of this murder and its counterpart, the assassination of Ibn al-Ḥuḳaif, with startling frankness. According to al-Wāḳidī, the murder took place on the night of the 14 Rabī' I of the year 3 A. H., but this date, which is in contradiction to his own dating of the raid against Dhū Amarr, is probably due to the events being all compressed within the same period in the source he followed (cf. Ibn Hishām), which might make it appear that Ka'b was murdered soon after his return from Mecca. It is however clear from the poem (Ibn Hishām, p. 658, 18, 659, 12), as well as from a tradition in al-Ḥalabī according to which the Naḍirīs were in deep mourning for Ka'b's death, when Muḥammad began to attack them, that his murder did not take place till the year 4 as a kind of prelude to the attack on his kinsmen. It is also natural that punishment only overtook him after the battle of Uhud to which he had contributed by his instigations.

KA'B B. MĀLIK, ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH, a native of Medina of the Ḳhazrajī tribe of Salima. After taking an active part in the sanguinary tribal battles in Medina, he was won over to Islām even before the Hīdjra and took part in the momentuous second meeting at the 'Akāba [q. v.]. He was a poet and along with Ḥassān b. Thābit [q. v.] and 'Abd Allāh b. Rawāḥa [q. v.] was employed by Muḥammad to glorify his military exploits and answer the polemical poems of the enemies. He did not fight at Badr [q. v.] but was in most of the other battles. At Uhud, wounded himself, he found the wounded Prophet, who was thought to be slain. On the other hand, he was one of the few followers of Muḥammad who, in spite of their devotion to him, could not bring themselves to take part in the difficult campaign against Tabūk. But he later regretted it and after severe penance received the forgiveness of the Prophet (cf. Sūra, ix, 103, 107, 118 sq.). It is noteworthy that he who is fond of emphasising the connection of his tribe with the Ḡhassānids [q. v.], was at that time summoned by a Ḡhassāni chief to abandon Medina and Muḥammad. In the caliphate of 'Othmān we again hear of him when he with Ḥassān and Zaid b. Thābit vigorously championed the Caliph, when he was assailed; after 'Othmān's death he wrote an elegy on him and declined to pay homage to 'Alī. He died blind in 53 (673); according to others, as early as 50 A. H. His poems have a somewhat nobler tone than those of Ḥassān and show a real enthusiasm for the religion of Muḥammad besides a strong local patriotism.

KA'BA B. ZUHAIR, son of the celebrated poet and author of a Mu'allāḡa, Zuhair b. Abi Salmā, and of Kabsha bint 'Ammār. Poetic talent seems to have been one of the privileges of the family, for, not to speak of Ka'b and his father, we have verses by eleven of its members, including the famous Tumādhīr (al-Khansā). We do not know the date of his birth; he was the eldest of three brothers, the other two being Budjair and Sālim. Traditions, more than suspicious, report that he early gave proof of his poetic talents, in spite of the opposition of his father who ended in being convinced after a decisive test. He was involved in the wars of his tribe against the Taiyī, the Kuraish and the Khazraj, as we see from various poems in his Diwān. At the time of Muḥammad's mission, Budjair was converted shortly before the year 7, but Ka'b refused vigorously to imitate him and launched satirical verses against the Prophet. The latter solemnly authorised his assassination. Henceforth "the earth became too narrow for Ka'b" and he resolved to submit. He appeared unexpectedly in the year 9 in a mosque of Medina where Muḥammad was and recited to him his famous poem known as Bānat Su'ād (Su'ād has gone). The Prophet was overcome with admiration on hearing this eulogy of himself and the Kuraish and threw on his shoulders his own striped Yemen cloak, the burda, whence the name often given to this Ḳaṣida. The date of Ka'b's death is unknown, but he seems to have reached an advanced age. The Bānat Su'ād has nothing of a religious poem; it is inspired with the sentiments of pagan poetry and begins with such a commonplace that Ḥammād al-Rāwīya [q. v.] claimed to know 700 poems with the same opening. It was frequently reproduced in the form of tashfir and takhlīs. Its commentators are numerous. The best known are: Thālab, Ibn Duraid, al-Tibrīzī (published by Krenkow, Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Ges., lxx. 241—279), Ibn Hishām (of which the best edition is that of Guidi, Leipzig 1871), Ibn Hīdjja, al-Suyūṭī, al-Bādījūrī. It was first published by Lette (Leiden 1740); of later editions we may mention those of Freytag with a Latin translation (1823), Noldeke, Delictus Veterum Carminum Arabicorum, Berlin 1840, p. 110—114). I have given an edition with a French translation and two unpublished commentaries (Algiers 1910): The Diwān is not yet published.

KA'BA, the palladium of Islām, situated almost in the centre of the great mosque in Mecca.

I. The Ka'ba and its immediate neighbourhood.

The name, not originally a proper name, is connected with the cube-like appearance of the building. It is however only like a cube at the first impression; in reality the plan is that of an irregular rectangle. The wall facing northeast, in which the door is (the front of the Ka'ba) and the opposite wall (back) are 40 feet long: the two other are about 35 feet long. The height is 50 feet.

The Ka'ba is built of layers of the grey stone produced by the hills surrounding Mecca. It stands on a marble base 10 inches high, projecting about a foot (shāḍḥarwān). Four lines drawn from the centre through the four corners (rukn pl. arkān) would roughly indicate the four points of the compass. Four perpendiculars from the centres of the four walls would run north-east, north-west, south-west and south-east. The north corner is called al-rukn al-irāḡī, the western al-rukn al-shā'mī, the southern al-rukn al-yamānī, and the eastern al-rukn al-aswad (after the Black Stone).

The four walls of the Ka'ba are covered with a black curtain (kiswa) which reaches to the ground and is fastened there with copper rings, which are fastened in the shāḍḥarwān. Gaps are left in only for the water-spout and the door. The kiswa is prepared in Egypt every year and brought to Mecca by the pilgrim caravan. The old covering is taken down on the 25th (or according to al-Batanūnī, the 28th) Dhu 'l-Ka'da, and the Ka'ba temporarily covered with a white covering which hangs down to within 6 feet of the ground; the Ka'ba is then said to have put on the iḥrām [q. v.]. At the end of the Hājj it is covered with the new cloth. The door is covered by a separate covering also of Egyptian manufacture, which in Egypt is called al-burḡa (the veil).

The kiswa consists of black brocade, into which the shahāda is woven (see Snouck Hurgronje, Bilderatlas zu Mekka, n^o. xvii). At two-thirds of its height a gold embroidered band (ḥizām) runs round, which is covered with verses from the Qur'ān in fine calligraphy. Every inch of the garment, which is taken down each year, is of course regarded as a relic and small pieces are sold by the Banū Shaiba, the door-keepers of the Ka'ba, as amulets.

In the north-east wall, about 7 feet from the ground, is the door, parts of which have mountings of silver-gilt. In Burckhardt's and Ali Bey's times the threshold was lit up every night by a row of candles. When the Ka'ba is opened, a wooden staircase (daradj, mainadj) running on wheels is pushed up to the door: when not in use, it is kept between the Zamzam building and the Gate of the Banū Shaiba (see Snouck Hurgronje, Bilder-atlas zu Mekka, n^o. ii.). For a picture of the staircase, see Ali Bey, Travels, ii. 80.

In the interior of the Ka'ba are three wooden pillars, which support the roof, to which a ladder leads up. The only furnishing is the numerous golden and silver lamps suspended. On the inner walls there are many building inscriptions. The floor is covered with slabs of marble.

In the eastern corner, about 5 feet above ground, not far from the door, the Black Stone (al-haḡar al-aswad) is built into the wall; it now consists of three large pieces and several small fragments stuck together and surrounded by a ring of stone, which in turn is held together by a silver band. The stone is sometimes described as lava and sometimes as basalt; its real nature is difficult to determine, because its visible surface is worn smooth by hand touching and kissing. Ali Bey (ii. 76) gives a profile sketch of it which clearly shows the surface hollowed out in undulations. Its diameter is estimated by al-Batanūni (p. 105) at 12 inches. The colour is reddish black with red and yellow particles.

The part of the wall between the Black Stone and the door is called al-mulṭazam, because the visitors press their breasts against it while praying fervently.

In the east corner too, about five feet above the ground, another stone (al-haḡar al-aṣad), the "lucky", is built into wall. It is only touched and not kissed during the perambulation.

Outside the building there is still to be mentioned the gilt water-spout (mizāb), which juts out below the top of the north-west wall, and has an appendage which is called the "beard of the mizāb". The spout is called mizāb al-raḡma, "spout of mercy" (on it cf. Ben Chénf, Aux Villes Saintes de l'Islam, p. 75); the part between it and the west corner is the exact ḡibla [q. v.]. The rain water falls through the spout on the pavement below which here is inlaid with designs in mosaic. The ground all round the Ka'ba is covered with marble slabs.

Opposite the north-west wall, but not connected with it, is a semi-circular wall (al-ḡaṡim) of white marble. It is three feet high and about five feet thick; its ends are almost six feet from the north and west corners of the Ka'ba. The semi-circular space between the ḡaṡim and the Ka'ba enjoys an especial consideration, because for a time it belonged to the Ka'ba [see ii.]; in the perambulation therefore it is not entered; the ṭawāf goes as close as possible along the outer side of the ḡaṡim. The space bears the name al-ḡidjr or ḡidjr Ismā'il. Here are said to be the graves of the patriarch and his mother Hagar. The pavement on which the ṭawāf is performed is called maṡāf; a depression in it just opposite the door has still to be mentioned; it is called al-miḡdjan "the trough"; according to legend, Ibrāhīm and Ismā'il [q. v.] here mixed the mortar used in building the Ka'ba.

Around the maṡāf, and a little higher than it, runs a paved border, a few paces broad, on which stand 31 or 32 slender pillars. Between every two pillars hang seven lamps, which are lit every evening — to make the darkness visible, as Burton says. The row of columns is closed by the Bāb Banī Shaiba, an arch which stands opposite the north-west wall of the Ka'ba and affords an entrance to the maṡāf. Between this archway and the Ka'ba is a little building, a kind of pagoda, with a small dome, the maḡām Ibrāhīm. In it is kept a stone, on which Ibrāhīm is said to have stood at the building of the Ka'ba. Admission is granted to visitors on payment. Europeans have however not been able to see the stone. Burton says that the five dollars asked was too high for his finances. According to Oriental travellers and historians, it is a soft stone on which the footprints of Ibrāhīm can still be seen. During al-Mahdi's caliphate it was provided with a gilt band holding it together. Beside the Maḡām Ibrāhīm, also opposite the north-east wall of the Ka'ba and within the row of pillars, but farther north of the Maḡām, is the pulpit (minbar) of white marble. It consists of the usual staircase, shut at the foot by a door, and above the staircase are four short pillars supporting a spire like that of a Gothic church tower.

The pavement on which the row of pillars stands is somewhat lower than that which runs round them, to which eight paved paths from the colonnades round the mosque give access. On this outer paved part are four small buildings. Close beside the Bāb Banī Shaiba, on the left of the entrance and just opposite the Black Stone, stands the ḡubba built over the Zamzam well. In the room on the ground floor is the well, which is walled in: its water is drawn up in buckets, fastened to a pulley. On one part of the flat roof is a small chapel partly open, which has a roof with a small dome.

In d'Ohsen's as well as in Ali Bey's plan of the sacred mosque we find two further buildings north-east of the Zamzam building, at the edge of the outer paving, which are called al-ḡubba-tain, "the two ḡubba's", by him, Burckhardt and Burton. They are not marked in Snouck Hurgronje's pictures because they were demolished in the eighties and removed entirely. One held various objects, such as chronometers, jars for Zamzam water; the other, books.

The three other small buildings on the outer pavement are the so-called maḡām's, the standing-places of the imāms of the various ritual schools during the ṣalāt. The Maḡām or Muṣalla 'l-Ḥanbalī stands south of the Zamzam building, opposite the south-east wall of the Ka'ba. It consists of a roof tapering to a point and supported by slender marble columns. The Maḡām al-Mālikī is of the same form and is opposite the south-west wall of the Ka'ba. The Maḡām al-Ḥanafī looks out on the ḡaṡim and the north-west wall of the Ka'ba; it has two roofs, one above the other. — The Shāfi'is have no maḡām of their own: during the ṣalāt they stand under the ḡubba on the roof of the Zamzam well or at the Maḡām Ibrāhīm.

Finally we may mention receptacles placed here and there beside the pavements, in which various articles are kept (see Snouck Hurgronje Bilder-atlas, n^o. i., ii.; Bilder aus Mekka, n^o. i., iii.).

II. History.

The Arabs possess no historical or semi-historical records of the origin of the Ka'ba, and we as little. According to Snouck Hurgronje's supposition, the Zamzam spring in a waterless valley may have been the cause of the rise of a sacred place. It is to be noted that Ptolemy (Geography, vi. 7) in place of Mecca mentions Macoraba, which is probably to be interpreted, as does Glaser, (Skizze der Gesch. u. Geogr. Arabiens, Berlin 1890, ii. 235) as the South Arabian or Ethiopic mikrāb, "temple". From this one may conclude that the Ka'ba already existed in the second century A. D. The accounts of Abrahā's campaign, which has been elaborated with legendary features, also suggest the existence and worship of the Ka'ba in the sixth century but tell us nothing of its appearance or equipment. The Tubba' As'ad Abū Karib al-Himyari, who came to Mecca, is said to have for the first time provided the building with a kiswa and with a door with a lock. The information available regarding the distribution of the offices [see below iii.] among the sons of Qusai shows that the worship of the sanctuary had developed into a carefully regulated cult several generations before Muḥammad.

As to the history of the building of the Ka'ba the legends referring to the pre-Muḥammadan period are dealt with below [iv.]. Whether Qusai demolished and restored the building, as the historians say, is a question that cannot be definitely settled.

The historical references only begin with Muḥammad. When Muḥammad had reached man's estate, the fire of a woman incensing the Ka'ba is said to have caught the building and laid it waste. It happened that a Byzantine ship was thrown ashore at Djidda [q. v.] and the Meccans brought its wood hither and used it for the new building. In connection with this the name of a man Bākūm (it is given in various forms) is always mentioned, sometimes as the captain of the ship, sometimes as the carpenter whose advice was taken; he is said to have been a Coptic Christian.

The old Ka'ba is said to have only been of the height of a man and to have had no roof. The threshold is said to have been on the level of the ground so that the water had an easy entrance in the frequent floods (sail). The Ka'ba was then built of alternate layers of stone and wood, its height was doubled and a roof covered it. The door was placed above the level of the ground so that whoever wished to enter had to use a ladder. Unwelcome visitors were tumbled down from the high threshold. When the Black Stone was to be put in its place, the Meccans quarrelled among themselves as to who should have the honour. They had just decided that the first comer should be given the task when Muḥammad (who had been engaged in helping to carry the stones) came past. With superior wisdom he is said to have placed the precious object in a cloth — or in his cloak — and to have ordered the heads of tribes each to take an end. He himself then took out the stone and placed it in position. Legend and history are probably hopelessly confused in this story.

At the conquest of Mecca in 8 A. H. [see iii. below], Muḥammad left the Ka'ba as a building unaltered. But according to tradition, he later said that only the very recent conversion of the Mec-cans prevented him from instituting all kinds of innovations. These real or alleged intentions of Muḥammad were brought to realization in 64 (683) by 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubair [q. v.]. As anti-Caliph he was besieged by al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numair [q. v.] in Mecca. Catapults were erected on the hills round Mecca, which hurled a hail of stones on the town and sanctuary and so damaged the house of Allāh that it finally looked "like the torn bosoms of mourning women". 'Abd Allāh and his helpers pitched their tents beside the sanctuary (he henceforth called himself al-ʿAṣṣ bi l-Bait, "he who took refuge at the temple") and again a conflagration did its best to complete the destruction. In the fire the Black Stone was split in three pieces.

When the Omayyad army was withdrawn, 'Abd Allāh discussed with the Meccan authorities the demolition and rebuilding of the Ka'ba. When he had made his decision and the ruins had to be cleared away, no one dared to begin the work. The bulk of the populace, with Ibn 'Abbās at their head, had left the town because they feared a punishment from heaven. But 'Abd Allāh climbed up himself, axe in hand, and began the grim task. When his people saw that he remained unharmed, they took courage and assisted.

During the building a covered scaffolding was left on the spot to mark the qibla and the maṭaf at least. The masons are said to have worked behind the covering. 'Abd Allāh guarded the Black Stone, wrapped in a piece of brocade, in the council hall (Dār al-Nadwa). When put back into its place it, or rather the three pieces, into which it was broken, was bound with a band of silver.

The Ka'ba was then built entirely out of Meccan stone and Yemen mortar and built to a height of 27 ells. According to the tradition of the Prophet, the ḥidjr was included in the building and two doors were made on the level of the ground, the eastern as an entrance and the western as an exit. In the ṭawāf the four corners were kissed.

These alterations lasted only a short period. In 74 (693) al-Ḥaḍḍjādī b. Yūsuf [q. v.] conquered Mecca and killed 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubair. In agreement with the Caliph 'Abd al-Malik he again separated the ḥidjr from the Ka'ba and walled up the west door. The building, in keeping with the wish of the Omayyads, thus practically received its pre-Islāmic form again and this form has survived to the present day. The piety of the populace has always resisted any considerable innovations. Only to an unimportant degree have the authorities now and then made improvements. As was the case in the heathen period, floods have continued to be a danger to the building. When in 1611 it threatened to collapse, a girdle of copper was used to avert the disaster. But a new sail made this support also insufficient, so that in 1630 renovations were decided upon. But the old stones were used as much as possible for the rebuilding.

The Ka'ba successfully withstood the Ḳarmatian invasion of 317 (929); only the Black Stone was carried off. After an absence of some twenty years it was sent back to Mecca (cf. de Goeje, Mém. sur les Carmathes, etc. 2, p. 104—111, 145—8).

The custom of covering the Ka'ba is said to have been introduced by the Tubba'. The annual re-covering of the Ka'ba only became an established custom in modern times; for the oldest Muslim period, the 'Āshūrā day is mentioned as the day of covering, but in Radjab also and in other months the building has changed its covering. The kiswa consisted sometimes of Yemen and sometimes of Egyptian or other cloth: during 'Omar's Caliphate the building threatened to collapse on account of the many coverings hung on it. All sorts of colours are mentioned also. The Wahhābis even covered the Ka'ba with a red kiswa.

The maḳām's around the Ka'ba are mentioned as early as the 'Abbāsīd period: sometimes under the name ḡilla ("a shade"). The present buildings are said to date from 1074 (1663). A dome over the Zamzam well is mentioned at an equally early period, the present one was built in 1072.

The Ka'ba had offerings dedicated to it in the heathen as well as the Muslim period. Al-Azraḳī devotes a detailed chapter to this subject (p. 155 sq.). Many a worldly ruler has used these treasures for political purposes. Tradition reports that 'Omar said: "I will leave neither gold nor silver in the Ka'ba but distribute its treasures". To this, however, 'Alī is said to have raised vigorous objections so that 'Omar desisted from his plan.

III. The Ka'ba and Islām.

We do not know the personal feelings of the youthful Muḥammad towards the Ka'ba and the Meccan cult, but they were presumably of a conventional nature. What the biography of the Prophet tells us about his Meccan period in this respect can lay no claim to historical value. The Meccan revelations tell us nothing about these relations during this important period in the life of the Prophet. In any case he felt no enthusiasm for the Meccan sanctuary.

During the first period after the Hijra Muḥammad was busy with very different problems. But when the expected good relations with Judaism and the Jews did not come about, a change set in. Henceforth — about a year and a half after the Hijra — the Ka'ba and the Iḥdijj are mentioned in the revelations.

The change of attitude was first shown in the ḡibla edict: the faithful were no longer to turn towards Jerusalem in the ḡalāt but to the Ka'ba. "We see thee turning thy face towards every part of heaven, but we will have thee turn towards a ḡibla that will please thee. Turn then thy face towards the sacred mosque and wherever ye be turn your faces towards that part. They verily to whom the Book hath been given know this to be the truth of their Lord: and God is not regardless of what ye do" (Sūra ii. 139). From the dogmatic point of view this volte-face was justified by an appeal to the "religion of Abraham", which was specially invented for the occasion (Sūra ii. 129, iii. 89 etc.), as Snouck Hurgronje has shown in his Mekkaansche Feest. This religion of Abraham, the prototype of Judaism and Islām, is said to have been obscured by the Jews and to have been brought to light again by Muḥammad. The Meccan cult was now drawn into it. Ibrāhīm and Ismā'il laid the foundations of the Ka'ba (Sūra ii. 121). The Maḳām Ibrāhīm is described as a place suitable for the ḡalāt (ii. 119). Ibrāhīm prescribed the pilgrimage to mankind at Allāh's behest (xxii. 28); and the Ka'ba is said to be the first sanctuary that was founded on earth (iii. 90); it is now called the Holy House (v. 98), or the Ancient House (xxii. 30, 34).

In this way there was created for the reception of the old heathen cult into Islām a basis in religious history, which was at the same time a political programme; henceforth the eyes of the faithful were turned towards Mecca.

In the year 6 A. H. a prospect of taking part in the Mecca cult was held out to the Muslims by the pact of al-Ḥudaiḡiya [q. v.]; in connection with it, the 'Umrat al-Ḳaḏā' took place in the year 7. Muḥammad's political endeavours culminated in the conquest of Mecca in the year 8.

All the accumulation of heathendom, which had gathered round the Ka'ba, was now thrust aside. 360 idols are said to have stood around the building. When touched with the Prophet's rod they all fell to the ground. The statue of Hubal which 'Amr b. Luḡayy is said to have erected over the pit inside the Ka'ba was removed as well as the representations of the prophets. When they began to wash the latter with Zamzam water, Muḥammad is said to have placed his hands on the pictures of Jesus and Mary and said: "Wash out all except what is below my hands". He then withdrew his hands. A wooden dove also which was in the Ka'ba is said to have been shattered by Muḥammad's orders. The two horns of Abraham's ram did not crumble to dust until the rebuilding of the Ka'ba by 'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubair.

At the capture of Mecca, Muḥammad made arrangements regarding the religious and secular offices which had been filled in Mecca from ancient times. The historians say that in the old heathen period Ḳuṣayy after a fierce struggle with the tribe of Ḳhuzā'a became master of the Ka'ba and held all the important offices, religious and secular: the administration of the Dār al-Nadwa and the tying of the standard, the provision of the pilgrims with food (riḡāda) and with drink (siḡāya) as well as the supervision of the Ka'ba (sidāna and ḡidāba). His descendants administered the offices after his death, 'Abd Manāf and his descendants getting the riḡāda and siḡāya etc., while 'Abd al-Dār and his descendants saw to the sidāna and ḡidāba etc.

'Abbās Abū Ṭālib Abū Ṭalḡa 'Abd Allāh

When Muḥammad conquered Mecca his uncle 'Abbās [q. v., i. 9^b sq.] or, according to another tradition, 'Alī asked for the administration of these offices. But Muḥammad said that they must all be crushed beneath his feet except the siḡāya and the guardianship of the Ka'ba. The former remained in the hands of 'Abbās; the latter he gave to 'Uṭhmān b. Ṭalḡa who allowed his cousin Shaiba b. Abī Ṭalḡa to act as his deputy. The Banū Shaiba are the doorkeepers at the Ka'ba to this day. The riḡāda, which was in the hands of Abū Ṭālib, was taken over by Abū Bakr in the year 9; after his death the Caliphs looked after the feeding of the pilgrims.

Muḥammad's control over Mecca and the Meccan cult was first clearly marked at the Hudjijj of the year 9. As plenipotentiary of the Prophet, who did not participate in the pilgrimage, Abū Bakr announced to the assembled pilgrims the latest arrangements, which were put in the form of a revelation. They are contained in Sūra ix., which from them is often called the Sūra of Immunity (barā'a) (v. 1—12, 28, 36 sq.).

According to it, idolators are henceforth forbidden to participate in the Meccan festival as they are impure (naḍījas). Moreover, they are declared outlaws. A period of four months is given them during which they can go freely about the country; but after that "kill them wherever ye find them". Excepted are those with whom an alliance has been made in so far as they have punctiliously observed its terms and helped no one against the Muslims.

In the year 10 A. H. Muḥammad himself led the pilgrimage, at which therefore according to tradition not a single idolator was present: the Ka'ba had become an exclusively Muslim sanctuary, and Mecca was and is for Islām what Rome is to the Roman Catholic and Jerusalem to the Jew. At every ṣalāt the Muslims throughout the world turn towards Mecca and at the ceremonies of the pilgrimage the Ka'ba forms the beginning and the end of the holy rites.

Two special ceremonies concerning the Ka'ba may here be mentioned, the opening and the washing of the building. The opening takes place on definite days and men are first admitted, then the women. On this occasion the above mentioned staircase is pushed up to the building. The days in question change at the will of the Meccan authorities — but some usually fall in the month of the pilgrimage and one on the 10th Muḥarram ('Āshūrā day, q. v.). It is considered particularly meritorious to perform the ṣalāt in the Ka'ba.

After the Ḥajjīdī is completed, at the end of the month Dhu 'l-Hijja, the Ka'ba is washed, a ceremony in which the Grand Sharīf, the governor and other authorities as well as a number of pilgrims take part (or took part). The first to enter is the Sharīf, who after a ṣalāt of two rak'a's, himself washes the ground with Zamzam water which flows away through a hole in the threshold. The walls are washed with a kind of broom made of palm leaves. The Sharīf then sprinkles every-thing again with rose water and finally the building is fumigated with all manner of perfumes (cf. al-Ḥibla, n^o. 409, p. 1). The Sharīf throws the broom away among the crowd of pilgrims who fight among themselves for possession of it. Al-Batanūnī says (p. 109) that the Zamzamis and the Muṭawwifs sell the pilgrims similar brooms for a minimum of half a real.

As is evident from this example, the veneration for the sacred building extends to all that comes in contact with it: — to the Black Stone, the water-spout, the multazam, and above all to the Zamzam water. It is however said — and probably with truth — that 'Omar thus expressed himself on the Black Stone: "I know that thou art a stone, that neither helps nor hurts, and if the messenger of Allāh had not kissed thee, I would not kiss thee". But then he kissed the stone. And hardly a single pilgrim will think of 'Omar's words during the ṭawāf. The ṣalāt under the water-pipe is described as particularly efficacious: "Anyone who performs the ṣalāt under the math'ab becomes as pure as on the day when his mother bore him" (al-Azraqī, p. 224). The Zamzam water, which the pilgrim has poured over him again and again, is useful for every purpose for which it is drunk (mā' Zamzam li-mā ṣhurība lahu, Ḳuṭb al-Dīn, p. 34).

There is abundant testimony in Muslim as well as European literature to the intensification of devotional feeling which the sight of the Ka'ba produces in the pilgrims. We may here quote al-Batanūnī's description of the ṣalāt at the Ka'ba as particularly characteristic (p. 26). "The whole assembly stood there in the greatest reverence before this highest majesty and most powerful inspirer of awe before which the greatest souls become so little as to be almost nothing. And if we had not been witness of the movements of the body during the ṣalāt and the raising of the hands during the prayers, and the murmuring of the expressions of humility and if we had not heard the beating of the hearts before this immeasurable grandeur we would have thought ourselves transferred to another life. And truly we were at that hour in another world: we were in the house of God and in God's immediate presence, and with us were only the lowered head and the humble tongue and the voices raised in prayer and weeping eyes and the fearful heart and pure thoughts of intercession" (cf. also Macdonald, The Religious Attitude and Life in Islām, Chicago, 1909, p. 216 sqq.; Ben Chérif, Aux Villes Saintes de l'Islām, p. ii, sq., 45 sq., 68).

Even the Shī'is and the Wahhābīs have left the Ka'ba its place in Islām. For the Karmatians alone has an exception to be made, as can be well understood.

Although moderns like al-Batanūnī (p. 24) put the question: Why is God particularly worshipped in Mecca, when the whole world is His sphere, they themselves give the answer: "But Mecca is His citadel and the place of revelation of His dominion and power. And the Ka'ba is His temple and the place of His grandeur and grace. And is there in any of the four quarters of the earth a place not quite seven square miles in extent where half a million people assemble on a pilgrimage, all of whom call to God with one heart and one tongue? And although they differ in race and language, they all turn towards one ḥibla and at the ṣalāt move with one motion, without any hope other than the grace of the one God, who has not begotten and is not born and is without equal".

As to the mystics, their attitude to the Ka'ba depends on their position regarding the law. For the, so to speak, nomistic mystics like al-Ghazālī, the Ka'ba is, it is true, the sacred building which one has to go round in the ṭawāf. The ṭawāf and its object however only receive their value for men when they give them an inducement to rise to a higher spiritual level. Ibn al-'Arabī goes a step further when he says that the true Ka'ba is nothing other than our own being (al-Futūḥāt al-Makkiya, i. 733); the Ka'ba however also plays a part in his mystic experiences. Ḥudjwiri however quotes some sayings of mystics, who no longer require the Ka'ba as an inducement to rise, and even despise it. Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl says: "I wonder at those who seek His temple in this world: why do they not seek contemplation of Him in their hearts? The temple they sometimes attain and sometimes miss, but contemplation they might enjoy always. If they are bound to visit a stone, which is looked at only once a year, surely they are more bound to visit the temple of the heart, where He may be seen three hundred and sixty times in a day and night. But the mystic's every step is a symbol of the journey to Mecca, and when he reaches the sanctuary he wins a robe of honour for every step". Abū Yazid (al-Biṣāmī) says: "If anyone's recompense for worshipping God is deferred until to-morrow he has not worshipped God aright to-day", for the recompense of every moment of worship and mortification is immediate. And Abū Yazid also says: "On my first pilgrimage I saw only the temple; the second time, I saw both the temple and the Lord of the temple; and the third time I saw the Lord alone". In short, where mortification is, there is no sanctuary: the sanctuary is where contemplation is. Unless the whole universe is a man's trysting-place where he comes nigh unto God and a retired chamber where he enjoys intimacy with God, he is still a stranger to Divine love; but when he has vision the whole universe is his sanctuary. "The darkest thing in the world is the Beloved's house without the Beloved".

Accordingly, what is truly valuable is not the Ka'ba, but contemplation and annihilation in the abode of friendship, of which things the sight of the Ka'ba is indirectly a cause. (Huḍjwiri, transl. Nicholson, p. 327).

IV. The Ka'ba in Legend and Superstition.

The alleged religion of Abraham gave a basis for the esteem in which the Muslims held the Ka'ba. Legend attached itself to the Qur'anic statements and spun them out. As Snouck Hurgronje has proved in his Mekkaanse Feest against Dozy's hypotheses (see his Israelieten in Mekka), there can be no question of a local Meccan tradition in this connection. There was, it is true, a local tradition, but it consists of semi-historical reminiscences of the last few centuries before Islam. But all that tradition relates regarding the origin of the Ka'ba and its connections with Biblical personages, belongs to Islāmic legend.

The latter first of all attached itself to the statement that Ibrāhīm and Ismā'il raised (raf'a) the foundations of the Ka'ba (ii. 121). God's command to Ibrāhīm to build the Ka'ba is by some placed before the episode of Hagar and by others after it. The patriarch came to Arabia led by the Sakina, which had the shape of a stormy wind with two heads; it is also described as having a snake's head. When it reached the site of the Ka'ba it wound itself round its foundation [see below] and said "Build on me". According to others, Ibrāhīm built on its shadow. He was helped by Ismā'il in this; the stones were taken from five (or seven) hills: Hira', Thabir, Lebanon, Mount of Olives and the Djabal al-Aḥmar near Mecca (other names are also given). When the building had risen to some height, he stood at his work on the stone, which still shows the impress of his feet, the Maḳām Ibrāhīm. The Black Stone, which was still white in those days and only received its present colour as a result of contact with the impurity and sin of the pagan period, was brought to him by Gabriel after having been kept in Abū Ḳubais [q. v.] since the Deluge. Within the building (which was not high and had no roof) Ibrāhīm dug the hole, which afterwards served as a treasury. When the work of building was completed, he took his stand on the maḳām, which now rose high above the mountains, and proclaimed the pilgrimage to all men. From all sides they answered: Labbaika, Allāhumma! Labbaika!

On the other hand Muslim legend has developed the passage, Sūra iii. 90: "Truly, the first temple that was founded for men is that in Bakka; a blessed house and a guidance for (all) creatures". The ambiguous expression according to which Ibrāhīm and Ismā'il "raised" the foundations of the Ka'ba left room for the view that the foundations already existed on which he erected the building. Al-Ṭabarī in his commentary on Sūra ii. 121 (i. 408 s.f.) however recognises that there are two views: according to the one, Adam, according to the other, Ibrāhīm laid the foundations. Legend relates the following regarding the foundation by Adam. When after the fall Adam was hurled out of Paradise on the earth, he came to Mecca. Gabriel with his wing uncovered a foundation, which had been laid in the seventh earth, and the angels threw blocks on it from Lebanon, the Mount of Olives, Djabal Djudi [see Djudi] and Hira' until the hole was filled level with the earth. God then sent from Paradise a tent of red jacinth in which Adam lived: what was afterwards the black stone, then a white jacinth from Paradise, served as a seat. When God made his covenant with men, the latter acknowledged God's suzerainty; the document on which their acknowledgment was written was given by God to be swallowed by the Black Stone. At the Last Day it will be given a tongue, to bear witness against men: according to others, because it was originally an angel.

There was a particular reason for sending down the prototype of the latter Ka'ba. Originally Adam's stature was so great that he could hear the song of the heavenly hosts around God's throne. As a result of the Fall, however, his stature was shortened; he then lamented to God that the higher spheres were now closed to him. God then sent down the tent around which Adam now performed the ṭawāf, following the example of the angels. But Mecca was without inhabitants and the sanctuary without worshippers. When he gave vent to his regrets on this point, he was promised by God that in time this place would be the site of a cult; that the sanctuary would enjoy a particular karāma; that it would be a ḥaram [q. v.] whose ḥurma would extend above, below and around, and to which men would make pilgrimage with dishevelled hair and covered with dust, breaking out of every cleft with weeping and takbīr [q. v.] and talbiya [q. v.].

After Adam's death his descendants (Shith is specially mentioned) built the Ka'ba. But the deluge washed the building away while the sacred stone was concealed by the angels in Abū Ḳubais. According to others, however, the flood did not touch the Ka'ba and Noah performed the ṭawāf round the holy house. According to the first tradition, only a red mound was left of the Ka'ba, which Abraham afterwards found.

But the legends also extend to the period after Abraham. The hole in the Ka'ba, which is called al-Akhsaf or al-Akhsaf, is said to have been several times plundered under the Djurhum [q. v.]. Therefore at God's command a snake took up its abode there and guarded the treasures. When the Ḳuraishis wanted to pull down the Ka'ba, the monster opposed this plan, until God sent a bird which carried it off to one of the surrounding hills. — Every renovation of the Ka'ba is said to have been carried out amid terrible portents, such as lightning-flashes. It is also said that on such occasions the foundation of the Ka'ba was brought to light and it looked like the necks of camels intertwined.

For the legend connected with the origin of the Zamzam well, see the article ISMĀ'IL. The following may however be added here. Once when 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib was sleeping in the hidjr, one appeared to him and in mysterious words ordered him to dig out the Zamzam, which was "at the battle-ground of the Kuraishis", at the "Ravenhole", and at the "Ants' nest". Now when the Kuraish contested his right to it (or the claim to the well already dug) both parties went to the K'ahina of the Banū Sa'd b. Hudhail. On the way their water gave out. But the water which sprang from the impression of the hoof of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib's mount was an indication from heaven that the latter was right. They therefore turned back to Mecca; and when 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib had begun to dig, he found there two golden gazelles which the Djurhum had concealed there, as well as swords and armour. All this was deposited at the Ka'ba or used to decorate the buildings.

This legendary story of the origin of the Ka'ba was easily brought into conformity with the cosmological views current among Christians and Jews in the East, the central point of which was the sanctuary itself. Muslim tradition at first adopted this cosmology completely, as is evident from the statements which are still wholly under the influence of the predominance of Jerusalem. They were however not content with this and transferred a considerable part of these sayings to Mecca. These traditions are grouped round the navel theory, the main ideas of which are as follows. The earth has a navel, whose functions are parallel to those of the human navel. It forms the part of the earth which was created before the rest of it and around which the rest stretches. It is also the highest point, the place which provides the whole world with its nourishment; and it forms the place of communication with the upper and under world.

This navel was at first Jerusalem and later Mecca. But not all the properties of the navel are attached in equal degree to Mecca. They may be briefly summed up as follows. About 40, according to others, 2000 years before the creation of the world, the sanctuary was an agglomeration (ghuthā') in the world ocean. The beginning of the creation consisted in the stretching out of the earth around this point as centre, in the following order: after the substance of the earth (which coincides with the navel) heaven was formed and lastly the earth itself. In agreement with this theory is the fact that in the Qur'ān Mecca is called the mother of cities (Umm al-Ḳurū) (vi. 92, xlii. 5) and in popular literature the navel of the earth (Yāqūt Mu'djam, iv. 278; al-Khamīs, i. 37; al-Halabi, i. 195, etc.).

That the sanctuary is the highest point in the world cannot be scientifically maintained. The popular traditions however like to move in this direction. Thus, in the story of the creation, it is said that the earth is extended below the sanctuary. The semi-scientific cosmography says that the position of the Ka'ba corresponds to the Pole Star; as the latter is the highest point in the heavens, so the Ka'ba is the highest point on earth (al-Kisā'i, Adḡāib al-Malakūt, ms. Leiden, f. 15b). This view is probably connected with the conception of heaven and earth as domes or tents put one upon the other, which can be shown to exist in Muslim literature.

The view that the sanctuary connects on the one side with heaven and on the other with the lower world is not so clearly stated with regard to Mecca as to Jerusalem. But it is said that no place on earth is nearer heaven than Mecca; and in the pagan period men are said to have gone up on to Abū Ḳubais to offer particularly urgent prayers. Whether the pit in the Ka'ba was really regarded as the entrance to the underworld, like the corresponding arrangements in Jerusalem and Hierapolis is uncertain.

One typical characteristic of the lower world is certainly possessed by Mecca. It is described as a tomb. Not only Ismā'il, but a whole series of prophets, numbering hundreds, is said to have been buried round the Ka'ba. Every prophet belongs to Mecca. This is his essential starting point and termination of his career. Muḥammad therefore also belongs to Mecca and Mecca is his real grave as theoreticians say (al-Halabi, i. 197) in opposition to the fact that he is buried in Medina.

Traditions which emphasise Mecca's importance for the nourishment of the world are hardly represented at all.

These theories had to be brought into consonance with the later cosmology of Islām, which regards the universe as a series of stories of seven heavens and seven earths. The Ka'ba is now not only placed in the centre of the earth (according to the navel theory) but it forms the central point of the whole universe. Its foundations as well as those of Abū Ḳubais lie in the seventh earth and form a kind of axis which runs through all these worlds.

The so-called stories are exactly like one another in plan. Every one has a sanctuary in the centre so that if the top one fell down, it would fall exactly on the lowest in the seventh world. The highest of the sanctuaries is the throne of God. Of those which lie between the throne and the Ka'ba two are mentioned by name, the Bait ma'mūr, the name of which is taken from the Qur'ān (lii. 4) and al-Durūh. Jewish literature was already acquainted with a heavenly sanctuary in which the angels act as priests. In Islām these priestly functions are usually replaced by the ṭawāf.

V. Comparative History of the Cult.

From the fact that Ptolemy calls Mecca Makraba (i. e. Mikrāb, temple) we may conclude that in his time the Ka'ba was regarded as the dwelling of one or more deities. According to a statement of Epiphanius (Haereses, V, following the text in Philologus, 1860, p. 355), Dhu 'l-Sharā had his ḡazzav in Petra, in which word Ka'ba is also probably concealed. It is however not clear from Epiphanius, whether the temple in Petra was meant or the quadrangular black stone, which represented Dhu 'l-Sharā. Al-Bakrī (Mu'djam, ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 46) relates that the tribe of Bakr Wā'il [q. v.] as well as the main body of the tribe of Iyād had their centre of worship in Sindād in the region of Kūfa and that their holy tent (or temple, bait) here was called Dhāt al-Ka'abāt (cf. however al-Hamdāni, Ṣifa Dīḡirat al-'Arab, p. 171, 14, 17, 230, 12). According to Wellhausen, the Ka'ba owed its sanctity to the Black Stone; this may be right, for the religion of the ancient Arabs was essentially stone-worship.

The form of the building may be compared with the apse of the Jerusalem temple, which was twenty ells in each direction.

It is not related that the Black Stone was connected with any special god. In the Ka'ba was the statue of the god Hubal who might be called the god of Mecca and of the Ka'ba. Caetani gives great prominence to the connection between the Ka'ba and Hubal. Besides him, however, al-Lāt, al-'Uzzā, and al-Manāt were worshipped and are mentioned in the Qur'an; Hubal is never mentioned there. What position Allāh held beside these is not exactly known. The Islāmic tradition has certainly elevated him at the expense of other deities.

It may be considered certain that the Black Stone was not the only idol in or at the Ka'ba. The Maḳām Ibrāhīm was of course a sacred stone from very early times. Its name has not been handed down. Beside it several idols are mentioned, among them the 360 statues.

The Ka'ba possessed in a high degree the usual qualities of a Semitic sanctuary. First of all it made the whole surrounding area into consecrated ground. Around the town lies the sacred zone (ḥaram) marked by stones, which imposes certain restrictions on each one who enters it [see ḤIRĀM]. Moreover, the sanctity of the area is seen in the following points. In the ḥaram the truce of God reigns. When the Arab tribes made a pilgrimage to the Ka'ba, all feuds were dormant. It was forbidden to carry arms. Next, the ḥaram — and the Ka'ba especially — is a place of refuge. Here the unintentional manslayer was safe just as in the Jewish cities of refuge. On the Ka'ba there was a kind of handle to which the fugitives clung (Al-Azraḳī, p. 111), an arrangement which recalls the purport of the horns on the Jewish altar.

Blood was not allowed to flow in the ḥaram. It is therefore reported that those condemned to death were led outside the ḥaram to execution. The idea of peace extended even to the flora and fauna. Animals — except a few injurious or dangerous sorts, — are not to be scared away; hence the many tame doves in the mosque. Trees and bushes were not cut down except the Idh-ḥhir shrub, which was used for building houses and in goldsmiths' work. These regulations were confirmed by Islām and are in force to this day.

As to the rites, it is said that in the heathen period victims were slain at the Ka'ba. Among the ancient Arabs the idol of stone replaced the altar; on it they smeared the blood of the sacrificial animals. In Islām the killing takes place in Minā.

It is a question, whether and how far the Ka'ba was connected with the ḥajj in the pre-Islamic period. Wellhausen (Reste Arab. Heidentums, 2nd ed., p. 79) defends the view that originally only the 'umra [q. v.] was concerned with the Ka'ba while the scene of the ḥajj was 'Arafāt, Muzdalifa and Minā. The connecting of pilgrimage and 'umra is regarded by him as a rather clumsy correction made by Islām. It must be conceded that Wellhausen with justice points to the fact that the 'umra far down into Islām was closely connected with the month of Radjab. Moreover, the ḥajj is called simply ḥajj

'Arafāt and, according to the Shāfi'ī school, the ṭawāf in 'Arafāt is the main ceremony of the ḥajj. On the other hand, it should be remarked that in the Qur'an (iii. 91) pilgrimage is connected with the Ka'ba (ḥajj al-Bait) and that tradition nowhere gives us the slightest hint of this being an innovation. The facts emphasised by Wellhausen may however be interpreted otherwise. He himself has pointed out that the ancient Arabs were fond of connecting sacred places situated close to one another by ceremonial rites. It is therefore more probable that the rather clumsy alteration had taken place by the pre-Islamic period and is to be regarded as the result of a connection of the cult of 'Arafāt with that of Mecca.

As was said above, the Tubba' is regarded as the first who covered the Ka'ba. Whether this tradition is historically correct is beyond our knowledge. It is noteworthy that the coloured cloths are mentioned which were placed over the building, a rite which one has to consider in connection with similar rites used in other cases. The Jewish tabernacle, the high places of Canaan (Ezekiel xvi. 16), the throne of Solomon, the throne of the bishops, the maḥmal, and sacred tents in ancient Arabia as well as the Sidrat al-Muntahā in Paradise are all covered with coloured cloths. It is misleading to give a general explanation of all such things. But the idea of a connection with the sun shining in the heavens seems obvious here; particularly for the Sidra this notion can be traced further. The question might even be asked whether and how far the Ka'ba was regarded as an astral symbol. For the affirmative there is the fact that the Ka'ba is the object of the ṭawāf and that ṭawāf and Kab'a are represented by Muslim tradition itself as connected with the host of spirits round the throne of God. The throne of God is, as is well known, a cosmic magnitude, and the Ka'ba and the Black Stone are described as the throne of God's ḫalifa on earth, Adam. The dance of the heavenly spirits can easily be interpreted as a dance of the planets. Moreover, golden suns and moons are repeatedly mentioned among the votive gifts (al-Azraḳī, p. 155 sqq.). According to al-Mas'ūdī (Murūj, iv. 47), certain people have regarded the Ka'ba as a temple devoted to the sun, the moon and the five planets. The 360 idols placed round the Ka'ba also point in this direction. It can therefore hardly be denied that traces exist of an astral symbolism. At the same time one can safely say that there can be no question of any general conception on these lines. The cult at the Ka'ba was in the heathen period syncretic as is usual in heathenism. How far also North Semitic cults were represented in Mecca cannot be exactly ascertained. It is not excluded that Allāh was of Aramic origin. The dove of aloe wood which Muḥammad found existing in the Ka'ba may have been devoted to the Semitic Venus.

KABAQBĀZĪ, or Kabakandāz, the gourd-game, the oriental form of the Popinjay. It was a sort of tilting at the ring, but the weapon was an arrow, and the archers were on horseback. A ring was shot through, but the mark was a pigeon or other bird set on a high mast. In Bābur's time the mark was a duck (v. Bābur-nāma, Gibb Mem. i. and Mrs. Beveridge's transl. i. 34, and P. de Courteille, i. 39). The game was much practised in Egypt (v. Quatremère, Hist. des Mamlouks, i. 243, note 118; also Dozy's Supplément). It was also practised in India and Persia, (v. Akbarnāma, i., transl. p. 440; Vuller's Lex., ii. 710). The game is alluded to in the Gulistān, iii. Story 28.

KABATASH. [See CONSTANTINOPLE, i. 875b.]

KABD (A.) means the legitimate taking possession of a thing, for example by inheritance or as the result of a contract. Kabd is usually discussed in the Muslim law-books in close connection with delivery by a contract of sale, for example in al-Badājuri's Hāshiya on Ibn Kāsim's Fatḥ al-Karīb, at the beginning of the chapter on Ba'ī (Bulāḳ edition 1307, i. 358); cf. E. Sachau, Muḥammed. Recht nach Schafitischer Lehre, p. 283 sq.; Th. W. Juynboll, Handb. des islām. Gesetzes, p. 263.

(TH. W. JUYNBOLL.)

KABD (A.) "contraction, oppression", in Sūfi terminology means a state (ḥāl) which is the opposite of bast, "expansion, gladdening". (In the phrase Allāhu yaḳbiḍu wa-yaḳṣiṭu, quoted by Sūfi authors from Qur'an ii. 246, however, the words have a more general meaning). Both happen to the 'urīf (gnostic) only, while in the novice the corresponding emotions are fear and hope, but with the distinction that the latter refer to the future, while kabd and bast express a present feeling of spiritual dullness or joy. In the language of Western mysticism, they might be said to correspond approximately to the expressions consolatio (consolation) and desolatio (spiritual dryness).

KABD, a term in prosody. It is the suppression of the fifth quiescent letter in the primitive feet fa'ūlun and maf'ūlun and is therefore found in ṭawīl, hazaj, muḍarr' and mutaḳārib.

In fa'ūlun, kabd is recommended (according to some, it is obligatory) when this foot is the penultimate of the second hemistich of the third ḡarḥ of a ṭawīl; everywhere else it is optional. In maf'ūlun, kabd is obligatory in the last foot of the first hemistich of a ṭawīl. In all other cases it is only permitted if the foot is not liable to kaff or suppression of the seventh quiescent letter (n); nevertheless, it is very rarely found in ṭawīl, hazaj and muḍarr'.

AL-KĀBID one of the names of God, see the article ALLĀH, i. 303b.

KĀBID (KABIZ) a Turkish Sunnī theologian, founder of the sect of Khubbashīh (popularly called Chupmessihis). By order of Sulimān he was tried before an extraordinary court, sentenced to death on 8th Ṣafar 934 (3 Nov. 1527) and executed on the following day as a zandīk [q. v]. He maintained the (moral) superiority of Jesus over Muḥammad (afḍaliyat 'Īsā 'alā Muḥammad). On the occasion of this trial Ibn Kamālpaṣhazāde wrote his treatise on Zindikism.

AL-KABĪR, one of the names of Allāh, see the article ALLĀH, i. 303a.

KABİR, an Indian mystic, of the xvth century, who was claimed both by the Hindus and Musalmāns as belonging to their faith. A large collection of Hindi versés is attributed to him, but their authenticity is doubtful, and a like uncertainty attaches to his biography, which is obscured by legends. He is said to have been the son, or adopted son, of a Muhammadan weaver, and to have become the disciple of Rāmānanda, the Vaishnav reformer, at whose feet he sat in Benares, joining in the theological and philosophical arguments that his master held with Brahmans and Šūfis. He appears to have earned his living as a weaver, and to have been a married man, the father of a family, and to have been as contemptuous of the professional asceticism of the Yōgī as he was disregarding of the doctrines and ordinances of orthodoxy, whether Hindu or Muslim. The boldness with which he sang his mystical doctrine of the divine unity exposed him to persecution, and he is said to have been driven from Benares in 1495, when he was about 60 years of age, and to have died at Maghar, in the district of Bastī, in 1518. Legend says that his Hindu and Muslim disciples disputed as to the disposal of his body, which the former wished to burn and the latter to bury; when they lifted the cloth that covered the body, they found in place of the corpse only a heap of flowers; of these, the Hindus burnt half in Benares, while the Muslims buried the rest at Maghar, where the shrine is still in the charge of Muhammadan Kabir-Panthis. Modern scholars, like Kabir's contemporaries, claim him for one or other of the rival creeds: H. H. Wilson (op. cit., pp. 69, 74) and R. G. Bhandarkar (op. cit., p. 69) maintain that he was a Hindu; G. H. Westcott that he was a Muslim (op. cit., p. 29 sqq.); G. A. Grierson's theory (Journ. Roy. As. Soc. 1907, pp. 325, 492) that he derived his opinions from Christian sources, may be dismissed as a pious fiction. A study of his poems makes it clear that he had no desire to attach himself to any organised religion: "Let me make self-reflection my saddle, And put my foot in the stirrup of divine love. . . . Saith Kabir, they are good riders Who keep themselves aloof from the Vedas and the Qur'ān"; nor did he attempt to formulate any religious or philosophical system of his own, but he popularised the current Vaishnav teaching of his age, without however connecting it with any particular incarnation, and he spoke of God indifferently as Rām, Hari, ʿAlī or Allāh. He rejected the outward signs of Hinduism, e. g. the sacred thread, the distinctions of caste, the ritual observances of temple worship, etc., and his references to Muslim authorities and institutions (e. g. the Qur'ān, circumcision, pilgrimage, the Mullā, the Kāfi etc.) are accompanied with a denial of their validity. He represented God as the omnipresent reality, but maintained the separate individuality of the human soul, which could attain union with God through love, not by knowledge or by ceremonial observances. Through his homely illustrations and his close contact with daily life, he presented his doctrines in a form readily acceptable to unlettered persons, who appear to form the majority of his followers.

KABĪRPANTHĪS (Hindi panth, a path, sect). Despite the non-sectarian character of Kabir's teaching, his followers now form a distinct sect, the majority of whom are Hindus. The best account of their organisation is given by Westcott, op. cit., chaps v. and vi. According to the Census of 1911, there were 597,199 in the Central Provinces, and 49,605 in the United Provinces; in the other provinces they either are not found at all, or their number is too inconsiderable to call for separate enumeration.

AL-KABĪŠĪ, whose full name was ʿABD AL-ʿAZĪZ (also ʿABD AL-RAḤMĀN) B. ʿOTHMĀN B. ʿALĪ, ABU ʿL-ŠAKR, an important astrologer probably of Persian descent. He was known to the Christian world of the middle ages as ALCABITIUS (also ALCHABITIUS). He lived for a considerable period at the court of Sulṭān Saif al-Dawla b. Ḥamdān (d. 356 = 969) and dedicated his principal astrological work to him: al-Madhkhal ilā Šinʿat Aḥ-kām al-Nuḍjūm (Introduction to the art of Astrology) of which copies still exist in Oxford, Gotha and Cairo. It was translated into Latin by Joh. Hispalensis. This translation was printed in Venice in 1481, 1485, 1491 and 1521. The edition of 1485 is entitled Libellus ysagogicus Abdilazi, id est servi gloriosi Dei, qui dicitur Alchabitius, ad magisterium iudiciorum astrorum. Interpretatus a Ioanne Hispalensi, Venetiis 1485. The edition of 1521 is called Praeclarum Alchabitii opus ad scrutanda stellarum magisteria ysagogicum. A commentary on it was compiled by Joh. de Saxonia in 1331 and printed at Bologna in 1473, and again in 1485 and 1521 at Venice at the end of the editions of Alcabitus. Al-Kabīšī also wrote several smaller astrological treatises. The dates of his birth and death are unknown.

Bibliography: A special article on this astrologer is given by al-Baiḥakī (c. 1150) alone among the Arab biographers, in his Taʾrikh Ḥukamāʾ al-Islām (Ms. Leiden, 133d, Gol.), cf. E. Wiedemann, *Beitr. z. AL-KĀBĪŠĪ. DJĀBAL (DĪBĀL) AL-KĀBĪŠĪ or AL-KĀBĪ, as al-Ṭabarī, i. 2660, 15, 2664, 4, 2666, 16 and Yāqūt iv. 31, 23 have it, and as should be read everywhere in al-Mas'ūdī (ed. Paris) for al-Kābkh, is a name for the Caucasus, common in Muslim authors. Hubschmann, Armen. Gramm. (Leipzig 1867), i. 45 derives Kābkh from Armenian Kapkhō, Pehl. Kāfkōh.

An older geographical conception regards this chain as belonging to the Kāf [q. v.] range which encloses the world (cf. B. Munkácsi, Der Kaukasus u. Ural als "Gürtel der Erde", in Keleti Szemle, i. 236 sqq.). The name Alburz is no doubt connected with this idea, which Mustawfī, and apparently following him Kīātib Celebī, give to the Caucasus, while the name Kābkh (Djīhānumā, K-y-t-k) is limited to its eastern (transl. p. 182 wrongly "western") side. Here the range appears to be considered the continuation of the North Persian mountain chain of the same name, with which also are associated notions of its being the boundary range of the world. (Cf. the article ALBURZ; F. Justi Beitr. zur alten Geographie Persiens, i. 4 sqq., ii. 4 sq.; Melgunof, Das südliche Ufer des Kaspischen Meeres, p. 27). To similar considerations is probably to be ascribed the fact that the Caucasus is connected with mountains which, beginning with Djabal al-'Ardj between al-Madīna and Mecca (Ibn Khordādhbeh, p. 172 infra sq.; Ibn al-Fakīh, p. 25, 7 sqq., 295, 6 sqq.) or in Yemen (al-Hamdānī, Djāzirat al-'Arab, p. 126, 25 sq.) run northwards through Arabia and Syria. The connecting of these mountains with Kāf led to the localisation in the Caucasus region of the rock, sea and village (Ḳur'ān xviii. 59 sqq.) known from the legend of Moses (Alexander) (Ibn Khordādhbeh, p. 124, 3 sqq.; Ibn al-Fakīh, p. 287, 14 sq.; al-Mukāddasī, p. 46, 16 sq.; Yāqūt, i. 220, 21 sq., 454, 5 sq., iii. 282, 9 sqq.).

The Caucasus has further been regarded as the range beyond which dwelt Yādjudj and Mādjudj [q. v.]. The al-Saddain of Ḳur'ān xviii. 89, explained as "the two mountains", between which Dhu 'l-Ḳarnain caused a barrier to be built to check the inroads of Yādjudj and Mādjudj is identified with Armenia and Ādharbaidjān (al-Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, xvi. 121 sqq.; al-Baidāwī on Ḳur'ān xviii. 89). But when geographical knowledge was extended, Yādjudj and Mādjudj were placed farther north.

The Sasanians in particular had closed the Caucasus passes with fortifications to prevent the inroads of the northern nomadic peoples. The most famous of these passes (cf. Ibn Khordādhbeh p. 123, 13 sqq.; Yāqūt, i. 439, 2 sqq.) are Bāb al-Abwāb or Bāb Šul or Derbend [q. v.] and Bāb Allān, the gate of the Alans, or the Darial pass.

The multiplicity of ethnic groups and languages in the Caucasus is mentioned by most Muslim geographers. According to an oft recurring statement, 70 (72) different languages are found there (Ibn al-Fakīh, p. 25; al-Mas'ūdī, ii. 2); according to al-Muhallabī's Kitāb al-'Azīzī (in Abu 'l-Fidā), as many as 300. Wherefore the mountain ranges are also called Djabal al-Alsun "Mount of Languages" (Abu 'l-Fidā, Takwīm al-Buldān, ed. Reinaud and de Slane, p. 71, 15 sqq., 393, s. v. Tarābāzūn, 405, s. v. Sarīr Allān).

KĀBUL. 1. A river of Afghānistān which rises near the Unai Pass in Lat. 34° 21' N., Long. 68° 20' E. and flows past the city of Kābul, near which it receives the Loghar River on the south and the Pandjshēr on the north. From the plateau of Kābul it flows by rocky passes to the lower valley of Djālalābād in which it receives the Surkhāb on the south and the Kunar on the north. It then passes through a gorge in the Mohmand hills into the Peshāwar District of British India near Mičānī. Here it divides into two branches, the northern one of which receives the Swāt R. Afterwards the branches re-unite. After a course of 316 miles the Kābul falls into the Indus near Aṭāk.

It is the Skr. Kubbā, and is called Kōphēn and Kōphēs by Arrian and Strabo, Kōa by Ptolemy. The Kubbā was undoubtedly one of the Seven Rivers of the Rigveda: The Arab geographers call this river by various names. Al-Bērūnī speaks of the River Ghōrband which falls into the Indus below Waihand, the capital of al-Qandahār (i. e. Gandhāra). This name is taken from the Ghōrband Pass near which the Pandj-hēi River rises. Al-Mas'ūdī says "the fourth river of the Pandjāb comes from the country of Kābul and its mountains which form the frontier of al-Sind". The modern name of the river in Pashto is Sind, (also a general term for "river"). Bābur speaks of the Sind river as rising in a mountain to the west of Kābul, and no doubt alludes to the Kābul R., though elsewhere he applies the name Sind to the Indus. The name Kāma given by Elphinstone (Appendix on Rivers) appears to be a misnomer, as Kāma is the name of a tributary only.

The town and district of Kābul seem to have taken their name from the river.

2. An important city, now the capital of Afghānistān, situated in 34° 30' N. 69° 13' E. 5780 ft. above sea-level, in a fertile and well watered plateau. Population about 150,000.

Although the Kābul River under various names [q. v.] is known from the earliest times, there is no mention of any town which can be identified with Kābul. Ptolemy's Karoura has been supposed by some to be Kaboura, and the people he names Bōlitai are conjectured to be properly Kabolitai or people of Kābul, but these guesses rest on no evidence. Kōphēnē is probably the name of the whole valley derived from the river Kōphēn.

This territory was reoccupied by the Bactrian King Demetrios and formed a Greek kingdom until about the commencement of the Christian Era. The Parthian Gondophares seems to have held it for a time and the Kushan invaders were in possession of it during the 1st century. A vase bearing an inscription of King Huviska has been found at Wardak near Kābul. Buddhism was the religion at this period. The Kushans were supplanted by the Ephthalites for a period, but some branches of the race seem to have recovered power afterwards, and held it when Hiuen Tshang passed through in 657 A. D. Kao-fu is the name given to Kābul by the Chinese at this period. Buddhism was gradually replaced by Brahmanism, and this was the religion of the later Kushans, known by the title of Shāhī, who, as we learn from al-Bērūnī, were superseded by their Brahman wazīrs, probably about the time of the first Muhammadan invasions. It is probable that after the first invasions the Hindū kingdom of Gandhāra was ruled from its capital Udabhandā (or Waihand) on the Indus, and extended to the foot of the mountains west of Djalālabād, but did not include Kābul proper, which continued as a separate principality under its own Shāh, sometimes under Muhammadan influence and sometimes independent, till Sabuktigin's time. By the earliest Arab chroniclers the country as a whole is termed Qandahār i. e. Gandhāra, which has often been mistaken for the town of Qandahār. Thus Ṭabarī tells us that under 'Omar in the year 23 'Asim b. Amr and 'Abd Allāh b. 'Omair pressed on through Sistān as far as the Indian frontier and Qandahār. The town of Kābul is not distinctly mentioned, the Kābul Valley and the adjacent Kōhistān up to the Hindūkush passes being described as the country of the Kābul-Shāh and the capital as an inaccessible mountain fort of an uncertain name (read Djurwas by Le Strange). Ya'qūbī says that it was conquered under 'Othmān by 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Samura, but when he wrote it was known only by the export of the Chebulic (or Kābuli) myrobalans. Another expedition followed in Mu'āwīya's time, and again in 176 (793) under Hārūn al-Rashīd an army from Balkh invaded the valley from the north via the Bāmiyān Pass. There was another invasion in the time of al-Ma'mūn, which led to the submission of the Kābul-Shāh and his acceptance of Islām. These expeditions seem to have led to a nominal submission and acceptance of Islām but there seems to have been no actual occupation before that of the Ṣaffāris in 257 (871). Pandjhir with its silver mines was no doubt a powerful attraction and coins were struck there by Ya'qūb b. Laith. But it cannot be said that the name of Kābul applied to any particular town until later, and in any case it was not an important centre. It may be noted that the attack made by Ya'qūb b. Laith was from the north by way of the Hindu-kush passes, and not by the more obvious route from Sidjistān, by way of the Arghandāb Valley and Ghazna. The ruler of Kābul at this period is described as a Turk by race and a Buddhist by religion, and it is probable that he was a successor of the later Kushan [cf. AFGHĀNISTĀN, i. 161].

It was never a mint town before the time of the Mughal Emperors. Coins were first struck there by Bābur [see art. BABER]. Throughout the rule of the Ghaznavids [q. v.] and Ghōrids [q. v.] Ghazna was the capital. Al-Idrīsī mentions Kābul as a large Indian city on the border of Tukhārīstān, and adds that no ruler could take the title of Shāhī till he had been inaugurated at Kābul. His information was probably derived from authorities much earlier than his own period, when the kingdom of the Shāhīs had long ceased to exist.

It seems probable that the frequent destruction of Ghazna led to the rise of Kābul and after Timūr's time it became the centre of a principality under some members of his family. After the death of Abū Sa'īd [q. v.], his son Ulugh Beg obtained possession of Kābul and held it till his death. His son was expelled by Muḳim, a son of Dhu 'l-Nūn Beg Arghūn, who in his turn was driven out by Bābur in 910 (1504). This formed the foundation of Bābur's Indian empire, and even when his son Humāyūn was driven out of India, Kābul was not lost by the family, but was held first by Kāmran and afterwards by Humāyūn himself till India was recovered. Bābur was fond of Kābul, and gives an enthusiastic description of its climate, its streams, its fruits and flowers. After his death at Agra his body was brought to Kābul and his tomb still exists in a garden laid out by himself near the town. From this time the history of Kābul is bound up with that of the Mughal Empire of India. It became a mint for gold, silver and copper, and coins of most of the emperors are found up till the time of Muḥammad Shāh. In 1738 it fell into the hands of Nādir Shāh, and although a rupee of the emperor 'Ālamgir II was struck there after Nādir Shāh's death, it never again belonged to the empire, but was very soon taken by Aḥmad Shāh Durrānī [q. v.]. It soon superseded Qandahār as capital of the Durrānī dominions, and has continued to hold that position under Sadozais and Barakzais till the present day. [For history see under art. AFGHĀNISTĀN, i. 169^b sqq.]. The town grew in prosperity as the capital of an important kingdom, although it suffered much during the various wars, especially those between 1839—1842 between the Sadozais and Barakzais, in which the British army of occupation took part, and in the civil war between Shēr 'Alī and his brothers. Under 'Abd al-Rahmān Khān [q. v.] and Ḥabīb Allāh the town has been improved and good roads and bazaars constructed. The Bālā Ḥiṣār or old palace citadel on a rocky hill has been dismantled, the upper part has become an arsenal. A new fortified palace known as the 'Ark was built by 'Abd al-Rahmān outside the town between Shērpūr and 'Ālamgandj.

In addition to the tomb of Bābur mentioned above, the tomb of Tīmūr Shāh Durrāni is also near Kābul.

3. Kābul is also the name of the province in which the capital is situated. It is bounded on the north by Afghān Turkistān, on the west by Herāt, on the south by Kandabār and on the east by Djalālābād. It includes the Paghmān Mts. to the north-west and the Hazārājāt in the south-west. Ghaznī is comprised in its limits, and the boundary between Kābul and Djalālābād is at Djagdalak.

KĀBŪL (A.). Acceptance of the offer (in contracts); see IDJĀB.

KĀBŪS B. WASHMGĪR, SHAMS AL-MA'ĀLĪ, ABU 'L-HASAN, nephew of Merdāwīdj h. Ziyār and fourth ruler of the Ziyārid dynasty (his genealogy is given by his grandson, Kābūs Unşur al-Ma'āli in his preface to the Kābūs-nāmah). Called to the throne by a military conspiracy, in 366 (976) he succeeded his brother Zahr al-Dīn Bahistūn as ruler of Djurdjān and Tabaristān. When the Būyid Fakhr al-Dawla [q. v.] had quarrelled with his brother 'Aḡud al-Dawla [q. v.] and the latter deprived him of his whole kingdom in 369 (979/80) Fakhr al-Dawla took refuge with his father-in-law Kābūs. As the latter declined to hand him over to the victor, 'Aḡud al-Dawla sent a force against Kābūs who after a defeat at Astarābād in 371 (981/2) fled with his protégé to Nishāpūr to Husām al-Dawla, governor of Khōrāsān under the Sāmānid Nuḥ b. Manşūr. The latter sought to conquer Tabaristān for himself, but Husām was defeated. On the death of the Vizier, Abu 'l-Husain al-'Utbi, Husām was summoned to Bukhārā to succeed him and took Fakhr al-Dawla and Kābūs with him. Soon after the death of 'Aḡud al-Dawla at Baghdād (373 = 983) Fakhr al-Dawla gradually reconquered Djurdjān and Tabaristān and wished to restore them to Kābūs but was persuaded by his vizier Ibn Abhād al-Sāhib [q. v.] to keep them for himself. After the death of Fakhr al-Dawla however Kābūs regained his inheritance after seventeen years' exile in 388 (998) and held it till in 403 (1012) his tyranny and the many executions ordered by him produced a rising of the troops, who deposed him and put on the throne his son Minoṭīhr, who was summoned from Tabaristān. Soon afterwards he was put to death by the rebels in the fortress of Djenāshk between Djurdjān and Astarābād by being deprived of his clothes, while engaged in his religious ablutions, and then allowed to perish of cold. He was learned in several branches of knowledge, particularly astrology, and left several short treatises (rasā'il) as well as Persian and Arabic poems. He was also a distinguished calligrapher. The poets Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. 'Alī of Sarakhs and Ziyād b. Muḥammad of Djurdjān sang his praises (Muḥammad 'Awfi, Lubāb al-Albāb, ii. 18, 19).

KABYLIA, a mountainous country in the Algerian Tell. The name Kabylia or land of the Kabyls (Arab. Bilād al-Kabā'il) is of comparatively modern origin; it is not found in the Arab historians or geographers, nor is it usual among the natives. It seems only to have been introduced as a geographical name by European scholars since the sixteenth century. The name Kabyls is taken from the Arabic ḡabā'il, plur. of ḡabīla, "tribe", which some Arab writers use as a synonym for Berbers; this is found as early as the author of the Kirfās, who several times (e. g. p. 217 and 238 of the Arabic text), in detailing the contingents of troops in the Marinid armies, carefully distinguishes the ḡabā'il from the Arabs.

The European geographers sometimes give the name Kabylia to the whole mountain system of the Algerian coast from the mouth of the Isser to the Tunisian frontier. These elevations show in fact several common characteristics: predominance of the older strata with a few less extensive chalk zones intervening, an irregular outline, a striking development of forest flora, a population consisting of settled tribes who for the most part have retained their Berber dialects. According to the different mountain ranges, Kabylia is divided into the following fairly well defined areas: Great Kabylia or Kabylia of the Djurdjura, Little Kabylia or Kabylia of the Babor mountains between the Summam in the west and the Wād al-Kabr in the east, Kabylia of Collo, Kabylia of the Djebel Edugh and Kabylia of Bōna. The first named of these areas is the most extensive and has the most marked character; it is therefore called Kabylia by preference and we shall deal with it alone in the following.

Great Kabylia is bounded on the north by the Mediterranean from the mouth of the Wād Bū-duāu to Bougie, i. e. for a length of 100 miles. In the east it is bounded by the valley of the Wād Sāhel (called Summam in its low course) and by the upper course of the Isser, in the west by the valley of the Wād Būdūāu and the Mitidja plain. The area thus included measures about 41 miles from N. to S. between Dellys and Bwīra (Bouira) and covers some 2307 square miles. Access is rather difficult except from the west. Here the gateway of Ménerville (pass of the Benī 'A'isha 450 feet high), the valley of the lower Isser, the depression of the Wād Shander and the pass of Haussonvillers (600 feet) afford an easy access to the Sebau plain, i. e. the heart of Kabylia.

Kabylia falls into three separate areas very different from each other: the Kabylia mountains in the narrower sense, the Djurdjura chain and the coast range. The Kabylia mountains "consist in the centre chiefly of gneiss and micaceous schists with larger or smaller intrusions of granitic rocks and, on the flanks, of archaic schists and primary argillaceous schists, the layers of which form the outer spurs with their gentler slopes. In the west of these mountains and separated from the main group by tertiary deposits rise several isolated rocky peaks: Bū 'Arūs, the massif of the Khashna (2050 feet), the Djebel Bellūwa (2310 feet) north of Tizi Uzū". The Kabylia massif is connected as it were by an isthmus with the central part of the Djurdjura and cut off on the other sides by a continuous depression, in the north by the valley of the Sebau, as much as 11 miles broad, in the west by the valley of Dra' al-Mizān and in the south by the depression of Bughni. The whole system, sloping from west to east (from 4225 to 1950 feet) is divided by deep and narrow valleys into mountainous blocks (hills of the Ma'atka, the Flissa and of the Zwāwa, etc.).

The Djurdjura forms in the south the edge of the Kabyl massif for about 40 miles from Tizi (Berber = pass) Djabūt (3850 feet) to Tizi-n-'Shria (4010 feet). It consists of lias limestone, split up into a series of sharp combs or steep rocky walls, and maintains an elevation of a little over 6500 feet. The highest summits, which run in two rows, are the Haizer (6935 feet) and the Akukur (7490 feet) in the north and in the south the Lalla Khadidja (7500 feet). This altitude and the scarcity of the passes, which are impassable in the winter (the most important is the Tirurda Pass (8655 feet), make traffic between the two slopes very difficult. In the east of the Djurdjura proper, in the Djebel Arbalu, there reappear scattered layers of limestone, running down to the sea where they end in the Gūraya of Bougie.

At a lower elevation (2600—3900 feet) the coast range stretches along the sea-coast from the mouth of the Sebau to the Djebel Akfadū and covers the greater part of eastern Kabylia with its sandstone formations.

From this variation in elevation and geological structure result marked differences in climatic conditions. In the valleys, notably in the basin of the Sebau, cut off from the sea by the coast range, the summer is very hot (mean July temperature in Tizi Uzū 35° C.). In the Kabyl mountain country on the other hand there is a long cold winter, during which the ground is often continually covered with snow, which lies on the summits of the Djurdjura from December to June. The rainfall is unevenly distributed — being particularly heavy in the east of the district where it averages 40 inches p. a., while the lowlands, notably that of the Wād Sāhel-Summam, which is sheltered from the moist winds by the wall of the Djurdjura, are relatively dry. Nevertheless Kabylia is one of the best watered areas in Algiers. Four river-systems are distinguished: — the Isser, the Wād Sāhel Summam, the coast rivers, and the Sebau. The latter collects the water from the north slope of the Djurdjura, supplied by tributaries, flowing at the bottom of narrow valleys cut through the Kabylia mountains. None of all these water-courses is navigable; they are all mountain torrents and are liable to considerable variations in their amount of water. The winter-rains and the melting of the snow produce a considerable, often devastating, increase in their volume.

Lying within the so-called Numidian zone which is marked by luxurious forests, Kabylia does not have the treeless appearance of most Algerian landscapes. The flint and sandstone formations of the eastern part support great wooded mountains (Yakūren, Tizi Ufella, Akfadū etc.) which are covered with different kinds of oaks such as the cork, the zān (chênes zâens, quercus Mirbeckii), the afures (quercus castaneofolia) and ballū or hazelnut oak. Several cedar plantations, which however are on the verge of extinction, cover the slopes of the Djurdjura up to a height of 3900 feet. Trees are especially cultivated in the Kabyl mountains where they afford the inhabitants the greater part of their resources. The leaves of the ash-trees are used to feed the cattle, while its wood is used for agricultural and domestic implements and vines sometimes cluster round their stems. The fig and olive trees, the first of which is grown up to 3250 feet and the latter to 1950 feet, play an important part in the life of the Kabyls. Dried figs and oil form the basis of the food of the population; the superfluity is sold abroad. These fruit trees are therefore cultivated with the greatest care and in increasing numbers, so that we find fig and olive trees even on almost inaccessible slopes, where the soil has to be supported by mortarless stone walls. Vegetable fields and orchards surround the houses and villages and their produce serves to supply the daily wants of the inhabitants. Wheat is grown only on the low-lying ground and as a rule only in the districts settled by Europeans. As the scarcity of meadows hardly allows cattle to be reared, the native stock consists of a few cattle and sheep and a large number of goats. The mule is the only suitable beast of burden for this mountainous region.

Kabylia is the most populous part of Algeria as it has about 660,000 inhabitants or 250 to the square mile. The population however is very unevenly distributed. Scattered in Djurdjura, comparatively thin in the forest region, it is however very dense in the Kabylia mountains where the soil of the nature and abundant springs afford more favourable conditions for human settlements. The mixed community of Fort National and that of Djurdjura number, the former 61,726 to 145 miles, the latter 66,353 to 125 miles that is about 418 and 530 to the square mile or about the density of population in Holland. The natives live in groups in villages, sometimes up to several thousand in one village. These settlements lie on the hill-tops or on the mountain ridges which separate the valleys from one another. The choice of site was settled by consideration for the most profitable use of the arable part of the slopes and also for the necessity for securing a defence against neighbouring tribes. Surrounded by a belt of gardens protected by cactus hedges and encircling walls of stone without mortar, accessible only by steep paths, these villages were really fortresses, sometimes impregnable to an opponent unless provided with artillery. Since however the French occupation guarantees the peace of the land, the natives show a certain tendency to leave the summits and move their dwellings nearer to the valley. In spite of the picturesque appearance which the closely huddled together white houses with their brown tiles make, these villages are in reality only piles of wretched dirty hovels. Most of the houses consist of one storey only and have neither windows nor chimney. As a rule they are divided into two by a wall breast high, of which one part is for men and the other for cattle. The very scanty furnishing consists chiefly of mats, which take the place of bedding, and stone vessels, which hold the family provisions. The groups of houses are separated from one another by narrow passages, which are just broad enough to allow a loaded mule through and are encumbered with dung and rubbish. The only public building is the mosque which, only recognisable by its minaret, is in almost as miserable a condition as the private dwelling houses. As there are no shops in the village where the natives could make their necessary purchases, they have to go to a market (ṣūq) which is held weekly at a definite place, usually in the neighbourhood of a river or spring. This market has a great attraction for the Kabyls as they come to it not only to purchase food and other necessities but also to meet the inhabitants of other villages and learn what is going on. The market usages have therefore been very strictly regulated. The market formed a neutral area, visitors to it enjoyed a special protection called "anāya of the market".

The Kabyl population is increasing steadily and rapidly, but the soil, which is of only average fertility, in spite of the aptitude of its inhabitants cannot support them all. The once flourishing native industries such as weaving, making carpets, ornaments, and arms (especially among the Flissa and the Banī Yenni) are disappearing more and more before European competition. The natives thus find themselves forced to leave their native land and seek work outside it, as moreover they used to do in earlier times also. Under Turkish rule hill dwellers used to come in considerable numbers to Algiers to gain a livelihood as servants, porters or gardeners. Others, notably the Banū Yaḥyā, the Banū Iliten and the Banū Aṭṭaf went about among the Arab tribes as pedlars (ḥaṭṭāren) and combined money-lending with commerce, as their descendants still do. The French conquest and the expansion of colonisation have opened new outlets for the industry of the natives. While they work in the coast towns as bricklayers, hodmen, and dock labourers, the Kabyls at the same time supply the farmers of the Tell of Algiers and Constantine with the labour so necessary for the harvest and vintage. They also readily labour on public works as well as in the mines of Algeria and Tunisia and for some years past in those of France also. Others again enlist in the native regiments, especially the tirailleurs. But the Kabyl's emigration is only temporary; — as soon as the pedlar, the agricultural labourer or the miner has saved a little capital, he returns to his village to buy a strip of land or at least a few trees at the earliest opportunity. The impulse to acquire property is very strong in them and the land is thus broken up into very small shares.

The Kabyls form the most important and at the same time the most compact Berber group in all Algeria. Yet they cannot be regarded as absolutely pure descendants of the old African race which inhabited North Africa before the foreign conquests and the immigrations of the historical period. The very formation of the country made it a place of refuge for the inhabitants of the plateaus and valleys, who were pushed back by the continual inroads of foreign peoples into North Africa. In addition, as Hanoteau points out, Kabylia was at all times an asylum for outlaws and evil doers. The present Kabyl type is therefore the result of numerous crossings and far from being homogeneous. Many individuals can hardly be distinguished from Arabs, others and indeed the greater number, with their large bones, their square heads and their coarse features resemble the peasants of Central France. As to the colour of their hair, two types can be distinguished, the brown and the much rarer blonde. Yet in spite of these differences, the natives of Kabylia have all the linguistic, social and religious peculiarities common to all the tribes described as Berber. They talk different Berber dialects, of which the Zwāwa spoken in Djurdjura and in the Kabyl mountains is the commonest. "The Zwāwa, especially the Benī Raten, are those who, owing to their isolation, are considered to have preserved the purest Berber dialect; this gradually changes by almost imperceptible degrees as one goes westward into the dialect of the Ait Khalfūn and eastward into the dialect of the Wād Sāḥel (Wādī Sāḥil) and that of Bougie". (R. Basset, Etude sur les dialectes Berbères, Paris, 1894, Introd., p. viii.). The linguistic frontier even crosses the geographical boundaries of Great Kabylia and follows the watershed between the basin of the Wād Bū-Sellam and that of the Wād al-Kabīr. The persistence of these dialects is all the more remarkable as the French occupation, the extension of Muslim as well as European education and finally the continual development of emigration seemed likely to bring about a rapid decline in the use of Berber. Although many natives have a more or less superficial knowledge of Arabic and French, Kabyl is nevertheless still the language of the home, and the only language used by the women and children in the villages. In many districts a decline in Arabic has been noted. In the arrondissement Tizi Uzū, for example, several Arabic speaking groups comprising some 18,400 persons have become completely berberised in the last few years (E. Doutté and E. F. Gautier, Enquête sur la dispersion de la langue berbère en Algérie, Algiers 1913).

The Kabyls possess no written literature but have a fairly varied and copious popular literature (songs, often inspired by current events, fairy tales, riddles, etc.). These productions, composed by illiterate people, often women, have been handed down by oral tradition and transmitted from village to village by wandering singers whose profession is often hereditary. Some of these singers (meddāh, faḥīh) who sang the praises of the Deity, the feuds of the tribes and the heroic deeds of the warriors, were held in high esteem by their countrymen; others again who sang songs of love or humour to the accompaniment of the tambourine or the oboe were as despised as the butchers, measurers of corn and other individuals, who followed a trade regarded as degrading.

As Muslims, the Kabyls, like the other Berber tribes, adopted the creed without recognising the Qur'anic system of law (see BERBERS, i. 702). Their customs are in many points contrary to orthodoxy. Lending money at interest, condemned in the Qur'an, is generally allowed. "The acceptance of the principle that money is to be considered as goods", writes Hanoteau, "is a characteristic feature of Kabyl society which in order to remain true to its traditions has not shrunk from showing its contempt for the punishment of exclusion from the Muslim community, threatened as a punishment for usury". (Hanoteau and Létourneux, *La Kabylie et les coutumes kabyles*¹, ii. 497). The social and material position of women is far behind that assured her by Muslim law. Woman has no civil rights, being continually in tutelage; excluded from participation in the paternal inheritance, she herself is one of the family chattels. Marriage is merely an act of purchase. The man who divorces his wife still remains her owner and he fixes the price which must be paid him before she can marry again. Polygamy is legal but little practised and only a few marabouts are rich enough to afford it. The position of woman thus appears a very miserable one; she is, according to Hanoteau, "a human chattel" (Poésies populaires de la Kabylie du Furjura, p. 287). In practice, however, it appears that her position is easier than one would expect from the rigour of customary law. She holds an important place in the family and even in the villages, and, according to some authors (Rinn, Masqueray, Boulifa), she exercises a by no means negligible influence in domestic life and even in political life.

In spite of the liberties they take with orthodoxy, the Kabyls are not, as is sometimes alleged, lukewarm Muslims. They have always been and still are to-day very susceptible to the influence of fanatics. Perhaps they, at one time, like many other Berber groups, embraced Khāridjī doctrines but they were regained for orthodox Islām at the beginning of the modern era and have since then remained steadfast in their faith. Their ignorance, it is true, leaves them defenceless against the incitements of marabouts. The latter held and still hold a special position in Kabyl society. Enjoying numerous privileges (exemption from taxation, entertainment allowances etc.) they were not expected to bear arms except in the holy war and, thus placed outside tribal wars and quarrels of the soff, they kept for themselves the fruitful roles of intermediaries and peacemakers. The only representatives of education in the midst of an illiterate population, they gave the rudiments of instruction in the village schools and in the schools attached to the zāwiya, a word which among the Kabyls means a village exclusively inhabited by marabouts. Education in these schools (Kabyl thimamert, Arab. mad-mara) is confined to the elements of Arabic language and grammar, theology and law. The marabouts live either scattered among the people or grouped in families or tribes. Some claim for themselves an Arab or even Shārfan origin. These Shorfā form a privileged caste and only marry among themselves. At all periods the part played by marabouts — male and female — has been considerable. It was they who stirred up the native resistance to the foreigners, Turk or French, who tried to conquer them. They were supported by the religious orders, of which the largest is that of the Rahmāniya, which originated in Kabylia itself. Its founder was the marabout Sidi Muḥammad 'Abd al-Rahmān Bū Kōbrain, sprung from the tribe of the Ait Smā'il, who lived from 1126—1208 (1715—1798). Recruited at first from the Gueshtūla, a confederacy of which the Ait Smā'il were part, the order gradually extended throughout Kabylia. Its chiefs were the fiercest opponents of the French in 1857 and in 1871; although its influence has declined, the brotherhood of the Rahmāniya, of which the parent lodge is at Akbu, is still that which numbers most adepts (9000 members and 43 zāwiya in 1897, according to Depont and Coppolani, Les Confréries religieuses du Maghreb).

History. Practically nothing is known of the history of Kabylia before the xvth century A. D. There are no native chronicles and the notices supplied by Arab, Latin or European writers are few and fragmentary. The characteristic fact of Kabyl history during this long period seems to have been the resistance of the Kabyls to foreign penetration. In ancient times even the Romans did not succeed in establishing themselves in the massif. Their principal settlements Saldæ (Bougie) Rucazus (Tigzirt), Rusucurru (Dellys) were situated on the coast. Military posts kept a watch on the valley of Wād Sāhel and of the Isser, but the Djurdjura (Mons Ferratus) remained practically independent under the rule of native chiefs, vassals of Rome. The inhabitants of the mountainous region formed the confederation of the Five Nations or Quinque Gentes: — the Massissenses (perhaps the Msisna of the Wād Sāhel), Isafenses (Idlissen?), Jubabeni (Beni Jubar), Tendenses and Jesabenses. These natives rose in revolt several times, notably in the first century A. D., during the rebellion of Tacfarinas, then again in the time of Diocletian. From 288—297, they ravaged eastern Mauretania and western Numidia. To subdue them, Maximian had to deport them en masse. In the following century they adopted Donatist doctrines and again took up arms under their national leaders, Firmus (372—375 A. D.) and later Gildon.

We do not know at what period and under what conditions, Islām was introduced into Kabylia, taking the place of Christianity and paganism. We may, however, conjecture that this land must have for some time escaped the Arab conquest and served as a place of refuge for the last remnants of Roman and Byzantine population as well as for the Berber tribes fleeing before the invaders. In the ixth century however, the conversion to Islām was an accomplished fact, since Ibn Khaldūn (Hist. des Berbères, transl. de Slane, i. 256) mentions the Zāwā at the same time as the Ketāma among the partisans of 'Obaid Allāh and the founders of the Fātimid empire. Well treated by the Ṣanhādjī Zirids, the Kabyls then passed under the rule of the Hammādids, who reduced to obedience the mountain peoples of the Bougie region, and then under the sway of the Ifāfids. But Ibn Khaldūn himself says that the authority of the sovereigns of Bougie over the Kabyl tribes was quite nominal [cf. IRĀTEN, ZĀWĀ'Ā].

At the beginning of the xvth century, the people of Kabylia were divided into three political groupings called by western writers, the kingdom of Kūko, the kingdom of Labbès, and the principality of the Beni Jubar. The kingdom of Kūko stretched from Djurdjura to the sea, and through the port of Azzeffūn was in touch with European countries. The kingdom of Labbès comprised several tribes of little Kabylia of which the most important was that of the Beni 'Abbās in the east of the Wād Saḥel [cf. the article KAL'AT BANĪ 'ABBĀS]. The principality of the Beni Jubar comprised the population of the coast east of Bougie. The Turks who appeared in Algeria at the same period and there founded a powerful state, relied on these different groups in turn. 'Arūdī contracted a close alliance with the Sultān of Kūko, Aḥmad b. al-Kāḍī, who gave him auxiliaries and took part in the expeditions against Algiers and Tlemcen [see 'ARŪDĪ], but he thereby alienated the Sultān of the Beni 'Abbās, who took the side of the Spaniards. After the death of 'Arūdī, Ibn al-Kāḍī quarrelled with his successor Khair al-Dīn [q. v.]; he inflicted a bloody defeat on him on the land of the Flissat Umellil and remained for several years master of Algeria and of Mitīdja. An alliance with the Beni 'Abbās enabled the Turks to regain the advantage. Pursued right into their mountains, the Kabyls were forced to submit and to pay tribute. During the period of the Beylerbeys, the inhabitants of great Kabylia lived on good terms with the Turks. Khair al-Dīn and his successors recruited from among the Zwāwas soldiers whose fidelity they appreciated and on whom they could rely if necessary against the undisciplined soldiery of the Janissaries. The alliance with the Sultān of Kūko enabled Ḥassan b. Khair al-Dīn to triumph over the Sultān of Labbès who became in his turn a tributary of the Turks (1559). As to the 'Abd al-Djabbār, they had shown themselves friendly to the Spaniards and after the reoccupation of Bougie by the Turks never ceased to wage war on its garrison.

The rulers of Algiers did not however succeed in definitely imposing their supremacy on the Kabyls. The latter during the closing years of the xvth century and during the whole of the next century, were in a state of almost permanent insurrection against the Turks. The expeditions undertaken by the Pashas to chastise the rebels yielded no permanent result. The conquered tribes agreed to pay tribute but cast off the obligation as soon as the Turkish columns had quitted the country. In the course of these struggles, important changes modified the political organisation of Kabylia. The kingdom of Kūko disappeared and was replaced by the confederation of the Zwāwa. A new confederation that of the Gueshūla (Igūshdal) was founded in the middle of the xvth century by a shaiḥ named Gassem and united together the population of the western part of the Djurdjura. In the xviii century, the Turks made some progress. They succeeded in taking the mountainous region between the Wād Bugdura and the Wād 'Aīsi (1745—46) but could not subdue the Bani Rāten. Their military ports at Bughni, Bwira, Burdj Sebau were destroyed on several occasions. The first years of the sixteenth century were still more unfortunate. The Flissa invaded Mitīdja several times; in 1816 the Gueshtūla seized the burdj of Bughni and only spared the garrison at the intervention of the marabouts.

Turkish authority in Kabylia was therefore up to the end very precarious. The tribes which recognised it were distributed over two kā'idats: the kā'idat of Bughni, which included the confederations of the Gueshūla, the Banū Sa'adka and a part of the Ma'atka, and the kā'idat of the Sebau, including, besides the town of Dellys, the Banū Khalfūn, the Banū Waguennūn, the Flissat al-Baḥar, the peoples of the upper Sebau and those of the Wād al-Ḥammām. In the north-east, finally, the Turks occupied Bougie. To maintain order and collect taxes, the kā'ids had at their disposal a few hundred janissaries installed in fortified posts (burdj), and zmalas, of which several were composed of negroes ('abid). They levied taxes — which were however quite light — on the produce of the plain, collected dues in kind (sheep, grain, figs & oil) for the use of the garrisons, claimed the right of investiture of shaiḥs and granted for a fee passports to natives, etc. In return the Turks interfered very little in local affairs and only did so when they thought they could make profit out of it. The most efficacious means employed by them to bring recalcitrant tribes to order was the blockade. As the country did not produce enough grain to feed its inhabitants they were not long in submitting. The Turks, moreover, observed local divisions with the greatest care and showed themselves full of consideration for influential marabouts, to whom they gave exceptional privileges. They heaped gifts on their zawiya's and built kubba's on the tombs of the most venerated saints. Turkish rule therefore has left no feeling of hatred among the Kabyls. "The Turk", says Hanoteau (Poésies populaires de la Kabylie du Furjura, p. 63—64 note), "is the type of bravery and dignity in the popular songs; when the poet wants to praise one of his compatriots, he compares him to a Turk".

Whether nominally subject to the Turks or completely independent, the Kabyl tribes preserved intact their political and administrative institutions. Kabylia, far from forming a state, was simply an aggregation of little municipal republics, grouped in confederations of small size. The political and administrative unity was the village (thad-darth), whether a single village or a union of several hamlets (tūfik) and subdivided again into divisions called by different names in different districts (adrūm, tharift, takherrūbt, kharūba). Several villages bound together by mutual obligations formed a tribe ('arsh). At the time of the French conquest there were 1400 villages divided among 120 tribes. A confederacy of several tribes was called a thakebilt (Arab. qabila). The chief of these confederations were those of the Gueshūla, the Ait Šedka, the Zwāwa, the Eastern Zwāwa, the Ait Irāten, the Ait 'Aīsi, the Ma'atka, the Flissat Umellil and the Flissat al-Baḥar (Ifi-sen), the Ait Waguennūn, the Ait Djennād, the Ait Ghobri, etc.). In certain cases several confederations could unite for some common defensive or aggressive purpose, but such leagues had never more than a temporary character. All tribes however were not grouped into confederacies and some were content merely to contract, when in case of need, temporary alliances with their neighbours.

Kabyl organisation, was a kind of municipal republic subject to the authority of the assembly of its citizens (theğemiat, Arab. ğem'ia), which had most extensive powers. It appointed a president (amekrane, amrar, amran), who was charged with carrying out its decisions, and temman (plural of āmen), a kind of assistants, who had to support the amin in the exercise of his duties. The ğama'a fixed the quota and the apportionment of taxes, declared war, made peace, administered public charity and, lastly, modified, if necessary, local customs. All male inhabitants old enough to observe the fast of Ramaḍān took part in the assembly and were bound to be present, but in practice decisions were made by a minority of rich and influential persons, so that the government of the village was only democratic in theory. The authority of the ğama'a was, besides, limited by the obligation under which it found itself, to respect the rights of individuals or families, individual or collective guarantees sanctified by long custom, market-laws, etc. The tribe and the confederacy were organised on the model of the village, with deliberative assemblies and amin's, but the bonds which united such groupings became more and more slack as the groups increased in size. There were frequently serious dissensions within these groups. The existence in the smallest village of ğeff, that is to say, parties supporting the interests of influential personages, the exercise of the right of private vengeance (rekba) or of the right of reprisals (usiga), the care taken to make respected the 'anāya of individuals or of the community, provoked continual conflicts, which the intervention of the marabouts settled with great difficulty. The relations of the tribes and confederations were hardly more satisfactory than those of the villages with one another. Kabylia was, in a word, handed over to anarchy and there was a permanent state of war there.

The capture of Algiers by the French in 1830 put an end to Turkish rule. On hearing of this event, the garrisons retired to the Titteri, leaving the country to itself. The Kabyls, however, proved themselves no more able to unite than they had in the past. Various chiefs, Ben Sālem of the Banū Djād, Ben Zamun of the Flissa, Si Djūdi of the Zwāwa, Belkāsīm or Kasi of the Amrāwa disputed for the supremacy with one another, but did not succeed in imposing themselves on all the tribes. 'Abd al-Kādir himself was no more fortunate [see 'ABD AL-KĀDIR, i. 43 sq.]. He appointed a khalifa of the Sebau, but could not get himself recognised as Sultān by the tribes of the Djurdjura, who refused to pay him taxes as they had refused to pay them to the Turks. He was even nearly massacred by the people of Wād Sāḥel in 1839. The French, for their part, had been in occupation of Bougie since 1833, while the Kabyls of the east made frequent incursions into the Mitidja. To dispose of such dangerous neighbours the government therefore decided to conquer Kabylia at a time when 'Abd al-Kādir seemed definitely reduced to impotence. A first expedition conducted by Bugeaud in the valley of the Sebau resulted in the submission of the Flissat al-Bahr and the occupation of Dellys (1844). Interrupted by the Franco-Moroccan War, then by the struggle with 'Abd al-Kādir, who in 1849 again tried to raise the Kabyl tribes, operations were resumed in 1847 and brought the tribes of Wād Sāḥel to recognise French authority. But the Kabyl massif and the Djurdjura served as an asylum for all malcontents and continued to be a smouldering fire of rebellion, which was continually blazing out again. In 1849, the Zwāwa, the Gueshtūla, and the Banū Melhesh attacked the tribes who had already submitted; in 1851, the Sherif Bū Baghla, with several thousands of mountaineers threatened Bougie, then, repulsed by French troops, sought refuge in the Djurdjura. Pelissier in 1851, Bosquet in 1852 had to take the field against him. To facilitate penetration of the country, roads were built from Algiers to Bougie, from Dellys to Aumale and finally from Sétif to Bougie across Little Kabylia, only recently pacified. The natives, however, were not yet subdued; they took advantage of the reduction of effective troops during the Crimea war to take up arms again. The rising of the tribes of the upper Sebau necessitated the despatch of a column which crossed the country between Bougie and Dellys and penetrated as far as the Benī Yahyā in the very heart of the Kabyl massif (June—July 1854). New disturbances provoked by the Rahmāniya brotherhood in 1855 and 1856 forced the French once more to fight the tribes of the Sebau and the Gueshtūla. The results obtained however would have remained insecure so long as the Banū Rāten, the most turbulent of tribes of the massif, were not reduced to impotence. A new expedition was therefore organised in 1857 by Marshal Randon, then governor-general, supported by Generals Macmahon, Renault and Yūsuf. While reconnoitring troops surveyed the southern slope of the Djurdjura, three divisions left Tizi Uzu and scaled the slopes of the massif. The Banū Rāten were the first to be attacked and defended themselves energetically for two days. The capture of their villages and the defeat inflicted on them on the plateau of Sūk al-Arbā forced them to sue for peace (25 May). The Ait Menguellet, their allies, continued the struggle and were crushed at Isheriden (24 June). The Ait Yenni had to submit in their turn in the beginning of July. The defeat of the Ait Iliten, who had been stirred up by the female marabout Lalla Fātma, terminated the campaign. The tribes delivered hostages and paid a war indemnity, but retained their municipal autonomy and their kānūn. The building of Fort Napoléon (now Fort National) on the plateau of Sūk al-Arbā enabled the French troops to control the whole massif. The country was opened up by roads, put under military rule and divided into four administrative districts.

The most complete tranquillity reigned until 1871, when the Kabyls rose again at the incitation of the grand-master of the Rahmāniya, Shaikh al-Haddād and especially of his son al-'Azīz, who made an alliance with Mokrāni, the rebel bashagha of the Medjana. A holy war was proclaimed on April 8 at the market of Šeddūk and soon the rebels numbered 180 000 fighting men. Bougie, Delly, Tizi Uzu, Fort National, and Dra' al-Mizān were blockaded by the natives, the village of Palestro was taken and sacked by the rebels in spite of the resistance of the Europeans. The rebels even threatened Mitidja but were held up on the Alma by Colonel Fourchault's flying column. Troops sent from Algiers delivered the towns and garrisons besieged by the insurgents, who were routed at Isheriden on June 24. Shaikh al-Haddād surrendered to the French on July 13 and at the end of the same month, the valley of Wād Sāḥel was cleared of rebels. Kabylia lost its municipal autonomy and a war indemnity of 36 582 000 francs was levied on it. Besides, 446 000 hectares of land were sequestered and appropriated for European colonisation, for which centres were created in the valley of the Isser and in the valley of Wād Sāḥel. Since that date peace has not been disturbed and civil government has been organised in Kabylia as in the rest of the Tell (cf. the article ALGERIA). Primary schools with technical instruction have been established in the principal villages and education is compulsory for the natives. The latter seem to have adapted themselves to the new situation; their resources have increased to such a pitch that in some districts European colonisation has receded and considerable areas of land have been bought back by the natives. The isolation in which the Kabyls lived so long is tending to disappear and, if it is chimerical to hope even in the remote future for an assimilation of the Berber and European elements, perhaps it may be permitted to foresee for them sufficient community of interest to prevent new conflicts.

KAČĀH (sometimes written KAČ; al-Balādhuri and al-Yā'qūbi: قَصَّة; al-Bērūni: كَج; Yā'qūt, ed.

Wüstenfeld, iv. 126, 1: al-Ḳaṣṣa, but i. 505, 22, iv. 94, 10: al-Ḳass; in Anglicised spelling CUTCH), an Indian State attached to the Pālanpur Agency of the Bombay Presidency, lying between 22° 47' and 24° N. and 68° 25' and 71° 11' E. Its area is 7616 sq. m. and the population in 1911 was 513, 429 (Musalmans 126, 133). It is separated from the mainland of Sindh and Kaṭhiāwād by the great salt-swamp known as the Rann of KačĀh (Great and Little) which makes it a quasi-island. The Rann is included in its boundaries, but not in the area given above. The country is hilly in some parts, but is flat for the most part. There are signs of former volcanic action. Earthquakes have frequently occurred; that of 1819 wrought great destruction, including the capital Bhūdj.

The Rann was undoubtedly at one time an arm of the sea and may with probability be identified with the great lake described by Arrian as visited by Alexander near the mouths of the Indus. It has been identified by S. Julien, V. de St. Martin, Watters and V. Smith with the Ki-ch'a of Hwen Tsang, which he describes as under the suzerainty of the Vallabhī kings, but this is open to doubt as the province described by Hwen Tsang does not seem to have been near the sea.

Al-Balādhuri mentions a king of Ḳaṣṣa called Rāsak (Rāsik) in the time of the Caliph al-Walid I (86—96 = 705—715). The town of Surasta (Sorasra) situated in the Bay of KačĀh still existed in the 16th century. It was inhabited by the Maid (Mēd), who were reputed as pirates. According to al-Balādhuri, the people of KačĀh were Muslims in the time of Hishām 105—125 (724—743). When the power of the Muslims in the region of the Indus declined in this period, they endeavoured to maintain themselves in Ḳaṣṣa (al-Yā'qūbi). Al-Bērūni describes the eastern branch of the Mīhrān of Sindh (the Indus) as flowing into the ocean at a place called Sindhu-sāgara (the Sea of Sindh) in KačĀh, and this is clearly the Rann of KačĀh. The Rann was therefore an arm of the sea as lately as 1000 A. D., and a branch of the Indus still flowed into it. KačĀh is described by al-Bērūni also as the home of pirates (baḡūrīyāt). The Samma Rāḍjput rulers of Sindh conquered the country probably in the 14th century; the majority of them became Musalmans, but the Dihādēdjā clan, whose power was established by Mōda about 1270 to 1298, adopted a modified form of Hinduism. They have continued to rule the country under the suzerainty first of the Kings of Gūḍjarāt, then of the Mughal Emperors and lastly of the British Government. The Kālhoras of Sindh invaded KačĀh in the xviiith century (1762—5). The early reputation of KačĀh for piracy was revived in more recent times and led to the British occupation in 1815—1818. The Rāo was however soon restored.

The Dihādēdjā rulers bear the title of Rāo. Their capital is at Bhūdj and coins are struck there in the name of the Mahārāo joined first with those of the later Emperors of Dihlī and more recently with those of Queen Victoria and her successors. The port of Mandvi is a considerable town with a large coasting trade.

The KačĀhi language is peculiar to the province. It belongs to the Western Indian group of languages and is commonly classed as a dialect of Gūḍjarātī, although, according to Grierson, it may perhaps be more correctly considered a dialect of Sindhi. In accordance with its geographical position it forms a link between the two languages.

KAČĀHĪ OR KAČĀHĪ GANDĀWA. A province in Balōčistān extending from 27° 53' to 29° 35' N. and from 67° 11' to 68° 28' E. with an area of 6,415 sq. m. It forms a level plain enclosed on the N. and E. by the southern Sulaimān Mts. and on the W. by the Kirthār Ranges. To the S. it is open being bounded by the plain of N. Sindh. Politically it forms part of the Khanate of Kalāt [q. v.] with the exception of the small area of Sibi in the north which was nominally part of Afghanistan and was transferred to the British Government under the treaty of Gandamak in 1879. This district is part of British Balōčistān. The tribes in the eastern half of Kačāhī, the Dōmbkī, Umarānī and Kahīrī are only nominally subject to the Khan. These tribes lie to the east of the railway from Jacobabad to Quetta, which traverses the province from south to north. The territory west of this line is also mainly occupied by Balōč tribes with the exception of the area near Dhādhār in the north, where nomadic Brahōis are found. Everywhere there is a large settled population of Djāts. There are no large towns; Gandāwa, Shorān, Dhādhār, Sibi and Lahri are the principal places. Cultivation is carried on by irrigation from the small streams and hill-torrents which issue from the mountains; the Nāī and Bōlān on the north, the Mūla and Suklādji on the west, and the Lahri and Chātār on the east. Without irrigation, cultivation is impossible as the climate is intensely hot and the rainfall very scanty. The valleys of the Mūla, Bōlān and Nāī form passes by which communication with the uplands has been carried on from time immemorial. The two first-named are now traversed by railways which lead to Quetta and Peshin by the Bōlān and Harnai countries. The strip of territory called Našīrābād is politically part of the Sibi district. It lies adjacent to the British District of Jacobabad in Sindh, and receives its irrigation from the Sindh Canals fed by the Indus.

The population is scattered but denser than in most parts of Balōčistān. Including the Sibi and Našīrābād taluqs, and the Dōmbkī-Kahīrī country, all of which are geographically part of the Kačāhī plain, the total is 175,860 (census of 1911). The history of this tract is dealt with under arts. BALŌČISTĀN and KANDĀBĪL.

(M. LONGWORTH DAMES.)

KADĀ means literally "deciding" (ḥukm, faṣl, kaṣf, tartīb, cf. Ibn Ḥazm, Milal, iii. 51) but the root is developed in many diverging senses already in the Qurʾān, "commanding", "judging", "making so as to be fixed", "informing", "substituting", "discharging (obligation)" etc.; cf. al-Isfahānī, Mufradāt, p. 416, and Lisān, xx. 47 sqq. Technically it indicates a) the office and functioning of a judge (qāḍī); b) the discharging of a previously neglected religious obligation, e. g. of the daily worship or of fasting in Ramaḍān; thus opposed to adā, the performance of the duty at the appointed time (Juyṇboll, Handb. des Islām. Gesetzes, p. 68, note); Lane, Lexicon, p. 38^b); c) the eternal, universal decision of Allāh as to all existent things as they are continuously, very nearly the "eternal decree" of Calvinism. The point in doubt in the last use is the relation of the term to qadar (qadr), "measuring or estimating an amount", "assigning something by measure"; to ināya, "providence"; and to the will (irāda) and knowledge (ʿilm) of Allāh; further whether kaḍā is one of the "essential qualities" (al-ṣifāt al-dhātīya) of Allāh or of His "qualities of action" (al-ṣifāt al-fiʿliya); is eternal (qadīm) or originated (ḥādith). For orthodox Aṣḥʿarites kaḍā is the will of Allāh (al-Baidāwī on Kur. ii. 111) and its eternal connection (taʿalluq), while qadar is His bringing things into existence in accordance with His will. Or it is His eternal knowledge and its connection with the thing known, while qadar is His bringing the thing into existence in accordance with His knowledge. Kaḍā, therefore, is eternal as one of the eternal qualities and qadar is originated because one of the "connections" of Allāh's quality of power. But others taught that kaḍā is the bringing forth (ibrāz) of transitory things (al-kāʾināt) in accordance with the knowledge of Allāh, while qadar is the eternal defining of each thing with what of good and bad, advantage and disadvantage, it is to have when it exists. Kaḍā, then, is originated and qadar is eternal. Further, kaḍā, if it equals Allāh's will or knowledge, is one of the essential qualities, but if it is this "bringing forth" it is only one of the connections of Allāh's power, and these, according to the Aṣḥʿarites, are originated. But the Māturidites called these "active qualities" and held that they were eternal because they were names for the Māturidite quality takwīn (making to become) which the Aṣḥʿarites did not admit as a quality (al-Faḍālī with comment. of al-Baidjūrī, Cairo 1315, pp. 55, 61; al-Nasafī's Akād with comm. of al-Taftāzani etc., Cairo, 1321, p. 95). But the overwhelmingly accepted position makes kaḍā the universal, general and eternal decree and qadar the individual development or application of that in time. A phrase quoted in the Ṣiḥāḥ under QDR is significant, Mā yuḥaddiruhu ʾllāh min al-kaḍā, "That which Allāh measures out of kaḍā". Al-Rāzī on Kur. xxxiii. 37, 38 (Mafātīḥ, Cairo 1308, vi. 527) even applies the distinction to the problem of evil and of human responsibility. That which is by qadar comes in incidentally, almost accidentally, and the disadvantages (ḍarar) of the world are through it, while the good (ḥayr) is by kaḍā. Man was created by Allāh subject to lust and anger in order that, striving against these under the guidance of reason and religion, he might be rewarded. That leads in some to sin, but Allāh did not produce this consequential sin in them by intention, although it was by His kaḍar. Again, that which is by kaḍā' being universal is always perfectly intelligible — we see it happening all the time; but some of weak understanding may ask the reason for a thing which is by kaḍar. Yet it must not be thought that these latter things are necessary consequences following of themselves according to the Mu'tazilite doctrine of taḥlīd or the philosophical teaching that there is a nature in things (ṭab'). Everything is by the choice (ikhtiyār) of Allāh and He admits only a certain custom (ʿāda) in things. Among philosophers the tendency is to equate kaḍā' with Allāh's knowledge or with His eternal providence (ʿināya) or even to say that it is an expression for the existence of all existent things, taken as a whole, in the world of reason, while kaḍar is their external existence, separated, one after another (Dict. of Techn. Terms, p. 1234 sq.).

KAḌĀ' (A.). In the terminology of Turkish administration kaḍā' (kaḍā) denotes a district governed by a ka'immakām [q. v.].

KADAM SHARIF (KADAM RASŪL ALLĀH). Among the miracles (mu'djizāt) popularly attributed to Muḥammad was the fact that when he trod on a rock, his foot sank into the stone and left its impress there. (This miracle is usually referred to along with others e. g. that he cast no shadow, that if one of his hairs fell in the fire, it was not burnt, that flies did not settle on his clothes etc. (v. al-Ḥalabī, al-Sira al-Ḥalabiya, Būlak, 1292, III, 407), or that his sandals left no imprint on the sand (v. Ibn Ḥaḍḍar al-Haitamī, commentary on al-Būṣīrī's al-Ḳaṣīda al-Ḥamziya, l. 176. (Ind. Off. MS., Loth, no. 826, fol. 94). No early authority refers to such a miracle, nor can any ḥadīth be quoted in corroboration of it, as Ḍjalāl al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī himself pointed out (v. al-Ḥalabī, op. cit., i. 497). But sufficient evidence of this miracle is considered to be provided by the numerous impressions of one or both of the feet of the Prophet, which are venerated in different parts of the Muslim world. The most famous of these footprints is that in the Masjdīd al-Aḳṣā, at Jerusalem, on the rock from which Muḥammad mounted Burāk for his journey to heaven (Shams al-Dīn al-Suyūṭī, Ithāf al-Akhiṣṣā' fi Faḍl al-Masjdīd al-aḳṣā, Journ. Roy. As. Soc., xix., NS. (1887), p. 258-9). In a mosque near the southern gate of Damascus, on the road to Hawrān, is shown the imprint of the foot of the Prophet, when he half-alighted from his camel, but was warned by the angel Gabriel that God had given him the choice between the Paradise of this world and that of the next; whereupon he relinquished his intention of entering the city (W. G. Palgrave, Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia, London, 1865, ii. 19). In Cairo there are two footprints, one in a mosque called Āthār al-nabī (Rev. des Trad. Pop., ix. 689), the other at the tomb of Kā'it Bey [q. v.] (Baedeker's Egypt, 1914, p. 113), who, according to Aḥmad Daḥlān [q. v.], purchased it for the sum of 20,000 dinars; in Tanṭa, there are impressions of both the feet of the Prophet, in the shrine of Saiyid Aḥmad al-Badawī (Rev. des Trad. Pop., xxii. 410); as, also, at Constantinople, in the mosque where Sulṭān ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd I is buried (ibid., ix. 473); cf. also CONSTANTINOPLE, i. 871b.

But it is in India that this veneration for the footprints of the Prophet appears to have attained its fullest extension, and such slabs of stone are found all over the country, — sometimes venerated in buildings specially erected for their reception, as the Kadam Rasūl Mosque at Gawr, or kept with other relics, as in the Ḍjāmi' Masjdīd, Dīhli, or left disregarded in a corner of a cemetery, as in that of Shāh Ḍjāmāl, near ʿAligarh, or preserved in the house of some private person. Usually, there is the imprint of one foot only, but in the Kadam Rasūl building at Balasor (in Orissa), the stone bears the marks of both feet, as well as those of ʿAlī. (Abdus Salam, The Kadam Rasūl Building at Balasore in Journ. As. Soc. Beng., iv. [1908], 31-2.) One of the most highly venerated of these footprints is that placed over the tomb of Faṭḥ Khān, the son of Firūz Shāh Tughlāk [q. v.]; this monarch had associated his son with him in the government as early as 760 H., and the death of Faṭḥ Khān in 776 H. was a cause of great grief to his father, who erected a stately tomb over his grave, with a mosque and a madrasa attached. The footprint is said to have been brought from Madīna by the great saint of the Čishtī order, Saiyid Ḍjalāl al-Dīn Bukhārī, known as Makhdūm-i-Ḍjahāniyān; it is kept immersed in water, which is believed to possess healing power; a religious fair is held here every year, on the 12th of Rabī' al-awwal, the anniversary of the death of the Prophet (Saiyid Aḥmad Khān, Description des Monuments de Delhi, Journ. As., 1860, p. 411-2). At Uṭh, which has a rich collection of relics of the Prophet, there is a footprint in the shrine of Bandagī Muḥammad Ghawṭh (ob. 923 H.), a descendant of ʿAbd al-Kādir Ḍjilī (Gazetteer of the Bahawalpur State, Lahore, 1908, p. 166).

The slab of stone with the footprint of the Prophet, preserved in the Kadam Rasūl Mosque at Gawr [q. v.] is said to have been brought from Madīna by ʿAlā' al-Dīn Ḥusain Shāh, king of Bengal 1494-1521; the fine mosque in which it rests was built by his son and successor, Nuṣrat Shāh, in 1530 (J. H. Ravenshaw, Gaur, London, 1878, p. 20). About fifty years later, Mīr Abū Turāb, who had been appointed by Akbar leader of the pilgrims' caravan, brought back from Mecca, in 1579, a stone bearing the imprint of the right foot of the Prophet; that brought by Makhdūm-i-Ḍjahāniyān to Sulṭān Firūz Shāh is said to have represented the left foot. Akbar himself went out several miles from Agra to receive the holy relic, and carried it on his shoulder for about a hundred paces, his example being afterwards followed by his nobles and courtiers, who escorted the stone with great pomp and ceremony to the city. In the following year, when Mīr Abū Turāb was returning to his home in Guḍjarāt he received permission from Akbar to take the footprint with him; he erected a building in Asāwal, near Aḥmadābād, as a shrine for this slab and for some hairs of the Prophet, which he had also brought from Mecca with him; after his death the footprint was placed over his tomb, which is still standing to the south of the city of Aḥmadābād, but the footprint is no longer there, having been removed (it is said) to Khambāy (Mīr Abū Turāb Valī, History of Gujarat, Calcutta, 1909, pp. 97-9). The footprint on the grave of Saiyid Muḥammad Maḳbūl 'Ālam, who is buried in the precincts of the shrine of his ancestor, Saiyid Muḥammad Shāh 'Ālam, at Baṭuwā, to the south of Aḥmadābād, is said to be a copy made from the stonc in the Djamī' Masjdīd at Dihli (J. Burgess, The Muhammadan Architecture of Ahmadabad, London, 1905, ii. 20, 50). Similar copies on stone or on paper are sometimes found in the houses of private persons (G. A. Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, Madras, 1863, p. 153).

Closely connected with the veneration of the footprints of Muḥammad, is that paid to representations of his sandals. Copies of these are hung up in the houses of the pious, as a protection against the assaults of Satan, the evil eye, the depredations of robbers, etc.; they are also said to relieve the pangs of childbirth (al-Ḳaṣṭalānī, al-Mawāhib al-laduniya, Cairo, 1281 H., i. 337). Such representations are common in Algeria, Egypt, India and Syria.

QADAR. The contradictory statements of the Qur'ān on free will and predestination show that Muḥammad was an opportunist preacher and politician and not a systematic theologian. It has been demonstrated (Grimme, Einführung in den Koran, vol. ii.) that his predestinarian position steadily hardened towards the close of his life, and the earliest conscious Muslim attitude on the subject seems to have been of an uncompromising fatalism. QDR was the root used most generally to express it (see, too, QADĀ') and appears to mean primarily "to measure, estimate" and then "to assign specifically by measure" as though Allāh "measured out" his decrees. On the early opposition to this, which showed itself apparently before A. D. 700 and under Christian influences, see QADARĪYA. In the course of the conflict two extreme views and two mediating views developed, the mediating views becoming those possible in orthodox Islām. All could appeal to Qur'ānic texts and to traditions. The traditions are, of course, in great part shadows thrown back from the later controversies. They may be found in al-Bukhārī, Kitāb al-Qadar and also in part of the Kitāb al-Tibb; see, too, al-Ash'arī, Kitāb al-Ībāna, Haidarābād, p. 84 sqq. (Bāb al-Riwāyāt fī 'l-Qadar). The Djabriya [q. v.] were absolute predestinarians; man had no part at all in the actions which apparently proceeded from him. This became an heretical position in Islām. The other extreme, that man produced his own actions, was that of the Qadarites who eventually merged in the Mu'tazilites. At first they did not venture to use the word "create" (khalk) — Allāh alone was khāliq — of this producing, but employed supposedly safer terms, such as ijād, ikhtirā', but eventually they came to speak of man "creating" his actions. The intermediate, orthodox, parties were the Ash'arites and the Maturidites. Of these the Ash'arites had thought out their position most logically, while the Maturidites stated simply the evident facts in the case. The basis of the upholders of free will seems to have been ethical; the justice (adl) of Allāh requires man's freedom. But orthodox Islām in general cared little for that, although some, as al-Taftāzānī and al-Rāzī, spend dialectic on the point. It maintained the Pauline parallel of the potter and the vessels; Allāh could do what he pleased with his own. The orthodox difficulty was rather man's consciousness of freedom. This the Maturidites met by admitting that man did possess "free choice actions" (af'āl ikhtiyārīya) for which he is rewarded or punished" (al-Nasafī, Aḳā'id, ed. with comment. of al-Taftāzānī, Cairo 1321, p. 97). Man knows the difference between a voluntary grasping and an involuntary trembling, but the contradiction of this with the absoluteness of Allāh's creative power is left unsolved. Al-Ash'arī introduced the idea of iktisāb [see KASB] "accepting for one's self": man accepts for himself the action of Allāh and this accepting is man's consciousness of free will. Apparently al-Ash'arī meant that this consciousness was only another part of Allāh's creative action. Man is still an automaton although part of his machinery is that he believes himself free. Between the two wide scope was left even in orthodox Islām for discussion. The ultimate, scholastic, Ash'arite statement, denying that man possesses any action at all — which must not, however, be taken for the only possible one in Islām — will be conveniently found in al-Faḍālī's, Kifāyat al-Āwāmm with al-Baiḍjūrī's commentary, and in Luciani, Prolegomenes théologiques de Senoussi. This attitude struck so deep that even al-Ghazālī, and that even at the end of the wonderful psychological analysis of the book of the Iḥyā' on "the marvels of the heart", could quote with approval the tradition: "These to Heaven and I care not, and these to Hell and I care not" (ed. with comm. of al-Sayyid al-Murtaḳā, vii. 308); (cf. Macdonald, Religious Attitude in Islam, p. 301). For qadar among mystics see art. 'ABD AL-RAZZĀḲ above.

QADARĪYA is given regularly as a descriptive or surname (laqab) of the Mu'tazila, but it points back to a pre-Mu'tazilite time when the Muslims were beginning to ask theological questions and when, the first apparently among these questioners, there were doubters of the harsh predestinarianism of Muḥammad's last period. The later Mu'tazilites resented the name and held that it applied better to those who maintained Allāh's ḥa-lar of all things, good and bad, than to themselves who held that man has a certain power (ḥudra) over his actions. This, the orthodox said, was because they wished to avoid the saying of the Prophet. "The Qadārites are the Madjūs (Zoroastrians, Dualists) of this People", which meant that they made man a ḫālīk al-af'āl, "creator of actions", thus giving Allāh a partner in creating. But this saying was certainly later than the rise of the Qadārites and the name may well have been first invented and applied to themselves by those who claimed a qadar over their own actions. Another saying ascribed to Muḥammad in this connection is, "They are the opponents of Allāh in qadar", i. e. they profess to have a rival qadar to that of Allāh. Al-Taftāzānī (on al-Nasafī, p. 96) has a pointed story of how a certain Madjūsī silenced (alaṣama) 'Amr b. 'Uбайд on both these points. The name which the Mu'tazilites preferred for themselves in regard to this doctrine was "the People of Justice" (ādī); Allāh's justice required that man must be free if he were to be rewarded or punished.

KADHF (A.) is slander in a special sense. If anyone accuses a respectable person (muḥṣan) of incontinence, without being able to bring four witnesses to support him, he is liable by law to a definite punishment (ḥadd) of 80 lashes for kadhf. The regulations on this subject in the law-books are based mainly on Qur'ān xxiv. 4. In a case of kadhf, all male and female persons are considered muḥṣan who have never been guilty of incontinence and who, in addition, are believers, freemen, of age, and in possession of their mental faculties. The right to demand the punishment of the guilty one is in the view of most faḳīh's a private right of the person slandered (i. e. a ḥaḳḳ 'ādami) so that the latter (or his heir) may also voluntarily refrain from exercising it. In the view of the Hanafī school, however, the ḥadd punishment for kadhf is a right of of God (ḥaḳḳ Allāh), and neither the person slandered nor his heir can avert this punishment from the guilty one. If a husband has accused his wife of unfaithfulness without being able to prove the charge in the prescribed manner, he can secure exemption from punishment by pronouncing the li'ān formula [see LĪ'ĀN]. Punishment, moreover, may not be inflicted on the father, mother or more distant ascendants of the insulted party, nor on minor, and lunatics. For a slave the punishment is only 40 lashes.

(TH. W. JUYNBOLL.)

KĀDĪ (A.) is the judge, who, according to the theory of Muslim law, has to decide all cases involving questions of civil and criminal law. In practice, however, there has been from quite an early period throughout the Muslim east a twofold method of administration of law, usually distinguished one from the other, with a certain amount of correctness, as "religious" and "secular". Only such questions as are popularly felt to be closely connected with religion (e. g. disputes on points of family law or inheritance, legal questions concerning pious foundations, etc.) are brought to be decided, in conformity to canon law, before the kāḍī, the "religious" judge; all other questions, according to the popular view current in the east, come within the province of the secular authorities, and they as laymen usually decide them by other standards.

The kāḍī must, according to the law, be a Muslim scholar of blameless life (ādī), thoroughly conversant with the prescriptions of the sacred law. Originally the theory of most madḥhab's even demanded that the kāḍī should be able to derive the laws to be applied in his verdicts independently as a muḍjtahid [see IDJTĪHĀD] from the sacred sources. Later, however, no one was any longer considered qualified to give his own interpretation of the law; the judges could only be muḳallid's, who were tied down to the decisions of earlier authoritative scholars. The kāḍī therefore in giving his decisions has to adhere strictly to the rules which he finds laid down in the fiḳḥ books of his madḥhab.

The administration of justice is considered a religious duty for the Muslim community. In each district the competent authority must appoint a suitable person as kāḍī. If there is only one, who could be considered legally qualified for the office of judge, he is bound to accept the office if appointed and even bound to seek the office if the authorities should neglect to give it to him.

The kāḍī has to conduct his court exactly in accordance with the procedure laid down by the law. He has to treat the parties, if they are both believers, as equals in every respect. If the defendant admits that the plaintiff is in the right, no further proof is necessary. If the defendant, on the other hand, does not acknowledge any justification for the charge, the plaintiff must support his assertions by proofs. The judgement of the kāḍī is decisive for the parties; there is no appeal from it.

To secure the independence of the judge, the law forbids the kāḍī to take presents from people who are appearing in his court. He also should avoid engaging in trade, either personally or through the intermediary of persons known to be his agents, as people might then attempt to win him to their side by offering special advantages in business.

In spite of these and many other regulations to secure as faultless an administration of justice as possible "the bad kāḍī's" have at all times given cause for complaint in Islām. Most judges were ignorant and corrupt. If upright men filled the office, they frequently found themselves forced to bend the law to suit the will of authority. In religious circles then there soon arose a strong disinclination to fill the office of judge. Traditions were put into currency in which the Prophet was made to utter grave warnings against accepting the position of kādī. Pious faḳīh's e. g. Abū Ḥanīfa [q. v.] declined to fill the office of judge.

For many centuries past no Muslim judge has any longer come up to the original theoretical requirements of the law; therefore any existing kādī is regarded by Muslim scholars only as kādī 'l-ḍarūra, i. e. as an emergency kādī, to whom one must go, in default of a better.

On the history of the office of kādī and of the kādī's see: R. J. H. Gottheil, The Cadi, the History of this Institution in Revue des Études ethnographiques et sociologiques, i. (1908), p. 385—393; The History of the Egyptian Cadis as compiled by Abu Omar Muhammed al-Kindi, ed. by R. J. H. Gottheil, New York 1908 (with an introduction); cf. The Governors and Judges of Egypt of el-Kindi, ed. by R. Guest (Gibb Mem. xix.), 1912; and also the important remarks on the office of kādī in Cordova by Ribera in the introduction to his edition of al-Khushanī, Kitāb al-Ḳuḍāt bi-Ḳurtuba (Hist. de los Jueces de Córdoba por Aljoxani, Madrid 1914; cf. Hādījī Khalifa, ii. 141, n^o 2279).

The Prophet and the early Caliphs often decided disputes in person as judges, as did their governors and prefects in the various provinces. Justice was always administered in Muslim lands to a great extent by local authorities, notably the police officials. This was sometimes called Naẓar fi 'l-Maẓālim (al-Māwardī, ed. Enger, p. 128 sqq.; H. F. Amedroz, The Maẓālim Jurisdiction in the Ahkam Sultaniyya of Mawardi, Journ. Roy. As. Soc., 1911, p. 635 sqq.; de Sacy, *Chrest. Arabe*², i. 132 sqq.).

Moreover 'Umar and 'Uthmān and their successors had appointed special officers as judges (kādī). These kādī's, who always belonged to the faḳīh class, never obtained an independent position in Islām. They were often dismissed — soon after their appointment — and always remained subject to the caprice of the ruler. Cf. for example Autobiographie d'Ibn Khaldoun, transl. M. de Slane, Paris 1844, p. 103—110 (Journ Asiat., 4th Ser., iii. 328 sqq.).

The kādī's had not only to decide cases but they had also to administer pious foundations (wakf's) and the estates of orphans, imbeciles and other persons. They had often to draw up contracts of marriage for women without male relations, etc. The chief kādī in the capital was one of the high officials (al-Makrīzī, al-Khiṭaṭ, Būlāk 1270, i. 403). In eastern countries he was called kādī 'l-Ḳuḍāt, in the western kādī 'l-djama'a (Dozy, Suppl. aux Dict. Arab., ii. 363b). In later times the kādī 'l-askar was also a high official (cf. al-Kālkashandī, Ṣubḥ al-Ashā, iv. 36; Autobiogr. d'Ibn Khaldoun, p. 102, Journ. As., 4th Ser., iii. 327; J. v. Hammer, Des Osmanischen Reichs Staatsverfassung, ii. 378 sqq.). Some kādī's were military leaders.

In the large cities, where numerous adherents of the different fiqh schools lived together, a kādī was appointed, if necessary, for each madhhab. For example, there were in later times four kādīs in Cairo. (Quatremère, Hist. d. sultans mamelouks, i. 1, p. 98, Note; Autobiogr. d'Ibn Khaldoun, loc. cit.).

AL-KĀDĪ AL-FĀDIL, ABŪ 'ALĪ 'ABD AL-RAḤĪM B. 'ALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤASAN AL-LAKHMĪ AL-BAISĀNĪ AL-'AṢKALĀNĪ, MUḤYĪ (MUḌJĪR) AL-DĪN, Saladin's celebrated vizier, was born on 15 Djumādā ii. 529 (3 April 1135) at Aṣkalān [q. v.] where his father, a native of Baisān, called al-Kāḍī al-Ashraf, filled the office of judge. In 543/4 (1148—9) his father placed him in the Diwān al-Inshā' in Cairo as a learner. By 548 (1153) he had entered the service of Ibn Ḥadīd, kādī of Alexandria, as secretary. As his elegant reports from there attracted attention to him in Cairo, he was summoned thither as superintendent of the Diwān al-Djāish by al-'Ādil Ruzzik b. al-Ṣāliḥ Talā'ī, the last representative of the vizier-family of the Banū Ruzzik. When the latter soon afterwards was overthrown by Shāwar, prefect of Ḳūṣ, al-Kāḍī al-Fāḍil became secretary to Shāwar's son Kāmil and after Shāwar's murder to Shīrkūh, his successor in the office of vizier. In 563 (1167—8) he became deputy for Ibn al-Khallāl, chief of the Diwān al-Inshā', under whom he had begun his official career and on the latter's death on 23 Djumādā ii. 566 (March 4, 1171) was appointed his successor, Saladin having in the meanwhile taken over the vizierate. When in the next year, on the death of the last Fātimid, Saladin himself assumed the rule in Egypt, al-Kāḍī al-Fāḍil became his right hand man in carrying through the reforms necessary in the army and taxation. He then accompanied the Sultān on his campaigns in Syria. He was in Egypt from 585 to 586 (1189—90) to control the financial administration and re-equip the army and navy. He then returned to Syria and remained with Saladin till the latter's death on 27 Ṣafar 589 (March 1193). When al-
